ASP CEO BGen Stephen Cheney and Senior Fellow for Energy and Climate Andrew Holland recently published an article in The Wall Street Journal discussing the importance of the bipartisan Energy Policy Modernization Act and its role to improve how the U.S. approves permits for the export of liquefied natural gas (LNG).

Click here for more.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

upcoming work in the space, you may contact me directly.

Later this spring we will launch a long-term project on geo-economics, first looking at how U.S. businesses can begin to engage in Iran. If you or members of your network would be interested in working with us in this area or attending or participating in related upcoming events, please let me know.

Very respectfully,
Maggie Feldman-Piltch

Nuclear Capabilities Innovcation Act Passes the House Unanimously

On February 24th ASP sent a letter of support for the bill, signed by CEO BGen. Stephen A. Cheney USMC (Ret.) on behalf of the Board of Directors and cosigned by the Business Council for American Security's Chairperson Dante Disparte and Chair of the Fusion Advisory Committee Nathan Gilliland on behalf of General Fusion. Click here for more .

Facebook

Twitter

Website

Copyright © 2016 American Security Project, All rights reserved.
You are receiving this email as a valued supporter of American Security Project's work.

Our mailing address is:
American Security Project
1100 New York Ave
Washington, DC 20005

Add us to your address book

Update subscription preferences

This email was sent to john.podesta@gmail.com
why did I get this? unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences
American Security Project · 1100 New York Ave · Washington, DC 20005 · USA

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "t r u t h o u t" <messenger@truthout.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 2/15/2015 8:09:13 AM
Subject: Some Thoughts on Mercy: An Essay on Race and Redemption

View Recent Newsletters

Tell a friend about Truthout!

Sunday, 15 February 2015

truthout

Donate Today!

Truthout is a 501(c)3 nonprofit organization; donations are tax deductible.

Some Thoughts on Mercy: An Essay on Race and Redemption

Chris Moore-Backman and Ross Gay, Truthout: Beginning with a commonplace encounter in our racist society, poet-essayist Ross Gay tells a story that breaks open the murky and painful world of race. Through his eyes, our journey into that world of racial hurt, degradation and separateness holds out the fragile possibility of redemption.

Read the Article

Frida Berrigan: Give Your Children a Conscience Instead of Material Possessions

Mark Karlin, Truthout: Raising kids with a lot of time for friendships and work for peace and justice seems "rebellious" these days, author Frida Berrigan, daughter of two legendary antiwar activists, tells Truthout.

Read the Interview

David Krieger's Haunting Poetry: A Wake-Up Call

Leslee Goodman, Truthout: Astonishingly, WAKE UP!, David Krieger's most recent book of poetry, is fully alive to the beauty and promise of our precious world - despite the quotidian violence of those who continuously incite us to war.

Read the Review

The Challenges of Liberalism

David Palumbo-Liu, Truthout: It is those in power who get to determine the elasticity or rigidity of liberalism. They channel "blasphemy" in the directions they prefer, that is, away from their gods and churches.

Read the Article

Connecticut Schools Pin Down and Restrain "Staggering" Number of Kids

Annie Waldman, ProPublica: Connecticut public schools are far too quick to restrain or isolate unruly children against their will, leaving hundreds with injuries and many others with unmet educational

BuzzFlash

The BuzzFlash commentary will return soon.

Obama to Sign an Executive Order Promoting Private Sector Cybersecurity Information Sharing

Read the Article at Reuters

Study Finds 60 Percent of Gaza Victims of Israel Strikes Were Women, Children or Elderly

Read the Article at RT

Untested Chemicals Are Everywhere, Thanks to a 39-Year-Old US Law. Will the Senate Finally Act?

Read the Article at The Guardian

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

needs, a state report finds.
Read the Article

US Looks to Detain More Mother, Child Migrants, Sometimes for Months

Franco Ordoñez, McClatchy Newspapers: An almost-abandoned practice of holding migrant mothers and children in prisonlike settings is not only back, but also is surging as the US government continues to struggle with the wave of migrants fleeing violence in Central America.
Read the Article

Zimbabwe's Famed Forests Could Soon Be Desert

Jeffrey Moyo, Inter Press Service: According to the United Nations Environment Programme, Zimbabwe lost an annual average of 327,000 hectares of forests between 1990 and 2010. The country's deforestation crisis is linked to several factors. Unfortunately, Zimbabwe is not the only sub-Saharan country facing a crisis in its forests.
Read the Article

Marshaling Marooned Tax Dollars

Josh Hoxie, OtherWords: Closing offshore tax shelters is a great idea. Giving a major tax break to the corporations that built them is not. A better proposal would close loopholes for both corporations and the super-rich and spend some of the extra money collected on infrastructure.
Read the Article

A Tiny Step Toward Ending a CEO Scam

Sam Pizzigati, Campaign for America's Future: The SEC has just issued proposed regulations on executive hedging. But the new rules don't prohibit executives from betting against their own companies, they just require companies to let us know if they let their executives do this betting.
Read the Article

How Bail Punishes the Poor for Their Poverty
Read the Article at The Washington Post

ACLU Sues for Records on Border Patrol's "Roving" Agents
Read the Article at the Associated Press

US Military Just Can't Kick Its Afghanistan Habit, Picks Up Pace of Night Raids
Read the Article at emptywheel

"Ferguson Everywhere": Hundreds Protest Police Killing of Latino Worker in Washington State
Read the Article at RT

Obama, the National Prayer Breakfast and the Tortured Truth of Christian History

Mikey Weinstein, AlterNet: "At this sorry historical moment of rampant fundamentalist religiosity, racialized xenophobia and purely irrational bigotry, catastrophe is on a precipitously dangerous winning streak."
Read the Article

This week in Speakout:

Eric Draitser notes that while the election of Syriza in Greece has been vital to the future of the country, it is not the only means by which the Greek working class is building a future for itself; Dean Baker highlights how Washington Post columnist Robert Samuelson is unhappy that seniors get Social Security and Medicare; Victoria Collier looks at how citizens are mobilizing to resist undemocratic corporate water grabs; Kathy Kelly reflects on her time in Lexington federal prison, abolitionism and how to make the shift from a thing-oriented society to a person-oriented society; US Right to Know staff spotlight a recently removed internet video in which the public relations firm Ketchum bragged about its success in spinning the media to get positive coverage of GMOs; Alex Kogan wonders if the renewal of sanctions launched in response to Russian involvement in Ukraine are a curse or a blessing; Dan Riker urges political leaders to control corporations before they completely control us; Tor Ekeland reports that Canada has denied refugee status for

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Anonymous-linked Matt DeHart, who was tortured by the FBI; and more.

Read the Articles

Support Truthout with a tax-deductible donation

Please add messenger@truthout.org to ensure you receive our messages

Truthout is a proud member of the New spaper Guild/CWA, Local 36047

Subscribe | Unsubscribe

Privacy Policy

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Gene Karpinski, League of Conservation Voters" <josh_hicks@lcv.org>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 10/17/2012 9:49:57 AM
Subject: Quick Election Update: 20 days to go!

LEAGUE OF CONSERVATION VOTERS

Dear John,

You and I have always known that this election was going to be close. And as we enter into the final critical days, the race to the White House and the battle for the Senate remain dangerously tight. As we saw again in last night's debate, the stakes couldn't be higher.

Thanks to your generous support, LCV's campaign team is in full gear in key battlegrounds across the country. We now have 24 full-time organizers deployed in 11 states and we are mobilizing thousands of LCV members to volunteer between now and Election Day. No slowing down until we cross the finish line.

The Washington Post put out a great piece this week highlighting the central role LCV is playing in key races across the country: League of Conservation Voters Spends Heavily on 2012 Campaign. And as you'll see from the update below, environmental champions across the country are counting on us to help close the gap in tight races.

With 20 days until this critical election, LCV Victory Fund is still $350,000 shy of raising the resources we need to run our targeted campaigns at full scale, and any additional support you are able to lend will be very well spent!

With deep appreciation,

Gene

LCV Launches Ad Campaign in Arizona

With a month to go until Election Day, the Arizona Senate race has emerged as a surprisingly competitive race. The Cook Report moved it to a "toss-up" race and the Real Clear Politics average of public polling shows Dr. Richard Carmona only 2.3 points behind Rep. Jeff Flake. The contrast of these two candidates' positions on our issues is as clear as it is in any race, with Rep. Flake earning a dismal 9% lifetime score from LCV.

We just can't let this rare opportunity to elect an environmental champion from Arizona pass us by. This week LCV and Majority PAC launched a new $470,000 television ad campaign against former mining lobbyist and Congressman Jeff Flake for sponsoring legislation that most Arizonans are emphatically against: allowing mining for radioactive uranium near the Grand Canyon and Colorado River, threatening the drinking water of 25 million Americans. The ad, "Dangerous," will air in the Phoenix media market and will run through October 24th. To view the ad, please click here .

LCV turns up the heat on the Flat Earth Five

With your support, LCV launched a new $200,000 television ad campaign against "Flat Earth Five" member Rep. Ann Marie Buerkle (NY-24) for her extreme environmental voting record, and for denying the existence of climate change, which she has called a "myth." The ad, "Support," is airing in the Syracuse media market and will run through October 23rd. To view the ad, please click here .

We also launched a clever billboard campaign targeting each of the members of the "Flat Earth Five" campaign to highlight their extreme, anti-science views on climate change. The billboards , which will stay up in all five Congressional districts through Election Day, are part of LCV's campaign against Rep. Dan Benishek (MI-01), Rep. Ann Marie Buerkle (NY-24), Rep. Dan Lungren (CA-07), Rep. Francisco Canseco (TX-23), and Rep. Joe Walsh (IL-08).

More information about the Flat Earth Five can be found at http://www.lcv.org/flatearthfive .

Join us in New York to honor Robert Redford

We hope you will join us at the League of Conservation Voters' annual New York Dinner on Wednesday, October 24th at Hilton Hotel in New York City. We are thrilled to present the Lifetime Achievement Award to Robert Redford for his exemplary leadership to protect the environment and will also hear from New York Senator Chuck Schumer. It is sure to be a great evening! You can purchase tickets at www.lcv.org/NYDinner or contact Jenna Ebert at (202) 454-4583 or jenna_ebert@lcv.org if you have any questions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GiveGreen*: Because not all money is "green"

With only 20 days to go until Election Day, now is the time to donate as generously as you can to pro-environment political candidates. For environmental voters like yourself, the best giving strategy is to "bundle" your contributions with contributions from others who share your environmental values. Bundling through LCV Action Fund's GiveGreen magnifies the power of your contribution by calling attention to the environmental values that drive you to support the candidate in the first place. LCV Action Fund has already raised and contributed nearly $2 million in support of environmental candidates this cycle. Visit www.givegreen.com today to support LCV Action Fund's featured environmental champions.

Paid for by League of Conservation Voters, www.lcv.org , and not authorized by any candidate or candidate's committee.

Update Your Profile
To Unsubscribe Click Here

1920 L Street, NW Suite 800
Washington, DC 20036
202-785-8683

POWERED BY blackbaud
nonprofit software

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Ryan Duncan" <ryan@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: "Big Campaign" <bigcampaign@googlegroups.com>
Date: 8/29/2008 4:35:05 PM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Evening 08/29/08

Main Topics: Sarah Palin as McCain's Surprise V.P. Choice, Palin Interviewed, Maverick or Gimmick?

Summary of Shift:
With the announcement of McCain's vice presidential nominee, a slew of speculation has arisen as to Sarah Paulin's ability to chair the position of commander in chief if McCain passes. The strongest arguments against her remain her inexperience (2 years as governor and small-town mayor), her limited relationship with McCain, as well as the current investigation due to her firing a commissioner under questionable intentions. Barack Obama's speech at the DNC has continued to be highlighted.
In other news, the Gulf Coast prepares for the worst as Gustav is predicted to become a category 4 hurricane. The death toll continues to rise in India amidst severe flooding during the monsoon season. The Kremlin announced that it intends to absorb South Ossetia into 'one united Russian state'.

Highlights:
1. FNC: Pfotenhauer ignorant on McCain's and Palin's short relationship
2. CNN: Jack Cafferty frowns upon Palin's domestic and international inexperience
3. FNC: Tucker Bounds dances around question on Paulin's foreign relations experience
4. MSNBC: Senator Lindsey Graham on McCain's Choice of Sarah Palin
5. MSNBC: Andrea Mitchell and Chuck Todd Discuss Palin's Risk
6. MSNBC: Hardball discusses if Palin's Selection is Just a Gimmick
7. MSNBC: Countdown Investigates If Palin Will Be Able to Draw Clinton Voters
8. MSNBC: Rachel Maddow Highlights Palin's Bridge to Nowhere Flip-Flop
9. MSNBC: Representative Debbie Wasserman Schultz Blasts Palin as Anti-Women Issues
10. MSNBC: Rep. Eric Cantor Supports Sarah Palin's Experience
11. MSNBC: Race to the White House Asks If Sarah Palin is the New Dan Quayle
12. CNBC: Sarah Palin Interview Discusses Energy and ANWR Drilling

Highlights, No YouTubes:
1. MSNBC: Mike Murphy gave the Bush presidency a "C" grade
2. MSNBC - DAN SCHNUR: "I think, like everybody else in the universe, I am extremely surprised. Earlier this summer when McCain was running 10, 12, 15 points behind Obama a pick like this, a gamble like this would have made more sense. Conventional wisdom suggested that in a race that's essentially tied, he would have done something safer. But I think what it show's you Andrea is how much John McCain values his reputation as a Maverick. He's very steadily come back in the polls over the last couple of weeks, but it's been by running a very conventional campaign. I think given the choice of being a maverick and being president, John McCain would rather be president. A pick like this, potentially at least, gives him the opportunity to do both."
3. MSNBC - RACHEL MADDOW: On the temperament issue, I think that we'll keep hearing it because I think that McCain keeps demonstrating it. I mean, when he said "we are all Goergian's now", that may have sounded like big tough rhetoric, but he's essentially saying, let's treat Georgia like it was a member of NATO. Which means, let's treat Georgia as if it were Nebraska that just got invaded by the Russians. Let's go bomb Moscow. To have that sort of reaction, that sort of hair trigger reaction, on a very sensitive on-going policy dispute, where our own government is taking a very different attack, yeah, no matter who says that, I think temperament ought to be an issue. He keeps bringing it up himself.
4. MSNBC - PHIL MUSTER: "Well, look, I think the bottom line on experience here is she's had more experience as a chief executive as the Governor of Alaska than Barack Obama has in the United States Senate. So people grow into new jobs as they develop and take them. But her record as a chief executive in Alaska has been great. She's reached out across the board, just like John McCain has worked in a bi-partisan fashion in Washington, she's worked in a bi-partisan fashion in Alaska. She hasn't been afraid to challenge those within her own party who are wrong. Take for example, the fact that she's been outspoken in supporting a primary challenge to Don Young who sponsored the bridge to no where in our party. She calls them like she sees them, and I think America might fall in love with this woman who really brings a real common touch."
5. MSNBC - MICHAEL MOORE: […] I don't know if you showed the cake there, that they had three years ago today with McCain and Bush. When Marie Antoinette, when she said let them eat cake, I think she was speaking figuratively, they literally were, while New Orleans was drowning, eating cake.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

6. MSNBC - KEITH OLBERMAN: But our winner [Worst Person in the World] Senator John McCain. In the last twenty days, suicide bombers have killed at least 78 people in Iraq. Wounded countless others. Yet the Senator told Time Magazine, in an extraordinary and frightening interview, that as to Iraq, "It's a peaceful and stable country now." The reporters asked the natural follow-up, "It is? But you wouldn't say you've achieved victory now?" He answered, "Yes, I would say that the surge is succeeding and we are winning." So an average of four people a day dead in suicide bombings means that a country is peaceful and stable. But a peaceful and stable country does not mean victory has been achieved and we can get our men and women out of there. One way or another, you are witnessing a man suffering from at least from one actual delusion. To say nothing of an utter disrespect of the meaning of the loss of life. It is not funny, it is shameful. John McCain, today's worst person in the world.

Clips:

Highlight #1
Pfotenhauer Doesn't Know the Extent or Length of McCain's and Paulin's Relationship (FNC 08/29/08 10:08am)

BILL HEMMER: […] Tell me about the relationship between McCain and Palin. How much time have they spent together? How well do they know one another?

PFOTENHAUER: You're running flat into the wall of my ignorance here, Bill. I just, I truly, um, no indication whatsoever of the extent of a relationship that exists with the governor of Alaska. And you know there are several other folks […] and they have been at the forefront of the scene the last several months.

HEMMER: You know, Nancy, if I could just stop you there, maybe that answer itself is a bit revealing of the fact that they don't have much of a relationship. Is that a fair reading?

PFOTENHAUER: No, no, no. It's revealing of my ignorance. Not of their relationship.

Highlight #2
Jack Cafferty on Sarah Paulin's Inexperience with International and Domestic Issues (CNN 08/29/08 6:39pm)
GLORIA BORGER: […] I've been talking to some democrats who are now expecting that Senator McCain will soon name his Secretary of State, Secretary of Defense to try and relay questions about this sort of military industrial complex in his administration, should anything happen to him.

[…]

STEVEN HAYES: […] It's legitimate to wonder whether she would have this experience; but look at what she's done in Alaska. You can't just ignore her record in Alaska. She up-ended the establishment. The republican party establishment in Alaska taking on people in her own party, she's governed effectively, she's cut taxes, she's done all of these things that won her an 80% approval rating. It is absolutely not crazy to pick her. […]

JACK CAFFERTY: The state of Alaska has the population of Austin, Texas. What does she know about inner-city poverty? The war on drugs? What does she know about the Middle East? You want to put her up against Putin, Achmajenidad? She was the mayor of a town of 7,000 people in Alaska. […] Most of the republicans I heard from, including a lot of women, how dare John McCain presume because he names an inexperienced woman from Alaska, that he can start collecting the 18 million votes that were cast for Hillary Clinton? They're on opposite sides of all the issues, people are outraged. This is a joke.

Highlight #3
Bounds Deflects Question About Palin's Foreign Experience (FNC 08/29/08 1:35pm)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

TUCKER BOUNDS: […] It's an exciting pick for us. Both of these candidates share a passion for change in government, they have records of reform, and we can think of no better person to be joining us here at the campaign other than governer Palin of Alaska. So many of the issues, she has expertise on. We are important to American voters that are facing skyrocketing gas prices. She's an expert on energy issues. She understands that we need to transition to alternative fuels, renewable energies. But she also understands the importance of drilling; making sure we have those short shock measures to fight energy prices that are skyrocketing, pinching families.

TRACE GALLAGHER: […] the democrats are already on the attack here. You know they're going to go after her foreign credentials, and how do you retaliate against that?

BOUNDS: […] for them to completely ignore that Governor Palin is a governor and executive and reformer in the state of Alaska, and to belittle her, to try and say that small-town Americans , a mayor wasn't befitting of a vice presidential nominee. […] America's built on small towns. Small town Americans may have taken offense. I know I certainly did.

GALLAGHER: […] How do you respond to the democrats when they attack her foreign relations credentials?

BOUNDS: Well, Senator McCain is running for president of the United States, and I don't think anyone would disagree that in this campaign, there is no one with more experience, more understanding of the international stage, foreign affairs than John McCain. That's why Americans are gonna support him in the fall; is because he understands that we need to take the right approach overseas […]

Highlight #4
Senator Lindsey Graham on McCain's Choice of Sarah Palin (MSNBC 08/29/08 4:33pm)
PETER ALEXANDER: First question, perhaps in the case of an unforeseen tragedy, John McCain comes into office at the age of 72, would be the oldest president to walk into the White House. If for any reason Sarah Palin were to assume the presidency, are you comfortable with her leading this country?

SEN. LINDSEY GRAHAM: Given her life story, yes, absolutely. When you look at what she's accomplished in her life, from a personal point of view and a professional point of view, I don't think there's anything that she can't do. She is tough. She's reformed minded. She's taken a beating for her principles. She's put her political future at risk more than one time challenging her own party. She's a quite extraordinary lady and I would be proud for her to be my president.

ALEXANDER: If you're comfortable with her life story, I think a lot of democrats will hear you say that Senator and say, why then aren't the republicans comfortable with Barack Obama's life store? If he lacks experience but he does have a terrific life story, wouldn't that be sufficient for him as a candidate?

GRAHAM: I'm not talking just about her life story; I'm talking about her judgment. She has taking on corruption, she has made people mad at her they you would want mad at you if you wanted to reform the government. She has really done things in Alaska that are similar to what john McCain would like to do in Washington. At the end of the day, I had a chance to see senator Obama up close in the immigration debate. We had a comprehensive bipartisan deal where republicans got some things and gave some things to democrats. I saw what he did. We had a temporary worker program as part of the comprehensive bipartisan agreement that republicans wanted, unions hated. And at the end of the day he introduced an amendment to do away with that part of the deal, which was basically killing the deal. So I'm not very impressed with senator Obama, quite frankly, when it comes to doing hard things and telling democrats something they don't want to hear. I'm very impressed with governor Palin taking on her own people at times. That's what John's looking for. Somebody that will come to Washington with him, that will turn the place up side down. And Obama and Biden are not going to do that.

ALEXANDER: Senator, have you ever met Governor Palin?

GRAHAM: No. Talked to her on the phone. Anybody that hunts moose at 3:00 in the morning is high on my list.

ALEXANDER: Alright, then give us a better sense, perhaps, is this pick more of an appeal, do you believe, to the republican base? She's a strong social conservative. Or do you think it plays to independents and disgruntled Hillary Clinton supporters? Who will this sway?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GRAHAM: Good question. What I think it's going to do is reinforce what senator McCain would like to do in Washington. You know, when you look at his legislative career he's always pushed the status quo, much to his detriment sometimes. And you've got a governor, a young governor in Governor Palin, who's done exactly the same thing in Alaska. So I think that's the narrative that will resonate in both groups. People are frustrated, the Congress is at 12 percent. People are dying for something new and different, and controlling spending, reforming the way business is done. From the women perspective, I think a lot of young women in this country are going to be inspired by Governor Palin. And Republicans will be inspired by her. She's a solid conservative, but more than anything else, she's taken the status quo and corruption head on. And that's exactly what we need to do in Washington. So I think it's a two-for. I think it helps us with our base, and I think it will help us with independent voters who are looking for somebody, not to talk about change, but who has actually done something to make things change.

Highlight #5
Andrea Mitchell and Chuck Todd Discuss Palin's Risk (MSNBC 08/29/08 5:05pm)
ANDREA MITCHELL: […] Now it is a high risk, high payoff kind of nomination, because she's got no real national experience. […] She could help with Hillary Clinton voters in the suburbs of some of the big cities, in battleground states, I mean this could be a game changer. That said, the fact that John McCain only met her once, when we get this tick doc just now that, from the McCain, they didn't even know each other. This was not a carefully vetted, personal decision. This was a very calculated, strategic decision to try to change the whole game.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: […] Is this niche marketing here? In other words, you're taking a person who doesn't really conform to the profile, the voters you're trying to win over, the women voter, the working women, the very committed woman. This candidate for vice president, now apparently has no real interest in the Iraq war. She said she hasn't given it much thought, which certainly separates her from a lot of democratic women who are vastly against the war. She would outlaw abortion in every circumstance, including cases where a woman had been raped or there was incest involved. Certainly a radical view at odds to, it seems to me, in my experiences with those suburban women that Andrea just mentioned.

CHUCK TODD: Well, look, I see this pick as a decision by the McCain campaign to basically say, well, look we can not win on experience alone. Every time there's an election, a change election, and it's change versus experience, change wins and I think they came to that conclusion. Look, I had been told a couple of weeks ago that you can tell what McCain thinks about his chances by the type of running mate he names. […] They've abandoned experience and that's ok, because McCain had not been able to recapture his maverick, change image. This is giving him an opportunity to re-launch. Look, he may not win over a lot of new supporters over the next couple of days. But it's making them take a second look and that's what he needed. He needed a second look, he needed a fresh look. Look the campaign staff is fired up, they're enthusiastic. […] For McCain it's about playing with the news cycle and surprising, do these nice surgical strikes when it comes to the media. Look, it may be a disaster at the end of the day. But McCain thought they had a ceiling going on in the trajectory that they were headed.

Highlight #6
Hardball discusses if Palin's Selection is Just a Gimmick (MSNBC 08/29/08 5:15pm)
CHRIS MATTHEWS: We have a Vice President who's committed almost viscerally to the war in Iraq. Here's a candidate to replace him in a Republican Party who said this, […] "I've been so focused on state government, I haven't really focused much on the war in Iraq." I mean here she is running to replace a guy with 60 staff people involved with foreign policy and Intel collection in a very hawkish setting. How can she be a credible successor? […]

ANDREA MITCHELL: […] Foreign policy is not why she was chosen. You could argue, politically, tactically, you don't want to replace Dick Cheney with another Dick Cheney. That's not what the Republicans want right now. You've got John McCain, John McCain's your foreign policy guru. Look, there are a couple of pluses and minuses here. She's got five children, […] she will appeal to the soccer moms and the hockey moms, as she describes herself. She's got a lot of color. People are going to talk, people who don't know Alaska who don't know that part of the world, […] she eats moose burgers. This is exciting to a lot of people. Everyone up there eats moose burgers. That's the meal, that's the food, that's the meat that you get, that you shoot. That you bring home. […] She is also a bit of a libertarian. She's not completely consistent on those social conservative issues. I got a Log Cabin email from the Log Cabin Republicans saying her first veto was to protect gay rights for partners. So we need to dig a little deeper into this. […] But the biggest thing is she has no personal relationship with the man that she's running with.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CHUCK TODD: The biggest downside, Chris, is that this could look like a gimmick. Cause John McCain only met her twice. Doesn't know her. This goes against everything we think we know about John McCain. He likes to surround himself with people that he's comfortable with, that are loyal to him, and all of a sudden this is a political calculation, and it's gimmicky. And the gimmick could wear out. […]

CHRIS MATTHEWS: Let's talk about age. John McCain has just turned 72. John McCain will be 77 in his first term as President. A lot of concern he wouldn't really be running for two terms, which is unique. He'd really be running for one. And there for his running mate would really be running like his successor to be. And you have to wonder whether this is credible. Is John McCain replaceable, effectively by the Governor of Alaska, could something happen in the first term? Is this something that he can honestly say to the American people, that this person after a year in office in Juno, with no foreign policy interest? Not just experience, no interest apparently. Can this person be commander in chief if something happens?

MITCHELL: That is going to be the biggest question. […]

Highlight #7
Countdown Investigates If Palin Will Be Able to Draw Clinton Voters (MSNBC 08/29/08 8:31pm)
KEITH OLBERMAN: The Republicans have chosen the least experienced vice presidential candidate, probably in American history. A rabid conservative, seemingly a vague alternative to Hillary Clinton, except that last March the Governor claimed that Senator Clinton was "whining" about the primaries.

KEITH OLBERMAN: This wasn't really a bid for Hillary supporters was it? I mean A: If you're trying to poach Clinton women, you would announce this before the democratic heal-a-thon, not the day after it ends. And B: at your own magazine's women in leadership event, […] she felt kind of bad she couldn't support a woman, but she didn't like Clinton's "whining". So the Hillary alternative just called Hillary and the PUMA's whiners?

HOWARD FINEMAN: Well Keith, there are a lot of pro-drilling and anti-polar bear and anti-abortion women among those 18 million Hillary supporters, I'm sure. I'm being factious, I don't think there's that many left. And I don't think this really is about that. I think in big picture terms, it was about John McCain seeking to change things up to try to re-establish his Maverick credentials. Because, despite her lack of experience, Sarah Palin is sort of a brave political person, having taken on her own political party the way John McCain used to do. He wanted to underscore the desire for change, and the fact that he gets it. And he wanted to, frankly, shake things up and not make it so boring. […]

[…]

OLBERMAN: The experience argument. This had been viewed widely, as maybe Senator McCain's best weapon against Obama. He just turned this in. Why give this up for her?

FINEMAN: Well for the reasons I said. Because he hadn't established himself with the grassroots of the Republican Party. Because he wanted to be an agent of change. Because he wanted to restore his maverick credentials. I mean, that's what the McCain people were telling me all day today, the Maverick just picked a maverick. But yes, he's done it at great cost, because the whole Republican Convention, I was told, […] the slogan was going to be, he's not ready to lead, meaning Barack Obama. Well Sarah Palin makes Barack Obama look like John Adams. I mean it's no contest. […]

Highlight #8
Rachel Maddow Highlights Palin's Bridge to Nowhere Flip-Flop (MSNBC 08/29/08 8:40pm)
KEITH OLBERMAN: She said no thanks to the Bridge to Nowhere. But in 2006 one of her spokesman, I guess in Alaska her spokesman, told the Associated Press that she had supported the Bridge. So she just jumps into this national spotlight complete with the Bridge to Nowhere attached to her? Is she the bridge to nowhere?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

RACHEL MADDOW: Yeah, this is very awkward, because she is out there, in her, you know, I'm the new running mate speech, her debut on the national stage bringing up that bridge to nowhere issue. I went and looked it up in the Anchorage Daily News from 2006, she was asked point-blank about funding for that bridge, and she said yes, I would like to Alaska's infrastructure projects built sooner rather than later. The window is now while our congressional delegation is in a strong position to assist. So as recently as two years ago, she was not only in favor of the Bridge to Nowhere, which she's now saying that she wasn't, but she was also in favor of it on the basis of the fact that Alaska's congressional delegation was in a position that they could do it through earmarks. This is an embarrassing position to have taken. Not only because of the flip-flop, but they're trying to market her as a fiscal conservative who stood up to Alaska's, sort of famously corrupt Republican politicians.

Highlight #9
Representative Debbie Wasserman Schultz Blasts Palin as Anti-Women Issues (MSNBC 08/29/08 6:16pm)
DAVID GREGORY: This statement from Hillary Clinton, could this not be interpreted as a message to her own supporters that perhaps this new Republican ticket ought to warrant a new look?

REP. DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: No, I don't think that's the message that Hillary Clinton was speaking at all. On the contrary, she made it clear that John McCain and Sarah Palin are wrong on all the issues that matter to women. This is a pick that demonstrates colossally bad judgment on the part of John McCain. You know, we're talking about someone who has less than 18months experience as Governor of a state that has fewer people than my own Congressional district. Someone who was the mayor of a town of 8,000 people. Someone who would have to have their hand on the pillar of our foreign policy, and combat the war on terror, with that colossal lack of experience is frightening. And it demonstrates that John McCain, just like Barack Obama said last night in his acceptance speech, just doesn't get it.

[…]

SCHULTZ: John McCain has failed both tests, experience and judgment. He's chosen someone who totally lacks the experience that we need in a potential President of the United States, and he's demonstrated an unbelievable lack of judgment in choosing her. What he's done here is he's tried to appeal to the women of this country, by choosing someone who simply has the same parts that we do. And what matters to women is not having someone that's the same gender as we are, but we need to make sure that we have someone in office that cares the same issues that we do. Sarah Palin is wrong on a women's right to choose, wrong on equal pay for equal work, wrong on expanding access to children's healthcare. It's insulting, I have to tell you.

[…]

SCHULTZ: […] I'm sure she manages her household with five children very well, but she is not ready to manage this country.

Highlight #10
Rep. Eric Cantor Supports Sarah Palin's Experience (MSNBC 08/29/08 6:18pm)
DAVID GREGORY: Is there the potential […] that John McCain would actually experience a backlash from the very women he's trying to court here, Hillary Clinton supporters and other women around the country? Does this look like pandering?

REP. ERIC CANTOR: […] Sarah Palin represents what so many women in this country are about, trying to balance work and raising a family, and all the double income families out there in America, we all feel the strains. And the women often bare the brunt of that. So what we have in Sarah Palin is in individual that has a wealth of experience, not only raising five children, becoming a mayor, and then a governor, but also one of experience. I mean, I find it really unbelievable that the Barack Obama folks are starting to criticize Sarah Palin over lack of experience. She has as much experience as Barack Obama, and even more. She was chief executive of a state, Barack Obama has had no executive experience whatsoever.

GREGORY: He's 72 years old, he's actively talked [..] about him just pursuing one term as president. […] Now he's got someone who's 44 years old, only been Governor since 2006, will Americans look to her and think, yeah she can do the job if anything happens to him.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CANTOR: I think Americans will pull the level when they go into the ballot booth in November, they'll put it based on Barack Obama versus John McCain.

Highlight #11
Race to the White House Asks If Sarah Palin is the New Dan Quayle (MSNBC 08/29/08 6:46pm)
RACHEL MADDOW: This feels a little Dan Quayle like to me. I mean, I guess it would be Daniel Quayle. Have they ever been seen together before? Are there any pictures of them together? Is there any evidence that they've ever spoken? In an interview today, Sarah Palin did not know what John McCain's plan is on Iraq. I mean, the reason that Dan Quayle was a bad choice is that it was a transparent electoral choice. I think this guy will make me look younger, I think this guy will make me look more like the future. And there was not even lip service paid, either with Dan Quayle or with Sarah Palin. To the idea that these two politicians want to govern together, that they even know each other, or that the McCain campaign really thinks she can be the best president, out of everybody else in the country, other than John McCain. It just doesn't feel right, it doesn't smell right, it seems a little insulting.

DAVID GREGORY: Is this stage craft first?

JOHN HARWOOD: Yes. […] He has a much narrower margin for error than other recent Republican nominees. He's got to have everything go right. And if people look at her and say, hey this was a real reach that was made for political reasons to try to appeal to those Hillary supporters, that's going to hurt him. […]

Highlight #12
Sarah Palin Interview Discusses Energy and ANWR Drilling (CNBC 08/29/08)
SARAH PALIN: Economically speaking though, it's about 20 percent of the U.S. domestic supply of energy is produced up on the north slope up in Prudo. So it's very, very significant economically, physically, it's a tiny little foot.

MARIA BARTIROMO: So you're saying it's a tiny little footprint, actually the operations in Prudo Bay, but people think of it as so expansive and so massive that it's going to have a material effect if in fact we were going to see drilling there, on the wildlife and on the community.
PALIN: Well, ANWR, that point, it's about 2,000 acres that is being asked to be looked at and then to be explored and then to be produced. 2,000 acres out of 20,000,000 acres. That footprint, it's about the size of LAX, or one of the larger airports across the nation. That should allow some perspective there also. No one, I think, but Alaskans, care more about our wildlife, about our clean water, our clean air, the pristine environment that we are blessed to live in and get to breath in every single day. No one but Alaskans will care more to make sure that we are preserving that pristine environment that is ANWR, the coastal plane, Prudo Bay, Alaska as a whole. And when you ask Alaskan's, are you ready to allow drilling to take place to a greater degree up on the north slopes, specifically here we're talking about ANWR, do you want to see that happen? And with Alaskan's love and care for our environment and our lands and our wildlife, Alaskan's are saying, yes, because we believe that it can be done safely. It can be done prudently. And it had better be done ethically, also. Yes, we'd want to see that drilling. So hopefully the rest of American can understand that also. You go door to door and you ask Alaskans if we are ready, willing, and able to produce more and contribute more to the U.S., and they're going to tell you, yes.

BARTIROMO: President Bush tried this a number of times under his watch. Why is it that we have been unable to actually get this done?

PALIN: I think there's a lot of misperceptions and misconceptions about what ANWR is all about and what, up in the north slope, what the environment actually is up there. You see pictures, you see visuals from the nay-sayers, the critics of the idea of opening up ANWR and the pictures that they're showing are mountains, and polar bears, lots of different wildlife. They'll show moose in a stream with mountains in the background, that's not ANWR. And as your people go up there also and actually get to see for themselves, and we've had a lot of Congressman and Congresswomen come up here this summer even to see for themselves, what actually is ANWR. What would be touched here in terms of lands and wildlife. Then they see that those visuals that have been shown to America for all these years are inaccurate. Those are not the pictures of ANWR, there aren't mountains up there for instance. So I think that there's a lot of misperception out there for what the plane actually looks like. And the visuals are very important to Americans, I do think though that Americans are recognizing more and more, it's evidence in the pressure that they're putting on Congress at this point, the constituents putting on Congress, more and more Americans are recognizing it is time to ramp up America's supply of energy. Especially, we're a nation at war, a lot of the issues that are so adversely effecting America are based on energy supplies as we're relying on foreign sources of energy to feed our hungry market. More and more Americans are recognizing, our sister state, up in the Alaska, has these supplies. We have trillions of cubic feet of clean, natural gas. We have billions of barrels of oil still sitting underground, in a sense, being warehoused. It's time to unlock these reserves and allow competitors to come in and compete for the right to tap those resources and start flowing that energy into the domestic markets that so hungry, so that we can become less reliant on foreign sources of energy. As more Americans recognize that, more Americans, I believe, are choosing to educate themselves on what ANWR is really all about.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BARTIROMO: For Sure. And this year there was a price. And once there was a price actually reached, it was, people got it.

PALIN: I believe so too.

BARTIROMO: Let me get your thoughts, on really the consequences. What then are the major consequences of drilling in ANWR? I was reading a piece earlier that said, look, it will impact the breeding of caribou, the breeding of polar bears. Give me your sense, what are the consequences?

PALIN: Well, let's look at lessons learned over the last 30 years from the Trans-Atlantic Oil Pipeline was finally allowed to be built. And there were the threats then and the fears that the caribou herds would diminish and die off. No, the caribou herds are actually thriving, they're flourishing. There has not been the adverse impact on the caribou herds. So we anticipate the same thing as we tap more energy supplies up on the North Slope in ANWR, and as we build a Natural Gas Pipeline also that's underway at this point. When you consider the naysayers, kind of the fear mongerers, 30 years ago before the Trans America Pipeline was built, and remember, that pipeline has supplied 50 billion barrels of oil into our domestic supplies here in America. By the way, Joe Biden was one who voted against that Trans Atlantic Pipeline 30 years ago. He was fearful of allowing ramped up domestic supplies of energy, even then. So of course, I fear, if he's of the same mind today we're in a world of hurt there. But no, the environment will continue to be protected. Our wildlife will continue to thrive and prosper up there. And we're going to make sure that we have the stringent and safe oversight that is necessary and will allow the population of this wildlife and the pristineness of the area to continue.

BARTIROMO: Ok, let's talk about jobs and sort of the impact of drilling and of operations there. How significant?

PALIN: Here in Alaska, oil production is so significant. 85 to 90 percent of our entire state budget is based on that barrel of oil and the price that it drives. And our state revenue, is again, so reliant on the price of a barrel of oil. For such a great part also Alaskan jobs are contingent on very aggressive production of oil and natural gas up here in Alaska.

BARTIROMO: On probably of all the 48 states, it's a ripple effect

PALIN: Absolutely, and also the ripple effect, is our belief too that as more domestic supplies of energy from Alaska flow into the hungry markets, naturally, we believe the price of energy will diminish also. It will decrease and that will be good for the economy as a whole. But very, very important to the US economy, specifically here in Alaska. My goodness, it is what drives our economy.

BARTIROMO: So how important are the oil and gas industries, businesses to Alaskans?

PALIN: Very, very important. Conical Phillips, Exxon, BP, you know we bump heads quite a bit when it comes to the sovereignty of our state. Alaska is set up unlike any other state in the nation, where our statehood compact act, and our state constitution lays out for us who owns the resources. And unlike other states, it's Alaskans who live here who own the resources underground. So as they're tapped, as they're produced Alaskans share in the wealth that's derived from the production of these resources. So the oil industries there are our partners here, they have the leases, the rights to develop the resources. But Alaskans own the resources. So that obviously creates some tension with who owns what and who can control what. But our position of strength in my administration, we know is our state consititution that again lays out for us who actually owns the resources. That's the Alaskan residents and I will do all I can to protect the Alaskan residents as we develop, but at the same time we recognize that the big oil industry that is here they do have the rights and have had the rights for many years now to develop these resources for us and with us.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BARTIROMO: How will you do that? How will you protect Alaskans homes, there environment?

PALIN: We need to drill, drill, drill though. Otherwise I can not believe that a domestic solution is any part of a national energy policy. If they're not going to let Alaskans drill on our own lands, and on Federal lands within our own state. And a domestic solution isn't part of a national energy plan, then our nation is in a world of hurt. We're going to continue to be reliant on foreign, dangerous regimes, to feed our hungry markets. I find it ironic, and I find it non-sensical that here, we send Secretary Bodman we even send our own President overseas to negotiate with the Saudi's to ask the Saudi's ramp up oil production. For us in America, where again, absolute nonsense because Alaska has those resources already. And we should be tapping these American supplies before we go over to the Saudi's and ask them to do so. So very significant where what is going on and I think our nation is at a cross roads also. We better be making decisions to allow this American supply of energy to be tapped, or we are going to become more and more beholden to these foreign regimes. And again, our nation is going to be in a word of hurt. When you talk about national security, when you talk about ever reaching potential towards energy independence. If we can not implement a domestic solution for this national energy policy, and we have lacked a national energy policy also. We have not had a plan. Alaska should be a leader in this plan because we have the conventional, the non-renewable supplies, the petroleum. We have them up here. […]

We also have the renewables also. We have the largest tides on the continent. We have the geothermal. We have the winds. We have all these alternative renewable resources that also can be tapped into as we work collectively and comprehensively on an energy plan.

BARTIROMO: So as a nation we need to be doing everything?

PALIN: We need to be doing everything, and people need to be realistic, also. This is what scares me about Biden and Obama also is it seems to be almost a naïve notion of their that we can just automatically jump right into a renewable supply of energy to feed hungry markets across our nation, when these renewables are not yet proven to be economic or reliable. We're going to be in a transition period for quite some time where we're going to have to continue to be reliant on conventional sources of energy as we're working on the renewables. And we certainly have to head in that direction also, but it's got to be doin' everything, everything that we can to allow the domestic supplies; renewable and unrenewable, to be tapped; solutions plugged in both those ends, and not just skip the oil and gas developments that- and the coal development also that we have to have as part of a comprehensive plan. It's naïve to think we can go right to renewables, and think that's ever going to work for our nation, today. At this time.

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "t r u t h o u t" <messenger@truthout.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 8/14/2014 9:49:42 AM
Subject: Another Night of Police Violence in Ferguson

View Recent Newsletters

Tell a friend about Truthout!

Thursday, 14 August 2014

truthout

Donate Today!

Truthout is a 501(c)3 nonprofit organization; donations are tax deductible.

Another Night of Police Violence in Ferguson; Governor Relieves Local Police of Protest Duty

Candice Bernd, Truthout: Last night, police in Ferguson, Missouri shot tear gas and rubber bullets at people protesting the shooting of an unarmed teenager. Two journalists were arrested after being told to stop filming.

Read the Article

"Stop Fearing Our Children": Why Juvenile Incarceration Needs to Go

Maya Schenwar, Truthout: Although lawmakers and the media may decry atrocious conditions, overcrowding and rampant violence in juvenile prisons, they aren't examining the roots of the problem. In this interview, author Nell Bernstein takes on the question: Why are we locking up children at all?

Read the Interview

Armed With Military-Grade Weapons, Missouri Police Crack Down on Protests Over Michael Brown Shooting

Amy Goodman and Juan González, Democracy Now!: The Missouri town of Ferguson looks like a war zone as police fire tear gas, stun grenades and smoke bombs to break up a fifth night of protests over the police shooting of unarmed African-American teenager Michael Brown.

Watch the Video and Read the Transcript

Homeschooling for Critical Consciousness

Jeffrey Nall, Truthout: Educator Jeffrey Nall explains why he and his wife, April, homeschool their children. Rather than the near-exclusive domain of social isolationists, conservatives and religious fundamentalists, homeschool can be compatible with democratic, progressive and feminist values, he contends.

Read the Article

BuzzFlash

Yes, Sarah Palin Supports Socialism in Alaska

Mark Karlin, BuzzFlash at Truthout: Want a check for up to $2,000 from big government for just living in a state? Then you might want to move to socialist Alaska.

Read the BuzzFlash Commentary

"Go Ahead and Shoot Me": The Veteran Who Defied Ferguson's Cops

Read the Article at The Daily Beast

Jim Hightower | What's Wrong With the GOP's "Hell No" Faction

Read the Article at BuzzFlash

Arrested While

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Moving From a Culture of Death to a Culture of Life: Mobilizing for the People's Climate March

Ven. Bhikkhu Bodhi, Truthout: As preparations intensify for the People's Climate March, in NYC September 21, we must remember that change via technology alone will not avert global disaster. We must also transition to a new social paradigm that prioritizes preserving the integrity of human beings and the natural world.

Read the Article

To Terrify and Occupy: How the Excessive Militarization of the Police Is Turning Cops Into Counterinsurgents

Matthew Harwood, TomDispatch: Welcome to a new era of American policing, where cops increasingly see themselves as soldiers occupying enemy territory, often with the help of Uncle Sam's armory, and where even nonviolent crimes are met with overwhelming force and brutality.

Read the Article

Briefing the President but Keeping the Public in the Dark

James Arkin, The Center for Public Integrity: Washington prepared some grim early estimates of the death and destruction that would come from a nuclear war with Russia, but kept the details secret for more than 50 years.

Read the Article

The Mystery of the Malaysian Airlines Crash Over Ukraine

Zhuge Li, Truthout: What is known and what remains to be proven or investigated in the mystery of the downing of Malaysia Airlines Flight 17 from Amsterdam to Kuala Lumpur? Who has benefited from the air tragedy? A Malaysian airline safety engineer considers the facts.

Read the Article

War Always Comes Home

The Daily Take Team, The Thom Hartmann Program: The scenes coming out of Ferguson, Missouri, illustrate the stupidity of war and the stupidity of our corrupt political system putting weapons of war on our streets, just to pad the wallets of the multibillion dollar defense contractors who own our politicians.

Read the Article

Cry for Argentina: Fiscal Mismanagement, Odious Debt or Pillage?

Ellen Brown, The Web of Debt Blog: Argentina has now taken the United States to The Hague for blocking the country's 2005 settlement with the bulk of its creditors. The issue underscores the need for an international mechanism for nations to go bankrupt. Better yet would be a sustainable global monetary scheme that avoids the need for sovereign bankruptcy.

Read the Article

Economic Update: Markets and Immigration

Richard D. Wolff, Economic Update / Truthout: This episode covers the drop in household wealth across the United States, and the ways in which

Covering Ferguson Shooting Protests: A Reporter's First-Person Account

Read the Article at The Washington Post

Racism, the Misuse of Genetics and a Huge Scientific Protest

Read the Article at The Los Angeles Times

Following Assault on Gaza, "Freedom Flotilla" to Sail Against Siege

Read the Article at Common Dreams

Jimmy Carter Blasts "Nutcases" Who Block Climate Action

Read the Article at EcoWatch

Why the United States' Police Are Becoming So Militarized

Read the Article at The Economist

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Social Security finances are more about wages than aging. We also discuss the political economy of immigration and the contradictions inherent in capitalism. Plus, we respond to listeners' queries about worker co-op incubators and fundraising by the Clintons.

Listen to the Radio Segment

The Mass Destruction of Iraq: The Disintegration of a Nation: Why It Is Happening and Who Is Responsible

Truthout writers William Rivers Pitt and Dahr Jamail have collaborated on a new e-book that examines the history behind the chaos in Iraq. From PNAC to Bush, with vivid reporting from the scene, this book definitively explains why this is happening. Order The Mass Destruction of Iraq for Kindle now!

Get the E-Book

Support Truthout with a tax-deductible donation

Please add messenger@truthout.org to ensure you receive our messages

Truthout is a proud member of the New spaper Guild/CWA, Local 36047

Subscribe | Unsubscribe

Privacy Policy

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Uri Avnery and Tikkun" <miriam@tikkun.org>
To: Podesta@Law.Georgetown.Edu
Date: 6/26/2015 3:59:09 AM
Subject: Uri Avnery on Israeli War Crimes, BDS and the One State Proposal for Israel and Palestine

Tikkun { tē-kün } to heal, repair, and transform the world

Uri Avnery is the leader of the Israeli peace movement Gush Shalom and from Tikkun's perspective one of the most respected voices for peace and reconciliation between Israel and Palestine. Here we present 3 articles he has written in the past month that reflect his wisdom and his sardonic humor--on the UN charge of Israeli and Hamas war crimes, on the BDS- Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions strategy of some who seek Israeli and Palestinian reconciliation and some who seek to end the existence of a Jewish state at all, and on the proposed One State Solution merging Israel and Palestine into one political entity. Read these three articles--they are very important perspectives, and a good place to start a serious conversation about Israel and Palestine along with adding into the discussion the empathic and psychologically sensitive perspective you need to get by reading Rabbi Michael Lerner's book Embracing Israel/Palestine (for Kindle at amazon.com, for print, order it at www.tikkun.org/eip) which in some places differs from Avnery's approach.

Uri Avnery from Tel Aviv

June 27, 2015

War Crimes? Us???

"WAR IS HELL!" the US general George Patton famously exclaimed.

War is the business of killing the "enemy", in order to impose your will on them.

Therefore, "humane war" is an oxymoron.

War itself is a crime. There are few exceptions. I would exempt the war against Nazi Germany, since it was conducted against a regime of mass murderers, led by a psychopathic dictator, who could not be brought to heel by any other means.

This being so, the concept of "war crimes" is dubious. The biggest crime is starting the war in the first place. This is not the business of soldiers, but of political leaders. Yet they are rarely indicted.

THESE PHILOSOPHICAL musings came to me in the wake of the recent UN report on the last Gaza war.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The investigation committee bent over backwards to be "balanced", and accused both the Israeli army and Hamas in almost equal terms. That, in itself, is problematic.

This was not a war between equals. On one side, the State of Israel, with one of the mightiest armies in the world. On the other side, a stateless population of 1.8 million people, led by a guerrilla organization devoid of any modern arms.

Any equating of such two entities is by definition contrived. Even if both sides committed grievous war crimes, they are not the same. Each must be judged on its own (de)merits.

THE IDEA of "war crimes" is relatively new. It arose during the 30 Years War, which devastated a large part of Central Europe. Many armies took part, and all of them destroyed towns and villages without the slightest compunction. As a result, two thirds of Germany were devastated and a third of the German people was killed.

Hugo de Groot, a Dutchman, argued that even in war, civilized nations are bound by certain limitations. He was not a starry-eyed idealist, divorced from reality. His main principle, as I understand it, was that it makes no sense to forbid actions that help a warring country [or “party”] to pursue the war, but that any cruelty not necessary for the efficient conduct of the war is illegitimate.

This idea took hold. During the 18th century, endless wars were conducted by professional armies, without hurting civilian populations unnecessarily. Wars became "humane".

Not for long. With the French revolution, war became a matter of mass armies, the protection of civilians slowly eroded, until it disappeared entirely in World War II, when whole cities were destroyed by unlimited aerial bombardment (Dresden and Hamburg) and the atom bomb (Hiroshima and Nagasaki).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Even so, a number of international conventions prohibit war crimes that target civilian populations or hurt the population in occupied territories.

That was the mandate of this committee of investigation.

THE COMMITTEE castigates Hamas for committing war crimes against the Israeli population.

Israelis didn't need the committee to know that. A large share of Israeli citizens spent hours in shelters during the Gaza war, under the threat of Hamas rockets.

Hamas launched thousands of rockets towards towns and villages in Israel. These were primitive rockets, which could not be aimed at specific targets – like the Dimona nuclear installation or the Ministry of Defense which is located in the center of Tel Aviv. They were meant to terrorize the civilian population into demanding a stop to the attack on the Gaza strip.

They did not achieve this goal because Israel had installed a number of "Iron Dome" counter-rocket batteries, that intercepted almost all rockets heading for civilian targets. Success was almost complete.

If they are brought before the International Court in The Hague, the Hamas leaders will argue that they had no choice: they had no other weapons to oppose the Israeli invasion. As a Palestinian commander once told me: "Give us cannons and fighter planes, and we will not use terrorism."

The International Court will then have to decide whether a people that is practically under an endless occupation is allowed to use indiscriminate rockets. Considering the principles laid down by de Groot, I wonder what the decision will be.

That goes for terrorism in general, if used by an oppressed people that has no other means of fighting. The black South Africans used terrorism in their fight against the oppressive apartheid regime, and Nelson Mandela spent 28 years in prison for taking part in such acts und refusing to condemn them.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

THE CASE against the Israeli government and army is quite different. They have a plentitude of arms, from drones to warplanes to artillery to tanks.

If there was a cardinal war crime in this war, it was the cabinet decision to start it. Because an Israeli arrack on the Gaza Strip makes war crimes unavoidable.

Anyone who has ever been a combat soldier in war knows that war crimes, whether in the most moral or the most base army in the world, do occur in war. No army can avoid recruiting psychologically defective people. In every company there is at least one pathological specimen. If there are not very strict rules, exercised by very strict commanders, crimes will occur.

War brings out the inner man (or woman, nowadays). A well-behaved, educated man will suddenly turn into a ferocious beast. A simple, lowly laborer will reveal himself as a decent, generous human being. Even in the "Most Moral Army in the World" – an oxymoron if there ever was one.

I was a combat soldier in the 1948 war. I have seen an eyeful of crimes, and I have described them in my 1950 book "The Other Side of the Coin".

THIS GOES for every army. In our army during the last Gaza war, the situation was even worse.

The reasons for the attack on the Gaza Strip were murky. Three Israeli kids were captured by Arab men, obviously for the sake of achieving a prisoner exchange. The Arabs panicked and killed the boys. The Israelis responded, the Palestinians responded, and lo – the cabinet decided on a full-fledged attack.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Our cabinet includes nincompoops, most of whom have no idea what war is. They decided to attack the Gaza Strip.

This decision was the real war crime.

The Gaza Strip is a tiny territory, overcrowded by a bloated population of 1.8 million human beings, about half of them descendents of refugees from areas that became Israel in the 1948 war.

In any circumstances, such an attack was bound to result in a large number of civilian casualties. But another fact made this even worse.

ISRAEL IS a democratic state. Leaders have to be elected by the people. The voters consist of the parents and grandparents of the soldiers, members of both regular and reserve units.

This means that Israel is inordinately sensitive to casualties. If a large number of soldiers are killed in action, the government will fall.

Therefore it is the maxim of the Israeli army to avoid casualties at any cost – any cost to the enemy, that is. To save one soldier, it is permissible to kill ten, twenty, a hundred civilians on the other side.

This rule, unwritten and self-understood, is symbolized by the "Hannibal Procedure" – the code-word for preventing at any cost the taking of an Israeli soldier prisoner. Here, too, a "democratic" principle is at work: no Israeli government can withstand public pressure to release many dozens of Palestinian prisoners in return for the release of one Israeli one. Ergo: prevent a soldier from being taken prisoner, even if the soldier himself is killed in the process.

Hannibal allows – indeed, commands – the wreaking of untold destruction and killing, in order to prevent a captured soldier from being spirited away. This procedure is itself a war crime.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A responsible cabinet, with a minimum of combat experience, would know all this at the moment it was called upon to decide on a military operation. If they don't know, it is the duty of the army [or “military”] commanders – who are present at such cabinet meetings – to explain it to them. I wonder if they did.

ALL THIS means that, once started, the results were almost unavoidable. To make an attack without serious Israeli casualties possible, entire neighborhoods had to be flattened by drones, planes and artillery. And that obviously happened.

Inhabitants were often warned to flee, and many did. Others did not, being loath to leave behind everything precious to them. Some people flee in the moment of danger, others hope against hope and stay.

I would ask the reader to imagine himself for a moment in such a situation.

Add to this the human element – the mixture of humane and sadistic men, good and bad, you find in any combat unit all over the world, and you get the picture.

Once you start a war, "stuff happens", as the man said. There may be more war crimes or less, but there will be a lot.

ALL THIS could have been told to the UN committee of inquiry, headed by an American judge, by the chiefs of the Israeli army, had they been allowed to testify. The government did not allow them.

The convenient way out is to proclaim that all UN officials are by nature anti-Semites and Israel-haters, so that answering their questions is counterproductive.

We are moral. We are right. By nature. We can't help it. Those who accuse us must be anti-Semites. Simple logic.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To hell with them all!

Uri Avnery

June 13, 2015

BDS, the New Enemy

BINYAMIN NETANYAHU was racking his brain. His whole career is based on fear mongering. Since Jews have lived in fear for millennia, it is easy to invoke it. They are addicts.

For years now, Netanyahu has built his career on fear of the Iranian Nuclear Bomb. The Iranians are crazy people. Once they have the Bomb, they will drop it on Israel, even if Israel's nuclear second strike will certainly annihilate Iran with its thousands of years of civilization.

But Netanyahu saw with growing anxiety that the Iranian threat was losing its edge. The US, so it seems, is about to reach an agreement with Iran, which will prevent it from achieving the Bomb. Even Sheldon the Great cannot prevent the agreement. What to do?

Looking around, three letters popped up: BDS. They denote Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions, a worldwide campaign to boycott Israel because of its 48 year-old subjugation of the Palestinian people.

Ah, here we have a real threat, worse than the Bomb. A second Holocaust is looming. Brave little Israel facing the entire evil, anti-Semitic world.

True, until now Israel has suffered no real damage. BDS is more about gestures than about real economic weapons. But who is counting? The legions of anti-Semites are on the march.

Who will save us? Bibi the Great, of course!

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HONEST DISCLOSURE: my friends and I initiated the first boycott, which was directed at the products of the settlements.

Our peace movement, Gush Shalom, was deliberating how to stop the spread of the settlements, each of which is a land mine on the road to peace. The main reason for setting up settlements is to prevent the two-state solution – the only peace solution there is.

Our investigators made a Grand Tour of the settlements and registered the enterprises which were lured by government enticements to set up shop beyond the Green Line. We published the list and encouraged customers to abstain from buying these products.

A boycott is a democratic instrument of protest. It is non-violent. Every person can exercise it privately, without joining any group or exhibiting himself or herself in public.

Our main aim was to get the Israeli public to distinguish clearly between Israel proper and the settlements in the occupied territories.

In March 1997 we held a press conference to announce the campaign. It was a unique event. I have held press conference which were overflowing with journalists – for example, after my first meeting with Yasser Arafat in besieged West Beirut. I have held press conferences with sparse attendance. But this one was really special: not a single Israeli journalist turned up.

Still, the idea spread. I don't know how many thousand Israelis are boycotting the products of the settlements right now.

However, we were upset by the attitude of the European Union authorities, which denounced the settlements while in practice subsidizing their products with customs exemptions like real Israeli wares. My colleagues and I went to Brussels to protest, but were told by polite bureaucrats that Germany and others were obstructing any step toward a settlement boycott.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Eventually, the Europeans moved, albeit slowly. They are now demanding that the products of the settlements be clearly marked.

THE BDS movement has a very different agenda. They want to boycott the State of Israel as such.

I always considered this a major strategic error. Instead of isolating the settlements and separating them from mainstream Israelis, a general boycott drives all Israelis into the arms of the settlers. It re-awakens age-old Jewish fears. Facing a common danger, Jews unite.

Netanyahu could not wish for more. He is now riding the wave of Jewish reactions. Every day there are headlines about another success of the boycott movement, and each success is a bonus for Netanyahu.

It is also a bonus for his adversary, Omar al-Barghouti, the Palestinian organizer of BDS.

Palestine is well stocked with Barghoutis. It is an extended family prominent in several villages north of Jerusalem.

The most famous is Marwan al-Barghouti, who has been condemned to several life sentences for leading the Fatah youth organization. He was not indicted for taking part in any "terrorist" acts, but for his role as organizationally responsible. Indeed, he and I were partners in organizing several non-violent protests against the occupation.

When he was brought to trial, we protested in the court building. One of my colleagues lost a toenail in the ensuing battle with the violent court guards. Marwan is still in prison and many Palestinians consider him a prospective heir of Mahmoud Abbas.

Another Barghouti is Mustafa, the very likable leader of a leftist party, who ran against Abbas for the presidency of the Palestinian Authority. We have met while facing the army in several demonstrations against the Wall.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Omar Barghouti, the leader of the BDS movement, is a postgraduate student at Tel Aviv University. He demands the free return of all Palestinian refugees, equality for Israel's Palestinian citizens and, of course, an end to the occupation.

However, BDS is not a highly organized worldwide organization. It is more of a trade mark. Groups of students, artists and others spring up spontaneously and join the struggle for Palestinian liberation. Here and there, some real anti-Semites try to join. But for Netanyahu, they are all, all anti-Semites.

AS WE feared from the beginning, the boycott of Israel – as distinguished from the boycott of the settlements – has united the general Jewish population with the settlers, under the leadership of Netanyahu.

The fatherland is in danger. National unity is the order of the day. "Opposition Leader" Yitzhak Herzog is rushing forward to support Netanyahu, as are almost all other parties.

Israel's Supreme Court, a frightened shadow of its former self, has already decreed that calling for a boycott of Israel is a crime – including calls for boycotting the settlements.

Almost every day, news about the boycott hits the headlines. The boss of "Orange", the French communications giant, first joined the boycott, then quickly turned around and is coming to Israel for a pilgrimage of repentance. Student organizations and professional groups in America and Europe adopt the boycott. The EU now vigorously demands the marking of settlement products.

Netanyahu is happy. He calls upon world Jewry to take up the fight against this anti-Semitic outrage. The owner of Netanyahu, multi-billionaire casino mogul Sheldon Adelson, has convened a war council of rich Jews in Las Vegas. His counterpart, pro-Labor multi-billionaire Haim Saban has joined him. Even the perpetrators of the Protocols of the Elders of Zion would not believe it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

AS COMIC relief, another casino owner is competing for the headlines. He is a much, much smaller operator, who cannot be compared to Adelson.

He is the new Knesset Member Oren Hazan, No 30 on the Likud election list, the last one who got in. A TV expose has alleged that he was the owner of a casino in Bulgaria, who supplied prostitutes to his clients and used hard drugs. He has already been chosen as Deputy Speaker of the Knesset. The Speaker has temporarily suspended him from chairing Knesset plenum sessions.

So the two casino owners, the big and the small, dominate the news. Rather bizarre in a country where casinos are forbidden, and where clandestine casino goers are routinely arrested.

Well, life is a roulette game. Even life in Israel.

Uri Avnery

June 20, 2015

Isratin or Palestrael?

THERE WAS this guy who had an earth-shaking invention: an airplane that flies on water.

No more gas. No more pollution. No more astronomical prices. Just fill it up with water, and it will fly to the end of the world.

"Wonderful!" people cried out. "Show us the plans!"

"Plans?" the man said. "I have had the great idea. I leave it to the engineers to work out the technical details."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The inventors of the "One-State Solution" remind me of this genius. They have a wonderful idea. But there are a few questions left open.

FIRST QUESTION: how can it be achieved?

The obvious answer is: by war.

The Arab world will mobilize its armies. Israel will be conquered. The victors will impose their will.

This may be possible within a few generations. I rather doubt it. In a world of nuclear arms, wars may end with mutual annihilation.

Well, if not war, then "outside pressure".

I doubt this, too. The international boycott movement is quite effective, in its way. But it is far, far from being able to compel Israelis to do something that is opposed by every fiber of their being: to give up their sovereignty. The same goes for political pressure. It may hurt Israel, it may isolate it – though I don't believe this is possible in this or the next generation – but this, too, won't be enough to bring Israel to its knees.

Convince the majority in Israel? One has to be very remote from Israeli reality to believe that this can happen in the foreseeable future. For more than 130 years, now, the core of the Zionist and Israeli raison d'etre has been Israeli (or "Jewish") statehood. Many people have died for it. Every child in Israel is indoctrinated from kindergarten on, through school and the army, to see the state as the highest of all ideals. Give it up voluntarily? Not likely.

But for argument's sake, let's assume that one way or another, the One-State Solution becomes possible. Perhaps by divine intervention.

How would it function?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In all my dozens of debates with One-Staters of all kinds, I have never, not even once, received an answer to this simple question. Not once. Like the inventor of the water-fueled plane, they leave that to the engineers.

Let's try.

HOW WILL the state be named? Not an easy question.

The late Muammar Gadddafi proposed "Isratin" (why not Palesrael"?) I can think of "Holyland", "State of Jerusalem" and other names. Perhaps just "The United State of Israel and Palestine" (let's call it USIP).

Various flags and national anthems have been proposed., some of them really inventive. Will anyone sacrifice their blood for them?

But that, too, is not the real problem. It's when we approach the realities of the state the questions multiply.

How will the state function on a day-to-day basis?

How difficult that may be is illustrated by a simple historical fact: since World War II, there is not a single instance of two states or two peoples voluntarily coming together in one state. But there are ample instances of multinational states breaking apart.

Let's start with the Soviet Union, a mighty world power. Then Yugoslavia. Then Serbia. Czechoslovakia. Sudan.

Other countries are threatened with breakup. Who would have thought that the venerable United Kingdom might become Disunited? Scots, Catalans, Basques, Quebecois, East Ukrainians are waiting in line. Only the Swiss, united by centuries of history, seem immune. And also Bosnia and Herzegovina.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Be that as it may, let's look more closely at the thing itself.

THE STATE must have a united army. How will it function?

Will Jews and Arabs serve in the same squad? Or will there be separate battalions or separate brigades? If there is trouble in Jewish neighborhoods, will Jewish units follow orders against their brethren? In a war against an Arab state, how will Arab units act?

Will the Chief of Staff be a Jew or an Arab? Perhaps by rotation? And the General Staff – half and half?

That's easy, compared to the police. Will Jews and Arabs serve side by side, as they did during the British Mandate, when practically all local policemen belonged to secret nationalist organizations?

How will this police force investigate nationalist crimes? Who will be the Inspector General?

Then there is the question of taxes. As of now, the average income of Jews in Israel is 25 times higher than that of Arabs in occupied Palestine. No, that is not a typo. Not 25% higher. 25 times higher!

Will they pay the same taxes? Very soon, Jewish citizens would complain that they pay for nearly all the welfare and education of the Palestinian citizens. Trouble.

THEN THERE are the problems of the political structure.

Of course, there will be universal and free elections. How will citizens vote – according to their class interests or along ethnic lines?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Experience in many countries indicates that the ethnic identity will take precedence. In today's Israel, that is the rule. During the British Mandate, there was only one joint party: the Moscow-line Communist one. On the eve of the 1948 war, it split between Jews and Arabs. In the new State of Israel, they reunited (as ordered by Moscow) but then split again. Now it is in practice an Arab party, with a few Jewish followers.

In 1984 I took part in the foundation of a new party, the Progressive List for Peace, based on strict parity: our Knesset list was Arab, Jew, Arab, Jew, up to 120.

In two successive election campaigns we entered the Knesset. But a curious thing happened: almost all our voters were Arabs. Soon after, the party disappeared.

I strongly suspect that in USIP the same will happen. In Parliament, two blocs will face each other in a climate of perpetual mutual animosity. It will be extremely difficult to form a working government coalition composed of elements of both sides. Look at Belgium, another problematic bi-national state.

Some One-Staters admit that the project is only feasible if both peoples change their basic attitudes completely, and a spirit of mutual love and respect displaces the present nationalistic hatred and contempt.

Some 50 years ago I had a conversation with the then Indian ambassador in Paris, Kavalam Madhava Panikkar, a very respected statesman and scholar. We talked, of course, about Israeli-Palestinian peace, and he said: "It will take 51 years!"

Why exactly 51, I asked, surprised. "Because we need a new generation of teachers," he said. "That will take 25 years. These new teachers will educate a new generation of pupils, who will be able to make peace, That will take another 25 years. Making peace will take one more year."

Well, 51 years have passed, and peace is further off than ever.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Matchmakers tend to say: "They don't love yet, but once married and having children, they will come to love each other."

Perhaps. How long will it take? A hundred years? Two hundred years? Long before that, we shall all be dead.

The main argument against the One-State vision is that it will soon become the battlefield of a perpetual conflict, like Lebanon. There will not be a day of internal peace.

The greatest danger is that in such a state, with a growing Arab majority, affluent and highly educated Jewish citizens will slowly leave (as some are already doing now). In the end, only the poor and ill-educated will be left –a small Jewish community in another Arab state.

I have a lurking suspicion that some of the Arab One-Staters embrace the idea for this reason alone: to put an end to Israel.

Israeli Jews and Palestinian Arabs are two of the most nationalist nations in the world. One has to be an extreme optimist – even more extreme than I – to believe that it will work.

Honest disclosure: I did once believe in the "One-State solution", long before the term was invented. In 1945, when I was just 22 years old, I founded a group that was devoted to the idea that the new Hebrew nation in Palestine and the Arab nation in Palestine, bound by common love for the country, could become one joint nation and live in one common state.

Our ideology caused an uproar in the Zionist community in the country. We were universally condemned. But during the 1948 war, when I came into immediate contact with the Palestinian reality, I gave up this beautiful idea for ever and from 1949 on was one of the creators of the concept of the Two-State Solution.

I have a great respect for the adherents of the One-State Solution.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Their motives are admirable. Their vision lofty. But it is disconnected from reality.

I WOULD like to make one point quite clear: for me, the Two-State Solution is not a recipe for separation and divorce, but on the contrary, a kind of wedding.

From the first day on, 66 years ago, when we, a tiny group, raised the banner of the Two-State Solution, it was clear to us that the two states, living close together in one small country, must live in close cooperation. Borders must be open for the movement of people and goods, the economies closely intertwined. Some kind of federation is inevitable. Attitudes will slowly change on both sides.

Connections will be formed. Friendships will be established. Business interests will convince people. People will work together and come to like each other. As the Arabs say: Inshallah.

When I am asked whether this is the best solution, my answer is: "It is the only solution."

****

Want to support a movement committed to the survival of both Israel and Palestine as states living in peace, seeks to boycott goods from the settlements and firms that collaborate with the settlers, but does not seek to boycott Israel as a whole, and approaches these issues with empathy and compassion for both Israelis and Palestinians as well as severe criticisms of the way each side has been violent and arrogant toward the other (without denying the huge discrepancy in power between the two, and hence the greater responsibility for Israel to make the major concessions by ending the Occupation of the West Bank and the blockade of Gaza and participating in a spirit of generosity and atonement in the creation of a politically and economically viable Palestinian state living in peace with Israel)? If so, join the interfaith and secular-humanist-and-atheist-welcoming NSP--the Network of Spiritual Progressives www.spiritualprogressives.org/join With membership in the NSP comes a free suscription to Tikkun magazine (the print version which is not available on our lively website www.tikkun.org though lots of other articles are available for free there at www.tikkun.org)

Please feel free to post this on your Facebook or other social media, your own website, and send it to your friends and anyone on your email lists!

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Click here to unsubscribe
if you are having trouble unsubscribing Click here

Copyright 2015 Tikkun Magazine. Tikkun is a registered trademark.
2342 Shattuck Avenue, #1200
Berkeley, CA 94704
510-644-1200
Fax 510-644-1255

empowered by salsa

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"The Washington Post" <email@e.washingtonpost.com>
To:	john.podesta@gmail.com
Date:	12/30/2015 6:07:31 AM
Subject:	The Daily 202 [corrected]: Will the GOP establishment candidates kill each other?

View The Daily 202 on the Web

PowerPost

The Daily 202

Morning intelligence for leaders

Share on Twitter Share on Facebook

Will the GOP establishment candidates kill each other?

Chris Christie speaks at Elly's Tea and Coffee House in Muscatine, Iowa, yesterday. (AP Photo/Andrew Harnik)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BY JAMES HOHMANN

THE BIG IDEA:

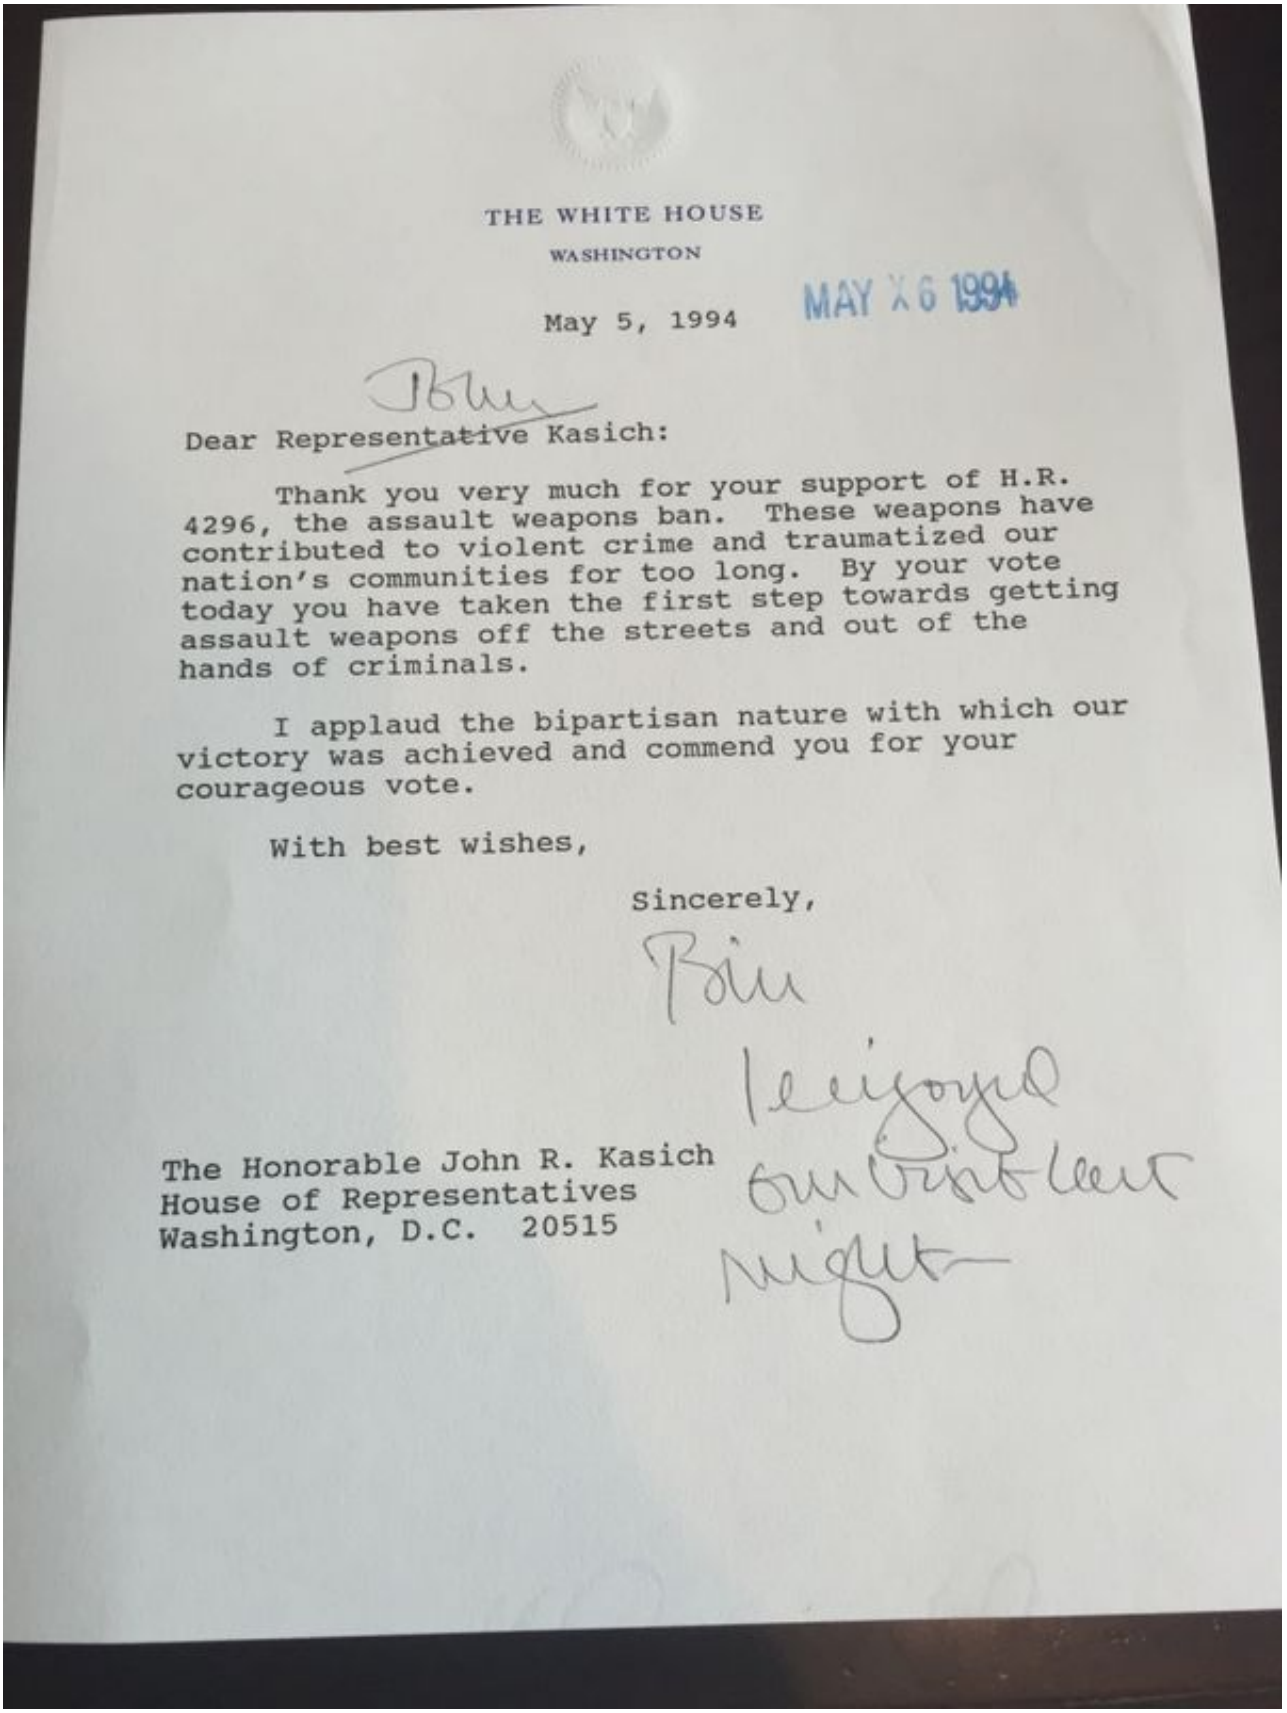
— The Republican nominating contest has entered a new, more desperate phase. The four GOP candidates vying to occupy the so-called establishment lane all turned on one other yesterday. Attacks that circulated for months on background flared up in the open.

"It's now down to the last five weeks here," Chris Christie told reporters in Iowa. "We need to make distinctions…"

The New Jersey governor then ripped into Marco Rubio for missing more votes than any other senator. "Dude, show up to work," he said in Muscatine. "Just show up to work and vote no. And if you don't want to, then quit."

Rubio, also campaigning in Iowa, fired back: "You know, Chris has been missing in New Jersey for half the time."

— That was one of the more memorable moments in a day that started as a Rubio pile-on but became a free-for-all. Jeb Bush's super PAC, Right to Rise, launched a $1.4 million ad buy in Iowa to highlight Rubio's absenteeism. The goal is to stop another Floridian from getting momentum in the caucuses that he could carry into the New Hampshire primary a week later. "Politics first, that's the Rubio way," the narrator says.



— Right to Rise also unveiled a commercial contrasting Bush with the two other governors in the establishment lane, Christie and Ohio's John Kasich.

— The super PAC supporting Kasich, New Day in America, responded that, "The country doesn't have an appetite for another Bush … As for Governor Christie, his mishandling of his state budget and the 'Bridgegate' scandal have earned him a 60 percent unfavorable rating from those who know him best — the people of New Jersey."

— Then Mike Murphy, the strategist behind the Bush super PAC, began tweeting out pictures of embarrassing documents that his opposition researchers had collected from an archive of Kasich's congressional papers. Among them: a 1980 thank you note from Phil Crane, the Illinois congressman whom Kasich backed over Ronald Reagan in the primaries, and a personalized letter of gratitude from Bill Clinton after Kasich supported the 1994 ban on assault weapons:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

May 5, 1994 MAY 16 1994

Dear Representative Kasich:

Thank you very much for your support of H.R. 4296, the assault weapons ban. These weapons have contributed to violent crime and traumatized our nation's communities for too long. By your vote today you have taken the first step towards getting assault weapons off the streets and out of the hands of criminals.

I applaud the bipartisan nature with which our victory was achieved and commend you for your courageous vote.

With best wishes,

Sincerely,

Bill

The Honorable John R. Kasich
House of Representatives
Washington, D.C. 20515

— More of the back-and-forth is captured in the story leading our newspaper this morning. GOP political consultant Alex Castellanos is quoted saying that the crossfire is beginning to look like "a 'Fistful of Dollars' gunfight," referring to the 1964 western starring Clint Eastwood. (Watch the scene Alex is referring to here ; read Karen Tumulty, Ed O'Keefe and Philip Rucker's story here.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Marco Rubio takes a question from the audience during a town hall in Clinton, Iowa, yesterday. (AP Photo/Andrew Harnik)

— Rubio has begun trying to position himself as the most conservative of the four establishment figures.

The campaign is pushing around a column in National Review by Jim Geraghty that ticks off his right-wing bona fides: "This is a man who has a lifetime ACU rating of 98 out of 100. A man who has a perfect rating from the NRA in the U.S. Senate. A man who earned scores of 100 in 2014, 100 in 2013, 71 in 2012, and 100 in 2011 from the Family Research Council. … Rubio's the guy who earned a 100 from National Right to Life in two straight cycles, and a zero rating from NARAL. He supports an abortion ban after 20 weeks, opposes exceptions for rape and incest (although he's voted for legislation that includes those exceptions), and opposes embryonic stem-cell research. … Rubio opposes gay marriage. … He opposes raising the minimum wage … He contends the legislative efforts to fight climate change are economically self-destructive and expresses skepticism that human behavior is driving climate change."

Ironically, the above could also be read as a list of reasons that Rubio would have a lot of trouble winning in a general election…

— Rubio is trying, to the extent possible, to stay above the fray: On the stump yesterday, he tried to brush aside attacks on his record as "par for the course," as his campaign released a barrage of surrogate statements decrying the attacks on his abysmal attendance record. His super PAC released a video highlighting nice comments that Jeb has made about Rubio in the past.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Today, Rubio's campaign will go on the air with an ad that presents the first-term senator as knowledgeable about and tough on foreign policy. "Today, we face ever growing threats: radical Islamic terror, a lunatic in North Korea, a gangster in Moscow, and a president more respectful to the Ayatollah of Iran than the Prime Minister of Israel," he says. "Our allies don't trust us. Our enemies don't fear us. And the world doesn't know where America stands. On day one of my presidency that will change."

— New Hampshire's primary may not have the winnowing effect that each campaign expects. David Weigel: "The four … are each counting on one or more of their compadres to fail. Until that happens, none of them are getting through the door. … New Hampshire sends only 12 delegates to the Republican National Convention. The history of people merely performing well there, then staying in the race until it's clarified, is as rich as the history of the state producing a nominee. … At some point, if Bush clearly has the money to last into March (as he says) and if Rubio is clearly in a stronger position to compete after New Hampshire, the 'nightmare' might be unavoidable. There are simply too many candidates waiting for dominoes to fall — and too many who can write off Trump votes as flukes." Dave calls this the Three Stooges Syndrome.

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost's morning newsletter. Sign up to receive the newsletter.

With contributions from Michael Smith.

WHILE YOU WERE SLEEPING:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Donald Trump speaks during a news conference on his airplane in Omaha, Neb., last night. (AP Photo/Nati Harnik)

— Donald Trump says, beginning next Monday, he will spend at least $2 million per week on television ads in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina. The AP reports the first two spots will be about immigration and national security. “If somebody attacks me, I will attack them very much and very hard in terms of ads,” the billionaire told journalists aboard his private jet last night. The buys have not been placed yet, though, and Trump has not always followed through on these kinds of pronouncements. He bragged last night on Twitter about how little he’s had to spend for paid media:

> My campaign for president is $35,000,000 under budget, I have spent very little (and am in 1st place). Now I will spend big in Iowa/N.H./S.C.
>
> — Donald J. Trump (@realDonaldTrump) December 29, 2015

> So, I have spent almost nothing on my run for president and am in 1st place. Jeb Bush has spent $59 million & done. Run country my way!
>
> — Donald J. Trump (@realDonaldTrump) December 29, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

George Pataki ended his campaign with a video message.

— George Pataki dropped out of the race for the Republican presidential nomination. David A. Fahrenthold and David Weigel note the former New York governor's campaign was doomed to fail from the start, that his liberal stances on abortion, guns and unions are very much at odds with a party that continues moving to the right: "Pataki announced the suspension of his campaign in a two-minute message that aired on NBC affiliates in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina. He secured the free air time through an 'equal time' request made after Trump hosted 'Saturday Night Live.'" Pataki, who has not held office since 2006, had flirted with a presidential run in 2000, 2008 and 2012. When he announced in May, he declared: "My life has prepared me for this moment." He was wrong. When "Jeopardy " contestants were shown his picture a few months ago, none could name him.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Benjamin Netanyahu looks on as John Kerry speaks during a press conference at the Prime Minister's Office in Jerusalem. (Atef Safadi/Pool via AP)

— The Wall Street Journal reports that NSA surveillance of Benjamin Netanyahu and top Israeli leaders picked up their strategy conversations with members of Congress about how to torpedo the Iran nuclear deal. "That raised fears—an 'Oh-s— moment,' one senior U.S. official said—that the executive branch would be accused of spying on Congress," Adam Entous and Danny Yadron report. "Stepped-up NSA eavesdropping revealed to the White House how Mr. Netanyahu and his advisers had leaked details of the U.S.-Iran negotiations—learned through Israeli spying operations—to undermine the talks; coordinated talking points with Jewish-American groups against the deal; and asked undecided lawmakers what it would take to win their votes." Five nuggets from the piece:

- Obama ordered the NSA to stop spying on the presidents of France and Germany, but not Turkey.
- Obama was convinced for a time that Netanyahu would attack Iran without giving the U.S. a heads up, which prompted the order to step up surveillance.
- "Wary of a paper trail stemming from a request, the White House let the NSA decide what to share and what to withhold … 'We didn't say, 'Do it,'' a senior U.S. official said. 'We didn't say, 'Don't do it.'"- The NSA would also remove the names of lawmakers from intelligence reports.
- Analysts would pass details of intercepted communications to the top within six hours.
- Netanyahu was focused on building opposition to the Iran deal among Democratic lawmakers and confident he could win enough votes to stop the deal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clemson's Deon Cain runs in a 55-yard pass play for a touchdown during a Nov. 28 game against South Carolina.(AP Photo/Richard Shiro, File)

— Three Clemson football players were suspended after failing drug tests, taking them out of tomorrow's Orange Bowl against Oklahoma. "Deon Cain, Ammon Lakip and Jay McCullough have been sent home from the site of the College Football Playoff semifinal," USA Today reports . "Cain is a freshman wide receiver who is tied for third on the team in receptions. Lakip, a senior kicker, had a three-game suspension earlier this season after a spring arrest for cocaine possession and DUI. McCullough, a junior tight end, has no receptions this season for the undefeated and top-ranked Tigers."

— Four on-duty Secret Service agents were involved in a head-on car collision that killed one-person in Wakefield, N.H., the Associated Press reports. "Police said the agents were passengers in a Ford Taurus heading south on Route 16. A northbound Mercury Sable with three people crossed over the center line and collided head-on into the Taurus." Hillary was campaigning in nearby Berlin.

GET SMART FAST:

1. Eighteen people have now died as the result of massive flooding in Missouri and Illinois. (St. Louis Post-Dispatch)
2. The North Korean official in charge of relations with South Korea died in a car accident, hampering the chances of improving relations between the two countries. (USA Today)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

3. A U.S.-led airstrike killed a high-level ISIS leader in Syria with direct ties to the Paris attackers and who was actively planning more attacks against the West, the Pentagon announced. (Dan Lamothe)
4. A close call in the Strait of Hormuz: Iran conducted a live-fire exercise near the USS Harry Truman as the aircraft carrier passed through international waters. The Revolutionary Guard announced a warning over maritime radio and then fired several unguided rockets from about 1,500 yards off the carrier's starboard side. (NBC News)
5. Twitter has revised its rules of conduct to emphasize that it prohibits violent threats and abusive behavior by users. The question now is whether they will enforce it. (ABC)
6. The owners of a Portland bakery who refused on religious grounds to bake a wedding cake for a lesbian couple paid $144,000 in damages, though they continue to appeal a court ruling. (The Oregonian)
7. An unidentified man was caught on surveillance footage wrapping strips of raw bacon around the handle of a Las Vegas mosque's doors. Police are investigating as a hate crime. (KSNV)
8. China and Taiwan began operating the first telephone hotline between the two nations, designed to reduce tensions. (Reuters)
9. Eight Chinese men were rescued after being trapped for five days in a mine collapse. (AP)
10. A voter file with information about 191 million Americans was left exposed on the Internet, raising questions about the security chops of political campaigns that increasingly hold large caches of data. "The leak appeared to be the result of a technical error that allowed the information to be publicly accessed online, not a hack," Andrea Peterson reports.
11. Country music singer Craig Strickland is missing after going on a hunting trip in Oklahoma. The body of the friend he went out with was recovered after police found their capsized boat. (Niraj Chokshi)
12. A husband and wife in England who wanted to help ISIS were convicted of planning a terrorist attack in London to mark the 10th anniversary of the 2005 train bombings. (AP)
13. Ethan Couch, the "affluenza" teenager from Texas who killed four people while driving drunk, apparently planned his disappearance after being caught drinking on video. Authorities said he even had something akin to "a goodbye party" before

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

fleeing to Mexico! But the harshest punishment he'll likely face is four months in jail because he's a juvenile. Couch and his mom were caught when they used their phones to order pizza — they are expected to be extradited today. (Dallas Morning News; The Post ; Fort Worth Star-Telegram)

Mexican authorities released a picture of Ethan Couch with dyed black hair after detaining him in Puerto Vallarta. (Jalisco state prosecutor's office, via Reuters)

POWER PLAYERS IN THE NEWS:

1. African American protesters gathered outside Rahm Emanuel's home and called for him to resign as mayor. (Chicago Tribune)
2. The Philadelphia Eagles fired head coach Chip Kelly with one game remaining in his third season. They missed the playoffs for the second straight year after losing to the Redskins. (Mark Maske)
3. Hillary Clinton began running a radio ad on predominantly African American stations in South Carolina that describes raising family incomes "is the defining economic challenge of our time." (Listen)
4. John Kasich said the people protesting a grand jury's decision to not charge the police officers involved in the Tamir Rice shooting "need to be heard." (Ed O'Keefe)
5. Ron Burkle, a billionaire California investor with a history of donating to Democrats, endorsed and will raise money for Kasich. (Politico)
6. The vice chair of the GOP in Miami-Dade County endorsed Cruz over favorite sons Rubio and Bush, the Tampa Bay Times reports . E.W. Jackson, the gaffe-prone and bombastic GOP nominee for Virginia lieutenant governor in 2013, also endorsed Cruz.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

7. Trump's campaign signed an agreement give it access to the RNC voter file. (Politico)
8. Just one voter showed up to Martin O'Malley's event in Tama, Iowa, during a snowstorm Monday night. After an extended sitdown with the candidate, he left uncommitted. (Sarah Beckman's Tumblr)

@SarahBeckman3 Twitter

WAPO HIGHLIGHTS:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Abdulaziz Moallin, a co-owner of the Juba Cafe, a coffee shop popular among local Somalis, stands in the wreckage of the restaurant after it was burned in an act of arson on the night Trump announced a plan to bar Muslims from entering the country. The restaurant is now closed until repairs are made. (Photo by Andrew Cullen/For the Washington Post)

NASTY RHETORIC HAS NASTY CONSEQUENCES. A few hours after Trump called for temporarily stopping Muslims from entering the U.S., someone in North Dakota drove by a Muslim-owned restaurant and tossed a 40-ounce Bud Light container filled with gasoline inside.

That incident is the lead anecdote in this piece –> "Trump's effect on Muslim migrant debate reverberates in heartland," by Robert Samuels in Grand Forks: "Residents, descended mostly from Norwegian Lutherans, were accustomed to coexisting with the Muslim refugees who have settled in town over the past decade. But a confection of events far beyond the city limits … has made both sides increasingly fearful of their neighbors. After fleeing a decade-long war and remaking their lives in a peaceful, quiet community, Somalis feel they are being looked at with unfair suspicion. Many locals, meanwhile, have questioned whether the government is spending too much money on a group they think shows little interest in assimilation. And they find themselves wondering whether the people wearing unusual garb and speaking a foreign language will produce a jihadist killer."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ted Cruz (Andrew Harrer/Bloomberg)

WINNING THE RELIGIOUS RIGHT –> "Ted Cruz huddles with faith leaders at ranch of super PAC donor," by Katie Zezima and Tom Hamburger: "Sen. Ted Cruz huddled with conservative faith leaders in Texas Monday and Tuesday as he coalesces the support of evangelical leaders behind his presidential bid. Cruz met with about 300 prominent faith leaders gathered at the sprawling ranch of Farris Wilks, who, along with his brother Dan, donated $15 million to a super PAC supporting Cruz. The event, sponsored by the PAC, was designed to introduce visitors to the faith story of the Cruz family. No cameras or recording devices were allowed at the remote ranch, where visitors enter through a massive stone archway with black gates, to protect the privacy of attendees and their conversation. … Those in attendance at the Monday sessions included prominent televangelists, such as John Hagee, pastor of the Cornerstone Church in San Antonio, and James Dobson, founder of the Focus on the Family organization. Richard Land, president of the Southern Evangelical Seminary and a longtime leader of the Southern Baptist Convention, was there, according to interviews with attendees."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Director of National Intelligence James Clapper looks on as President Obama speaks at the National Counterterrorism Center in McLean on Dec. 17. (Jim Watson/AFP/Getty Images)

A NEAR TOTAL LACK OF ACCOUNTABILITY –> "Spy agencies resist push for expanded scrutiny of top employees," by Greg Miller: "U.S. intelligence agencies recently fought off a move by Congress to require the CIA and other spy services to disclose more details about high-ranking employees who have been promoted or fired … The disputed measure was designed to increase scrutiny of cases in which senior officers ascend to high-level positions despite problems ranging from abusive treatment of subordinates to involvement in botched operations overseas. The CIA in particular has come under sharp criticism in recent years for promoting operatives who faced investigations by the agency's internal watchdog or the Justice Department for their roles in the brutal interrogations of prisoners…Under a provision drafted by the Senate Intelligence Committee this year, intelligence agencies would have been required to regularly provide names of those being promoted to top positions and disclose any 'significant and credible information to suggest that the individual is unfit or unqualified.'"

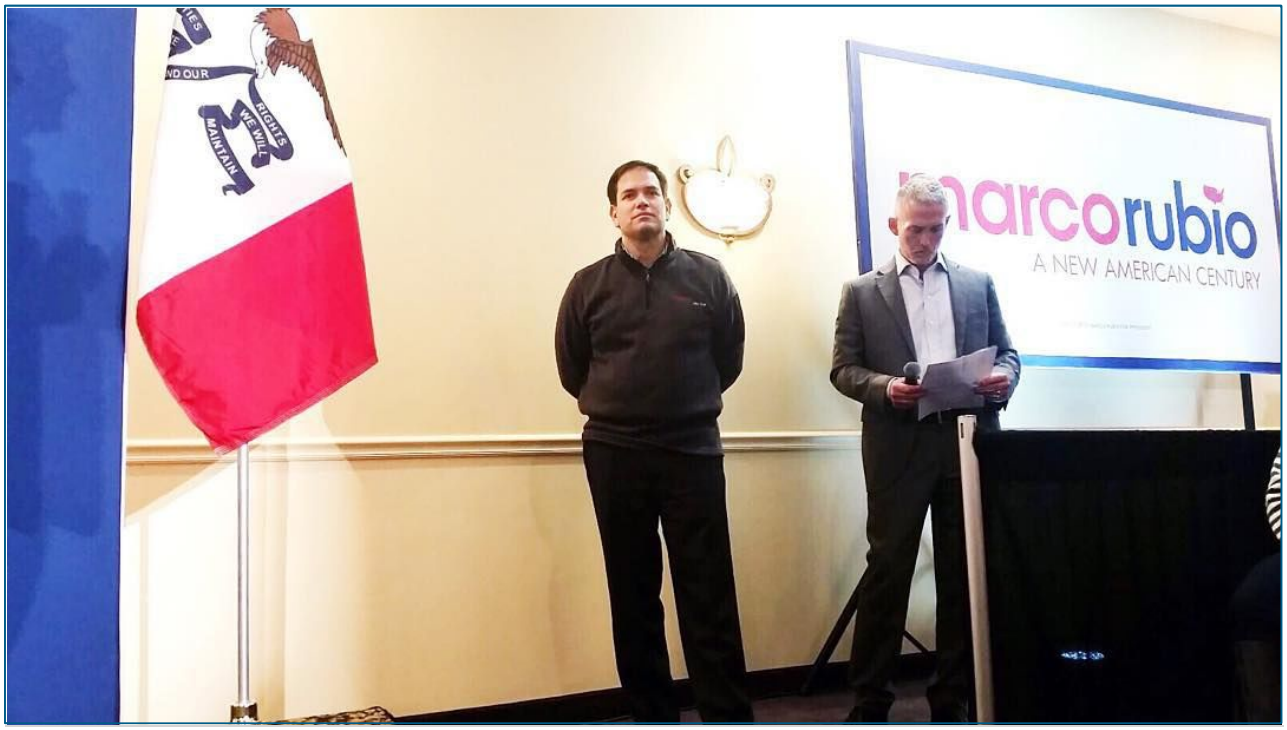
"But that language faced intense opposition from Director of National Intelligence James R. Clapper Jr. As a result, the wording was watered down by (congressional Republicans) this month and now requires Clapper only to furnish 'information the Director determines appropriate.' … Sen. Dianne Feinstein (Calif.), the top Democrat on the Senate [Intelligence] committee, had inserted the initial provision in the intelligence authorization bill that was passed by the panel earlier this year."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SOCIAL MEDIA SPEED READ:

— Pictures of the day:

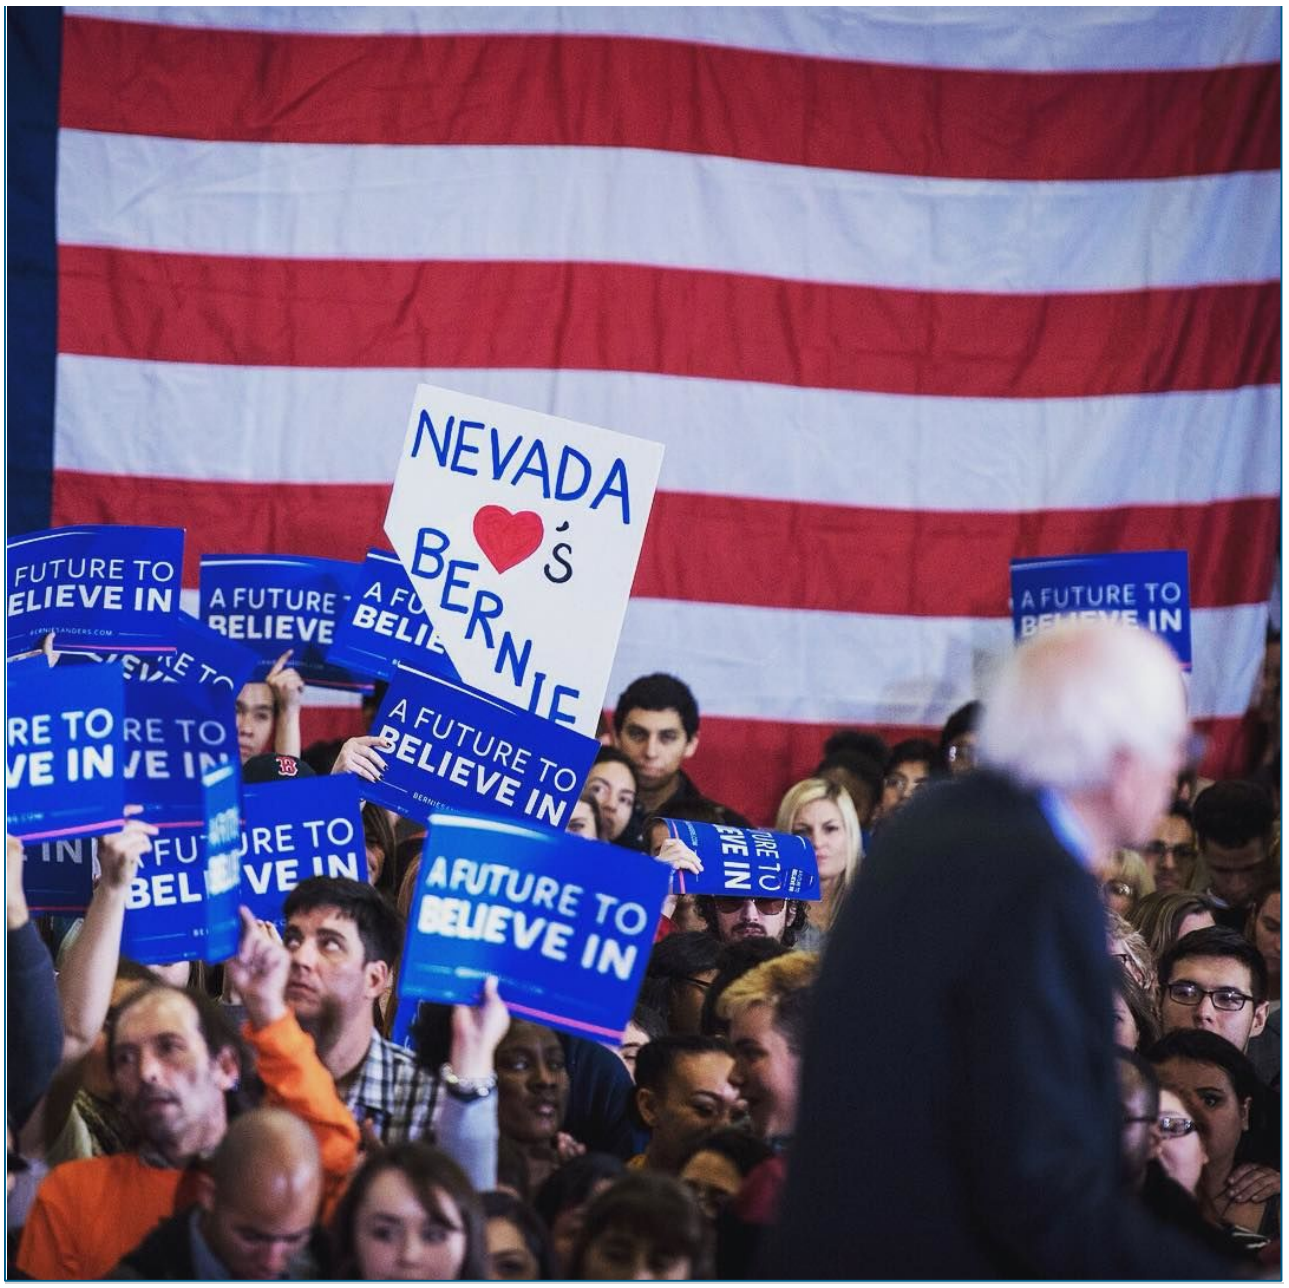
Gina Rodriguez, aka “Jane the Virgin,” shared some snaps of her trip to the White House during the holidays:



(@michelleobama)

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) appeared with one of his newest supporters, Rep. Trey Gowdy

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



(R-S.C.), at a town hall in Clinton, Iowa:

(@marcorubiofla)

Bernie Sanders showed off some love from his rally in Las Vegas:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@berniesanders)

Rep. Pete Sessions (R-Texas) surveys the damage in Rowlett from the Texas tornadoes over the weekend:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@reppetesessions)

–Tweets of the day:

Trump continued bashing those who have backed other horses in the race for president:

> I hope @TGowdySC does better for Rubio than he did at the #Benghazi hearings, which were a total disaster for Republicans & America! — Donald J. Trump (@realDonaldTrump) December 29, 2015

He also went after New Hampshire Union Leader Publisher Joseph W. McQuaid, who has been mocking him in front page op-eds:

> Joe McQuaid (@deucecrew) of the dying Union Leader wanted ads, lunches, donations, speeches from me, and tweets—very unethical. — Donald J. Trump (@realDonaldTrump) December 30, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

— Instagrams of the day:

Rep. Joe Kennedy (D-Mass.) showed off his newborn baby, Eleanor (Ellie):

(@repkennedy)

Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz, aka the “Clean Cooking Congresswoman,” said she had her first-ever “homemade sushi night.” Her daughter and her best friend’s daughter helped out:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@cleancookingcongresswoman)

Sen. Mike Lee (R-Utah) said his staff organized the preparation of over 1,000 Christmas care packages for members of the military from his state:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@senmikelee)

And for all you cat people out there, here is Florida Rep. Lois Frankel (D):

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@reploisfrankel)

GOOD READS FROM ELSEWHERE:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jeff Weaver, campaign manager for Bernie Sanders (Yuri Gripas/Reuters)

— New York Times, "Top Bernie Sanders aide rankles those in and out of campaign," by Maggie Haberman: "When Senator Bernie Sanders's campaign team was about to address a throng of media about a breach in which his data director and at least two other staff members accessed Clinton's proprietary voter data, reporters and political watchers braced for some sort of apology. Instead, the campaign manager, Jeff Weaver, stood before the cameras and portrayed his campaign as victims of a voracious Democratic National Committee. He threatened to sue the party to restore access to its own voter file data. … The aggressive maneuver struck many political observers as daring. It caught Mrs. Clinton's campaign by surprise … But the person delivering the message, Mr. Weaver, is a long-trusted adviser to Mr. Sanders, who has developed a reputation inside and outside his campaign as a hard-charging operative often willing to go further than the candidate himself."

- "Mr. Weaver, who worked for Mr. Sanders in Congress for years and has the candidate's trust, took a break from a store in Virginia, Victory Comics, to return to the candidate's fold (his cell phone voicemail still identifies him as with the comic-book store.)"
- In October, Weaver rankled many inside the campaign when he said that HRC "would make a great vice president." Maggie reports that Sanders and others saw it as condescending: "The campaign's New Hampshire state director, Julia Barnes, asked

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Weaver to apologize for the comments, and voiced her displeasure to him in clear terms. He never did, telling unhappy staffers on a conference call after the report aired that their team needed to be mindful that the Clinton campaign was about to unleash attacks on Mr. Sanders."

Trump holds up his Bible during a campaign stop last night in Council Bluffs, Iowa. (AP Photo/Nati Harnik)

— BuzzFeed, "Trump defended Clinton during Lewinsky scandal against 'moralist" hypocrites In Congress," by Andrew Kaczynski and Megan Apper: "Donald Trump revived Bill Clinton's past marital indiscretions this week, attacking Hillary on Twitter and on TV for playing the 'women's card' and saying her husband's past affairs would be fair game. Trump took a different tact in the late '90s, when the scandal was at its peak, defending then-President Bill Clinton against the 'moralists' and hypocrites in Congress and arguing that the scandal wouldn't have been that bad if only Clinton had chosen to carry on an affair with a supermodel instead. 'I got a chuckle out of all the moralists in Congress and in the media who expressed public outrage at the president's immoral behavior,' wrote Trump in The America We Deserve. 'I happen to know that one U.S. senator leading the pack of attackers spent more than a few nights with his twenty-something girlfriend at a hotel I own. There's also a conservative columnist, married, who was particularly rough on Clinton in this regard. He also brought his girlfriend to my resorts for the weekend. Their hypocrisy is amazing.' Trump also wrote that Clinton should have refused to talk about his personal life … Trump at one point compared himself directly to Bill Clinton, telling CNBC in 1998, 'Can you imagine how controversial I'd be? You think about him with the women. How about me with the women? Can you imagine?'"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump defended his past comments last night, saying he was just trying to ingratiate himself with the powerful. "As a world-class businessman, you have to get along with everybody," he said. "I was able to get along with Clinton, I was able to get along with virtually every politician you can imagine." (Abby Phillip's story)

— The Atlantic, "The Iowa caucus gets an upgrade, " by Russel Berman: "Caucus Night 2012 was not exactly a banner evening for the Republican Party of Iowa. Reporting problems plagued the vote-counting during the crucial first-in-the-nation presidential contest. … Needless to say, the Iowa GOP would like to have a smoother—and more accurate—election on February 1 … The parties are pinning their hopes on new technology, betting that a custom-designed mobile platform can modernize a quirky voting method and ensure the public knows which candidates won Iowa long before voters head to the polls in New Hampshire. The idea is to meld 'a brand-new technology and a 100-year-old process,' said Stan Freck, senior director for campaigns and elections at Microsoft, which partnered with the parties on the project. … The key features of the app designed by Microsoft and its partner, Interknowlogy, are backstops for clumsy-fingered or tech-challenged precinct captains. 'It's a simple, big-button kind of interface, not a lot of crazy stuff on the screen,' Freck said. A demo confirmed his description; a precinct captain only has to go through a couple of screens after logging in, and the whole process should take no more than a few minutes."

The five House members who made the most floor speeches in 2015, via C-SPAN:

1. Rep. Glenn "G.T." Thompson (R-PA): 110 days
2. Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee (D-TX): 87 days
3. Rep. Doug LaMalfa (R-CA): 72 days
4. Rep. Ted Poe (R-TX): 70 days
5. Rep. Earl Blumenauer (D-OR): 69 days

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HOT ON THE LEFT

A Virginia GOP state lawmaker will try to remove Gov. Terry McAuliffe's (D) security detail. Republicans are up in arms, literally, over a decision by state Attorney General Mark Herring that Virginia will no longer recognize concealed handgun carry permits from residents of 25 states. Per the Bristol Herald Courier: State Rep. Bill Carrico (R) plans to retaliate, saying of the governor: "I have a budget amendment that I'm looking at to take away his executive protection unit. If he's so afraid of guns, then I'm not going to surround him with armed state policemen."

HOT ON THE RIGHT

"We Lost Too Many Conservative Luminaries in 2015 — R.I.P.," by Tevi Troy in National Review: "The conservative movement was built by intellectuals … Reflection on 2015 makes clear that we lost some titans, including Martin Anderson, Walter Berns, Harry Jaffa, Ben Wattenberg, Robert Conquest, Amy Kass, and Peter Schramm. They have left in the conservative movement a hole that will be difficult to fill." Berns and Jaffa both studied under Leo Strauss, famously feuded, and, à la Jefferson and Adams, died on the same day. "Jaffa was the intellectual godfather of West Coast Straussianism, best embodied by the Claremont Institute." He's also best known for writing Barry Goldwater's 1964 pronouncement that, "Extremism in the defense of liberty is no vice [and] … moderation in the pursuit of justice is no virtue."

DAYBOOK:

— What's happening today on the campaign trail: Trump is in Hilton Head, S.C., where he will host an event at 11 a.m. Eastern. Bush is also in South Carolina, and he will appear at a barbecue dinner in Lexington at 6:30 p.m. Cruz is in Texas to visit the tornado-ravaged town of Rowlett. He will meet with Rockwell County Mayor Todd Gottel. Rubio has town halls in Pella, Newton and Boone, Iowa. Christie, also in Iowa, is hosting meet and greets in Waterloo and Marshalltown, followed by a town hall in Waukee. Sanders has three towns halls in Iowa, with his day concluding in Ottumwa at 7 p.m. Central. O'Malley will attend leadership forums in Humbolt and Clarion. Rick Santorum will speak at a house parties (for the second straight day) in Holstein and Sioux City.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

— On the Hill: Recess

— At the White House: President Obama continues his vacation in Hawaii. He went snorkeling yesterday.

QUOTE OF THE DAY:

Chelsea Clinton vs. Ivanka Trump in 2032? Donald's daughter was asked whether she'll ever run for office. "It's not something I've ever been inclined to do, but I'm 34, so who knows? At this point I would never even contemplate it, but that doesn't mean that when I'm 50 I won't have a change of heart," she told Town & Country in an extended interview.

NEWS YOU CAN USE IF YOU LIVE IN D.C.:

— "We could see a few glimmers of sun here and there, once the early fog lifts, but for the most part it's another mostly cloudy day as highs head for the mid-50s," the Capital Weather Gang forecasts. "Might see some spots of drizzle through the morning, with scattered light showers possible starting around or after 3 p.m. About a 50-60% chance of getting wet at any given location. Winds are light from the southeast."

— This month is officially the warmest December ever recorded in D.C., with the average daily temperature at 51.2 degrees, almost five-and-a-half degrees warmer than any other December since 1871. (Martin Weil)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Motorcycles and dirt bikes pop wheelies and drive the wrong way, slowing traffic on the Beltway Sunday. Officials took no enforcement action, according to Maryland State Police. (Jukin Media, Inc.)

— There's an epidemic of hooligans on dirt bikes and motorcycles causing mayhem, and the police are offering weak excuses for not enforcing the law. They surround cars and circle pedestrians. They drive the wrong way on the highway, terrifying those in their path. A swarm on the Beltway this Sunday was caught on video. I recently saw a similar incident on H St., NE. "Authorities across the region have concluded that pursuing riders on illegal dirt bikes and similar off-road vehicles is dangerous because law enforcement cannot respond quickly enough or safely chase and corral operators who can outmaneuver police cars and escape on stairs and sidewalks and through narrow alleys," Peter Hermann and Dana Hedgpeth report . Residents are stepping up pressure on the cops to crack down.

VIDEOS OF THE DAY:

See drones get too close to Obama's motorcade:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And watch yet more hoverboard accidents, including Mike Tyson wiping out :

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

You are receiving this email because you signed up for the The Daily 202 newsletter or were registered on washingtonpost.com or were invited as a VIP. For additional free newsletters or to manage your newsletters, click here .

We respect your privacy . If you believe that this email has been sent to you in error, or you no longer wish to receive email from The Washington Post, click here . Contact us for help.

©2015 The Washington Post, 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Josh Schwerin" <jschwerin@hillaryclinton.com>
To: hrcrapid <HRCrapid@googlegroups.com>
Date: 4/22/2015 1:53:56 PM
Subject: TIME: Clinton Allies Knock Down Donor Allegations, New Questions Pop Up

Clinton Allies Knock Down Donor Allegations, New Questions Pop Up

Sam Frizell @Sam_Frizell

Zeke J Miller @ZekeJMiller
Massimo Calabresi @calabresim

8:49 PM ET
http://time.com/3831794/clinton-allies-knock-down-donor-allegations-new-questions-pop-up/

Hillary Clinton's allies are pushing back against the suggestion in a new book that donations to the Clinton Foundation influenced the handling of the sale of U.S. uranium mines to a Russian-backed company.

The new book,"Clinton Cash: the Untold Story of How and Why Foreign Governments and Businesses Helped Make Bill and Hillary Rich," says that Hillary Clinton failed in 2010 to block the purchase of American uranium mines by a Russian-backed company while people with financial and strategic interests in the sale were making millions of dollars of donations to the Clinton Foundation, a philanthropy run by her husband, former President Bill Clinton.

The suggestion of outside influence over U.S. decision making is based on little evidence—the allegations are presented as questions rather than proof. The deal's approval was the result of an extensive inter-agency process that required the assent of at least nine different officials and agencies. A former State Department official who participated in the deal's approval told TIME that Clinton did not weigh in on the uranium sale one way or the other, and her campaign calls the allegations in the book, "absurd conspiracy theories."

But the book's dark suggestions reflect the growing problem Clinton faces in her run for the White House in 2016 as more and more details of the Foundation's fundraising activities present the appearance of impropriety and lack of transparency during her time as Secretary of State.

One chapter of the book, written by conservative author Peter Schweizer and obtained by TIME, focuses on an obscure deal that had been years in the making. Schweizer says Secretary Clinton failed to block the Russian State Atomic Nuclear Agency (Rosatom), a Kremlin-controlled nuclear agency, from purchasing a controlling stake in an American Uranium mining concern, Uranium One. The company's chairman, Ian Telfer, was a major donor to the Clinton Foundation. Several other Clinton Foundation donors stood to gain from the agreement as well.

Because the proposed sale involved the transfer of potentially strategic U.S. assets, the Uranium One transaction was subject to approval by the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States (CFIUS), an interagency panel that comprises powerful federal agencies. In prior years, Clinton had urged the committee to take a hawkish view of deals involving U.S. strategic assets, and Schweizer says that should have inclined her against the Rosatom purchase. "Despite a long record of publicly opposing such deals Hillary didn't object," Schweizer writes in the version of the chapter obtained by TIME. "Why the apparent reversal? Could it be because shareholders involved in the transaction had transferred approximately $145 million to the Clinton Foundation or its initiatives? Or because her husband had profited from lucrative speaking deals arranged by companies associated with those who stood to profit from the deal?"

The State Department's role in approving the deal was part of an extensive bureaucratic process, and the chapter offers no indication of Hillary Clinton's personal involvement in, or even knowledge of, the deliberations. State has just one vote on the nine-member committee, which also includes the departments of Defense, Treasury, and Energy. Disagreements are traditionally handled at the staff level, and if they are not resolved, they are escalated to deputies at the relevant agencies. If the deputies can't resolve the dispute, the issues can be elevated to the cabinet secretary level and, if needed, to the president for a decision. The official chairman of CFIUS is the Treasury Secretary, not the Secretary of State.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Before purchasing a controlling stake in Uranium One, the Russian conglomerate also had to get approval from the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, an independent agency outside of the State Department's purview, as well as Utah's nuclear regulator. It also received the sign-off of Canada's foreign investment review agency. The deal itself was the outgrowth of a diplomatic initiative launched by the administration of George W. Bush to expand trade opportunities between Russia and the U.S., including in the area of nuclear power.

One official involved in the process said Clinton had nothing to do with the decision in the Uranium One case. Jose Hernandez, who as former Assistant Secretary of State for Economic, Energy and Business Affairs was the State Department's principal representative on the committee, rejected the notion that Clinton's Foundation ties had any bearing on the deal. "Secretary Clinton never intervened with me on any CFIUS matter," he told TIME. A spokesperson for Hillary for America, Josh Schwerin, also attacked the suggestions made in the book. The transaction, "went through the usual process and the official responsible for managing CFIUS reviews has stated that the Secretary did not intervene with him," Schwerin says, "This book is twisting previously known facts into absurd conspiracy theories."

Throughout the new book, Schweizer suggests that Hillary Clinton used her authority as Secretary of State to intervene on behalf of companies that donated to her family's foundation. Clinton has sought to distance herself from the charges on the campaign trail, calling the GOP claims "distractions."

Even if Clinton was not involved in approving the deal with the Russian company, the book does raise more questions about the Clinton Foundation's transparency regarding its donors and shows that the issue will continue to dog her candidacy. The book reports that Telfer, the Uranium One chairman, donated $2.1 million to a Clinton Foundation subsidiary through a charity he controls around the time the purchase was being finalized, an assertion TIME has verified through a review of public records. Those donations do not appear on the Foundation's disclosure of donors. Telfer is listed for smaller donations he made directly to the parent foundation.

In 2008, the Clinton Foundation and President Barack Obama's transition team signed a memorandum of understanding about the foundation's activities to allay congressional concerns over potential conflicts of interest stemming from its donors as Clinton was preparing to become Obama's Secretary of State. "In anticipation of Senator Clinton's nomination and confirmation as Secretary of State, the Foundation will publish its contributors this year," the agreement states. "During any service by Senator Clinton as Secretary of State, the Foundation will publish annually the names of new contributors."

Exempt from that relationship were an array of Clinton Foundation subsidiaries, including the Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership, a Canadian-based charity which works to establish "social enterprises" in the developing world. Telfer is one of three directors of a charity called the Fernwood Foundation, according to Canadian tax records dug up by Schweizer and verified by TIME. Fernwood has donated $2.1 million to the Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership, which at one point passed through as much as 88% of its donations to the main Clinton Foundation, Schweizer writes. Schweizer alleges that Telfer had 1.6 million shares in Uranium One and profited hugely off the deal, a claim that couldn't be independently verified.

The Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership, is listed as having given contributed more than $25 million to the Foundation according to its online disclosures, but the Foundation does not list any of the Giustra Partnership's individual donors. When contacted by TIME, a spokesman for the Clinton Foundation deferred comment to the Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership, which didn't immediately respond to requests for comment.

Without a full account of donors to the Foundations, allegations like the one in Schweizer's book will follow Clinton's candidacy even as she seeks to remain above the fray. The campaign, for its part, will continue to do its best to discredit Schweizer's book and distance itself from Republican attacks.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“While Republicans focus their efforts on attacks, Hillary Clinton is going to continue to focus on how to help everyday Americans get ahead and stay ahead,” the Clinton campaign said in a memo circulated Tuesday night. “That’s what her campaign is about, and no book—especially one as discredited as this one—is going to change that.”

--
Josh Schwerin
Spokesperson
Hillary for America
@Josh Schwerin

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Karen Finney" <kfinney@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 4/12/2015 2:35:52 PM
Subject: Re: draft surrogate talkers -- responding to day 1 attacks

Agree on need for positive stuff. If we're not already let's add the topper but send them all the great stuff we've put together today so that people aren't seeing this in a vacuum.

On Sun, Apr 12, 2015 at 9:31 PM, Karen Finney <kfinney@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

> Can we start with a positive line like - despite the overwhelmingly positive response to Hillary's message, the GOP went into attack mode.
>
> On Sun, Apr 12, 2015 at 9:15 PM, Ian Sams <isams@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:
>
> > Hey folks. Here are some points we pulled together for surrogates going on TV -- not a wide blast -- on how to respond to day one attacks on HRC. Thoughts? Adrienne/Karen/etc. can get to surrogates once we're all good.
> >
> > Thanks.
> > Ian
> >
> > OPENING DAY -- SURROGATE TALKING POINTS ON GOP ATTACKS
> >
> > Today we've seen a wide range of attacks from the entire GOP field and their allies. Below are some points to respond -- keeping the focus on Hillary's desire to focus on voters while the Republicans are trotting out tired attacks on her.
> >
> > - Republicans can focus on attacking her, but Hillary is focused on meeting voters and having real conversations about issues facing everyday Americans. This is the start of the different kind of campaign that Hillary wants to run -- one that is squarely focused on having a conversation with voters -- answering their questions, asking them questions and sharing ideas.
> >
> > - Meanwhile, Republicans want to be the champions for those at the top. While Hillary is talking to voters and focused on everyday Americans, every single Republican candidate has offered the same tired attacks and the same economic agenda that Americans know rob them of the stability they've worked so hard for -- with a top-down agenda that would stack the deck even more in favor of those at the top.
> >
> > - Americans have responded clearly that they appreciate Hillary's focus on their issues and their lives, so if Republicans want to keep their focus on tired political attacks, that's their choice.
> >
> > If pressed on specific GOP attacks on foreign policy/HRC's record at the State Department, stemming from Jeb Bush's video or other attacks:
> >
> > Job number one for Hillary as Secretary of State was to restore America's leadership after it was badly eroded by eight years of the Bush administration's foreign policy -- two wars, damaged alliances, diminished moral standing, no stopping Iran's nuclear program, and no action on climate. She's proud of her accomplishments.
> >
> > - Hillary led the effort to build a worldwide coalition to impose the toughest sanctions in history against the Iranians, which forced them to the negotiating table and gave us our best shot at preventing them from acquiring a nuclear weapon.
> > - Hillary brokered a ceasefire between Israel and Hamas in Gaza, which prevented a wider war and protected Israel's security.
> > - Hillary stood up to Putin by strengthening NATO, encouraging Europe to find alternative sources of energy, and called him out for trying to rebuild the Soviet Empire.
> > - Hillary worked with President Obama to get every major developing country, including China and India, to agree for the first time to reduce their carbon emissions and be held accountable for it.
> > - Hillary put internet freedom, LGBT rights, and women's rights on the global agenda, and defending human rights advocates on the frontlines around the world.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- And, of course, she was part of the President's team making the decision to launch the raid against bin Laden.

Jeb Bush may attack Hillary's time as Secretary of State now, but it's just negative politics meant to gin up his Republican base.

- Jeb Bush in 2013: "Former Secretary Clinton has dedicated her life to serving and engaging people across the world in democracy. These efforts as a citizen, an activist, and a leader have earned Secretary Clinton this year's Liberty Medal." [National Constitution Center, 6/27/2013]

Jeb Bush is advocating for the same failed foreign policy that led us to misguided wars and degraded our nation's standing in the world.

- Jeb Bush on George W. Bush: "I will tell you that I'm the only Republican that was in office when he was office as President that never disagreed with him. And I'm not going to start now. Why would I do that now after two years? …I'm not going to start now. It's just – 'til death do us part." [CNN interview]

--
Ian Sams | Rapid Response Associate
Hillary for America
(423) 915-6592 | @IanSams
Gchat: icsams

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
To view this discussion on the web visit https://groups.google.com/d/msgid/hrcrapid/CABd81JJxcSiv95x3%3Duc5H1fSQ5M9CZZ0deNmoNAwM%2BHKiO-p3Q%40mail.gmail.com.
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .

To view this discussion on the web visit https://groups.google.com/d/msgid/hrcrapid/CANOiRV9voo87eQ%2B49MXGxRrOM5gUxNkP0nCAL5ybLthiBFQVhA%40mail.gmail.com.

For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
To view this discussion on the web visit https://groups.google.com/d/msgid/hrcrapid/CAE_%3DYH9A96%3DBbB_V%2Bc2TuOy_zj4wT64H-ge3x9KHPB77Ob4ZEA%40mail.gmail.com.
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Ian Sams" <isams@hillaryclinton.com>
To: hrcrapid <HRCrapid@googlegroups.com>
Date: 4/22/2015 12:30:45 PM
Subject: Politico: Martin O'Malley forces ramp up for late May launch

http://www.politico.com/story/2015/04/martin-omalley-forces-ramp-up-for-late-may-launch-117254.html

Martin O'Malley forces ramp up for late May launch

By GABRIEL DEBENEDETTI

4/22/15 7:26 PM EDT

MANCHESTER, N.H. — Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley's supporters are getting ready for a likely presidential campaign launch in Baltimore in late May, while the candidate meets with prospective donors in the San Francisco area this week.

It's part of a significant ramp-up in activity taking advantage of the natural media vacuum that's resulted from Hillary Clinton being the only declared Democrat in the presidential race. O'Malley, who left the Maryland governor's mansion in 2015 after eight years, has recently sat for a handful of national interviews, including one with NPR during which he raised eyebrows — and his profile — by labeling Republican claims that regulation leads to income inequality "kind of patently bullshit."

Story Continued Below

He is due at the South Carolina Democratic Party convention this weekend, and will almost certainly stop in Iowa in the coming weeks, though details have not yet been finalized, according to aides. His stop in New Hampshire on May 13 for a state party fundraiser and house party will probably be one of his final pre-campaign trips.

Then he will likely make his White House intentions official at a late May announcement in Baltimore, where he launched his political career and served eight years as mayor.

As the consensus settles that progressive hero Elizabeth Warren really won't pursue the presidency, O'Malley's appearances have been calibrated to position himself as the liberal alternative to Clinton with a proven record of accomplishments. He regularly talks about imposing tighter regulations on Wall Street banks, an issue closely associated with the Massachusetts senator, and he has also aligned with her wing of the party against the 12-nation Pacific trade deal that is supported by President Barack Obama.

ALSO ON POLITICO

Hill Dems to Hillary: Get off the fence on trade

MANU RAJU and LAUREN FRENCH

O'Malley's allies assume that down the line much of the progressive infrastructure currently devoted to drafting and backing Warren in Washington and the early-voting states will turn to him as their best realistic hope.

"There's a base of progressives out there nationally looking for a voice, and they've been funding people for a while," says O'Malley's senior advisor Bill Hyers, who served as the campaign manager for liberal darling Bill de Blasio in 2013. "There's definitely a group we can tap into that is looking for Governor O'Malley."

But as O'Malley seeks to sharpen the contrast with Clinton, aides said, he remains unlikely to lash out at her directly anytime soon.

Instead, he will continue to point out her policy shifts, talk about a need for new leadership, and tweet videos highlighting his stances on specific issues when they disagree, according to people familiar with his plans.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While the O'Malley brain trust is invested in raising the likely candidate's name recognition levels in the early-voting states, his advisers see no benefit in doing so by attacking Clinton, whose campaign looks and feels like a juggernaut. It's not productive for O'Malley to become known for anti-Clinton attacks, they believe, instead preferring that he focus on specific issues — like strengthening Wall Street regulation and opposing the Trans Pacific Partnership trade deal — that excite liberals.

ALSO ON POLITICO

The 2016 Blast: A sneak peek inside 'Clinton Cash'

KATIE GLUECK and JONATHAN TOPAZ

Ultimately, his strategists hope to position him as a liberal with executive experience, funded largely by a robust online donation operation.

Not that they mind when he catches the attention of the national press by subtly knocking the former secretary of state, like he did Wednesday with a fundraising email about the trade deal carrying the subject line "Hard choice?" — an obvious reference to Clinton's 2014 book, "Hard Choices."

But O'Malley, who has consistently hovered around one percent in national polls of Democrats considering their options for the White House in 2016, has no specific plans to go much further for now, in what are likely the final weeks of his pre-campaign.

"It wouldn't be sustainable to have a ping-pong match going back and forth, especially in the early states. What you want to do is get known for issues," says Trevor Cornwell, a Silicon Valley executive and former campaign operative who is helping O'Malley raise money and hosting him for a series of meetings with venture capitalists and tech figures in California this week.

But on top of his polling and name recognition deficit, O'Malley also faces a major uphill financial climb against the Clinton machine that is looking to raise over $2 billion between its campaign and super PACs between now and November 2016, backed by a who's who list of the Democratic Party's major donors. O'Malley has a handful of allies prepared to fund his efforts and to raise money for him — including Washington attorney John Coale and Terry Lierman, the former Maryland state party chairman who served as a national finance chair for Howard Dean in 2004 — but his team expects his focus on online fundraising to be "tremendous," in the words of Hyers.

ALSO ON POLITICO

Clinton lawyer: 'No reason' for private Benghazi testimony

LAUREN FRENCH

"We've seen a lot of candidates take a lot of money because they catch fire at the right time, and that has to be part of the strategy," he said, pointing to O'Malley's liberal appeal on a handful of issues.

In a recent speech at Harvard University, where Warren taught until recently, O'Malley cited his record of raising the minimum wage, bolstering collective bargaining, and increasing education funding as governor. He also called for expanding Social Security and reforming the college loan system.

But his consistent hammering on staunchly liberal issues has not paid dividends in polling. His 1.5 percent support is far behind Clinton's 63 percent in the RealClearPolitics national polling average through mid-April, but also behind the 12 percent for Warren and 11 percent for Vice President Joe Biden, not to mention Vermont senator Bernie Sanders and former Virginia senator Jim Webb. O'Malley backers assume he will pick up many of the voters who are currently aligned behind Warren and Biden, but a CNN/ORC poll of the Democratic field that didn't include Warren still showed O'Malley at 1 percent earlier this week.

Still, Democrats across the party expect a non-Clinton candidate to catch fire over the summer and to garner around 25-to-30 percent of the vote in Iowa, a state with which O'Malley has been familiar since he spent time there on behalf of Gary Hart's 1984 presidential campaign. Clinton's camp expects O'Malley to rise in the polls.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Malley's team has been aggressive about following up with activists who speak with the former governor during his early-state trips, and he has been benefited from the state parties' financial and organizational interest in competitive primaries.

ALSO ON POLITICO

O'Malley dings Clinton for flip-flops on gay marriage, immigration

NICK GASS

"It's a really straightforward grassroots approach," says Dave Allen, a New Hampshire lawyer who hosted O'Malley for a roundtable discussion last month. "He's seen as the only person who could make the primary relevant."

Nonetheless, even Democrats who see him as liberals' best hope against Clinton identify his likely fundraising deficit as a serious uphill battle, joined by the fact that the Democrat running to replace him in Annapolis lost in November, in what was widely taken as a referendum on O'Malley. And many see a weakness in the fact that he was one of Clinton's staunchest backers when she ran in 2008, supporting her against Obama until June of that year.

But Clinton's team has yet to directly engage with O'Malley or any other potential challenger, despite their behind-the-scenes acknowledgment that he could cause some trouble down the road.

Unsurprisingly, that's fine with O'Malley's allies.

"Hillary better be nice to him," warned Dan Calegari, a longtime New Hampshire activist, who has, like Cornwell, known O'Malley since their days on the Hart campaign. "He's going to need a good vice president. First woman vice president."

Read more: http://www.politico.com/story/2015/04/martin-omalley-forces-ramp-up-for-late-may-launch-117254.html#ixzz3Y5GMrgzO

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Stephen Paduano" <spaduano@hfaintern.com>
To:	"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date:	7/24/2015 5:36:19 AM
Subject:
Attachments:	Daily Clips (7.24.15).docx

Daily Clips

July 24, 2015

Hillary Clinton Strongly Defends Planned Parenthood and Cites Nuance on Glass-Steagall NYT/Amy Chozick

In Greenville, SC on Thursday HRC defended Planned Parenthood and gave a "nuanced" answer to an attendee's question about Glass-Steagall. HRC said: "I'm not interested in just saying there's one answer to the too-big-to-fail problem."

Hillary Clinton Things She Can Change How America's Biggest Companies Behave

WaPo/Jim Tankersley

"Hillary Cilnton is set on Friday to unveil a new round of economic proposals aimed at a problem that liberals and conservatives largely agree exists in America today: Companies aren't investing enough in the sorts of things that could lift the economy in the long-run."

Hillary Clinton to Return to the Hamptons for Vacation

NYT/Amy Chozick

Several news outlets reported on WJC and HRC's August vacation to the Hamptons, noting that in years past they have rented "multimillion-dollar mansions." It was also reported that HRC is set to attend fundraisers in the Hamptons.

Criminal Inquiry Sought in Hillary Clinton's Use of Email

NYT/Michael Schmidt, Matt Apuzzo

"Two inspector generals have asked the Justice Department to open a criminal investigation into whether sensitive government information was mishandled in connection with the personal email account Hillary Rodham Clinton used as secretary of state."

Hillary Clinton Invokes 'Black Lives Matter' Mantra

WSJ/Laura Meckler

"Hillary Clinton at a campaign appearance Thursday, spoke in blunt terms about race in America, saying the nation must confront 'systemic racism' and twice invoking the activist cry 'black lives matter.'"

U.S. Democrat Hillary Clinton Backs Local Taxes on Internet Sales (Reuters)

At a campaign stop in South Carolina, HRC said that she supports allowing cities and states to tax online purchases, but that she would not mandate it.

What's Going On With Mr. O'Malley's Money?

WaPo/Editorial Board

The Washington Post Editorial Board published an Op-Ed Thursday scrutinizing Gov. O'Malley's financial relationship with the tech company Esri, The Environmental Systems Research Institute.

Esri received a no-bid state contract from Maryland while O'Malley was governor, and then paid him $148,000 for speeches and consulting when he left office.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"What's concerning is how [Gov. O'Malley] pivoted almost immediately on leaving office to accepting a large income from a firm whose ongoing business with the state was sustained in no small part because of Mr. O'Malley's influence."

O'Malley: Democrats Need to Support Wall Street Overhaul

AP/Ken Thomas

"Gov. Martin O'Malley on Thursday challenged the Democratic presidential field to commit to making changes on Wall Street, including restoring the Glass-Steagall law that once separated commercial and investment banking."

Jeb Bush Calls for an End to Energy Subsidies

NYT/Alan Rappeport

In New Hampshire on Wednesday, Jeb Bush called for a phasing out of tax credits that subsidize the wind, solar, oil, and gas industries. Bush said: "I don't think we should pick winners and losers."

Jeb Bush Condemns 'Political Correctness' of #BlackLivesMatter Protesters

WaPo/David Weigel

Following Gov. O'Malley's walk-back of his "white lives matter" remark at Netroots Nation, Jeb Bush said: "We're so uptight and politically correct now that we apologize for saying 'lives matter'... If he believes that white lives matter, which I hope he does, then he shouldn't have apologized to a group that seemed to disagree with it. Gosh."

Marco Rubio and John Kerry State Differences on Iran Nuclear Deal

NYT/Alan Rappeport

At a Foreign Relations Committee hearing on Thursday, Sen. Rubio and John Kerry exchanged barbs on the Iran nuclear deal. Energy Secretary Ernest Moniz and Treasury Secretary Jack Lew were also at the hearing.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker Criticizes Iran Nuclear Deal

AP/Elliot Spagat

"Gov. Scott Walker told a sympathetic crowd of state lawmakers from around the country Thursday that he would trash the nuclear deal with Iran on his first day as president, striking a combative tone on how we would govern on a range of domestic and foreign policy issues."

New Jersey Dems Take a Swipe at Christie's Wallet

Politico/Ryan Hutchins

"Democratic lawmakers in New Jersey are taking a swing at Governor Chris Christie, pushing legislation that would require his campaign to reimburse taxpayers for security costs when he's traveling for political purposes."

Ohio Gov. John Kasich To Meet With 2012 Nominee Mitt Romney

AP/Steve Peoples

"Kasich plans to have lunch Thursday with the 2012 GOP nominee at Romney's lakeside vacation home in New Hampshire."

Donald Trump Threatens Third-Party Candidacy

NYT/Alan Rappeport

"In an interview with The Hill published Thursday, Donald Trump said that many of his supporters have been urging him to consider a third-party run if he fails to secure the Republican nomination. Noting that the Republican National Committee has been 'foolish' in its handling of him, he said that his treatment by the party will dictate his plans."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Drug Prices Soar, Prompting Calls for Justification

NYT/Andrew Pollack

"As complaints grow about exorbitant drug prices, pharmaceutical companies are coming under pressure to disclose the development costs and profits of those medicines and the rationale for charging what they do."

3 Dead, 7 Hurt When Gunman opens Fire in Lafayette Movie Theater

CNN/Ed Payne

A 58-year-old white male opened fire inside a movie theater in Lafayette, Louisiana Thursday night, killing two and wounding seven before taking his own life.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Josh Schwerin" <jschwerin@hillaryclinton.com>
To: hrcrapid <HRCrapid@googlegroups.com>
Date: 4/20/2015 10:30:17 AM
Subject: Politico: Hillary Clinton on GOP field: They only want to talk about me

Hillary Clinton on GOP field: They only want to talk about me

“I don’t know what they’d talk about if I weren’t in the race.”

By ANNIE KARNI
4/20/15 5:23 PM EDT
http://www.politico.com/story/2015/04/hillary-clinton-2016-new-hampshire-republicans-117160.html#ixzz3Xt4oxaND

KEENE, N.H. — Hillary Clinton on Monday attacked the crowded field of Republican presidential contenders for making her the focus of their campaigns.

“I think it’s worth noting that Republicans seem to be talking only about me,” she told reporters after her first roundtable in New Hampshire, which took place at a family-owned wooden toy company in Keene. “I don’t know what they’d talk about if I weren’t in the race.”

Clinton arrived in New Hampshire Monday – she drove from her home in Chappaqua, N.Y. – following a two-day gathering in the Granite State of 19 Republican presidential contenders who appeared to be workshopping their best shots. They spent the weekend blasting Clinton on everything from Benghazi to the State Department email scandal to the highly choreographed roundtables to her roadside lunch stop at Chipotle.

In contrast to the other side of the aisle, Clinton had the whole stage here to herself. During the event, she tried to present herself as above the political fray, while making a few subtle digs at the Republican field and veering into a couple policy areas.

She swatted away attacks due to be published in a book out next month, “Clinton Cash: the Untold Story of How and Why Foreign Governments and Businesses Helped Make Bill and Hillary Rich,” by Peter Schweizer. “[I’ll be] subjected to all kinds of distractions and attacks, and I’m ready for that. I know that that comes, unfortunately, with the territory,” she told reporters.

Before addressing the new book, Clinton toured Whitney Brothers, the toy company, and then sat down for an hour-long roundtable discussion with the CEO and six employees.

Sitting in the chilly warehouse where wooden step stools were being assembled nearby, Clinton twice mentioned that she was not going to be an ideological candidate — an implicit jab at the Republican party. “I want to embed what I propose as policies, not in ideology, not in some philosophy, but in the real daily lives and experiences of American workers and business owners, and everyone who has a stake in making sure the economy is working again,” she told the group of her early campaign strategy.

Answering questions about the future of Social Security, Clinton said she wanted to avoid getting into arguments “about ideology and rhetorical attacks and claims.” She said she is fully committed to ensuring that people who have worked hard can enjoy security when they retire. Clinton also said those who think the government should privatize social security are “just wrong.”

Clinton arrived in New Hampshire planning to speak about the importance of small business to helping rebuild the country’s middle class.

But she quickly found herself on what appeared to be an unplanned subject: drug addiction and substances abuse in rural communities, which multiple participants in the roundtable brought up. “There is a hidden epidemic … whether it is pills or meth or heroine, is not as visible as 30 years ago when there were all kinds of gangs and violence," Clinton said. "This is a quiet epidemic. And it is striking in small towns and rural areas." She called substance abuse a "perfect storm" and an "increasing problem that is only beginning to break through the surface."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Treating mental health issues, including substance abuse, will be "a big part of my campaign," she said.

Clinton — whose win in the New Hampshire primary in 2008 resuscitated her campaign after a bad loss in Iowa — told the group assembled she was "thrilled to be back in New Hampshire … the first place I ever came for any political campaign was in 1991, when I was here campaigning for my husband." It was the first time Clinton has mentioned the former president in her public remarks on the campaign trail this time around.

Read more: http://www.politico.com/story/2015/04/hillary-clinton-2016-new-hampshire-republicans-117160.html#ixzz3Xt4oxaND

--
Josh Schwerin
Spokesperson
Hillary for America
@Josh Schwerin

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To:	CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date:	10/9/2014 7:38:10 AM
Subject:	Gen. Wesley Clark Talks about Hillary and the Future

Today, General Wesley Clark was on the Diane Rehm show. He spoke candidly and passionately about his support for Secretary Clinton. You will find the links and script below. Please listen and share. I hope you are well on this fine Autumn day.

Click here to watch General Clark discuss Secretary Clinton as a potential candidate for president.

REHM: Would you, if Hillary Clinton decides to run, will you support her?

GEN. CLARK: Yes.

REHM: She is your candidate?

GEN. CLARK: She is my candidate. Yeah.

REHM: Nobody else out there on the Democratic side that you would support?

GEN. CLARK: Well, and let me explain. First of all, I've known Hillary for over thirty years. I've watched her growth. I've admired her from a distance. She was a remarkable lawyer in private practice in Little Rock. I live there now and I talk to people who worked with her. They'll tell you. She was smart. She was absolutely determined on her cases. She saw deeply in. She's extremely effective in dealing with small groups. She's a leader. She's fearless in speaking out. And I watched her as First Lady, Senator, Secretary of State. I think there's never been anybody quite so experienced and capable who would stand for the Office of President of the United States. I hope she'll run.

Click here to hear General Clark discuss Secretary Clinton's leadership.

GEN. WESLEY CLARK. Well, I do think that Hillary is a very strong leader. I think she has a very robust view of what American capabilities and responsibilities are, but I think to characterize her that way [as an interventionist] would be unfair to the record. She did a lot of things as secretary of state to raise the stature of economic diplomacy. We got talking serious about energy developments. We've been trying to encourage the Europeans to be less dependent on Russian energy. Ever since she became secretary of state we have an assistant secretary of state who works energy policies and things like that. She's worked diligently with the Agency for International Development to promote development abroad. So she's taken a much broader view than simply intervention. But on the other hand, there are times, unfortunately in this world, where the United States may have to use military power. Hopefully, we just deploy forces, not troops, but I think Hillary as president would be strong enough to make those decisions if required to do so.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 10/16/2014 1:50:13 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Thursday October 16, 2014 Morning Roundup

Correct The Record Thursday October 16, 2014 Morning Roundup:

Headlines:

Courier-Journal: "Grimes rallies crowd with Hillary Clinton"

"In many ways, the speech seemed like it could serve as a starting point for another presidential campaign by Clinton. It was peppered with her beliefs and even talked about returning to a time like when her husband was in office when Republicans and Democrats worked together."

New York Times: "In South, Clinton Tries to Pull Democrats Back Into the Fold"

"The demand for Mrs. Clinton — she has already been asked back to campaign again for Ms. Grimes — only underscores the racial and class divisions in the Democratic Party that emerged in 2008 and have been exacerbated during Mr. Obama's presidency, and which Mrs. Clinton would need to bridge if she runs for president again in 2016."

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Running From Obama: Grimes Declares Kentucky Is 'Clinton Country'"

"Former Secretary of State and first lady Hillary Clinton was the marquee speaker at the rally – and the person Mrs. Grimes suggested she'd rather see at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue."

Bloomberg: "Hillary Clinton Attempts to Rescue Alison Lundergan Grimes"

"A day after the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee announced plans to pull its Kentucky television ads, Clinton came to Louisville for a rally with Grimes."

Lexington Herald-Leader: "In Louisville, Hillary Clinton implores Democrats to 'send Alison to Washington'"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton joined more than 4,000 of Alison Lundergan Grimes' supporters for a rallyWednesday night as Democrats were eager to rebut the narrative that Grimes' campaign was struggling down the stretch in her U.S. Senate race against incumbent Mitch McConnell."

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "Hillary Clinton's complicated relationship with Mitch McConnell"

"But when she traveled to the state four years ago, she struck a much softer tone when speaking about the Republican incumbent whom Democrats paint as the 'obstructionist in chief.'"

CNN: "Pro-Clinton group adds $2 million to its war chest"

"Ready for Hillary, the super PAC urging Hillary Clinton to run for president in 2016, raised over $2 million and had 21,000 new donors in the last three months, officials from the group said Wednesday."

Politico: "$2M quarter for 'Ready for Hillary'"

"The amount means the group has raised more than $10.25 million overall, primarily through small donations."

CNN: "Is Hillary Clinton ready for marijuana's 2016 push?"

"It is 2016, when voters will also have to decide who they want in the White House, that marijuana activists feel could be the real tipping point for their movement."

Politico: "Scoring Hillary Clinton's politics"

"Political watchers have spent years debating whether Hillary Clinton is a liberal Democrat, or center-left. Steve Hilton, a former adviser to British Prime Minister David Cameron, says the answer is simple: It depends."

Politico: "Tales from a Clinton impeachment leader"

"Hutchinson declined repeatedly to assess a potential Hillary Clinton 2016 candidacy or to say whether he'd be a surrogate for the eventual GOP nominee. He skirted questions about his party's criticism of her on issues like the Benghazi attacks. 'This race is about Arkansas, not about what happens three years from now, it's about what happens next year,' Hutchinson said."

CNN: "With an Eye to 2016, Bill Clinton Campaigns in New Hampshire"

"Clinton's visit appears to be buoying many Democrats already. With news of his headlining appearance, 1,200 people have purchased tickets to the Jefferson-Jackson Dinner, the biggest crowd since the state party revived it as a fall fundraising event in 1991. Normally 400-450 Democrats attend."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Articles:

Courier-Journal: "Grimes rallies crowd with Hillary Clinton"

By Joseph Gerth

October 15, 2014, 11:37 p.m. EDT

Continuing to make her case that she is a Clinton Democrat, Senate candidate Alison Lundergan Grimes appearedMonday night in Louisville with Hillary Rodham Clinton, the former presidential candidate and secretary of state.

Together, the two rallied a crowd of 4,500 at the Kentucky International Convention Center.

"Alison is the right leader at the right time with the right plan to deliver for Kentucky's hard-working families," said Clinton, the wife of former President Bill Clinton who nearly won the Democratic nomination for president six years ago.

In a 32-minute speech, Clinton ripped U.S. Sen. Mitch McConnell, with whom she served with in the Senate, for his positions on various issues ranging from pay equity to student loan debt to raising the minimum wage.

She ended each passage with the same refrain, "You know what you have to do, send Alison to Washington."

At one point, a man sitting in the far away bleachers could be heard yelling, "We love you Hillary."

Clinton was a prize "get" for Grimes as she tries to capitalize on the popularity of the Clinton name in Kentucky, even as McConnell tries to connect her to President Barack Obama, who is deeply unpopular in Kentucky. Grimes has said she voted for Hillary Clinton in the 2008 Democratic primary but has avoided saying whether she voted for President Obama in the 2008 and 2012 general elections.

Bill Clinton has already been to the state twice to rally the Democratic troops and raise money for Grimes, and her campaign hopes to get him back again.

Hillary Clinton recalled trips to Kentucky, including dipping a bottle of Maker's Mark in wax in Loretto in 2008 as well as, as a friend of Grimes' father, Jerry Lundergan, visiting their old homestead in Maysville.

Grimes noted that she has known Clinton since she was 14 years old. What she didn't say is that she handed the Clintons flowers when they stepped out of their limousine at Bill Clinton's inauguration in 1993.

"She will never forget how she was raised and the people who helped her along the way," Clinton said of Grimes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Before the rally — the biggest of the race so far for Grimes — Clinton headlined a $1,000 to $2,600 per head fundraiser at the 21c Hotel about five blocks away.

The event didn't have the feel of a flagging campaign as the media has suggested in recent weeks. Grimes has come under fire for refusing to say who she voted for for president in the 2008 and 2012 general elections, and on Wednesdaythe Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee stopped buying ad time in the state.

The DSCC pushed back on Wednesday morning with DSCC executive director Guy Cecil tweeting that he had just signed a $300,000 check to help the get-out-the-vote effort in Kentucky.

"That's an interesting view of 'pulling out of the race,' " he wrote.

Grimes appeared to take a jab at the DSCC, noting at one point during her speech that the race wouldn't be decided by political operatives in Washington.

"Washington abandoned us a long time ago," she said.

Grimes mentioned Obama, but only to say that he wasn't on the ballot.

U.S. Rep. John Yarmuth, D-Louisville, who spoke earlier in the program, gave a rousing defense of the president, at one point blaming McConnell for losses in the coal industry over his 30-year career — saying that it wasn't the fault of Obama.

A long line of enthusiastic supporters began filing into the convention hall when the doors opened at 5:30. The room was set up to accommodate the large crowd and looked like a mini-political convention with narrow, horizontal signs signifying each of Kentucky's 120 counties.

Confetti also was shot into the air at the conclusion of Clinton's speech.

Grimes noted that she raised a record $4.9 million in the latest fundraising quarter. But she still trails McConnell, who has raised more than $28 million. Grimes has raised just over $16 million.

"Big ideas and big hearts beat big money every single time," Clinton told the boisterous crowd.

She asked the crowd if they had seen Monday's debate on Kentucky Educational Television, the only debate of the election, and said, "You could not have a clearer contrast between solutions for Kentucky's families and Washington double-talk."

Clinton also touted Grimes' job plan, which calls for improving education and providing job opportunities for military veterans.

But in many ways, the speech seemed like it could serve as a starting point for another presidential campaign by Clinton. It was peppered with her beliefs and even talked about returning to a time like when her husband was in office when Republicans and Democrats worked together.

She recalled Bill Clinton talking about "building a bridge to the 21st Century" but said today's Republicans seem intent on tearing it down.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

New York Times: "In South, Clinton Tries to Pull Democrats Back Into the Fold"

By Amy Chozick

October 15, 2014

LOUISVILLE, Ky. — The last time Hillary Rodham Clinton campaigned in Kentucky, she was delivering her victory speech after defeating Barack Obama in the state's 2008 Democratic presidential primary on the strength of a huge advantage among white working-class voters.

White Democrats voted for Mrs. Clinton over Mr. Obama by 49 percentage points in 2008, a telling indication of both her strength and Mr. Obama's trouble in attracting traditional Democratic voters.

When Mrs. Clinton returned here on Wednesday to campaign for the Senate candidate Alison Lundergan Grimes, a family friend, it was that appeal that Kentucky Democrats hoped would give Ms. Grimes a needed boost in her underdog campaign against Senator Mitch McConnell. The demand for Mrs. Clinton — she has already been asked back to campaign again for Ms. Grimes — only underscores the racial and class divisions in the Democratic Party that emerged in 2008 and have been exacerbated during Mr. Obama's presidency, and which Mrs. Clinton would need to bridge if she runs for president again in 2016.

Mr. Obama is so unpopular in Kentucky that Ms. Grimes will not even say whether she voted for him. In a debate on Monday evening, Ms. Grimes cited "privacy at the ballot box" when asked again about it, though she has freely acknowledged voting for Mrs. Clinton in 2008 and at Wednesday's rally called Kentucky "Clinton country."

Many Democrats said Mr. Obama never made efforts to repair the divides that became apparent that year, leaving states like Kentucky and Arkansas vulnerable to a Republican rout.

"I think if Hillary Clinton were in the White House today, McConnell would be behind by 20 points," said Todd Hollenbach Sr., a former Jefferson County judge executive whom Mr. McConnell unseated in 1977.

But after four years serving as secretary of state in the Obama administration and nearly two years living in New York with a packed schedule of paid speeches, book signings and charity galas, Mrs. Clinton will need to reintroduce herself to the blue-collar voters here and elsewhere who have become further alienated from the Democratic Party during the Obama administration. "I will never forget the time I spent crisscrossing the state in 2008 and all of the determined, hardworking people I met along the way," Mrs. Clinton said.

"Well, tonight I'm back," she added.

Besides Wednesday night's speech, Mrs. Clinton will talk about middle-class jobs on Thursday in Michigan at campaign events for two Democrats, Representative Gary Peters and former Representative Mark Schauer. Before the midterm election, Mrs. Clinton will also campaign in Georgia for Michelle Nunn, the Democratic nominee for Senate, and in New Hampshire for Senator Jeanne Shaheen and Gov. Maggie Hassan.

"When she speaks about issues of economic opportunity, particularly when she speaks about economic opportunity for women and for families, she does it in a way that really connects," said Mo Elleithee, the national communications director at the Democratic National Committee who worked on Mrs. Clinton's 2008 campaign.

That message helped Mrs. Clinton defeat Mr. Obama here by 35.6 percentage points in the state's 2008 primary; only in Arkansas did she win a wider margin of white voters. By then, Mr. Obama had already won the delegates necessary to effectively secure the nomination, but in her victory speech in Louisville, Mrs. Clinton vowed to stay in the race until Democrats had a nominee, "whoever she may be."

In the past six years, this state like much of the country has become more politically polarized. At the same time, fond memories of the Clinton administration — many of the voters who supported Mrs. Clinton did so because of their affection for Bill Clinton, who carried Kentucky in 1992 and 1996 — have faded.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Kentucky voters identified with Mr. Clinton because of his rural Arkansas roots and centrist politics. Mrs. Clinton largely resonated here because of "the Bill factor," said Al Cross, director of the Institute for Rural Journalism and Community Issues at the University of Kentucky. "It's been a while, so she does need to reintroduce herself," he added.

Jonathan Miller, a former Kentucky state treasurer, said it was voters' animosity toward Mr. Obama, and not necessarily excitement for Mrs. Clinton, that was energizing Democrats here. "We're just nostalgic for when Democrats were different than Obama," he said.

Kentucky Republicans have tried to remind voters that Mrs. Clinton worked in the Obama administration and cannot easily escape association with the unpopular president.

In the debate on Monday, Mr. McConnell pushed back on Ms. Grimes's associating herself with Mr. Clinton's style of centrist policies. "There's not a dime's worth of difference between a Clinton Democrat and an Obama Democrat," Mr. McConnell said.

The Clintons have been particularly invested in the long-shot Kentucky race. Mr. Clinton is friends with Ms. Grimes's father, Jerry Lundergan, a local entrepreneur and former chairman of the Kentucky Democratic Party. Mr. Clinton has campaigned frequently for Ms. Grimes, whom the Clintons have known since she was 14 years old, and made his first television ad this election cycle on her behalf.

"This is a young woman who knows where she came from," Mrs. Clinton said. "She will never forget how she was raised and the people who helped her along the way."

In her speech, Mrs. Clinton defended the impact the Affordable Care Act has had on Kentuckians and railed against congressional Republicans for the current gridlock in Washington.

"More than any other race in the country," Mrs. Clinton said, "this election in Kentucky is a referendum on the future."

A theme of the evening was shattering the glass ceiling, and Mrs. Clinton spoke extensively about raising the minimum wage and equal pay for women.

Ms. Grimes, 35, has sparred with the 72-year-old Mr. McConnell on gender issues, including seizing on a Republican operative's comment that Ms. Grimes was an "empty dress" because her campaign lacked specifics.

The rally at the Kentucky International Convention Center drew about 4,500 people and was one of Mrs. Clinton's riskier midterm efforts. Until recently, she seemed a reluctant and cautious surrogate, more focused on fund-raisers in Washington and New York than stepping out on the stump.

But that changed recently as her schedule has picked up and Democrats face a reality in which they could lose control of the Senate. Despite requests, as of Wednesday, Mrs. Clinton did not plan to return to Kentucky. This week the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee stopped funding ads on Ms. Grimes's behalf.

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Running From Obama: Grimes Declares Kentucky Is 'Clinton Country'"

By Peter Nicholas

October 16, 2014, 7:19 a.m. EDT

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

LOUISVILLE, Ky. – It's no secret that Democrats running for Senate in deep red states aren't pining for a visit from the leader of the party.

Just how toxic President Barack Obama has become was evident in a rally Wednesday when Kentucky Democratic Senate candidate Alison Lundergan Grimes said she won't be sorry to see him go when his term is up.

Ms. Grimes scarcely mentioned Mr. Obama in her speech, except to say he won't be on the ballot in the November election. Instead, she showered praise on the last Democratic president – Bill Clinton.

Less than one minute into her appearance she proclaimed that Kentucky is "Clinton country."

Former Secretary of State and first lady Hillary Clinton was the marquee speaker at the rally – and the person Mrs. Grimes suggested she'd rather see at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue.

"This election is not about who's in the White House now," Ms. Grimes said. Mr. Obama, she added, "has two more years. This is a six-year term. It's about the senator that will work for the next four years with whomever is in the White House, no matter he – or she – might be."

Ms. Grimes is in a delicate spot, running an underdog campaign against the longtime Republican incumbent, Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell. The Real Clear Politics average of polls in Kentucky shows Mr. McConnell with a three-point lead.

With Mr. Obama's approval ratings sagging across the board, Ms. Grimes is doing all she can to distance herself from the unpopular president.

Mr. Obama won't be showing up in Kentucky any time soon and Ms. Grimes won't say whether she voted for him in 2012.

In her speech , she spent no time discussing what Mr. Obama's supporters see as his signature achievements: Helping end the recession, overhauling the health-care system and imposing new regulations on large financial firms.

Instead, she touted Mr. Clinton's economic record in the 1990s. She said Mr. Clinton presided over "the largest economic expansion that the nation has ever seen."

"I am a Clinton Democrat and that's the kind of senator I will be," Ms. Grimes said.

Left unsaid in her speech is that when it comes to major domestic goals, Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton aren't far apart. Both favor an increase in the minimum wage. Both want more money spent on road, bridge and public works projects. And both see Mr. McConnell as an obstacle to legislative progress.

When it was her turn to speak, Mrs. Clinton praised the health-care overhaul ushered in by Mr. Obama in 2010.

Mrs. Clinton mentioned that Ms. Grimes favors improvements in the state's infrastructure, singling out the Brent Spence Bridge, which spans the Ohio River.

"She'll back common sense improvements to infrastructure that will get Kentucky's economy moving again, like the Brent Spence Bridge," Mrs. Clinton said.

Yet Mr. Obama has called attention to that same aging bridge. In 2011, he traveled to the Brent Spence Bridge and urged that it be updated, as part of a larger $50 billion jobs package.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Calling out Mr. McConnell and House Speaker John Boehner (R., Ohio), the president said, “Mr. Boehner, Mr. McConnell, help us repair this bridge.”

Mr. Obama’s jobs package went nowhere in Congress.

Bloomberg: “Hillary Clinton Attempts to Rescue Alison Lundergan Grimes”

By Lisa Lerer

October 15, 2014, 11:40 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Kentucky's struggling Senate candidate brings in a powerful friend.

LOUISVILLE, KY -- National Democrats have gone tepid on her. Progressive groups are attacking her. Latino leaders are condemning her campaign. But there's at least one powerful force in the Democratic Party sticking by Kentucky Senate candidate Alison Lundergan Grimes: Hillary Clinton.

A day after the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee announced plans to pull its Kentucky television ads, Clinton came to Louisville for a rally with Grimes.

"You know this race is too close to call and it all comes down to who shows up," Clinton told a convention hall packed with cheering supporters. "Let's put another crack in that glass ceiling and elect this incredible young woman to the United States Senate."

Grimes is challenging Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell and her backers seemed undaunted by the latest campaign setbacks as they roared chants of "Mitch Doesn't Care" at a rally they called "McConnell's retirement party." Campaign Manager Jonathan Hurst released a memo to reporters on Wednesday saying that the media is overstating the importance of the DSCC decision.

"The 15-month campaign plan we've put together and ridden to a statistical tie entering the final 20-day stretch of the election remains in place," he wrote. "The race will remain airtight and come down to turnout."

The Grimes campaign is banking on the Clinton appearance to motivate a key democratic group: women voters. Whether Democrats can stave off a major drubbing this November will depend, in large part, on female turnout. That battle has been front and center in Senate races in Colorado, Iowa, Georgia, Louisiana and Kentucky, where Grimes has hammered McConnell for being hostile to women's issues. Supporters waved "shatter the glass, break the ceiling," signs, a slogan repeated by female senators in a video introducing Grimes at the rally.

"You want to know what a freshman senator can do, you just look at Senator Clinton's record. That's what a senator can do and should do in Washington," said Grimes, standing beside two huge screens broadcasting her image to the crowd. "You are ready for an independent strong Kentucky woman who can set the partisanship aside and won't be bullied by Mitch McConnell."

Clinton, who is considering a second presidential bid, endorsed Grimes, saying she would fight for equal pay, raising the minimum wage, health care and other policies to help working families.

"I'm back for one reason and that’s because Kentucky deserves a change in Washington," said Clinton. "And I think you agree with me: Alison is the right leader, at the right time, with the right plan to deliver for Kentucky's hard-working families."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Grimes has a history with the former first family. Her father, former state party chairman Jerry Lundergan, is a longtime Clinton friend. As a 14-year-old in 1993, Grimes handed President Clinton a bouquet of roses while attending his inauguration events. Bill Clinton helped convince Grimes to enter the race and campaigned with her earlier this year.

"I am a Clinton Democrat and that's the kind of senator that I will be," Grimes said, referencing her backing for Clinton and refusal to say whether she voted for President Barack Obama.

While both the Senate Majority PAC, a Democratic super-PAC, and the DSCC have reserved no airtime in the state, officials say they're continuing to invest hundreds of thousands of dollars in get out the vote efforts.

Grimes is under attack from the progressive wing of the party for an ad aired by her campaign that attacks McConnell for backing immigration legislation in the 1980s—calling it "amnesty"—and referring to undocumented immigrants as "illegal aliens." Democracy for America, led by former Vermont Governor Howard Dean, and Latino organizations have demanded she pull the spot.

"To see a candidate from either party use this kind of language in advertising is unacceptable in 2014," said Cristobal Alex, head of the Latino Victory Project. "We condemn this attempt by Alison Lundergan Grimes to play ugly politics with an issue so important to our community and the nation."

Her polling numbers have been sinking, showing McConnell with a small lead, and she opened herself up to fresh attacks earlier this month with her refusal to say whether she voted for Obama. NBC's Meet the Press host Chuck Todd said she "disqualified herself," a statement that quickly ended up in a McConnell ad. Grimes supporters tried to turn that into a benefit: a fight with another Washington insider.

"This election is not going to be won by some party hacks in Washington or words that come out of Chuck Todd's goatee," Kentucky Attorney General Jack Conway told the crowd.

Lexington Herald-Leader: "In Louisville, Hillary Clinton implores Democrats to 'send Alison to Washington'"

By Sam Youngman

October 15, 2014

LOUISVILLE— Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton joined more than 4,000 of Alison Lundergan Grimes' supporters for a rally Wednesday night as Democrats were eager to rebut the narrative that Grimes' campaign was struggling down the stretch in her U.S. Senate race against incumbent Mitch McConnell.

"I do believe Kentucky is Clinton country," Grimes said to wild applause.

Clinton took the stage at the Kentucky International Convention Center to a thunderous welcome, saying it was good to be back in the Bluegrass and remembering the time she spent in the state during the 2008 presidential primary, noting that she still smiles "when I think of that bottle of Maker's Mark that I dipped into the red wax."

"Well, tonight, I'm back," Clinton said. "I'm back for one reason, and that's because Kentucky deserves a change in Washington."

"Let's put another crack in that ceiling and send this incredible young woman to the United States Senate," Clinton said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

With Clinton possibly running for president in 2016, the event took on a presidential feel, and the crowd seemed as enthused about a possible White House run by Clinton as it was by the prospect of defeating McConnell, the Senate minority leader.

The hall was decorated to look like a presidential nominating convention, and signs posted throughout the seating area denoted each of Kentucky's 120 counties, similar to the setting of a national convention where each state's delegation is marked by a sign.

After a parade of state Democrats warmed up the crowd, with Attorney General Jack Conway and state Auditor Adam Edelen calling Clinton "the next president of the United States," Grimes introduced the former first lady as "a woman who has literally known me since I was 14 years old."

Grimes continued to fight the notion pushed by McConnell that she would be a rubber stamp for President Barack Obama, saying again that Obama isn't on the ballot.

"I am a Clinton Democrat, and that's the kind of senator that I will be," Grimes said. She added: "This election, it's not about who's in the White House now."

Clinton echoed Grimes' criticisms of McConnell, following her attack lines by telling the crowd that the best way to change the nation's capital was to "send Alison to Washington."

While not mentioning McConnell by name, Clinton blasted his positions on health care and the minimum wage while recalling the economic successes of her husband's administration.

The event could not have come at a better time for Grimes as Tuesday was dominated by news that the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee was not renewing its ad buy in the state, and a number of left-leaning groups condemned the Grimes campaign for running an ad in which she said she would never give "amnesty or benefits for illegal immigrants."

Though the DSCC tried Wednesday to convince reporters that it wasn't abandoning the state, pointing to $300,000 for Grimes' ground game, the candidate cited last week's Bluegrass Poll, which showed her leading McConnell by 2 points, and said she didn't need the DSCC's help, framing the election as "Kentucky versus Washington."

"We are ahead not because of Washington, D.C., insiders," Grimes said. "Washington abandoned us a long time ago."

With McConnell having released his fundraising numbers earlier in the day, Grimes appeared thrilled to tell the crowd, "we've out-raised the Mitch McConnell money machine yet again by nearly $1.5 million."

After days of enduring questions from the national media about why she refused to say whether she voted for Obama, Grimes included a shot at Chuck Todd, moderator of NBC's Meet the Press.

McConnell included Todd in a campaign ad after the well-known analyst said that Grimes had "disqualified herself" by refusing to answer the question. Grimes responded Wednesday night by saying that Washington needs a "woman who won't be bullied by Mitch McConnell or Chuck Todd."

Allison Moore, McConnell's spokeswoman, said in a statement that "the only possible reason why Alison Grimes would throw a party for Hillary Clinton but refuse to admit she voted for Barack Obama is that she thinks we're all too stupid to figure out they have the exact same policy views."

"Instead of highly produced events with celebrity guests, most Kentuckians would settle for an honest answer from Alison Grimes on anything related to the job of a U.S. senator," Moore said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While both Grimes and Clinton avoided direct mentions of Obama, U.S. Rep. John Yarmuth was eager to defend the president, pointing to the economic crisis Obama walked into at the start of his administration.

"Nobody has inherited a tougher job than Barack Obama did," Yarmuth said, adding that Kentucky's job losses are "on your head, Senator."

"It's not on President Obama's head," Yarmuth said.

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "Hillary Clinton's complicated relationship with Mitch McConnell"

By Alexander Bolton

October 15, 2014, 5:10 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton is expected to take some hard shots at Senate Republican Leader Mitch McConnell when she campaigns with his opponent, Alison Lundergan Grimes, in Kentucky on Wednesday.

But when she traveled to the state four years ago, she struck a much softer tone when speaking about the Republican incumbent whom Democrats paint as the "obstructionist in chief."

Clinton, a likely 2016 presidential candidate, praised McConnell effusively when she spoke at the University of Louisville in April 2010 while serving as secretary of State.

McConnell invited her to discuss nuclear nonproliferation at the McConnell Center's spring lecture series.

At the time she hailed McConnell's cooperation with the Obama administration on an array of foreign policy issues.

"During the eight years that I served in the Senate with Mitch, I was fortunate to find common cause and work with him on a number of foreign policy issues: human rights in Burma; legislation to support small businesses and micro-credit lending in Kosovo; promoting women and civil society leaders in Afghanistan; strengthening the rule of law in parts of the Islamic world," she said, according to a transcript posted on the State Department's website.

"And I've appreciated working with him in my new capacity upon becoming secretary of State," Clinton added.

The glowing remarks somewhat undercut Grimes's campaign narrative that he is an unrepentant obstructionist.

"Sen. McConnell's 30-year record? It's gridlock. It's obstruction. It's extreme partisanship," Grimes, the Kentucky secretary of State, said at a debate Monday night.

Clinton acknowledged that she and McConnell often clashed fiercely on domestic policy but touted him as a helpful partner on national security issues where they found common ground.

"Back in Washington these days, our policy discussions can get pretty lively. We can both vouch for that, both Sen. McConnell and I, because anybody who's turned TV during the last few months will remember some of the heated exchanges," she said. "But in foreign policy, we have a long tradition of coming together across party lines to face America's toughest national security challenges."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Grimes's allies argue that Clinton's remarks highlighting areas where she worked together with McConnell do not in any way conflict with her advocacy for his defeat.

Merely praising the GOP leader's record on human rights in Burma does not imply an endorsement of his other positions or broader record in the Senate, they say.

"There's nothing wrong with being collegial and working together. Secretary Clinton felt at the time that Sen. McConnell brought positive aspects to his job as they worked together, but overall she thinks Sen. Grimes would be better for the United States and for Kentucky," said Bob Gunnell, a Democratic strategist based in Kentucky.

Clinton is scheduled to appear with Grimes on Wednesday evening at the Kentucky International Convention Center. It will be her first campaign appearance with Grimes in Kentucky.

Former President Bill Clinton has already traveled to the state to help Grimes.

CNN: "Pro-Clinton group adds $2 million to its war chest"

By Dan Merica

October 15, 2014, 11:02 p.m. EDT

Ready for Hillary, the super PAC urging Hillary Clinton to run for president in 2016, raised over $2 million and had 21,000 new donors in the last three months, officials from the group said Wednesday.

Ready for Hillary's haul came from more than 38,000 contributions, according to group spokesman Seth Bringman, giving the group an average contribution of $52.

The $2 million is in line with what Ready for Hillary has raised in the past, but slightly less than the record $2.5 million the group raised in the second quarter.

Ready for Hillary is part of a cadre of pro-Clinton outside groups that are organizing for Clinton's likely run at the presidency. Unlike other super PACs, which are focused on communications and large-money donors, Ready for Hillary has tried to focus on small, grass-roots donations. So far, the group has raised over $10 million.

But in the third quarter of 2014, Ready for Hillary also moved to do more than just raise money and began to raise its profile in the eyes of many longtime Clinton confidants by having a large presence at events like September's Harkin Steak Fry in Indianola, Iowa.

Led by former Clinton aides and supporters, the super PAC also began to dish out money to state parties, local candidates and other Democratic groups, as well as helping raise money for 2014 candidates whom Clinton has endorsed.

After Clinton endorsed Bruce Braley in Iowa, for example, the group blasted out an email to its supporters asking them to donate money to the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democrat's Senate campaign.

Ready for Hillary also maxed out contributions during the third quarter to Vincent Sheheen, South Carolina's Democratic candidate for governor, Bakari Sellers, the state's Democratic candidate for lieutenant governor and the South Carolina Democratic Party.

Donating money to state parties has been a Ready for Hillary strategy for much of the year. Last month, a source with the group said Ready for Hillary had donated thousands of dollars to 29 state parties. Most of these donations were close to $10,000, the maximum the group can give to a state party.

Part of this stepped up involvement in early states is in reaction to the fact that other possible 2016 Democrats are already making moves there, too.

Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley moved political staff into South Carolina in August and has been raising money for state Democrats for months. Vice President Joe Biden also has been heavily involved with helping local South Carolina politicos raise money since 2013.

Ready for Hillary began sending political staff to 14 states -- including Iowa, South Carolina and New Hampshire -- on October 1.

Politico: "$2M quarter for 'Ready for Hillary'"

By Maggie Haberman

October 15, 2014, 11:03 p.m. EDT

The pro-Hillary Clinton low-dollar super PAC "Ready for Hillary" raised more than $2 million in the third fund-raising quarter of this year, officials with the group said, as they prepared to file financial disclosure forms.

The amount means the group has raised more than $10.25 million overall, primarily through small donations.

It outraised Organizing for Action, the remainder of the Obama campaign apparatus, and took in more than 38,000 contributions in the three-month period ending on the last day of September.

The group has been primarily involved in list-building activities, with the intent of swapping it with an eventual Hillary Clinton campaign, or selling it at market rate.

CNN: "Is Hillary Clinton ready for marijuana's 2016 push?"

By Dan Merica

October 16, 2014, 6:43 a.m. EDT

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When Hillary Clinton graduated from Wellesley College in 1969 -- where the future first lady and Secretary of State says she did not try marijuana -- only 12% of Americans wanted to legalize the drug.

In 45 years, however, the tide has changed for legalization: 58% of Americans now want to make consumption legal, two states (Colorado and Washington) already have and two more states (Oregon and Alaska) could join them by the end of the year.

Despite their growth in approval, many activists see 2014 as a smaller, but important, step to their end goal. It is 2016, when voters will also have to decide who they want in the White House, that marijuana activists feel could be the real tipping point for their movement.

"There will certainly be even more on the ballot in 2016," said Tamar Todd, director of marijuana law and policy and the Drug Policy Alliance. "More voters coming to the polls means more support for marijuana reform and in presidential election years, more voters turn out."

Demographics and money are also an important consideration. Big donors who are ready to fund pro-legalization efforts are more loose with their money in presidential years, according to activists, while Democrats and young people are more likely to turn out. This means legalization activists will be better funded to reach the nearly 70% of 18 to 29 year old Americans who support legalization.

On paper, activists feel their plan will work. But it is one yet to be decided factor -- who Democrats will nominate for president in 2016 -- that could throw a wrench into their push.

Hillary Clinton is the prohibitive favorite for the Democrats' nomination, but to many in the marijuana legalization community, she is not the best messenger for their cause.

"She is so politically pragmatic," said Alan St. Pierre, the director of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws. "If she has to find herself running against a conservative Republican in 2016, I am fearful, from my own view here, that she is going to tack more to the middle. And the middle in this issue tends to tack more to the conservative side."

Making a concerted push during a presidential election year means activists' goals will be directly contrasted with the Democrats' presidential standard bearer. This happened in 2004, when more conservative voters helped tip the presidential election for President George W. Bush at the same time that 11 states had anti-gay marriage questions on the ballot.

Clinton has moved towards pro-legalization, though.

Earlier this year, during a town hall with CNN, she told Christiane Amanpour that she wants to "wait and see" how legalization goes in the states before making a national decision. At the same event, she cast some doubt on medical marijuana by questioning the amount of research done into the issue.

Later in the year, Clinton labeled marijuana a "gateway drug" where there "can't be a total absence of law enforcement."

"I'm a big believer in acquiring evidence, and I think we should see what kind of results we get, both from medical marijuana and from recreational marijuana before we make any far-reaching conclusions," Clinton told KPCC in July. "We need more studies. We need more evidence. And then we can proceed."

This is more open, however, than in 2008 when Clinton was outright against decriminalization, a step that is less aggressive than legalization.

Despite warming on the issue, Clinton's position is concerning to activists like St. Pierre because he feels they are far from solid.

"If reforms keep picking up... the winds in our sails are clear," he said. "But if we lose one of more or all of those elections this year, cautious people around her could make the argument that this thing has peaked and you now have to get on the other side of it."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

St. Pierre said he also watched -- laughing -- as Clinton tried to personally distance herself from marijuana at the CNN town hall.

"Absolutely not," Clinton said when asked if she would try the drug. "I didn't do it when I was young, I'm not going to start now."

"I will eat both of my shoes," he said, 'if she and Bill didn't trip their nuts off at Wellesley and Oxford."

What's more, some activists spoke highly of Democrats with executive experience like Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, who spent eight years as mayor of Baltimore.

O'Malley, who is also entertaining a run at the presidency in 2016, supports medical marijuana and approved a Maryland law that decriminalized possession of small amounts of the drug in 2014.

"As a young prosecutor, I once thought that decriminalizing the possession of marijuana might undermine the Public Will necessary to combat drug violence and improve public safety," O'Malley said in a statement at the time. "I now think that decriminalizing possession of marijuana is an acknowledgement of the low priority that our courts, our prosecutors, our police, and the vast majority of citizens already attach to this transgression of public order and public health."

As for where the governor is on legalization, Lis Smith, his top political adviser, said as long "as long as it is consistent with the goal of driving down crime," O'Malley is "open to sensible drug policy."

With an eye on 2016, some activists are starting to contrast that view with Clinton.

"I think in 2016 there is going to be a number of states with legalization initiatives on the ballot and there will be broad support," Todd said. "I don't see standing behind and defending the status quo of this destructive policy as helping a candidate in the 2016 election."

Clinton has come face-to-face with some aspects of marijuana policy on her trips to stump for Democrats across the country.

While raising money in Colorado for Sen. Mark Udall earlier this week, Hillary Clinton saw marijuana in her coffee. Pointing to the foam design atop Udall's latte, Clinton said, "Look at you, you got like a plant. Is that a marijuana plant?"

To laughs from the baristas at PigTrain Coffee, some who may have seen that the design looked more like a rose than marijuana, one answered jokingly, "That's exactly what it is."

Politico: "Scoring Hillary Clinton's politics"

By Maggie Haberman

October 16, 2014, 5:12 a.m. EDT

Political watchers have spent years debating whether Hillary Clinton is a liberal Democrat, or center-left. Steve Hilton, a former adviser to British

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Prime Minister David Cameron, says the answer is simple: It depends.

Hilton, the founder of Crowdpac , a site that scores politicians based on different factors, ran Clinton's donor history from her three runs for office — two in the Senate and one presidential — and her votes in the Senate from 2000 to 2008, and came up with a mixed picture on a scale that ranks people based on being liberal, or conservative. "10L" is the most liberal score and "10C" is the most conservative.

Clinton, much of the time, ranks somewhere in the middle of the liberal scale, according to data that Crowdpac ran through its ranking system. Clinton is not currently listed on its website since she isn't a declared candidate for office. So, the focus of the data was on where she left off.

"For years, pundits have debated whether Hillary Clinton is a liberal, a centrist, or even slightly conservative. Turns out: it depends on the issue," said Hilton. "She's often to the right of the average Democrat in Congress but to the left on some cornerstone issues, like health care.

"By analyzing her years in the Senate — her votes, her rhetoric, and her donor history, we found that Secretary Clinton is a dyed-in-the-wool progressive on health care, fair elections, and the environment and moderate on defense, banking, and immigration. But when it comes to some surprising issues like gender equality and student loans, she shares more with conservatives than you would think."

For instance, on abortion, Clinton got a 4.6L, while the average Democrat in Congress gets a 6.4L. On the environment, she scores closer to average, at 6.32L. Elsewhere, the scores are less indicative — Clinton ranked a 3.23 on gender equality, an issue she has focused on extensively in the State Department and at her family's foundation. But a number of votes on gender-rights legislation took place once she'd left Congress. On student loans, an issue she focused on in 2007, she gets a 3.79L.

On health care and immigration, she gets strong marks, a 6.95L and a 5.34L, respectively. Her fulls scores and their congressional comparisons are here.

The scores are an example of the type of work Crowdpac, which Hilton launched when he moved to the U.S. and became immersed in Silicon Valley, can do in the upcoming presidential cycle and the next midterms.

"The idea is to help level the playing field. … to give objective information," said Hilton in an interview. "It's a combination of objective information."

His goal was to give people more information about the people they are electing than just what they see in high-dollar ads and in direct mail. When he moved to California with his wife, who works for Google, he saw the chance to combine his interest in politics with policy.

People often say, "What difference does it make if I get involved?" Hilton said. His hope was to create a site in which people could use different algorithms to better understand the people they are considering supporting.

Typically, a score is also based on a candidate's public speeches. In Clinton's case, that hasn't been blended into her scoring yet. Her most recent speeches, however, have focused on the new Democratic populism, meaning there could be a change.

Politico: "Tales from a Clinton impeachment leader"

By Katie Glueck

October 16, 2014, 5:05 a.m. EDT

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — As a federal prosecutor in the 1980s, Asa Hutchinson sent Bill Clinton's brother to jail. As a member of Congress in the late 1990s, Hutchinson steered impeachment proceedings against the president from his home state.

But to hear him tell it now, Hutchinson — likely the next governor of this state — has the utmost respect for Hillary Clinton, and he's downright fond of Bill.

That posture is a testament to the enduring power of the Clinton name here. But it's also driven by the complicated relationship Hutchinson has had with Clinton dating back to the 1970s, long before they faced off over Monicagate or became household names in Arkansas politics.

Now the favorite to defeat Democratic candidate Mike Ross in the governor's race, Hutchinson has the potential to be a serious thorn in both Clintons' sides if Hillary Clinton runs for president as expected. But in a 40-minute interview here, the 63-year-old Hutchinson showed little interest in becoming a surrogate for Clinton antagonists.

If their opposing political parties make them adversaries by default, Hutchinson made clear he harbors no grudge against the Clintons — even if the former first couple's allies hold one against him.

"I ran in 1996 for Congress, and [Bill Clinton] came in and campaigned, of course, for my Democratic opponent," Hutchinson recalled with a smile. "He's always been on the other side from a political standpoint," adding that Clinton's fervor for politics, even as he nears age 70, is "something that's perhaps even refreshing to see."

To say Clinton has "always been on the other side" may be an understatement. In Congress, Hutchinson, a member of the House Judiciary Committee, chose to serve as one of the House managers handling Clinton's impeachment — something many Democrats here have never gotten over.

About 10 years after the impeachment, Hutchinson told The Associated Press that he initially wasn't interested in joining the proceedings, though many of his colleagues on Judiciary were spearheading the effort. And though reports from the time indicate that Hutchinson wasn't as excited about the impeachment drive as some of his fellow Republicans, he opted to play a central role in it just the same.

"I'm grateful for this opportunity, although it … comes with deep regret to be before you," Hutchinson told senators in the opening remarks of his impeachment presentation in 1999. But then he proceeded to dive in, outlining the "seven pillars of obstruction" Clinton allegedly perpetrated.

"I knew it wasn't good politics for Arkansas, being the president's home state," he said a decade later, reflecting on the impeachment experience in the AP interview. But he concluded that "I could actually help our country go through a difficult time, and so I accepted that responsibility reluctantly."

"Anybody who observed me at that time knows I was just trying to help the country through a difficult time," Hutchinson added during the interview with POLITICO last week.

To which many Arkansas Democrats respond: Please. They were outraged then and say they haven't forgotten that Hutchinson chose to help prosecute the president who put their state on the map.

"There's no love lost, that's for sure," said Little Rock's Democratic Mayor Mark Stodola, a longtime Clinton supporter. "There's a substantial number of people who believe Asa did not have to go do that extra step by being part of the impeachment team, that the piling on was gratuitous coming from Arkansas."

A spokesman for Bill Clinton did not return a request for comment on the former president's relationship with Hutchinson.

Hutchinson was courteous, if somewhat reserved, during the interview last week, joining a reporter in a dark-paneled conference room in a building that houses his campaign headquarters after walking his grown daughter — whose child stars in one of Hutchinson's best-received ads — to the door. The former congressman, who is 6 feet 1 inch, sat tall, with his thinning, nearly white hair neatly combed back, and invited the interviewer to "ask me anything you'd like." There was no fire-breathing rhetoric: Hutchinson, trained as a lawyer, talked about Arkansas and his opponent in a cool, analytical tone. And when he didn't want to discuss a subject — like Hillary Clinton — he declined to answer questions witha broad smile.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hutchinson's brother, Tim Hutchinson, lost his Senate seat in 2002 to Arkansas Attorney General Mark Pryor, as Democrats called Tim Hutchinson a hypocrite for vocally backing impeachment even as he divorced the mother of his children to marry a much younger staffer. Now Pryor is locked in one of the closest Senate races of the year against GOP Rep. Tom Cotton.

Asa Hutchinson, who represented a conservative district in an otherwise Democratic-tilted state, escaped the impeachment politically unscathed (though there were rumblings of anger from some constituents at the time).

Skip Rutherford, the dean of the Clinton School of Public Service at the University of Arkansas and a longtime friend of the former president, said he doesn't think people "wake up in the middle of the night and pace the floor over it. But do they recall it? Yeah. I recall it."

Ross, Hutchinson's opponent, has brought up impeachment on occasion, though in an interview with POLITICO, Ross said his campaign is "not about reliving the past." Clinton campaigned for the Democratic ticket in Arkansas last week and will do so again over the weekend.

Hutchinson and Bill Clinton first encountered each other at the University of Arkansas Law School in the 1970s, when Hutchinson was a student and Clinton, fresh out of Yale Law School, was teaching (though he was not Hutchinson's professor). Hutchinson's politics hadn't yet jelled: He recalled going door-to-door for David Pryor, the former Democratic senator and governor of Arkansas, who is the father of Mark Pryor.

As it turned out, that was the last time Hutchinson campaigned for a Democrat, he said, but his interactions with Clinton continued.

"Our paths crossed [again] when I was U.S. attorney and he was governor at that time," Hutchinson said of Bill Clinton in the interview. I remember him calling my home [about] this terrorist group up in northern Arkansas. We worked together [on a stand-down]."

In the 1980s, Hutchinson, then a Reagan-appointed U.S. attorney, "had the unfortunate responsibility" of prosecuting Clinton's half-brother, Roger, who eventually went to jail on drug charges. But in the former president's memoirs, published after he left office, Clinton wrote that the jail time probably saved Roger Clinton's life — and he had praise for Hutchinson's conduct.

"Asa Hutchinson was professional, fair and sensitive to the agony my family was experiencing," Clinton wrote. "I wasn't at all surprised when later he was elected to Congress from the Third District."

Hutchinson was for a long time one of a handful of Republican voices in a Southern state with a strong Democratic tradition. As Clinton climbed the ranks, Hutchinson lost three statewide races.

"Whether it's Dale Bumpers" — the beloved former senator, to whom Hutchinson lost in 1986, and who delivered the final speech on behalf of Clinton in the impeachment proceedings — "or Bill Clinton, they've had a very strong farm team, and populist-type candidates on the Democratic side," Hutchinson said.

In the early 1990s, Hutchinson served as state GOPchairman while Clinton was governor.

"So we've always been very respectful adversaries, respectful political adversaries," he said. "That's how I viewed that relationship."

In 1996, Hutchinson won his first House race. His opponent was Ann Henry, a personal friend of the Clintons who hosted the couple's wedding reception at her home; her top campaign strategist was also Clinton's former chief of staff, according to a report from the time.

From the House, Hutchinson was appointed by President George W. Bush to serve as administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration. His nomination sailed through the Senate on a 98-1 vote, with Hillary Clinton, then a senator, voting yes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She “did me the great honor of supporting my confirmation,” Hutchinson said. And after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the two had “very professional” interactions when he served as undersecretary in the Department of Homeland Security and she was in the Senate.

Hutchinson declined repeatedly to assess a potential Hillary Clinton 2016 candidacy or to say whether he’d be a surrogate for the eventual GOP nominee. He skirted questions about his party’s criticism of her on issues like the Benghazi attacks. “This race is about Arkansas, not about what happens three years from now, it’s about what happens next year,” Hutchinson said.

“I think they’ve looked at me as somebody who’s very committed to our country,” he later said of the Clintons. “We have different viewpoints, I respect them the same ways. And so I would just urge anybody who’s worried about the past to take the same fair approach and look at my heart.”

CNN: “With an Eye to 2016, Bill Clinton Campaigns in New Hampshire”

By Brianna Keilar

October 16, 2014, 6:09 a.m. EDT

In early 2000, shortly after Al Gore beat Bill Bradley by a too-close-for-comfort four points in the state's first-in-the-nation primaries, Ray Buckley, then a New Hampshire state legislator, swung through Washington to have breakfast with a friend in the Clinton administration.

As he sat in the White House mess eating pancakes, Buckley was shocked when an aide brought him a note that said President Bill Clinton wanted to see him in the Oval Office. He didn't know Clinton was even aware he was visiting.

"He started grilling me on what towns Gore did well in and didn't do well in. He didn't have a paper in front of him, he just knew. He was asking me 'Why didn't Al do better in Amherst?' His understanding of the political landscape of New Hampshire is just amazing," Buckley, now the chairman of the New Hampshire Democratic Party, told CNN.

Clinton is taking that enthusiasm for the Granite State, generated in no small part by the dramatic successes he and his wife have historically secured here, to the state party's Jefferson-Jackson Dinner in Manchester on Thursday, raising money and encouraging voters in his party to get to the polls on election day.

Incumbent Gov. Maggie Hassan has the most comfortable lead in the polls among Democrats running for federal office in New Hampshire. Reps. Carol Shea-Porter and Ann Kuster are in more competitive races as they try to hang onto their House seats. But it's Sen. Jeanne Shaheen who is getting the most attention. The longtime Clinton ally is running statistically even with Republican Scott Brown, the former senator from Massachusetts, in a race that could determine the balance of power in the senate.

"Bill Clinton is probably the best person for Shaheen," says Neil Levesque, the executive director of the New Hampshire Institute of Politics and Political Library at Saint Anselm College. "He's custom made for a state like New Hampshire that really appreciates someone who can get into the issues."

Clinton's visit comes one day after Mitt Romney campaigned alongside Brown and with Democratic activists here growing more and more anxious (the state legislature's return to Republican control looks like a foregone conclusion already) it's just in time.

"The concern is if there's anxiety bordering on depression about the bad news not just in New Hampshire but nationally that might stop an activist from working as hard as they might to get out the vote," says Dante Scala, professor of Political Science at the University of New Hampshire.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's visit appears to be buoying many Democrats already.

With news of his headlining appearance, 1,200 people have purchased tickets to the Jefferson-Jackson Dinner, the biggest crowd since the state party revived it as a fall fundraising event in 1991. Normally 400-450 Democrats attend. This year, some attendees will be watching Clinton from an overflow room and the normally seated dinner has been scrapped for an earlier buffet-style meal followed by Clinton's speech to a crowd in a theater-style seating arrangement.

New Hampshire has always been friendly to the Clintons and they're not going to neglect the state as Hillary Clinton eyes another presidential run.

In 1992, just a few days after a tabloid broke a story about Bill Clinton's affair with an Arkansas state employee named Gennifer Flowers, a surprise second place finish in the New Hampshire primary kept Clinton's presidential prospects alive. He famously declared that January evening, "New Hampshire has made Bill Clinton the comeback kid," and went on to win the state in the general election as well.

In 2008, when Hillary Clinton trailed Barack Obama by double digits in the lead up to the New Hampshire primary, she teared up at a Portsmouth coffee shop as she told a voter who asked how she was faring on the trail, "I just don't want to see us fall backwards. This is very personal for me. It's not just political." The next day, she answered Obama's crushing Iowa caucus win with a three point victory in New Hampshire, telling her supporters at her victory rally, "Now let's give America the kind of comeback New Hampshire has just given me."

Hillary Clinton will campaign here the weekend before the election, hoping to make a last minute move for Sen. Shaheen and Gov. Hassan.

By then, most voters will have made up their minds. But strategists say Clinton can make an effective play for undecided female voters, especially with incumbent Democratic women up and down the ballot.

"She could win this race for Shaheen," says Levesque. And if she does, the Clintons are betting New Hampshire will remember that in 2016.

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

- October 16 – MI: Sec. Clinton campaigns for Rep. Gary Peters and Mark Schauer in Michigan (AP)
- October 20 – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton fundraises for House Democratic women candidates with Nancy Pelosi (Politico)
- October 20 – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton fundraises for Senate Democrats (AP)
- October 24 – RI: Sec. Clinton campaigns for Rhode Island gubernatorial nominee Gina Raimondo (Politico)
- October 30 – Washington, DC: Sec. Clinton speaks at the launch of The International Council on Women's Business Leadership (CNN)
- November 2 – NH: Sec. Clinton appears at a GOTV rally for Gov. Hassan and Sen. Shaheen (AP)
- December 1 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton keynotes a League of Conservation Voters dinner (Politico)
- December 4 – Boston, MA: Sec. Clinton speaks at the Massachusetts Conference for Women (MCFW)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Adam Blickstein" <ablickstein@nsnetwork.org>
To:	bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date:	5/15/2008 8:34:49 AM
Subject:	[big campaign] Re: PRESS CALL TODAY: Experts Respond to McCain Claim of Victory in Iraq by 2013

The call was great. Below are a few quotes from the call, and a link to the full audio can be found here :

I think John McCain has been one of the most important voices on national security policy for many years now, so it really surprises me to see him giving speeches like the one today that are almost in "lala" land. These unsupported generalizations and predictions that he would have scoffed at as the old John McCain. Lets just take a couple of examples, one is what he says about the future Iraq. He says most of the troops will be gone in four years, at that time there will be relative security in the country and that it will be a democracy. But we have no idea how that is to come about. It certainly isn't coming about by the present polices of the Bush administration and the speech gives every indication he'll continue those policies and so it's kind of a wild eyed, unsupported prediction.
- Les Gelb, President Emeritus of the Council on Foreign Relations

I don't think McCain has an understanding of what a counterinsurgency is all about...To project that there will be substantially reduced violence in Iraq and that Iraq will be a functioning democracy sounds almost like a campaign promise. For the troops that means a indefinite extension of the substantial deployments in a country where they are seen as occupiers...I am very disappointed Sen. McCain would make these kind of projections, which are fantasies, without giving any hint of how he plans to achieve them.
- General Robert G. Gard (RET)

When it comes to Iraq I think he's lost his perspective right from the beginning. If you go back and look at his statements back in 2003, before the war, and predictions all throughout 2003 that it was going well and would end shortly and then each year he seemed to be telling us it would end very very quickly...But now what he is saying it will end in four years. Even if that were to be true, he's not shown us how you could get there, that will have meant the United States be there for 10 years.
- Lawrence Korb, Senior Fellow at the Center for American Progress Action Fund

On May 15, 2008, at 11:35 AM, Adam Blickstein wrote:

PRESS CALL TODAY: Experts Respond to McCain Claim of Victory in Iraq by 2013

Washington D.C. - The National Security Network will be holding a conference call TODAY AT 2:00 PM with Les Gelb, President Emeritus of the Council on Foreign Relations and Chairman of NSN's Advisory Board, General Robert G. Gard (RET), Lawrence Korb, Senior Fellow at the Center for American Progress and Former Assistant Secretary of Defense under President Reagan, and NSN President Rand Beers to respond to John McCain's claim, made today, that he envisions victory in Iraq by 2013, as well as other aspects of his speech.

Call-in #: 1-800-895-1085
Passcode: 7MCCAIN

WHO: Les Gelb, President Emeritus of the Council on Foreign Relations and Chairman of the NSN Advisory Board
General Robert G. Gard (RET)
Lawrence Korb, Senior Fellow at the Center for American Progress and Former Assistant Secretary of Defence under President Reagan.
Rand Beers, President of the National Security Network

WHAT: Conference call responding to Sen. McCain's claim of victory in Iraq by 2012

WHEN: TODAY Thursday, May 15th, 2008
2:00 PM ET

###

Les Gelb is a former correspondent for The New York Times and is currently President Emeritus of the Council on Foreign Relations. He is a fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, and is a member of the editorial board of Encyclopædia Britannica that was re-established in 2005 after a 10-year hiatus.

Gelb was director of Policy Planning and Arms Control for International Security Affairs at the Department of Defense from 1967 to 1969, winning the Pentagon's highest award, the Distinguished Service Award. Robert McNamara appointed Gelb as director of the project that produced the infamous Pentagon Papers, on the Vietnam War. He was an Assistant Secretary of State in the Carter Administration from 1977 to 1979, serving as director of the Bureau of Politico-Military Affairs and winning the Distinguished Honor Award, the highest award of the US State Department.

He was diplomatic correspondent at The New York Times from 1973 to 1977; later, between 1981 and 1993, he was in turn national security correspondent, deputy editorial page editor, editor of the Op-Ed Page, and columnist. He was a leading member of the Times team that won a Pulitzer Prize for Explanatory Journalism in 1986 for a six-part comprehensive series on the Strategic Defense Initiative (known as "Star Wars").

Gelb became President of the Council on Foreign Relations in 1993 and is now President Emeritus.
Lt. General Robert G. Gard, Jr. is Chairman of the Center for Arms Control and Non-Proliferation where his policy work focuses on nuclear nonproliferation, missile defense, Iraq, Iran, military policy, nuclear terrorism, and other national security issues.

During his military career, Gard saw combat in both the Korea and Vietnam wars, and served a three year tour in Germany. He also served as Executive Assistant to two secretaries of defense; the first Director of Human Resources Development for the U.S. Army; Special Assistant to the Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs; and President of National Defense University (NDU).

After retiring from the U.S. Army in 1981, after 31 years of distinguished service, Gard served for five years as director of the Johns Hopkins University

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

School of Advanced International Studies Center in Bologna, Italy, and then as President of the Monterey Institute of International Studies from 1987 to 1998. Since 1998, he has been an active consultant in Washington, DC, on national security issues, including the international campaign to ban anti-personnel land mines.

Gard has written for well- known journals and periodicals that focus on military and international affairs and lectured widely at U.S. and international universities and academic conferences. He serves on the board of eight non- profit organizations and is a member of the Council on Foreign Relations.

Gard holds a BA from the U.S MIlitary Academy at West Point and both an MP.A. and Ph.Din Political Economy & Government from Harvard University.

Lawrence J. Korb is a Senior Fellowat American Progress and a Senior Advisor to the Center for Defense Information. Prior to joining the Center, he was a Senior Fellow and Director of National Security Studies at the Council on Foreign Relations. From July 1998 to October 2002, he was Council Vice President, Director of Studies, and holder of the Maurice Greenberg Chair.

Prior to joining the Council, Mr. Korb served as Director of the Center for Public Policy Education and Senior Fellow in the Foreign Policy Studies Program at the Brookings Institution, Dean of the Graduate School of Public and International Affairs at the University of Pittsburgh, and Vice President of Corporate Operations at the Raytheon Company.

Dr. Korb served as Assistant Secretary of Defense (Manpower, Reserve Affairs, Installations and Logistics) from 1981 through 1985. In that position, he administered about 70 percent of the Defense budget. For his service in that position, he was awarded the Department of Defense's medal for Distinguished Public Service. Mr. Korb served on active duty for four years as Naval Flight Officer, and retired from the Naval Reserve with the rank of Captain.

Rand Beers is the president of the National Security Network. He served as the National Security adviser to the Kerry- Edwards 2004 campaign. Previously he spent 35 years as a senior civil servant. After serving as a Marine officer and rifle company commander in Vietnam, he entered the Foreign Service in 1971 and the Civil Service in 1983. From 1988-98, Mr. Beers served on the National Security Council Staff at the White House as Director for Counter- terrorism and Counter- narcotics, Director for Peacekeeping, and Senior Director for Intelligence Programs. From 1998-2003 he was Assistant Secretary of State for International. Narcotics and LawEnforcement Affairs. In 2002- 03 he was Special Assistant to the President and Senior Director for Combating Terrorism. In 2002- 03 he was Special Assistant to the President and Senior Director for Combating Terrorism at the National Security Council. Beers earned a B.A. from Dartmouth College and an MA from the University of Michigan.

Adam Blickstein
Press Secretary
National Security Network
Direct: 202-289 -7113
Mobile: 617-335-0859
ablickstein@nsnetwork.com

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.

-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To:	CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date:	2/19/2015 2:03:58 AM
Subject:	Correct The Record Thursday February 19, 2015 Morning Roundup

Correct The Record Thursday February 19, 2015 Morning Roundup:

Headlines:

Wall Street Journal: “Clinton Foundation Defends Acceptance of Foreign Donations”

"In its statement, the foundation said: 'The Clinton Foundation has strong donor integrity and transparency practices that go above and beyond what is required of U.S. charities and well beyond the practices of most peer organizations. This includes the voluntary, full disclosure of donors on our website for anyone to see. The bottom line: these contributions are helping improve the lives of millions of people across the world, for which we are grateful.'"

Washington Post: “Clinton foundation’s global network overlaps with family’s political base”

“Since its creation in 2001, the Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation has raised close to $2 billion from a vast global network that includes corporate titans, political donors, foreign governments and other wealthy interests, according to a Washington Post review of public records and newly released contribution data.”

Politico: “GOP group calls on Clinton Foundation to return foreign donations”

“One day after a report revealed that the Clinton Foundation has abandoned its near-prohibition of raising new money from foreign governments, Republican opposition research firm America Rising is calling on the organization to return funds from international sources and to promise to stop accepting them.”

National Journal: “When a Clinton 'Ally' Isn't an Ally At All”

[Subtitle:] “Dozens of freelancing Democrats are posing as Clinton confidantes, and it’s mess-making for her real team.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Hill blog: Briefing Room: “Conservative group hits Jeb for giving award to Hillary”

“A conservative group is launching a campaign calling former Gov. Jeb Bush (R-Fla.) 'unelectable' because he gave presumed Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton an award in 2013. In the minds of ForAmerica, a conservative group founded by Brent Bozell, the president of the Media Research Center, that one appearance is enough to disqualify him from a 2016 bid entirely.”

Washington Post blog: The Fix: “Three-quarters say the first-woman-president thing doesn’t matter. They’re wrong.”

“There's also this: People are really bad at deducing precisely what is important to their vote. Just because they say something isn't important doesn't mean it isn't.”

Bloomberg: “Fake Hillary Clinton and the New Social Media Rules of Truth”

“The world of new media is different, in barrier and also in tone. The game is getting in on the meme. The one who wins on Twitter is the fast, the fluid, the so-damn-biting that the mic gets dropped.”

Articles:

Wall Street Journal: “Clinton Foundation Defends Acceptance of Foreign Donations”

By Peter Nicholas and Rebecca Ballhaus

February 18, 2015, 6:40 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] Charity has received funds from governments of U.A.E., Saudi Arabia, Oman and Canada, among others

The Clinton Foundation on Wednesday defended its practice of accepting donations from overseas governments, amid concerns from some ethics experts that such contributions are inappropriate at a time when Hillary Clinton is preparing to run for president.

A Wall Street Journal review of donations to the Clinton Foundation in 2014 showed the charity received money from the United Arab Emirates, Saudi Arabia and Oman, among others. The donors included Canada’s foreign affairs department, which is promoting the Keystone XL pipeline.

The foundation had agreed to stop raising money from foreign governments in 2009, after Mrs. Clinton became secretary of state. That step was in deference to Obama administration concerns about the propriety of taking money from other nations while Mrs. Clinton served as America's top diplomat.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mrs. Clinton left the State Department in early 2013, and the foundation later dropped the ban.

Mrs. Clinton is an important figure in the foundation, serving as a marquee fundraiser for what is now officially called the Bill, Hillary & Chelsea Clinton Foundation. Some ethics experts questioned whether it is appropriate for the foundation to accept funds from foreign governments at a time when Mrs. Clinton is preparing for an all-but-certain presidential bid.

In its statement, the foundation said: "The Clinton Foundation has strong donor integrity and transparency practices that go above and beyond what is required of U.S. charities and well beyond the practices of most peer organizations. This includes the voluntary, full disclosure of donors on our website for anyone to see."

"The bottom line: these contributions are helping improve the lives of millions of people across the world, for which we are grateful."

In its account of the donations from foreign governments, the Journal quoted several independent analysts who said the foundation should restore its ban on such contributions, out of concerns that foreign governments would attempt to curry favor with Mrs. Clinton.

Republicans on Wednesday chided Mrs. Clinton over the contributions.

"The alarming rate at which these contributions are now coming in presents a massive conflict-of-interest problem for her," said Michael Short, a spokesman for the Republican National Committee. "When that 3 a.m. phone call comes, do voters really want to have a president on the line who took truckloads of cash from other countries? Absolutely not."

A spokeswoman for former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush , who is preparing a campaign for the White House, declined to comment on whether the Clinton Foundation should stop accepting contributions from foreign governments. But she noted that Mr. Bush, "as part of seriously exploring a potential run for president," had stepped down as chairman of his foundation, and that his foundation doesn't take donations from foreign governments or entities.

America Rising, a Republican opposition research group, on Wednesday called for the Clinton Foundation to restore its ban on foreign contributions and return the donations it has received from foreign countries and entities, including nonprofits where foreign government donations constitute the majority of their funds. They also requested that Mr. Clinton return the speaking fees he has earned from foreign governments and stop accepting them.

"The potential conflict of interest for someone in Clinton's position requires they return the money, and the ethical lapse to accept the money in the first place calls into question Hillary Clinton's judgment," the group said in a statement

The United Arab Emirates, a first-time donor, gave between $1 million and $5 million, 2014 according to disclosures on an online Clinton Foundation database. The German government—another first-time donor—contributed between $100,000 and $250,000.

Saudi Arabia, a previous donor, has given between $10 million and $25 million since the foundation's creation. An unspecified portion of the money came in 2014.

Other donors to the foundation last year included Jonathan Lavine, an investment adviser in Boston and previous donor to Mrs. Clinton's campaigns, gave between $500,000 and $1 million together with his wife through a foundation they created.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Several prominent Silicon Valley figures gave to the foundation for the first time last year. Ann Doerr, the wife of venture capitalist John Doerr , gave between $50,000 and $100,000. A foundation started by Sean Parker , the co-founder of Napster, gave between $500,000 and $1 million.

Newsmax, a conservative news organization, last year pledged $1 million to the Clinton Foundation over a five-year period, according to a spokesman for Chris Ruddy, the organization's CEO. Mr. Ruddy has been friends with the Clintons since 2007. Through a spokesman, he said the donation wasn't tantamount to an endorsement of Mrs. Clinton's potential campaign, though he thinks she would "make a great presidential candidate."

Washington Post: "Clinton foundation's global network overlaps with family's political base"

By Rosalind S. Helderman, Tom Hamburger, and Steven Rich

February 18, 2015, 9:30 p.m. EST

Since its creation in 2001, the Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation has raised close to $2 billion from a vast global network that includes corporate titans, political donors, foreign governments and other wealthy interests, according to a Washington Post review of public records and newly released contribution data.

The total, representing cash and pledges reported in tax filings, includes $262 million that was raised in 2013 — the year Hillary Rodham Clinton stepped down as secretary of state and began to devote her energies to the foundation and to a likely second run for president.

The financial success of the foundation, which funds charitable work around the world, underscores the highly unusual nature of another Clinton candidacy. The organization has given contributors entree, outside the traditional political arena, to a possible president. Foreign donors and countries that are likely to have interests before a potential Clinton administration — and yet are ineligible to give to U.S. political campaigns — have affirmed their support for the family's work through the charitable giving.

The Post review of foundation data, updated this month on the group's Web site to reflect giving through 2014, found substantial overlap between the Clinton political machinery and the foundation.

Nearly half of the major donors who are backing Ready for Hillary, a group promoting her 2016 presidential bid, as well as nearly half of the bundlers from her 2008 campaign, have given at least $10,000 to the foundation, either on their own or through foundations or companies they run.

The Clintons have relied heavily on their close ties to Wall Street, with donations from the financial services sector representing the largest share of corporate donors.

And many of the foundation's biggest donors are foreigners who are legally barred from giving to U.S. political candidates. A third of foundation donors who have given more than $1 million are foreign governments or other entities based outside the United States, and foreign donors make up more than half of those who have given more than $5 million.

The prevalence of financial institutions, both foreign and domestic, as major donors is likely to stir more unease in the Democratic Party's liberal base, which is pushing Hillary Clinton to adopt a more populist and less Wall Street-focused economic agenda. The role of interests located in countries such as Saudi Arabia, Qatar and Argentina may spur questions about the independence of a potential commander in chief who has solicited money from foreign donors with a stake in the actions of the U.S. government.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

'A philanthropy, period'

Foundation officials said the organization's fundraising success reflects its track record of accomplishment. They said many other foundations have a similar international donor base.

"The Clinton Foundation is a philanthropy, period," said Craig Minassian, the group's chief communications officer. "We take pride in our programs, our efficiency, and our transparency. As with other global charities, the Clinton Foundation receives the support of individuals, organizations and governments from all over the world because our programs are improving the lives of millions."

Minassian said it was a "false choice to suggest that people who may be interested in supporting political causes wouldn't also support philanthropic work."

Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Hillary Clinton, declined to comment.

The foundation, which Bill Clinton created soon after leaving the White House in 2001, has become one of the world's fastest-growing philanthropies.

It consists of multiple charitable initiatives that deal with climate change, HIV drug access and economic development in poor areas. One program, led by Hillary and Chelsea Clinton, seeks to improve the lives of women and girls.

The foundation has won accolades from philanthropy experts and has drawn bipartisan support, with members of the George W. Bush administration often participating in its programs. Major donations have come from figures such as Christopher Ruddy, the chief executive of the conservative Web site Newsmax.com and a onetime critic of Bill Clinton.

Foundation tax records show that it reported raising $1.69 billion in cash and pledges between 2001 and 2013, the last year for which documents are available. As of the end of 2014, donations reached nearly $2 billion, foundation officials confirmed.

The scope of the foundation's finances show the unparalleled fundraising power of one of the world's most important political brands.

"To be raising $250 million a year, certainly puts them in the top ranks of U.S. nonprofits in terms of fundraising," said Steven Lawrence, director of research for the Foundation Center, which studies philanthropy.

Lawrence said the Clintons' ability to draw support from overseas — a coveted goal for many U.S. charities and university endowments — was especially unusual.

"It's all about building networks and connections," Lawrence said, adding that donors are likely attracted both personally to the Clintons and to the highly regarded philanthropic work of their foundation.

The donor list shows that the foundation has relied most heavily on seven donors that have each given more than $25 million, including a foundation established by a Canadian mining magnate, Frank Giustra; the national lottery of Holland; and Chicago-based Democratic donor Fred Eychaner.

Other major donors giving at lower levels run the gamut of industries and interests, such as the investment banking firm Goldman Sachs, beverage giant Coca-Cola, and the governments of Oman, Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Foundation officials say some of their public support comes from competitive grants that are also available to other charities.

Concerns in late 2008

The foundation's fundraising sparked concerns in late 2008 when President-elect Barack Obama was preparing to nominate Hillary Clinton to be secretary of state. Some Republicans, raising the prospect of conflicts of interest, criticized the fact that the foundation's donors were kept secret.

The Clintons struck a deal with the Obama administration to begin posting lists of its contributors online and to accept some restrictions on support from foreign governments.

As part of the deal, the Clinton Global Initiative, which brings together world leaders, industries and charities to discuss global issues, was split from the foundation during Hillary Clinton's tenure at the State Department. In 2013, after she stepped down as secretary of state, the foundation and the global initiative were reintegrated. The newly published donor list is the first to provide a public accounting of the cumulative giving to both groups.

In posting its donor data, the foundation goes beyond legal requirements, and experts say its transparency level exceeds that of most philanthropies.

But that transparency has limits. The foundation identifies its donors within broad ranges — $1 million to $5 million and greater than $25 million, for instance. And the foundation tallies the giving of each donor only cumulatively, making it difficult to track trends in giving over time.

As a result, it is not possible to determine how much particular donors contributed in the months since Hillary Clinton joined the foundation in 2013.

Still, the organization has stepped up its solicitation efforts in anticipation of soon losing one of its chief fundraisers to the campaign trail — building a $250 million endowment designed to provide some long-term stability.

The recent efforts have at times looked like a political campaign. A contest offered foundation donors the chance to win a free trip to New York to attend a Clinton gala and have a photo taken with the former first couple.

Hillary and Chelsea Clinton hosted a "Millennium Network" event in 2013 aimed at cultivating a younger generation of philanthropists. According to an invitation, there were six tiers of donations, ranging from $150 for individuals to $15,000 for a couple seeking a photograph with Hillary Clinton.

The Post review found that the foundation provided another way for the Clintons' longtime political donors to support the family's endeavors between election campaigns. The analysis relied on a list of bundlers compiled by the advocacy group Public Citizen using campaign disclosures and news reports. Each donor had generally raised at least $100,000 for her 2008 campaign.

Susie Tompkins Buell, for instance, a close Clinton friend and 2008 fundraiser who has given to Ready for Hillary, has donated as much as $10 million to the foundation from her charitable fund.

Haim Saban, the billionaire creator of the Mighty Morphin Power Rangers and one of the Clintons' most-prolific political givers, has donated as much as $25 million to the foundation.

Buell and Saban did not respond to requests for comment.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The overlap between the Clintons' political network and their charitable work was apparent Friday, when Dennis Cheng stepped down as the foundation's chief development officer ahead of his expected role as a key fundraiser for Hillary Clinton's 2016 campaign.

U.S.-regulated donors

Some major foundation donors are corporations that are regulated by the U.S. government.

Tenet, a health-care giant that has been investigated in the past for overbilling Medicare, has given $1.75 million to the Clinton Foundation since 2012 to fund local health programs, such as one promoting more HIV testing in the Palm Springs, Calif., area, where the company has a major hospital.

"We really believe in their health-care model — the community-based model," said Daniel Waldmann, Tenet's senior vice president for public affairs.

The newly updated foundation donor list shows that, despite the restrictions on foreign-government support imposed during Hillary Clinton's tenure as secretary of state, the foundation continued to rely heavily on non-U.S. sources. The Wall Street Journal reported Wednesday that the foundation has now lifted the foreign-government restrictions.

The data shows that some major donors represent international interests that have faced scrutiny from the U.S. government.

All three Clintons, for instance, have attended meetings and private events with Victor Pinchuk, a Ukrainian steel magnate who has faced formal complaints in the United States for unfair trade practices. Spokesmen for the Clintons and Pinchuk waved away any suggestion of a conflict between the donor's regulatory concerns and the charitable contributions to the foundation.

"No assistance with any business issues has now or ever been sought from the Clinton Foundation or its principals," said Thomas Weihe, a spokesman for the Kiev-based Pinchuk Foundation.

He said Pinchuk supported the Clinton effort because of the foundation's record and the "unique capacity of its principals to promote the modernization of Ukraine."

Politico: "GOP group calls on Clinton Foundation to return foreign donations"

By Gabriel Debenedetti

February 18, 2015, 5:58 p.m. EST

One day after a report revealed that the Clinton Foundation has abandoned its near-prohibition of raising new money from foreign governments, Republican opposition research firm America Rising is calling on the organization to return funds from international sources and to promise to stop accepting them.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The group is warning against the prospect of countries that in some cases have given $1 million or more to the foundation having a “special” relationship with a Clinton administration. The Wall Street Journal on Tuesday reported that nations including the United Arab Emirates, Saudi Arabia and Canada have recently donated to the foundation.

“The potential conflict of interest for someone in Clinton’s position requires they return the money, and the ethical lapse to accept the money in the first place calls into question Hillary Clinton’s judgment,” the group will say on Wednesday in its release announcing these requests.

Neither Hillary Clinton’s spokesman nor a Clinton Foundation spokesman responded immediately to requests for comment.

While Clinton lies low ahead of her campaign launch, Republicans have been criticizing her work as a public official and a private citizen. The Journal report reflected one Republican line of criticism — that Clinton’s foundation ties to foreign regimes could cause her political difficulties — and a similar fear among some of her allies and defenders.

The organization — which was started by former President Bill Clinton as he left the White House and was renamed the Bill, Hillary & Chelsea Clinton Foundation in 2013 — has caused Hillary Clinton political headaches before. It agreed to stop actively seeking out new money from foreign governments, and to have increases in existing donations vetted, when she stepped into the secretary of state role in 2009. And it has again been the focus of Republican scrutiny since she left the State Department in 2013.

Many of Clinton’s public appearances in that year and 2014 were under the foundation’s umbrella, as the former senator and first lady has been involved with its philanthropic initiatives while preparing for her likely presidential bid.

America Rising will demand that the organization “return all donations from foreign governments, including regional or local government entities since 2013 and pledge never to solicit or accept them.” It is also asking the foundation to return funds received from nonprofit organizations that are themselves mostly funded by foreign governments or officials, and to return money from foreign officers. It is asking Bill Clinton to give back his own speaking fees from international governments as well.

The Journal article specifically pointed to the United Arab Emirates, which it said gave the foundation between $1 million and $5 million last year, as a recent first-time donor. The paper also reported that the Clinton Foundation received money from Oman, Australia, Germany, Norway, Italy and the Netherlands.

National Journal: “When a Clinton 'Ally' Isn't an Ally At All”

By Emily Schultheis

February 18, 2015

[Subtitle:] Dozens of freelancing Democrats are posing as Clinton confidantes, and it’s mess-making for her real team.

There are Clinton "insiders" and Clinton "allies." Clinton "loyalists" and Clinton "confidantes." People "familiar with Clinton's thinking" or "in Clinton's orbit."

No doubt, Washington is filled with Democrats who have worked for, advised, donated money to, or rubbed elbows with Hillary or Bill Clinton over the duo's three decades in politics. But as the former secretary of State prepares a 2016 campaign, these "allies" are posing a problem for Clinton's real team.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ever eager to voice opinions on everything from the timeline of Clinton's announcement to her 2016 message to how her "hipster black-rimmed glasses" fit with the optics of a Brooklyn-based operation, self-labeled advisors are going rogue. And by freelancing, they're taking the Clinton story out of Clinton's hands, even as she tries to build a team that's more leak-proof and less willing to air dirty laundry than in 2008.

"There are three parties to this equation: we're one, the source is two, and the media is three. And arguably we have the least amount of influence on any of this," said longtime Clinton aide Philippe Reines. He conceded, though, that there's no real way for her team to control it: "We just have to sit back. We just have to grin and bear it."

The issue is singularly frustrating for people who work and have worked in Clinton's press operation and dealt with the issue first-hand—enough so that several of whom, like Reines, were willing to give rare on-the-record interviews for this story.

"This is a constant problem," said Howard Wolfson, who served as Clinton's communications director in 2008. "There is an enormous number of people who have had, or claim to have had, an association with the Clintons over the years—and many of them claim to have some degree of knowledge of her plans or activities that they don't in fact have."

Unlike on the Republican side, where a crowded field makes candidates and their staffs happy to dish to reporters about big hires, early-state plans, and behind-the-scenes machinations, movements to and within Clinton's growing operation are closely held. Indeed, Republicans have used a running tally of the "no comment" responses from the Clinton camp to paint the former senator and first lady as out-of-touch—"OFF THE RECORD: no comment," read the headline on one recent Clinton-related release from the Republican National Committee.

So with Clinton's staff keeping public comments to a minimum, the quasi-"insiders" largely have the floor to themselves.

Certainly, former staffers eagerly offering up their own takes or speculation isn't unique to Clinton, but for her it's magnified by the amount of time she and her husband have spent in the public eye. There are decades' worth of former staffers to contend with: there are the Arkansas people, the Clinton White House advisers, New York Senate staffers, 2008 campaign aides, Clinton Foundation associates, and State Department aides, among others.

Asked how the campaign could get a handle on all the anonymous outside chatter, Reines placed much of the blame back on the media for being willing to grant anonymity to sources who don't know what they're talking about. Unless the unnamed "advisers" stop talking to reporters, or reporters stop quoting them, Reines added, there's no way to get the issue under control.

"What gets lost is there are no consequences for [the source or the media] when they're wrong—there just aren't," he said. "If you were to go back and look at the last three, four, five, six months of coverage about Secretary Clinton, you're going to see certain reporters who cover her closely whose accuracy rate is less than 50/50."

Any reporter covering the Clinton beat knows it's tough to navigate the sphere known as Clintonworld. A source who offers up good information for one story might be totally wrong on another, and most Democrats are understandably squeamish about talking on the record about anything Clinton-related because nearly all of them are hoping for jobs with her. (More than a dozen people contacted for this piece said they were happy to discuss it—but only on background.)

The thing is, a Clinton "ally" could be anyone: a top donor or former staffer in the know, sure, but also a Democratic strategist on the outside who is just sharing an opinion, wants to feel important, or is hoping to settle a score. What's more, it's far harder for the campaign to chastise someone for saying things they shouldn't—or stop telling that person privileged information—if they're quoted anonymously and you don't know for sure who said what.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Any time someone actually says their name and publishes a quote, it's easy for the campaign to call them up and say, 'Please don't do that anymore,'" said Michael Trujillo, who served as a senior staffer for Clinton's 2008 campaign in California, Texas and North Carolina. But with anonymous quotes, you don't know where they're coming from.

(Reines warned it's not difficult to figure out: "It's not like you read something and say, 'Oh my gosh, that could have been 97 people.' You tend to know. Not 100 percent of the time, but ... I think sources would probably shrivel up if they knew that when these things happen, there's usually a four-minute conversation about, 'Oh, that was probably X ... I think people would be mortified. I don't think they realize how much that happens.")

Mike McCurry, Bill Clinton's White House press secretary in the 1990s, also pegged the problem not to the campaign but to reporters who "hyperventilate" about 2016. "I love Mrs. Clinton and hope she decides what is best for her. But anyone that would quote me 'on background' would be misleading their audience because I have no real idea what they are thinking," he wrote via email. "I believe 75% (conservatively) of what I read about the political strategy inside the Clinton camp is from people who want to be in the 'inside circle' but probably aren't."

The dynamic in 2008 is just a preview of what the chattering "allies" will be like this time around. Trujillo said more than once he and his team were stunned at news reports about Clinton's plans in each of those states—which often had sources who were in direct contradiction with what was actually happening inside the campaign.

"To read that in the paper and know it was the complete opposite ... it's never helpful, it's never asked for," said Trujillo, now a Los Angeles-based senior adviser for Ready for Hillary. "You're not being helpful by pontificating on what she is or isn't going to do."

So what's the eventual Clinton campaign to do? No one reached for this story had a good answer. Some suggested the outside "allies" would be given less status once it's clear who's actually involved in the campaign and who isn't. Others said John Podesta, the expected campaign chairman, might be able to instill order among the older generations of Clinton loyalists, many of whom he's worked with in the past.

Ben LaBolt, the press secretary for the Obama 2012 campaign, said the eventual Clinton campaign needs to make it very clear to reporters who's actually on the campaign and in the know—and who isn't.

"Campaigns should bend over backwards to limit the number of people that speak officially for the campaign and to make sure the media understands exactly who serves on that team," he wrote in an email. "Otherwise, you're forced to apologize for, correct or condemn statements by people who don't actually have anything to do with the campaign."

But sometimes, Wolfson said, the 2008 staff took a step back and just laughed about who some anonymous sources could have been. "In the '08 campaign, we used to laugh and say, 'Okay, that was the shoe-shine guy.' 'That was the guy who ran the sandwich shop down the street,'" he said. "There was, in my experience, a very elastic and loose definition of who constitutes a 'Clinton loyalist,' 'Clinton insider,' 'Clinton confidante.'"

The reporting and speculation about her intentions and campaign plans, Reines said, often baffle even Clinton herself: "When you're talking to the person whose life is being written about and they're like, 'Where do they get this stuff?' It's really sobering."

The Hill blog: Briefing Room: "Conservative group hits Jeb for giving award to Hillary"

By Ben Kamisar

February 19, 2015, 5:00 a.m. EST

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A conservative group is launching a campaign calling former Gov. Jeb Bush (R-Fla.) “unelectable” because he gave presumed Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton an award in 2013.

In the minds of ForAmerica, a conservative group founded by Brent Bozell, the president of the Media Research Center, that one appearance is enough to disqualify him from a 2016 bid entirely.

“Anytime Jeb calls Hillary 'Obama 2.0,' any criticism he makes of her awful record as Secretary of State, any time he shows how much of an extremist she is on the issues, will be completely dismissed when she reminds everyone that he gave her an award for public service,” Bozell said in a statement.

“Jeb has absolutely no credibility to criticize her because he has already anointed her as a great public servant; and he inexplicably did so almost a year to the day of the Benghazi massacre," he continued. "He will lose, and the public will have to suffer at least another four years of Obama’s policies – and anything worse she has in store for America.”

As chairman of the National Constitution Center, Bush gave Clinton a lifetime achievement award for public service and her work on women’s rights.

A video released by ForAmerica shows footage of Bush thanking Clinton and her husband, President Bill Clinton.

"We are united by love of country and public service,” Bush says. The video then shows text calling Hillary Clinton “responsible for the security of the American embassy in Benghazi” and noting that the 2012 attack on the embassy that left four Americans dead “occurred on her watch.”

The event occurred one night before the first anniversary of the Benghazi attacks.

Bush has finished near the top of most national polls of Republican voters, but some of the party’s more conservative figures argue that he is too moderate for their liking and will struggle to win the base and nomination.

Most potential candidates, including former Gov. Mike Huckabee (Ala.), Gov. Scott Walker (Wis.), and Sen. Ted Cruz (Texas) are expected to run well to the right of Bush, who has been hit by conservative Republicans over his support for Common Core education standards and immigration reform.

Washington Post blog: The Fix: “Three-quarters say the first-woman-president thing doesn’t matter. They’re wrong.”

By Aaron Blake

February 19, 2015, 6:30 a.m. EST

Breaking: Hillary Clinton, if she were to run for and win the presidency, would be the first female U.S. president.

And, if you believe the polls, almost nobody who has any control over that really gives a rip.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

New polling from Quinnipiac University on Wednesday showed about three-quarters of people in the swing states of Colorado, Iowa and Virginia said that distinction made no difference to their 2016 vote. And the majority who said it did were Democrats. Basically no Republicans said it made them more likely to back Clinton, and only about one in 10 independents agreed -- the same percentage who said it makes them less likely to back her. In other words, these are probably just folks who claim to be independent but vote reliably for either party.

A Washington Post-ABC News poll a few weeks back showed basically the same thing, with just slightly more independents saying the first-woman-president thing was something that made them more pro-Clinton.

But there's also this: People are really bad at deducing precisely what is important to their vote. Just because they say something isn't important doesn't mean it isn't. The same goes for endorsements. Nobody likes to think their vote is based on such easy shorthand, but sometimes it is.

Case in point: the first-black-president thing. Turns out, back in 2008, almost nobody said it was a big deal -- even less than the first-woman-president thing today.

A Gallup poll conducted in June 2008 found 78 percent of African Americans and 88 percent of whites said Obama's race had nothing to do with their vote. (The question wasn't framed as "first black president," for what it's worth, but it stands to reason that's how almost everyone interpreted it.)

By the end of the campaign, just 9 percent were saying Obama's race made them more likely to vote for him, and 6 percent less likely -- basically a wash. And given much of the "more likely" crowd were African Americans (who vote almost universally Democratic anyway), it's hard to say whether it had any measurable effect on swing voters.

But then you get to turnout. That's where this mattered. Obama's status as the potential first black president pushed black turnout to unprecedented levels and helped him win the presidency (and reelection in 2012).

Here's how turnout looked in recent elections -- noting the upticks in 2008 and 2012.

[CHART]

Which is where the first-woman-president thing comes into play for Clinton. No, it might not sway as many swing voters as women's groups might like, and there is probably a countervailing effect of people still hesitant about installing a woman in the presidency.

Where it could really help Clinton is if it spurs higher turnout among women -- who tilt Democratic -- and particularly among lower-turnout unmarried and college-educated women -- who tilt much more Democratic.

Here is turnout for unmarried women.

[CHART]

These extra votes won't uniformly go to Clinton as much as the black vote did for Obama -- and we might not ever get a truly accurate first-woman-president polling response -- but they would go a long way toward helping her re-create the so-called "Obama Coalition."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And if 2008 is any indication, the first-fill-in-the-blank-president thing doesn't exactly hurt among swing voters either -- whether they know it or not.

Bloomberg: “Fake Hillary Clinton and the New Social Media Rules of Truth”

By Emily Greenhouse

February 18, 2015, 9:09 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] Fast and loose, in fact and on line.

At 11:45 a.m. on Valentine’s Day, Saturday, Senator Rand Paul tweeted, "Hillary Clinton's new Valentine's Day Pinterest board is worth a look. Check it out and please RT!"

As Paul advertised, the link took people to a Pinterest page purporting to belong to Hillary Clinton. Instead, it had been put together by Paul's camp. There was a "Power Couple" board, with shots of the Clintonian Mr. & Mrs., an "Inspirational Quotes" slot, and—because Paul knows what women like—a "White House remodel" board, with pictures of a heart-shaped pool and a stylish office with a desk resembling a doily. Then there was the holiday card, all in pink: Clinton's face, open-mouthed, with the words "I've Benghazing at you!" in a red heart beside her.

In presidential politics, it’s a fairly rare genuflection toward policing the truth. In 2004, a number of Vietnam War veterans turned against one of their kind. They called themselves the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, and they ran ads, as a tax-exempt 527 group, saying that John Kerry, then a candidate for president, was “no war hero,” that he “lied to get his Bronze Star.” One spot opened with the men stating, solemnly, that they had served with Kerry. But the the New York Times reported, “None of the men served with Mr. Kerry on his Swift boat.”

Swiftboating fast became a verb: a shorthand synonym whose meaning was extended to cover unjust or untrue political attacks, however petty or trivial. In the next presidential election cycle, Barack Obama accused his opponent, John McCain, of engaging in “swift boat politics,” after the McCain campaign accused Obama of sexism for his use of the phrase "lipstick on a pig," claiming the comment referred to vice presidential nominee Sarah Palin. The charges and counter-charges were ugly, but allowed, and it's doubtful that we’d recognize our national politics without mudslinging, misattribution, and misrepresentation. Hyperbole has become the norm—how else could the public be trusted to grasp basic political points? In television and newspaper ads, facts may seem slack, but the spirit is accurate. To someone, at least.

The world of new media is different, in barrier and also in tone. The game is getting in on the meme. The one who wins on Twitter is the fast, the fluid, the so-damn-biting that the mic gets dropped. Much has been made already of Rand Paul’s use of social media; Politico called him “the first true Twitter candidate.” In just the last weeks of January, Paul published a “secret tape” of a fake phone call between Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush, and posted tweets (initially misspelled) showing friendship bracelets exchanged between Jeb Bush and Mitt Romney.

His Valentine’s-themed fake Pinterest page seemed a natural extension of that, the du jour-ness, the jumping on the trend. Swiftboating, maybe, but swiftboating is savvy branding. But Paul hit a dam in the water Sunday when Pinterest deleted Paul’s ‘parody’ account.

The fake Hillary Clinton account, a spokesperson for Pinterest said, violates the company’s acceptable use policy, which makes it impermissible to "impersonate or misrepresent your affiliation with any person or entity.” A site like https://www.pinterest.com/fakebarackobama/ is labeled as a parody, and https://www.pinterest.com/randpaulreview “makes clear that it is administered by someone else.” But not this.

The company representative noted that Pinterest has “disabled other accounts that appear to impersonate individuals and our policies on this are nearly identical to other services.” Twitter and Facebook have similar positions on parody accounts. A spokesperson for Twitter said that the social network has disabled accounts claiming to be (or to be affiliated with) politicians, that weren't real.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Which means that so long as Rand Paul is tweeting as Rand Paul, he can keep posting made-up letters and images of friendship bracelets, leaving it to fate or followers to determine whether he's joking. This is an interesting modern condundrum, a hairsplitting of truth—which, we know, is already in short supply in politics. The rule seems to be: falsehood is acceptable, as long as it is uttered by a verifiable human. Possibly, social media networks should streamline their swiftboat policy.

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· February 24 – Santa Clara, CA: Sec. Clinton to Keynote Address at Inaugural Watermark Conference for Women (PR Newswire)

· March 3 – Washington, DC: Sec. Clinton honored by EMILY's List (AP)

· March 4 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton to fundraise for the Clinton Foundation (WSJ)

· March 16 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton to keynote Irish American Hall of Fame (NYT)

· March 19 – Atlantic City, NJ: Sec. Clinton keynotes American Camp Association conference (PR Newswire)

· March 23 – Washington, DC: Sec. Clinton to keynote award ceremony for the Toner Prize for Excellence in Political Reporting (Syracuse)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To:	CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date:	8/26/2014 1:44:05 AM
Subject:	Correct The Record Tuesday August 26, 2014 Morning Roundup

Correct The Record Tuesday August 26, 2014 Morning Roundup:

Headlines:

Washington Post blog: The Fix: "Rand Paul says he scares Democrats. Should he?"

"'It's pretty funny to see Rand Paul trying to direct Democrats on policy and politics alike,' said Adrienne Elrod, communications director for Correct The Record, a Clinton-aligned super PAC. 'He's too cute by half, and as a whole, he is too dangerous for our nation.'"

MSNBC: "Potential 2016 contenders flocking to I.A., N.H."

"Hillary Clinton has not made stops to either state…yet."

Huffington Post opinion: Ian Reifowitz: "Dear Hillary: Don't Worry About 'Obama's Third Term' Nonsense -- Run on Progressive Values and Record"

"The most important task for any Democrat is to make an election a choice between the values and record of our party versus that of Republicans."

The Hill: "Sanders weighs Clinton challenge"

"Sen. Bernie Sanders (Vt.) is gearing up for a presidential primary challenge against Hillary Clinton and hopes to capitalize on Democratic concerns over Clinton's coziness with Wall Street banks."

Politico political column: Roger Simon: "Hillary doomed if she's Obama's third term"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"You know who should worry? Hillary Clinton should worry. She has some of the same flaws as Obama."

Washington Post: "O'Malley to send campaign staff to Iowa, N.H. and elsewhere to aid fellow Democrats"

"Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley is preparing to dispatch more than two dozen campaign staffers to other states with competitive elections this year, including Iowa and New Hampshire, in his latest move consistent with someone gearing up to run for president."

BuzzFeed: "Martin O'Malley Sends Staffers To Support Campaigns In Iowa, New Hampshire"

"Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley will pay for more than two dozen staffers to work on Democratic campaigns in Iowa, New Hampshire, and several other states ahead of the midterm elections this fall, his spokesperson confirmed Monday."

Articles:

Washington Post blog: The Fix: "Rand Paul says he scares Democrats. Should he?"

By Chris Cillizza

August 25, 2014, 2:42 p.m. EDT

Here's Rand Paul on what a 2016 matchup between himself and de facto Democratic nominee Hillary Clinton might look like: "If you wanna see a transformational election in our country, let the Democrats put forward a war hawk like Hillary Clinton, and you'll see a transformation like you've never seen."

While I'm not sure Clinton would describe herself as a "war hawk" she has tended -- as Secretary of State and in the Senate -- to favor more aggressive approaches to international conflicts then those advocated by President Obama or, for that matter, Paul.

Consider:

* Clinton, while in the Senate, voted for the use of force resolution against Iraq in 2002. Obama, spoke out in opposition to it. Paul, who, like Obama, wasn't in the Senate at the time of the vote, has worked to repeal the use of force resolution.

* Clinton supported a larger troop surge in Afghanistan in 2009. Obama chose a smaller one. Paul penned an op-ed -- along with two Democratic Senators -- advocating for a faster withdrawal of troops from Afghanistan than Obama proposed.

* Clinton was a strong voice advocating military intervention in Libya. President Obama eventually sided with her. Paul opposed military intervention.

* Clinton favored more directly and broadly arming Syrian rebels early in the civil war, a move Obama resisted. Paul opposed arming the rebels.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Given that record, if Clinton and Paul were their party's respective nominees, it seems certain that she would be more hawkish in her approach to nearly every major international conflict than he would be. And that fact alone would be a remarkable turnabout -- given that Republicans have built much of their electoral success over the past three-plus decades around a muscular foreign policy. (It remains to be seen whether Paul's non-interventionist views will be disqualifying for him in the Republican primary fight.)

"It's pretty funny to see Rand Paul trying to direct Democrats on policy and politics alike," said Adrienne Elrod, communications director for Correct The Record, a Clinton-aligned super PAC. "He's too cute by half, and as a whole, he is too dangerous for our nation."

The more intriguing question is whether Paul or Clinton would be closer to where the American public stands on what role the U.S. should play in foreign conflicts.

While there is a natural tendency to assume Clinton's hawkish views would be preferred, there's reason to believe that the cumulative effect of a decade's worth of wars in Afghanistan and Iraq -- wars strong majorities don't believe were worth fighting -- has fundamentally altered how people view the U.S.'s place in the world community.

Take this amazing chart via Wall Street Journal politics editor Aaron Zitner from an April NBC-WSJ poll:

[GRAPH OF HOW INVOLVED THE U.S. SHOULD BE IN WORLD AFFAIRS]

And, the NBC-WSJ poll is far from an outlier. In a January Pew poll, six in ten people said "we should pay less attention to problems overseas and concentrate on problems here at home" while just 35 percent said "it's best for the future of our country to be active in world affairs." A June CBS-New York Times survey showed 58 percent saying that the U.S. should not take a leading role "among all other countries in the world in trying to solve international conflicts" while just 37 percent said America should play a leading role. An August NBC-WSJ poll found that just 35 percent of people were either "very" or "somewhat" satisfied with the U.S.'s role in the world while 62 percent were very or somewhat dissatisfied. Back in late 1995, 52 percent said they were satisfied with the U.S. role while 43 percent said they were not.

Support for the U.S. playing a more narrow role in world affairs tends to run higher among Democrats and independents than it does among Republicans. (See my point above about Paul's challenge in selling his views to Republican primary voters.) Whether the difference between Clinton and Paul on that set of issues would be enough to convince some Democrats and Democratic-leaning independents to vote for him, however, remains to be seen. It's simply too far away to begin predicting what the key issues of the 2016 presidential election will be.

"How things have always been" only holds true until those things change. Remember how America would never elect a black president named Barack Obama? Or how the Senate would never invoke the nuclear option? One day the current prevailing conventional wisdom about what the public wants the U.S. to do -- and be -- internationally may find its way onto that list.

MSNBC: "Potential 2016 contenders flocking to I.A., N.H."

By Lisa Crivelli

August 25, 2014, 7:25 p.m. EDT

If you're not visiting New Hampshire you're not running for president… and Texas Governor Rick Perry made the pilgrimage there this weekend. It was Perry's first visit.

According to a report from NBC News and U.S. News and World Report, Rand Paul, Ted Cruz, Chris Christie, Paul Ryan, and Marco Rubio have made a combined forty trips to New Hampshire and Iowa. That's four times more than their Democratic counterparts, which include Vice President

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Joe Biden and Brian Schweitzer. Hillary Clinton has not made stops to either state…yet.

Huffington Post opinion: Ian Reifowitz: "Dear Hillary: Don't Worry About 'Obama's Third Term' Nonsense -- Run on Progressive Values and Record"

By Ian Reifowitz, author of "Obama's America: A Transformative Vision of Our National Identity"

August 25, 2014, 5:59 p.m. EDT

Some people just wanna party like it's 2008. There's apparently some "concern" out there among advisers to Hillary Clinton -- all of whom, of course, told CNN they had to remain anonymous -- about Republicans attacking her candidacy (and presumably that of any Democratic nominee) as "Obama's third term."

One of these unnamed advisers predicted that the Republican attack would unfold thusly:

"If you like Obama, you will love Hillary. ... She was in his government, she was at his side. ... That is, the way to go after her is four more years of the same old thing. The question they should ask her is "Tell me 10 things that you disagree with him on."

Now, we don't know whether the Democratic nominee in 2016 -- whomever she or he may be -- will listen to this nonsense. Either way, running away from the Obama administration would be a serious mistake, not to mention being all but impossible for just about any Democrat currently on the horizon. Doing so would divide the party and depress enthusiasm, and thus voter turnout, among President Obama's core supporters in key swing states like Ohio and Florida. Besides, as we saw even as they competed for the Democratic nomination in 2008, Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama do agree on the vast majority of issues. Trying to pretend otherwise would be seen as disingenuous at best.

The most important task for any Democrat is to make an election a choice between the values and record of our party versus that of Republicans. When we do that, we win. Period. When it comes to values, Democrats are the party of the 99 percent, Republicans are the party of the 1 percent. We are the party of freedom, justice, and equality for all Americans, no matter who they are. The Republicans? Not so much. We are the party that believes "we're all part of one American family," while the GOP operates from a different principle: "I've got mine, and the rest of you are on your own." If former Secretary Clinton is our party's 2016 nominee for president, she must put these contrasts front and center.

The last three presidents have included two Democrats and a Republican. How'd they do? President Bill Clinton presided over the longest peacetime economic expansion in history, saw 20 million net jobs created during his eight years, and, thanks in large part to a 1993 budget deal passed with only Democratic votes in Congress, turned huge deficits into the first run of federal budget surpluses in decades.

George W. Bush turned these surpluses -- which the Congressional Budget Office predicted would come to over $800 billion per year from 2009 to 2012 -- into massive deficits. Additionally, he created all of about 1 million net jobs in eight years, and that thanks only to an increase in government jobs. The private sector actually lost jobs during the eight years of his presidency.

In his last year, George W. Bush's economy tanked. It crashed. Our economy was as bad as it's been at any point since the Great Depression. Barack Obama came in and stabilized the situation. Fighting against almost universal Republican opposition, his policies reversed the collapse, and we've been growing slowly but steadily since. Even after losing millions of jobs in its first months, his administration has seen overall job growth exceed 5 million in just five-and-a-half years.

Unemployment is down. Median income, after falling hard thanks to the crash, has rebounded in the last three years. The economy has grown for the most part over the past five years, while the deficit has fallen dramatically. The stock market has more than doubled off the low point reached just after President Obama took office. Assuming these trends continue over the next two years, the Obama record will be one to run on in 2016, and that includes Obamacare.

The American people have watched for the better part of three decades as Democratic presidents have performed better for our country than have Republicans. President Obama, in particular, has had to clean up the messes left at home and abroad by George W. Bush, a president who inherited a very strong country from Bill Clinton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There's no question that Hillary Clinton will also have to run on her own individual vision, her own talents, experience, and personal qualities. Absolutely. But rather than listen to the advice of some "unnamed" supporters and run away from the Obama record, former Secretary Clinton should absolutely highlight it, along with that of her husband, as a record of Democratic success.

In 1988, Michael Dukakis unfortunately tried to run a campaign that was "not about ideology, it's about competence." In 2016, however, the Democratic candidate for president would only benefit by emphasizing ideology, by contrasting what Democrats believe to the beliefs of a Republican party that, whoever is its nominee, is dominated by extreme right, by the tea party. Our policy positions -- even now, when President Obama's ratings are not what they were two years ago -- are more popular than those of the Republicans. Those positions reflect our values, as does the record of the last two Democratic presidents. Any Democrat running in 2016 should enthusiastically embrace them.

The Hill: "Sanders weighs Clinton challenge"

By Alexander Bolton

August 26, 2014, 6:00 a.m. EDT

Sen. Bernie Sanders (Vt.) is gearing up for a presidential primary challenge against Hillary Clinton and hopes to capitalize on Democratic concerns over Clinton's coziness with Wall Street banks.

Sanders, an independent who caucuses with Senate Democrats, plans to travel to two crucial presidential battleground states next month.

He will speak at an AFL-CIO breakfast hosted in Manchester, New Hampshire, over Labor Day weekend and then travel to Iowa in mid September, when Clinton will be there building support for her own 2016 campaign.

Sanders plans to return to New Hampshire, which neighbors his home state, on Sept. 27 to speak at the Stafford County Democrats annual dinner near Durham, according to his staff.

"I'll be going to New Hampshire and I'll be going to Iowa. That's part of my trying to ascertain the kind of support that exists for a presidential run," he said Monday in an interview.

Sanders has not said whether he will run as an independent or a Democrat.

He has served as an independent during his entire career in Congress. This lack of affiliation allows him to distance himself from both parties and the low approval ratings they have as a result of years of squabbling.

But a non-partisan bid would force Sanders to raise millions of dollars to overcome the hurdles various states have erected to make it harder for independent candidates to get their names on the ballot.

Running as a Democrat would give Sanders higher visibility by allowing him to participate in the early primary debates.

Sanders will hold a series of town-hall meetings in Dubuque, Waterloo and Des Moines on Sept. 13 and 14, according to his staff. Clinton will be in Iowa the same weekend to attend a steak fry hosted by Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This week, Sanders will visit South Carolina, the host of another important contest early on the 2016 presidential primary calendar, to speak at an event sponsored by Progressive Voters of America, South Forward and the South Carolina Progressive Network.

Many liberals have raised questions about Clinton's stance on regulating Wall Street banks and expanding Social Security, but Sanders has so far declined to take shots at the presumed Democratic presidential frontrunner.

"I don't want to speak about other people," he said.

Instead, Sanders will push his agenda, which calls for a "massive jobs program," raising the minimum wage, changing the nation's trade policies, programs to make childcare and college education more affordable, and subsidized healthcare.

Democratic strategists say there is room for a candidate to challenge Clinton from the left in 2016.

"Hillary Clinton has a lot of progressive positions on issues and she herself may move in a more populist direction but she also has lots of ties to big money, she has lots of ties to Wall Street," said Mike Lux, a Democratic strategist. "She has been very reluctant to criticize Wall Street on a lot of things.

"Absolutely there's room on the populist left for someone to run against her," he added.

Democratic strategists say it is far too early to say whether Sanders will emerge as the primary liberal challenger to Clinton.

They say it's possible that other candidates, including Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.), Sen. Amy Klobuchar (D-Minn.) or Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, may emerge as the leading alternative.

Liberal advocates say there are many questions about Clinton's policy stances. She has stayed relatively quiet about domestic issues since retiring from the Senate in 2008.

"I would like to know more about where she stands. The world has changed a lot since her husband was president and she hasn't had to deal with domestic issues since she was in the U.S. Senate," said Roger Hickey, co-director of Campaign for America's Future. "The questions I would like her debate and discuss is what do we do with this banking system that is a problem for the real economy.

"Do we continue to deregulate the way her husband did or do we break up the banks and make them less powerful?" he said.

Democratic activists acknowledge that Sanders is unlikely to present a serious threat to Clinton but they are happy to see him jump in the race because they want a vigorous debate over Wall Street.

Warren has emerged as the leading Democratic voice on Wall Street reform but she insists that she does not plan to run for president.

"The big question that most progressives have for Hillary is, 'Where is she now compared to the past?'" said Charles Chamberlain, executive director of Democracy for America, a liberal advocacy group. "In the past she sided with the Wall Street wing of the party. The reality is that the corporate, Wall Street wing of the Democratic Party is going away.

"The future of our party is the Warren wing, which is fighting to break up the big banks, expand Social Security and fighting economic inequality," he said.

Liberal Democrats hope a challenge from Sanders or another populist candidate will force Clinton to move to the left on financial regulations, corporate tax reform and expanding Social Security.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Politico political column: Roger Simon: "Hillary doomed if she's Obama's third term"

By Roger Simon

August 26, 2014, 5:05 a.m. EDT

When Barack Obama was first elected to the presidency, he asked David Axelrod to leave Chicago and come to the White House with him. Axelrod would be a senior adviser, a powerful position where he could craft both policy and the president's message.

But Axelrod hesitated.

Though he was often credited with being a calming influence in the fractious world of high-stakes politics, there was one thing Axelrod held dear: the ability to tell his boss off when his boss needed telling off.

And when you're president, Axelrod told Obama, I won't be able to tell you off.

Obama thought about it.

Yes, you still can tell me off, Obama told Axelrod. As long as you do it in private.

Axelrod went to the White House in January 2009 and left in January 2011. And today I wonder if there is anyone in the West Wing who has the valor and the vigor to occasionally tell the president off.

Was there anyone who said last week, "Uh, the golf thing, Mr. President? Maybe delay it a couple of days? So it doesn't come minutes after you tell the nation how 'heartbroken' you are over a beheaded journalist. Maybe go hiking? Sit on a rock, commune with nature, that kind of thing?"

Instead, the president swiftly changed into his golf togs, grabbed his bag and, as one wit put it, introduced the nation to his new doctrine: "Speak softly and carry a Big Bertha."

Even the civil unrest in Ferguson, Missouri, following the slaying of an unarmed black teenager by a white police officer, did not keep Obama off the links. As much as the White House says the president is always connected to his job no matter where he is — which is technically true — golf is clearly a world where the president goes to clear his mind and think other thoughts.

Don Van Natta, who has written a history of presidents and golfing, wrote for ESPN The Magazine in 2012 that Obama's wife, Michelle, "nudged him onto the links, hoping he would trade his smashmouth brand of pickup basketball for the more gentlemanly game of golf. Now Obama sees the game as his only chance to just wander around."

But there are better times to wander than others. Especially while playing a game associated with the 1 percent, not the people working two jobs to make a living wage.

Still, Obama played on. And even though he talked about Ferguson during a brief news conference, he wanted to keep it at arm's length. "I've got to make sure that I don't look like I'm putting my thumb on the scales one way or the other," Obama said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So Eric Holder, his attorney general, was left to express the kind of sentiments that Barack Obama used to express. It was Holder who went to Missouri and talked about being hassled by police as a young man and the kind of smoldering anger and mistrust that builds in black America.

“I understand that mistrust. I am the attorney general of the United States. But I am also a black man,” Holder said.

And it was Holder in 2009, in his first major speech after being confirmed, who said: “Though this nation has proudly thought of itself as an ethnic melting pot, in things racial we have always been and continue to be, in too many ways, essentially a nation of cowards.”

Holder called for a “national conversation” on race not because such a conversation would be easy, but because it was necessary to America’s future.

President Obama wanted no part of it. In 2012, after Trayvon Martin, another unarmed black teenager was shot and killed, Obama said it was not “particularly productive when politicians try to organize conversations” on race.

But how does he know? When did he try it?

There appears to be nobody working for him who both disagrees with him and is willing to tell him so. Instead, we are left with a president who seems wrapped in his aloofness as a protective blanket to keep the outside from getting in.

He may not care about the “optics” of all this. He’s got his two terms and his big legacy item: national health care.

So why should he worry? You know who should worry? Hillary Clinton should worry.

She has some of the same flaws as Obama. She can project a chilly public personality, a remoteness, a reserve and a detachment from ordinary people.

And the Republicans see their opportunity. They already have their 2016 theme:

“She may be riding high right now, but people may decide against having another four years of this kind of governing,” Rep. Paul Ryan, the Republican vice presidential nominee in 2012, said recently.

The candidate at the top of the GOP ticket backed him up. “Our party has to come together or we will continue with a third term of Barack Obama,” Mitt Romney warned.

It is easier to imagine Clinton losing the presidency in 2016 than to imagine exactly whom she would lose to. The Republican field has a very few candidates capable of winning a general election and a gaggle of far right-wingers who cannot.

Still, Clinton must connect with voters and sell her vision of America — which thus far she has kept largely to herself — in order to win.

And even if she does that, she is not a sure thing: If she can be labeled as Obama’s third term, she can be beaten.

That’s because I don’t think there are too many people who want an Obama third term. Not even Obama.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Washington Post: "O'Malley to send campaign staff to Iowa, N.H. and elsewhere to aid fellow Democrats"

By John Wagner

August 25, 2014, 4:27 p.m. EDT

Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley is preparing to dispatch more than two dozen campaign staffers to other states with competitive elections this year, including Iowa and New Hampshire, in his latest move consistent with someone gearing up to run for president.

O'Malley (D), who has said he is seriously considering a 2016 White House bid, plans to meet Friday with members of the group, who will be sent by his political action committee to states with gubernatorial and U.S. Senate races in the fall, aides said.

O'Malley spokeswoman Lis Smith confirmed the governor's plans but offered few specifics and declined to share the states to which the staffers will be sent, beyond Iowa and New Hampshire. Both states have gubernatorial and U.S. Senate races on the fall ballot.

Smith characterized the plans as part of O'Malley's ongoing effort to assist Democrats across the country win 2014 elections.

"The governor is doing everything he can to elect more Democrats, and this is part of that," she said.

Over the past two years, O'Malley's PAC has made more than $230,000 in contributions to Democratic candidates and committees, according to campaign finance records. O'Malley has also hosted more than dozen fundraisers for fellow Democrats, aides said.

And he has appeared in more than two dozen states at party dinners and other events. Those include multiple events in both Iowa and New Hampshire, the first two states with presidential nominating contests.

O'Malley's political activities have far exceeded those of other Democrats considering a 2016 run but have been overshadowed by speculation about whether Hillary Rodham Clinton will enter the race.

The tactic of paying for campaign staff in other states prior to a presidential year is one that has been employed by other White House hopefuls in past cycles.

Smith declined to discuss the staffers that O'Malley's PAC has hired for the upcoming field work, which will focus on getting sympathetic voters to the polls.

O'Malley has long believed in the importance of that kind of campaign work. In 1984, he worked in Iowa as field organizer for presidential candidate Gary Hart.

BuzzFeed: "Martin O'Malley Sends Staffers To Support Campaigns In Iowa, New Hampshire"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Ruby Cramer

August 25, 2014, 8:27 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] The Maryland governor is the only Democrat sending people out this year. A way to build favor in early-voting states ahead of 2016.

Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley will pay for more than two dozen staffers to work on Democratic campaigns in Iowa, New Hampshire, and several other states ahead of the midterm elections this fall, his spokesperson confirmed Monday.

The move to dispatch campaign workers, first reported by the Washington Post, signals the extent to which O'Malley is pursuing a possible White House bid.

The governor's spokesperson, Lis Smith, would not discuss details about how many staffers would travel to which states. But she said the staffers would be helping Senate and gubernatorial campaigns across the country, including those races in Iowa and New Hampshire, the states that host the first caucuses and primary.

The staffers, Smith said, will be paid for by O'Malley's political action committee, O'Say Can You See, also called O'PAC.

Politicians considering a national run will often send money or manpower to early-voting states during the election cycle before a presidential race. In 2006, before Democrats' last open primary, workers paid by former Democratic Sens. John Edwards and Evan Bayh, for example, hit New Hampshire and Iowa.

But this year, O'Malley is the only known Democrat providing such support.

Raymond Buckley, chairman of the New Hampshire Democratic Party, said he had no knowledge of plans for other Democrats to engage in races in his state.

He hadn't heard of O'Malley's intentions to send staffers until Monday, he said.

Ready for Hillary, a super PAC preparing for a possible Hillary Clinton campaign, has been set up in primary states for the last year. The group made its first organizing trip to Iowa last January. But Clinton herself has yet to engage in midterm races. She is scheduled to appear in Iowa at Sen. Tom Harkin's annual steak fry next month.

O'Malley will finish his second and last term as governor in January. He has spent much of the last year traveling on behalf of Democrats, while putting together what he has called "the framework" for a possible presidential campaign.

The campaign workers will meet with O'Malley on Friday and will dispatch to states "imminently," Smith said.

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- August 28 – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton keynotes Nexenta's OpenSDx Summit (BusinessWire)
- September 4 – Las Vegas, NV: Sec. Clinton speaks at the National Clean Energy Summit (Solar Novis Today)
- September 9 – Washington, DC: Sec. Clinton fundraises for the DSCC at her Washington home (DSCC)
- September 14 – Indianola, IA: Sec. Clinton headlines Sen. Harkin's Steak Fry (LA Times)
- October ? – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton fundraises for House Democratic women candidates with Nancy Pelosi (The Hill)
- October 2 – Miami Beach, FL: Sec. Clinton keynotes the CREW Network Convention & Marketplace (CREW Network)
- October 13 – Las Vegas, NV: Sec. Clinton keynotes the UNLV Foundation Annual Dinner (UNLV)
- October 14 – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton keynotes salesforce.com Dreamforce conference (salesforce.com)
- December 4 – Boston, MA: Sec. Clinton speaks at the Massachusetts Conference for Women (MCFW)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Hudson Institute" <events@hudson.org>
To:	podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date:	9/3/2015 10:00:04 AM
Subject:	Upcoming Events: U.S.-China Strategy, India-Pakistan Relations, IAEA and the Iran Deal, and more

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Christina Reynolds" <creynolds@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	"Tony Carrk" <tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com>
	"Mandy Grunwald" <gruncom@aol.com>
	"Lily Adams" <ladams@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	7/17/2015 5:29:53 PM
Subject:	RE: HRC did great

For awareness (or tweeting), here's a quick little snapshot Iowa put together that's up on the Briefing: https://www.hillaryclinton.com/p/briefing/updates/2015/07/17/idp-hof/

We will also be putting up a part of the riff on women, but had some technical issues, so will get it up tomorrow when more people are watching.

-----Original Message-----
From: Tony Carrk [mailto:tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com]
Sent: Friday, July 17, 2015 11:20 PM
To: Christina Reynolds <creynolds@hillaryclinton.com>; Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com>; Lily Adams <ladams@hillaryclinton.com>
Cc: Jennifer Palmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>; Robby Mook <re47@hillaryclinton.com>; Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com>; John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com>; Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com>; Kristina Schake <kschake@hillaryclinton.com>; Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hillaryclinton.com>; Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com>; Jim Margolis <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com>; Oren Shur <oshur@hillaryclinton.com>
Subject: RE: HRC did great

Good job on not getting CSPAN hot mic'ed yet.

-----Original Message-----
From: Christina Reynolds [mailto:creynolds@hillaryclinton.com]
Sent: Friday, July 17, 2015 11:04 PM
To: Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com>; Lily Adams <ladams@hillaryclinton.com>
Cc: Tony Carrk <tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com>; Jennifer Palmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>; Robby Mook <re47@hillaryclinton.com>; Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com>; John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com>; Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com>; Kristina Schake <kschake@hillaryclinton.com>; Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hillaryclinton.com>; Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com>; Jim Margolis <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com>; Oren Shur <oshur@hillaryclinton.com>
Subject: RE: HRC did great

Webb said he wouldn't have voted for war in Iraq, wouldn't have authorized the intervention in Libya and will not support Iran having any possibility of getting a nuclear weapon.

He didn't name us, and the first two things are not inaccurate, so I don't think it's worth putting anything out, but just flagging.

-----Original Message-----
From: Mandy Grunwald [mailto:gruncom@aol.com]
Sent: Friday, July 17, 2015 10:49 PM
To: Lily Adams <ladams@hillaryclinton.com>
Cc: Christina Reynolds <creynolds@hillaryclinton.com>; Tony Carrk <tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com>; Jennifer Palmieri

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

<jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>; Robby Mook <re47@hillaryclinton.com>; Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com>; John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com>; Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com>; Kristina Schake <kschake@hillaryclinton.com>; Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hillaryclinton.com>; Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com>; Jim Margolis <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com>; Oren Shur <oshur@hillaryclinton.com>
Subject: Re: HRC did great

Interesting that Bernie is making a big play on AA and Latino issues -- and getting good reaction, Huge applause on Citizens United.

Mandy Grunwald
Grunwald Communications
202 973-9400

> On Jul 17, 2015, at 10:40 PM, Lily Adams <ladams@hillaryclinton.com>
> wrote:
>
> Oh my mistake. He seems hoarse.
>
>
> ---------
> Lily Adams
> cell: (202) 368-4013
>
>> On Jul 17, 2015, at 9:39 PM, Christina Reynolds
>> <creynolds@hillaryclinton.com> wrote:
>>
>> I think he meant Bernie shouting at the crowd. It feels awkward on TV.
>>
>> -----Original Message-----
>> From: Lily Adams [mailto:ladams@hillaryclinton.com]
>> Sent: Friday, July 17, 2015 10:38 PM
>> To: Tony Carrk <tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com>
>> Cc: Jennifer Palmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>; Christina
>> Reynolds <creynolds@hillaryclinton.com>; Robby Mook
>> <re47@hillaryclinton.com>; Dan Schwerin
>> <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com>; John Podesta
>> <john.podesta@gmail.com>; Jake Sullivan
>> <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com>; Kristina Schake
>> <kschake@hillaryclinton.com>; Nick Merrill
>> <nmerrill@hillaryclinton.com>; Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com>;
>> Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com>; Jim Margolis
>> <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com>; Oren Shur <oshur@hillaryclinton.com>
>> Subject: Re: HRC did great
>>
>> It's from one corner of the room where his tables are
>>
>>
>> ---------
>> Lily Adams
>> cell: (202) 368-4013
>>

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

>>> On Jul 17, 2015, at 9:36 PM, Tony Carrk <tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com> >>> wrote:
>>>
>>> How is the shouting in the room?
>>>
>>> -----Original Message-----
>>> From: Jennifer Palmieri [mailto:jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com]
>>> Sent: Friday, July 17, 2015 10:32 PM
>>> To: Christina Reynolds <creynolds@hillaryclinton.com>
>>> Cc: Robby Mook <re47@hillaryclinton.com>; Dan Schwerin
>>> <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com>; John Podesta
>>> <john.podesta@gmail.com>; Jake Sullivan
>>> <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com>; Kristina Schake
>>> <kschake@hillaryclinton.com>; Nick Merrill
>>> <nmerrill@hillaryclinton.com>; Lily Adams
>>> <ladams@hillaryclinton.com>; Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com>;
>>> Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com>; Jim Margolis
>>> <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com>; Oren Shur <oshur@hillaryclinton.com>; Tony >>> Carrk <tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com>
>>> Subject: Re: HRC did great
>>>
>>> Bernie is up.
>>>
>>> It's really like listening to Robby.
>>>
>>> Sent from my iPhone
>>>
>>>> On Jul 17, 2015, at 9:20 PM, Christina Reynolds
>>>> <creynolds@hillaryclinton.com> wrote:
>>>>
>>>> Worth noting:
>>>> @Lis_Smith
>>>> BIG THEME of @MartinOMalley's speech tonight: Actions, not Words.
>>>> As progressives, we need someone who can get. things. done.
>>>>
>>>> -----Original Message-----
>>>> From: Jennifer Palmieri [mailto:jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com]
>>>> Sent: Friday, July 17, 2015 10:16 PM
>>>> To: Robby Mook <re47@hillaryclinton.com>
>>>> Cc: Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com>; John Podesta
>>>> <john.podesta@gmail.com>; Jake Sullivan
>>>> <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com>; creynolds@hillaryclinton.com;
>>>> Kristina Schake <kschake@hillaryclinton.com>; Nick Merrill
>>>> <nmerrill@hillaryclinton.com>; Lily Adams
>>>> <ladams@hillaryclinton.com>; Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com>;
>>>> Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com>; Jim Margolis
>>>> <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com>; Oren Shur <oshur@hillaryclinton.com>
>>>> Subject: Re: HRC did great
>>>>
>>>> Not yet. O'Malley is speaking now.
>>>>
>>>> Sent from my iPhone
>>>>
>>>>> On Jul 17, 2015, at 9:14 PM, Robby Mook <re47@hillaryclinton.com> >>>>> wrote:
>>>>>
>>>>> Fantastic. Any incoming from the others?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

>>>>>
>>>>>
>>>>>
>>>>>> On Jul 17, 2015, at 10:13 PM, Jennifer Palmieri
>>>>>> <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com> wrote:
>>>>>>
>>>>>> Passionate, great response in the room.
>>>>>>
>>>>>> Sent from my iPhone

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jake Sullivan" <jake.sullivan@gmail.com>
To: "Eizenstat, Stuart" <seizenstat@cov.com>
Date: 6/29/2015 11:23:29 AM
Subject: Re: FW: HRC Iran statement

Thanks Stu. I need to grapple with some of these edits, which go beyond where I might suggest she go at this point. Others are very well taken. Let me give it another crack and come back to you.

On Mon, Jun 29, 2015 at 6:14 PM, Eizenstat, Stuart <seizenstat@cov.com > wrote:

Dear Dan and Jake,

Here is a cleaner version. Something happened with the one I just sent that left gaps in the sentences.

Stu

From: Eizenstat, Stuart
Sent: Monday, June 29, 2015 6:09 PM
To: 'Daniel Kurtz-Phelan'
Cc: Jake Sullivan; John D. Podesta (John.Podesta@gmail.com); Huma M. Abedin (huma@hrcoffice.com)
Subject: RE: HRC Iran statement

Dear Dan and Jake,

I am sorry for the delay, but I only landed this morning from Israel via JFK. Please see my comments below. Of course, we do not know the details at this time.

Stu

From: Daniel Kurtz-Phelan [mailto:dkurtzphelan@gmail.com]
Sent: Sunday, June 28, 2015 8:52 PM
To: Eizenstat, Stuart
Cc: Jake Sullivan
Subject: HRC Iran statement

Dear Stu,

Jake asked that I share with you the current draft of HRC's statement on the Iran deal. It's pasted below. Some of this could of course change depending on the details of a final agreement, but it would be great to have your feedback at this stage,

Many thanks,

Dan

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

**

I applaud President Obama and Secretary Kerry for securing a nuclear agreement that offers the strongest chance to prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon. With vigorous enforcement, unyielding verification, and swift consequences for any violations, this deal will make the United States, Israel, our Arab partners, and the region safer and more secure than if there were no agreement.

At the same time, there are aspects of the agreement that are a cause for concern, and a basis for special diligence. has not been required to answer questions about the Possible Military Dimensions (PMD), including allowing the IAEA to inspect sites, interview key scientists and officials, and review documents that would shed light on their past and current PMD activities. In addition, clarity is required on what limits are imposed during the term of the agreement and thereafter to preclude Iran's work on advanced centrifuges. It is also critical that sanctions relief must come only when Iran has demonstrates to the satisfaction of the IAEA that they have complied with their obligations. Sanctions for terrorism and other non-nuclear sanctions must remain in place. I I want to make sure as President that any violation of the agreement by Iran would trigger a reimposition of sanctions, without an Iranian veto over the findings, and in ways that assure the US can act if we feel there is a violation. Most important is monitoring and verification. The IAEA inspectors must have timely and effective access to all sites in Iran, including military sites. It is unclear if this is the case.

Despite these concerns, it is critical in assessing this agreement to ask what alternatives exist. We already have in place the most effective, broad-based sanctions ever imposed on a country in peacetime. While they have brought Iran to the negotiating table, they have not stopped the continued expansion of their nuclear program. It is difficult to see what other sanctions would lead to greater Iranian concessions. Without an agreement, there would be no two-thirds reduction in their number of centrifuges; no dismantlement of their plutonium plant at Arak; no 24/IAEA inspections; no dilution of their 20% enriched uranium. Their capacity to "break-out: would be far more likely without this agreement, than with it. We also have to consider it we could maintain the partnership with the European Union, which has made the sanctions most effective.

Today's agreement is the culmination of an effective strategy executed over many years. By the end of the Bush administration, Iran was rapidly expanding its nuclear centrifuge capacity despite unilateral American sanctions and ineffective saber rattling. The Obama administration took a different approach, working with Congress and our allies and partners around the world. As Secretary of State, I logged tens of thousands of miles and twisted a lot of arms – especially in Moscow and Beijing – to build a global coalition to impose the most crippling sanctions in history against Tehran. That unprecedented pressure shattered Iran's economy, halted the progress of its nuclear program (NB. BE CAREFUL THEY HAVE SUBSTANTIALLY INCREASED THE NUMBER OF CENTRIFUGES AND AMOUNT OF ENRICHED URANIUM SINCE OBAMA TOOK OFFICE), and forced its leaders to the table to negotiate a deal that puts a nuclear weapon out of reach.

As President, I will use every tool in our arsenal to compel rigorous Iranian compliance. The response to any violation will be clear, immediate, and devastating -- starting with the return of sanctions but taking no options off the table, including, if necessary, the use of force. The message to Iran must be loud and clear: We will never allow you to acquire a nuclear weapon; we will never allow you permit you to produce sufficient fissile material or otherwise acquire it, sufficient for a nuclear weapons; not just during the term of this agreement – never.

Going forward, we have to be clear-eyed when it comes to the broader threat Iran represents. Even with an agreement that limits its nuclear ambitions, Iran still poses a direct challenge to the United States and our allies, especially Israel. The funds it will receive with sanctions relief will provide billions of dollars more for Iran to use to support terrorism. It continues to destabilize countries from Yemen to Lebanon, while exacerbating conflict in Syria. And it fuels terrorism throughout the region and beyond, including through direct support to Hamas and Hizballah. We have to aggressively oppose and raise the costs for Iran's destabilizing activities, insist on the return of U.S. citizens being held by the Iranian government, and strengthen cooperation with our allies and partners. This agreement under my Administration will not see this agreement as the beginning of an American-Iranian partnership. Our allies in the Middle East deserve to have this assurance, and they will have it if I am elected President.

Israel should be confident that now and in a Hillary Clinton Administration, the United States will always defend its security and ensure its military edge in the region. Our two countries have to be on the same page when it comes to the threat posed by Iran, so I would invite the senior Israeli leadership to Washington for early talks on further strengthening our crucial alliance. I will provide Israel with all the military means it requires to defend itself against an Iranian threat, and support its actions to defend itself. We should also deepen our security relationship with Arab partners who are threatened by Iran's ambitions.

Ultimately, this agreement is the best way to protect our country and our allies. To walk away from a deal that will stop Iran from getting a nuclear weapon, or to bomb Iran as long an agreement offers an alternative, [as some Republican candidates for President suggest,] would be both dangerous and shortsighted – fracturing our global coalition, raising the risk of regional war, and ultimately bringing Iran closer to a nuclear weapon.

So we should proceed with wisdom and strength in implementing a deal born out of effective diplomacy and strong American leadership.

**

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	5/8/2015 12:40:04 AM
Subject:	News Clips 5.8.15
Attachments:	H4A Clips 5.8.15.docx

H4A Press Clips

May 8, 2015

SUMMARY OF TODAY'S NEWS

Yesterday a federal appeals court ruled the NSA phone data collection illegal and Hillary Clinton along with the White House endorsed a bill that would scale back NSA mass surveillance.

The Senate voted overwhelmingly Thursday to approve legislation allowing Congress to review a nuclear deal with Iran in a 98-1 vote. Senator Tom Cotton (R-AR) was the only Senator in attendee to oppose.

The State Department says it has no plans to review previously undisclosed donations to a branch of the Clinton Foundation.

Yesterday a poll was released from Quinnipiac University found that with 60 percent of the vote among Iowa likely Democratic Caucus participants, Hillary Clinton has an early lock on the first-in-the-nation presidential test, apparently undamaged by a nationwide flood of negative publicity.

LAST NIGHTS EVENING NEWS

Last night there was no 2016 election coverage. The three major news outlets instead covered ISIS followers in the US, Wednesday evening's severe weather in Oklahoma and Patriots Super bowl quasi-scandal: Deflategate.

SUMMARY OF TODAY'S NEWS..... 1

LAST NIGHTS EVENING NEWS..... 1

TODAY'S KEY STORIES..... 4

Hillary Clinton endorses NSA reform bill // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald - May 7, 2015..... 4

Senate overwhelmingly approves Iran review bill in 98-1 vote // The Hill // Jordain Carney – May 7, 2015 5

State Department Plans No Review of Clinton Foundation Donations // AP // Matthew Lee - May 7, 2015 7

What Trouble? Clinton Has Early Lock On Iowa Caucus, Quinnipiac University Poll Finds; Sanders, Biden Are Only Dems Over 3% // Quinnipiac University - May 7, 2015..... 8

Hillary Clinton says 'not one' GOP presidential contender backs path to citizenship // Politifact // Louis Jacobson - May 7, 2015 9

SOCIAL MEDIA..... 13

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Maggie Haberman (5/7/15 7:54AM)@maggieNYT: @ByronYork on the trap Clinton set for Rs on immigration m.washingtonexaminer.com/how-will-top-2..... 13

Amy Chozick (5/7/15 10:45AM) @amychozick: Iowa Democrats unfazed by criticism of Clinton. Nice look at her standing in the caucus state, by @arappeport nytimes.com/politics/first..... 13

Ken Thomas (5/7/15) @KThomasDC: State Dept plans no review of Clinton Foundation donations, via @APDiploWriter bit.ly/1ET7rgy 13

Teddy Schleifer (5/7/15, 7:48 PM) @teddyschleifer: Contrary to previous report, @SaraMurray scoops that Jeb cited George W. as foreign policy, not Israel, adviser. | cnn.com/2015/05/07/pol..... 13

Maggie Haberman (5/7/15 6:41) @maggieNYT: Interesting - Priorities USA brings on Rafi Jafri, Dem fundraiser who'd worked for Clinton '08 and Ready for Hillary, per two sources..... 14

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 14

Hillary Clinton Shows New Willingness to Tackle Risky Issues // New York Times // Patrick Healy - May 7, 2015 14

The Clintons' Canadian Mining Pal Has Been Accused Of Double-Dealing Before // Daily Caller // Chuck Ross - May 6, 2015 16

Why Clinton's immigration speech left many Republican rivals speechless // Washington Post // David Nakamura and Robert Costa - May 7, 2015..... 22

Poll: Hillary Clinton strong in Iowa despite email, foreign cash flaps // Politico // Nick Gass - May 7, 2015 25

WMUR Poll: Clinton trails or tied with five top Republicans // WMUR // John DiStaso - May 7, 2015 26

Hillary Clinton pushes the limits of campaign finance law // LA Times // Evan Halper - May 7, 2015 27

Why Hillary Clinton Embraced Big Money in Politics // NBC News // Perry Bacon, Jr. - May 7, 2015 28

Hillary Clinton's Not the First Democrat to Woo Super-PAC's Donors // Bloomberg Politics // Ali Elkin - May 7, 2015 30

First on CNN: Clinton invites donors to New York, but only if they've hit their goals // CNN Politics // Jeff Zeleny - May 7, 2015 31

Democratic primary debates will still matter for Hillary Clinton // Chicago Tribune // Jonathan Bernstein - May 7, 2015 32

Hillary Clinton Hints Of Going Beyond Obama By Floating The Idea Of Debt Free College // Politicus USA // Jason Easley - May 7, 2015 33

The Billionaire Whose Clinton Foundation Ties Could Be Trouble for Hillary Clinton // Bloomberg // Joshua Green - May 7, 2015 34

Hillary Clinton's Hill Whisperer // National Journal // Sarah Mimms - May 7, 2015..... 37

Ja Rule just endorsed Hillary Clinton // Business Insider // Hunter Walker - May 7, 2015 40

Behind High Walls: Clinton Charity Moves Moroccan Party Out of View // ABC News // Matthew Mosk and Brian Epstein – May 7, 2015 40

Clinton 'fact-check' under fire // Washington Examiner // Sarah Westwood - May 7, 2015 41

How will top 2016 Republicans respond to Hillary Clinton immigration move? // Washington Examiner // Byron

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

York - May 6, 2015 44

Pennsylvania's Fight Over Paid Sick Days Could Be The Presidential Campaign's // Huffington Post Politics // Jonathan Cohn – May 7, 2015 46

Bill Clinton: We had the lowest net worth of any president entering office since Harry Truman // Politifact // Katie Sanders - May 7th, 2015 47

Hillary and the Burden of Clintonism // The Atlantic // Molly Ball – May 7, 2015..... 50

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 52

Trade Debate Gives Bernie Sanders a Chance to Put Hillary Clinton on the Hot Seat // Bloomberg // Heidi Przybyla - May 7, 2015 52

Martin O'Malley Hires Political Director Before Likely Run // New York Times // Maggie Haberman - May 7, 2015 54

Martin O'Malley Keeps On Baiting Hillary Clinton // Bloomberg Politics // Sahil Kapur - May 7, 2015 55

Can Elizabeth Warren Kill President Obama's Trade Deal? // TIME // Haley Sweetland Edwards - May 7, 2015 57

GOP..... 59

Rubio Headlines Fundraiser For Policy Group That Supports Conversion Therapy // Buzzfeed // Chris Geldner – May 7, 2015 59

Marco Rubio Campaigns on His Immigrant Story, Cautiously // New York Times // Jonathan Martin and Ashley Parker - May 7, 2015 60

'Underdog' Rick Santorum says he'll announce intentions May 27 // Politico // Nick Gass – May 7, 2015 63

Why Carly Fiorina is on a media blitz // CNN Politics // Chris Moody – May 7, 2015..... 64

Jeb Bush is Failing to Impress Iowa Republicans, Poll Shows // New York Times // Alan Rappeport - May 7, 2015 66

Jeb Bush Plans to Spend More Time in Iowa // New York Times // Alan Rappeport - May 7, 2015 66

One of Jeb Bush's top advisers on Israel: George W. Bush // Washington Post // Robert Costa and Matea Gold - May 7, 2015 67

T. Boone Pickens, With Cash, Backs Jeb Bush // New York Times // Alexandra Stevenson - May 7, 2015 69

Lindsey Graham Slams Hillary Clinton's New Immigration Proposal // Bloomberg Politics // Sahil Kapur - May 7, 2015 70

Lindsey Graham: '98.6% sure' to run, and on a different path on immigration // USA Today // Susan Page - May 7, 2015 71

Lindsey Graham looking at June 1 to announce White House run, sources say // Politico // Katie Glueck - May 7, 2015 72

Rand Paul praises 'monumental' NSA ruling // The Hill // Ben Kamisar - May 7, 2015.... 73

Paul, McConnell part ways on Patriot Act // The Hill // Julian Hattem - May 7, 2015..... 74

Chris Christie: Hillary Clinton 'pandering' on immigration // CNN Politics // Chris Moody - May 7, 2015 76

Christie Brings His Drug Treatment Message to New Hampshire // WSJ // Heather Haddon - May 7, 2015 77

Fiorina Comes Out Against TPP: 'I Am Very Uncomfortable With This Deal' // Daily Caller // Alex Griswold - May 7, 2015 78

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republican National Committee to share data with 2016 campaigns // Washington Examiner // David Drucker - May 7, 2015 79

AP-GfK Poll: Republicans open to softer immigration policy // The Big Story // Thomas Beaumont and Emily Swanson - May 7, 2015 80

TOP NEWS..... 82

DOMESTIC..... 82

N.S.A. Phone Data Collection Is Illegal, Appeals Court Rules // New York Times // Charlie Savage and Jonathan Weisman - May 7, 2015 82

FBI knew shooter might go to Muhammad drawing contest // Washington Post // Adam Goldman - May 7, 2015 85

Justice Department to launch federal investigation of Baltimore police // WaPo // Sara Horwitz – May 7, 2015 87

Tornadoes Hit Plains States, Battering Oklahoma // New York Times // The Associated Press - May 7, 2015 89

INTERNATIONAL..... 90

Senate Passes Bill Giving Congress Right to Weigh in on Iran Nuclear Deal // WSJ // Kristina Peterson - May 7, 2015 90

Exit poll: Conservatives running strong in Britain election // USA Today // Kim Hjelmgaard, Jane Onyanga-Omara, and John Bacon - May 7, 2015..... 93

Yemen Al Quaeda Leader Who Claimed Credit for Charlie Hebdo Attack Killed in U.S. Drone Strike // NBC News // Daniella Silva - May 7, 2015 95

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS..... 96

Hillary Clinton's eight questions // Politico // Hadas Gold - May 7, 2015..... 96

Hillary Clinton’s liberal lean on immigration — and what it means for 2016 // Washington Post // Philip Bump - May 7, 2015 96

The media's real role in 2016 // Politico // Dylan Byers - May 7, 2015..... 97

Meeting Hillary Clinton was like talking to a mentor // Iowa City Press-Citizen // Carter Bell Guest Opinion - May 6, 2015 99

‘I Gotta Pay Our Bills’ // WSJ // Daniel Henninger - May 6, 2015..... 100

The odd history of why the Clintons keep all their money in cash // WaPo Blog // Max Ehrenfreund - May 7, 2015 102

Debunking Hillary Clinton’s liberal ‘problem’ // WaPo Blog // Chris Cillizza – May 7, 2015 104

Clinton’s claim that no GOP candidate has consistently supported a path to citizenship // WaPo Blog // May 7, 2015 105

TODAY’S KEY STORIES

Hillary Clinton endorses NSA reform bill // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald - May 7, 2015

On the same day a federal court ruled against the National Security Agency’s bulk collection of telephone data,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton joined the White House in endorsing a bill to roll back mass surveillance.

“Congress should move ahead now with the USA Freedom Act — a good step forward in ongoing efforts to protect our security & civil liberties,” Clinton wrote on Twitter Thursday.

The USA Freedom Act would end the NSA’s bulk collection of data under the Patriot Act’s controversial Section 215. The section is set to expire June 1 unless Congress takes action, and momentum is building around the rollback measure.

The bill passed the House Judiciary Committee with a lopsided 25-2 vote, while a Senate version was recently introduced by a bipartisan group of lawmakers, led by libertarian Republican Mike Lee and senior Democrat Patrick Leahy.

However, a similar bill failed in Congress last year and opposition from hawkish Republicans in the Senate will likely force supporters to secure at least 60 votes as a means of overcoming a filibuster.

The White House also threw its support behind the bill this week. White House press secretary Josh Earnest has called bill “commonsense” reform and wrote on Twitter Thursday that President Obama thinks “Congress shld pass USA Freedom Act.”

Some civil libertarians say the bill doesn’t go nearly far enough, however, claiming that it only scratches the surface.

Earlier Thursday, a federal court in New York ruled that the NSA’s bulk data collection under Section 215 is illegal. It was the first such ruling and could set an important precedent.

Clinton left the State Department before NSA leaker Edward Snowden made the agency’s snooping a major political issue. But she has been asked about bulk collection since and tried to find a balance between defending the agency’s work and acknowledging the concerns of many Americans, especially in the Democratic base.

In April of last year, Clinton said Snowden’s leaks likely helped — “intentionally or unintentionally” — terror groups. “I have a hard time thinking that somebody who is a champion of privacy and liberty has taken refuge in Russia, under Putin’s authority,” she added, referring to Snowden.

When asked about the NSA during an appearance in Silicon Valley this year, Clinton called for reform. “Well, I think the NSA needs to be more transparent about what it is doing, sharing with the American people, which it wasn’t. And I think a lot of the reaction about the NSA, people felt betrayed,” she told Re/Code’s Kara Swisher at a tech conference.

Senate overwhelmingly approves Iran review bill in 98-1 vote // The Hill // Jordain Carney – May 7, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Senate voted overwhelmingly Thursday to approve legislation allowing Congress to review a nuclear deal with Iran in a 98-1 vote.

Sen. Tom Cotton (R-Ark.) was the only senator to oppose the bill. He said in a statement that he objected that the deal was not to be presented to the Congress as a treaty.

"A nuclear-arms agreement with any adversary—especially the terror-sponsoring, Islamist Iranian regime—should be submitted as a treaty and obtain a two-thirds majority vote in the Senate as required by the Constitution," he said.

The Senate bill would require a competed deal to be submitted to Congress, which could then vote to approve or disapprove the nuclear deal within 30 days. Sanctions on Iran could not be lifted during this consideration.

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Bob Corker (R-Tenn.), after the vote, suggested that passage of the bill allows Congress to take "power back" from President Obama. He also said it ensures the Congress will play "an appropriate role" in the nuclear talks.

Passage of the legislation clears the way for U.S. negotiators to continue to work on a nuclear deal with Iran ahead of a June 30 deadline with little fear of interference from Congress. Negotiators reached a framework agreement in April.

A vote to disapprove a nuclear deal with Iran would not kill it. President Obama could veto such a measure, and the House and Senate would then need two-thirds majorities to override his veto.

The administration initially opposed the legislation, arguing it could interfere with negotiations with Iran. The White House changed course after it became clear that the bill had strong support from Democrats.

The legislation will now move to the House. Speaker John Boehner (R-Ohio) suggested that passing the legislation would allow House lawmakers to "hold President Obama's administration accountable."

"This important, bipartisan legislation will ensure that Congress has a role in reviewing any potential agreement regarding Iran's nuclear weapons program," he said. "I applaud the Senate for passing this bill, and thank Sen. Bob Corker and others for their hard work. I look forward to House passage of this bill to hold President Obama's administration accountable."

The White House indicated it would sign the bill, as long as it is not changed with amendments opposed by the administration in the House.

"The president said he would sign it in its current form. The president also made clear if amendments were added to that bill that would endanger a deal coming together that prevented Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon that we would oppose it," White House spokesman Eric Schultz told reporters traveling on Air Force One.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ahead of the vote, several Republicans ripped the legislation negotiated by Corker and Sen. Benjamin Cardin (D-Md.), the ranking member on his panel.

Republicans also expressed frustrations that they could not offer more amendments to the bill.

Senate GOP Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) filed a motion to end debate after Sens. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) and Cotton tried to force a vote on an amendment requiring Iran to recognize Israel's right to exist as part of a final deal.

The move was a reversal of the open amendment process Republican leadership pledged to bring to the Senate.

McConnell said Thursday that he would have preferred that amendments be added to the bill, but that it might have invited a presidential veto.

“If we didn’t face the threats of filibusters, or the blocking of amendments, or the specter of presidential vetoes, this bill would be a heck of a lot stronger. I assure you,: he said. “But the truth is, we do. That’s the frustrating reality.”

Rubio slammed the decision not to allow his amendment requiring Iran to support Israel as part of a deal to come up for a vote, saying that some senators are "terrified" of voting against it.

"Apparently there are senators terrified of voting against that amendment, so they'd rather not have a vote at all. So I am deeply disappointed by the direction this has taken," he said.

But, he added that he would support the final bill, suggesting that it was better than nothing.

"At a minimum at least it creates a process whereby the American people through their representatives can debate an issue of extraordinary importance," he said. "So I hope this bill passes here today so at least we'll have a chance to weigh in."

Rubio's remarks separate him from his presidential rival Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) who said on Wednesday that the legislation is a "bad bill."

But Cruz voted in favor of the bill after voting against ending debate on it.

“I voted no on cloture because we should have insisted on amendments to put real teeth in this bill," the Texas Republican said. "Ultimately, I voted yes on final passage because it may delay, slightly, President Obama's ability to lift the Iran sanctions and it ensures we will have a Congressional debate on the merits of the Iran deal."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cruz was joined in voting against ending debate by fellow GOP Sens. Charles Grassley (Iowa), Tom Cotton (Ark.), Jerry Moran (Kansas), Mike Lee (Utah) and Dan Sullivan (Alaska).

Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) was absent for the vote.

The legislation has been a source of tension between congressional Democrats and the White House. Cardin, acknowledging that the hurdles he and Corker have had to overcome with the legislation, told reporters that "very few of you thought we would get a 98-1 vote on the floor of United States Senate, but we did."

This story was updated at 4:37 p.m.

State Department Plans No Review of Clinton Foundation Donations // AP // Matthew Lee - May 7, 2015

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The State Department says it has no plans to review previously undisclosed donations to a branch of the Clinton Foundation.

Some say the unreported private donations to the Clinton Health Access Initiative raise questions about potential conflicts of interest during former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton's time in office.

But State Department spokesman Jeff Rathke said Thursday that private contributions would not have been reviewed even if they had all been disclosed under the terms of ethics agreements Clinton signed before she took office. Only donations from foreign governments were subject to vetting.

Rathke said the department is aware of no evidence to support allegations of wrongdoing and would not "make a retroactive judgment about items that were not submitted" during Clinton's tenure.

What Trouble? Clinton Has Early Lock On Iowa Caucus, Quinnipiac University Poll Finds; Sanders, Biden Are Only Dems Over 3% // Quinnipiac University - May 7, 2015

With 60 percent of the vote among Iowa likely Democratic Caucus participants, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton has an early lock on the first-in-the-nation presidential test, apparently undamaged by a nationwide flood of negative publicity, according to a Quinnipiac University poll released today.

This compares to a 61 percent Clinton showing in Iowa in a February 26 survey by the independent Quinnipiac (KWIN-uh-pe-ack) University.

U.S. Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont has 15 percent among Democrats, with 11 percent for Vice President Joseph Biden and 3 percent each for former U.S. Sen. James Webb of Virginia and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley. Another 7 percent are undecided.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton and Biden each get 7 percent on the "no way" list when likely Democratic Caucus participants name a candidate they would "definitely not support." Sanders gets 6 percent.

Iowa Democrats say 76 - 17 percent that Clinton is honest and trustworthy, with Biden at 84 - 10 percent.

"One thing is obvious about Iowa Democratic Caucus participants: They are loyal as the day is long, at least when it comes to Hillary Clinton," said Peter A. Brown, assistant director of the Quinnipiac University Poll. "The former secretary of state has taken a major pounding in the news media and from her political opponents over her e-mail and family foundation. So far these criticisms have had absolutely no effect on her standing among Iowa Democrats.

"One other thing is slightly less obvious but interesting: By more than four-to-one, 76 - 17 percent, Iowa caucus-goers say Clinton is honest and trustworthy."

"When Quinnipiac University surveyed all Iowa voters last month, it found 49 - 43 percent they saw her as not honest and trustworthy. When it comes to analyzing Clinton's 2016 standing, it is important to keep straight who is talking," Brown added.

Iowa likely Democratic Caucus participants have an 83 - 11 percent favorable opinion of Clinton. Her positions on the issues are "about right," 70 percent of Democrats say. Likely caucus participants also say 93 - 6 percent that she has strong leadership qualities and 83 - 13 percent that she cares about their needs and problems.

Biden gets a 79 - 15 percent favorability rating from Iowa Democrats. His positions on the issues are "about right," 75 percent say. Democrats say 76 - 19 percent that he has strong leadership qualities and 85 - 10 percent that he cares about their needs and problems.

"Four in 10 Iowa likely Democratic Caucus participants aren't convinced about Clinton, but there is no candidate who appears to have the political and financial resources at this time to successfully take her on," Brown said. "Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont finished second in the caucus-goer poll, but that may reflect the news he was going to make the race, much of which occurred while this poll was being taken.

"Vice President Joseph Biden also makes it into double-digits, barely. Absent a change of events, numbers like those from Democratic core voters in Iowa make a strong statement: There may be a lot of talk about what Bill and Hillary Clinton have done since he left the presidency, but nothing has penetrated her base of support."

In fact, former President Bill Clinton scores an 87 - 10 percent favorability rating from Iowa likely Democratic Caucus participants, compared to President Barack Obama's 86 - 11 percent favorability.

From April 25 - May 4, Quinnipiac University surveyed 692 likely Iowa Democratic Caucus participants with a margin of error of +/- 3.7 percentage points. Live interviewers call land lines and cell phones.

The Quinnipiac University Poll, directed by Douglas Schwartz, Ph.D., conducts public opinion surveys in

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, Florida, Ohio, Virginia, Iowa, Colorado and the nation as a public service and for research.

Hillary Clinton says 'not one' GOP presidential contender backs path to citizenship // Politifact // Louis Jacobson - May 7, 2015

During a visit to a school in Nevada, Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton positioned herself as an uncompromising advocate for immigration -- and in the process, she took a shot at the Republican presidential field for not joining her.

"This is where I differ with everybody on the Republican side," Clinton said during the May 5, 2015, event. "Make no mistake: Not a single Republican candidate, announced or potential, is clearly and consistently supporting a path to citizenship. Not one. When they talk about legal status, that is code for second-class status."

We wondered whether Clinton was correct. So we took a look closer look at where the GOP field stands on the issue.

We'll start by noting that Clinton made some careful word choices here.

First, she explicitly distinguishes between eventual "citizenship" and a grant of "legal status." While those concepts are similar, they are not identical. Perhaps the biggest difference between the two is that citizens would be able to vote, while people with legalized status would not.

Second, Clinton emphasized that she's referring to Republican candidates who have "clearly and consistently" articulated support for a path to citizenship. That means she is discounting those who may have said they support citizenship on one or two occasions but have since stopped saying it or have said other things that would seem to undermine their commitment to that position.

We found that the other Republican candidates and potential candidates generally fell into one of three categories.

1. Those who unambiguously support a path to citizenship

We quickly found one exception to Clinton's formulation: Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., who isn't officially in the race but has said he's likely to run.

Graham -- who had been a leading Republican supporter of the "Gang of Eight" immigration legislation that passed the Senate but died in the House -- "has been clear about … his support for a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants that includes registering with the government, paying fines, learning English and undergoing background checks," Brittany Bramell, spokesperson for Security Through Strength, a pro-Graham group.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2. Those who have never supported a path to citizenship

Some GOP candidates or potential candidates do not appear to have ever explicitly articulated support for a path for citizenship. This list includes Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas, Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky, former CEO Carly Fiorina, former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, and former Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania.

3. Those who have expressed support for a path to citizenship but have since reversed themselves or expressed ambiguous views.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker. In 2013, Walker was asked by the Wausau Daily Herald, "Can you envision a world where, with the right penalties and waiting periods and meet the requirements, where those people could get citizenship?" He answered, "Sure. Yeah. I mean, I think it makes sense."

But in February 2015, Walker backed away from that stance, first on ABC's This Week and then, on March 1, 2015, in an interview with Fox News Sunday, when he said, "My view has changed. I'm flat out saying it. … Candidates can say that. Sometimes they don't." When Fox's Chris Wallace asked, "So, you've changed from 2013?" Walker said, "Absolutely."

Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee. Huckabee seemed to support citizenship during a book tour in January 2015. "I don't believe that it is a just thing to punish someone who had nothing to do with the breaking of the law. What I want to do is see what can we do to put that person in a position where they do abide by the law and become a citizen," Huckabee said. "I would like that person to become a very generous tax-paying citizen rather than somebody who is going to take taxes away from the rest of us."

However, this does not go as far as Clinton's position, and on other occasions, Huckabee has framed himself more of a critic of immigration. "A country that does not have secure borders is really not a country anymore," he said at the Iowa Agricultural Summit in March 2015.

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie. In 2010, Christie said on ABC's This Week that "the president and the Congress have to step up to the plate. They have to secure our borders, and they have to put forward a commonsense path to citizenship for people." But appearing on This Week in 2013, Christie sidestepped repeated questions about whether he still held the same view, saying, "I don't get to make those determinations."

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal. Jindal wrote in 2013 that "for folks who came here illegally but are willing to gain proficiency in English, pay a fine, and demonstrate a willingness to assimilate, we should require them to work here and pay taxes for a substantial period of time after obtaining legal status before they have the opportunity to begin the process of applying for U.S. citizenship." However, Jindal opposed the Senate bill that would have created a path to citizenship.

Physician Ben Carson. Carson has been widely quoted in the conservative media saying he would "of course allow (illegal immigrants) to have a pathway to citizenship. That's the only humane and reasonable thing to do." However, the time and place of that comment is not clear. It does get some support from this passage in Carson's 2012 book, America the Beautiful: "Is it moral for us, for example, to take advantage of cheap labor from illegal immigrants while denying them citizenship? I'm sure you can tell from the way I phrased the question that I believe we have taken the moral low road on this issue."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

However, since he's become a presidential candidate, Carson has articulated his position on immigration without referring to a path for citizenship, notably in a column for the National Review.

The candidates in this category who are hardest to characterize are the two from Florida, a state whose large population of immigrants makes immigration a somewhat touchier issue: former Gov. Jeb Bush and Sen. Marco Rubio.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush. As PolitiFact Florida has noted, Bush has flip-flopped extensively on the question of a path for citizenship during his long political career.

In the 2013 book Immigration Wars, Bush and his co-author Clint Bolick wrote that permanent residency "should not lead to citizenship. It is absolutely vital to the integrity of our immigration system that actions have consequences — in this case, that those who violated the laws can remain but cannot obtain the cherished fruits of citizenship."

But in the wake of the book's release, Bush backtracked. He supported the Senate bill that included a path to citizenship, and he told ABC's George Stephanopoulos that "the basic premise needs to be that coming to the country legally should be easier with less cost than coming to the country illegally. And if you can create a system like that — as is being discussed in the Senate and in the House — through a path to citizenship, that's fine."

As recently as March 2015, Bush told reporters during a visit to New Hampshire that he could support a path to citizenship. "If you could get a consensus done, where you could have a bill done, and it was 15 years (to achieve citizenship) as the Senate Gang of Eight did, I'd be supportive of that," he said.

However, he's also said some things contrary to that stance.

At a Politics and Eggs breakfast in New Hampshire in April 2015, Bush urged, "Deal with the folks who are here illegally in a rational, thoughtful way. My suggestion is earned legal status. Not earned citizenship, but earned legal status. You don't create a system where people cut in line in front of those who have been patiently waiting. But you get a provisional work permit, you work, you pay taxes, you pay a fine, you learn English, you don't commit crimes, and you earn — over an extended period of time — legal status."

A Bush campaign representative did not respond to inquiries for this article.

Sen. Marco Rubio. Rubio was one of the leading Republicans supporting the Senate immigration bill, which included a path to citizenship.

Asked for his reaction to Clinton's claim, Rubio spokesman Alex Conant referred us to several pieces of evidence.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

One was a January 2015 interview with the New York Times Magazine in which Rubio was asked, "Are you dropping the idea of citizenship for those who came here illegally?" He responded, "Once you have permanent residency, which is a green card, existing law allows you to apply for citizenship."

He echoed that stance in an interview with CBS's Face the Nation on April 19, 2015. "After a substantial period of time in that (work permit) status, assuming they haven't violated any of the conditions of that status, they would be allowed to apply for legal residency, just like anybody else would, not a special process," Rubio said. "And after you're a legal resident, after a number of years, by law, you're allowed to apply for citizenship."

However, at a National Review Institute event in May 2015, Rubio didn't use the term "citizenship." He said that after "securing the border" and "modernizing" the legal immigration system, "what you would get is the equivalent of a non-immigrant, non-permanent work visa to be in the U.S. and you would have to be in that status for a significant period of time. And at some point, if you choose, you could apply for permanent residency, but you'd have to do it through that modernized legal immigration system and you'd have to do it just like everybody else, not a special process or anything of that nature."

And some have raised questions about whether Rubio's proposal would be practical, given the long backlog in applications for legal residency -- 4.4 million people are awaiting green cards, according to the State Department.

Conant declined to respond specifically to whether Rubio fits into the category Clinton outlined.

As for the Clinton camp, spokesman Josh Schwerin indicated that all of the candidates in the third category aren't clearly supporting a path to citizenship, as Clinton put it. "Any candidate who is intentionally vague on the issue is, by definition, not clear and consistent in their support," he said.

Our ruling

Clinton said that "not a single Republican candidate, announced or potential, is clearly supporting a path to citizenship. Not one."

She's telling voters who want a path to citizenship that there's no one on the Republican side who supports that issue. That is not accurate. There is one -- Graham. She does have a point that the other dozen or so candidates either have never backed a path to citizenship or have sent mixed signals.

On balance, we rate Clinton's claim Mostly False.

SOCIAL MEDIA

Maggie Haberman (5/7/15 7:54AM)@maggieNYT . : @ByronYork on the trap Clinton set for Rs on immigration m.washingtonexaminer.com/how-will-top-2 …

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Amy Chozick (5/7/15 10:45AM) @amychozick : Iowa Democrats unfazed by criticism of Clinton. Nice look at her standing in the caucus state, by @arappeport nytimes.com/politics/first …

Ken Thomas (5/7/15) @KThomasDC : State Dept plans no review of Clinton Foundation donations, via @APDiploWriter bit.ly/1ET7rgy

Teddy Schleifer (5/7/15, 7:48 PM) @teddyschleifer: Contrary to previous report, @SaraMurray scoops that Jeb cited George W. as foreign policy, not Israel, adviser. | cnn.com/2015/05/07/pol …

Maggie Haberman (5/7/15 6:41) @maggieNYT Interesting - Priorities USA brings on Rafi Jafri, Dem fundraiser who'd worked for Clinton '08 and Ready for Hillary, per two sources

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE

Hillary Clinton Shows New Willingness to Tackle Risky Issues // New York Times // Patrick Healy - May 7, 2015

It has been only three weeks since Hillary Rodham Clinton declared her candidacy for the White House, but she already looks more confident than she did during the almost 17 months of her last campaign.

Sure, no serious rival has yet emerged to get under her skin the way Barack Obama did in 2008. But Mrs. Clinton and her team have also shown a determination not to be thrown off course: not by the blowback on her use of personal email while at the State Department, not by reports critical of the Clinton Foundation, nor by congressional investigations of the 2012 attacks in Benghazi, Libya.

Such flare-ups used to make Mrs. Clinton go cold and cautious. Now, she is projecting a scandals-be-damned attitude and barreling ahead with her agenda. In Las Vegas on Tuesday, she was unafraid to court controversy on an issue dear to her — families and children — by saying that she would go beyond President Obama's executive action on immigration and try to protect tens of thousands of parents who are still facing deportation.

It was a vivid contrast to a low point in 2007, at a Democratic primary debate, when she avoided taking a clear stand on an issue that was similarly divisive among voters: driver's licenses for illegal immigrants.

Mrs. Clinton's embrace of citizenship for many illegal immigrants, bold executive action and even those driver's licenses, which she endorsed recently, will allow her to play offense against Republican candidates who are divided on immigration.

What she does not say is that she used to side with many Republicans on some cultural and social issues. She now sees a constitutional right to same-sex marriage, for instance, after years of saying that marriage was only between a man and a woman.

It is not every day that a lawyer like Mrs. Clinton discovers a new constitutional protection, but Democratic primary voters increasingly favor same-sex marriage — and she is determined to catch up with them.

It may be early to jump to any "Hillary unbound" conclusions, and she has yet to engage in any freewheeling back and forth with reporters. But from her full-throated speech last week about ending mass incarceration to her bullish decision on Wednesday to court donors for a "super PAC," Mrs. Clinton has shown a new willingness to take stands that turn off some voters or interest groups.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This is a meaningful development. Mrs. Clinton twisted herself into knots during her last campaign when trying to mollify Democrats over her Iraq war vote without admitting any fault. After spending 2007 and 2008 refusing to apologize for events in Iraq, she now seems increasingly capable of saying what liberals want to hear.

“We are seeing a bolder and more confident candidate this time out,” said Geoffrey Garin, a Democratic strategist who worked on Mrs. Clinton’s first presidential bid. “As a result, I think voters are getting a much better look at the real Hillary Clinton.”

He continued, “At a similar point eight years ago, the mind-set of the Clinton campaign was to be cautious and avoid rocking the boat.”

Mrs. Clinton’s advisers, who were sometimes accused of overkill in defending her in the 2008 contest, are fighting back against opponents with a new tone and style intended to appear eminently reasonable.

Her lawyers are trying to strike a compromise with Representative Trey Gowdy, the Republican leading an investigation of the Benghazi attacks, to have her testify in public. A Clinton spokesman, Brian Fallon, appeared this week in a campaign video adopting a genial, Wally Cleaver manner as he attempted to eviscerate the new book “Clinton Cash” and the credibility of its author, Peter Schweizer.

The steadier hand is particularly noticeable to old Obama aides, who recall Mrs. Clinton as a more tactical than strategic-minded opponent in 2008.

“Her presidential campaign seems a lot less distracted by the day-to-day news stories than it was in 2008,” said Bill Burton, who was the press secretary for Obama’s first presidential campaign. “That means her ability to project a cleareyed focus on the American people is a lot more effective.”

Her near-term strategy, in the view of some Republicans and political analysts, is to catch up with the steady migration of many Democratic primary voters to the left wing of their party.

“Secretary Clinton has always run the campaign that she has politically calculated is the most advantageous for her at the time,” said Tim Miller, a spokesman for Jeb Bush, the former Florida governor and a likely Republican candidate. “She’s making a tactical choice that her best chance at winning is to protect her left flank from a challenge and run a divisive general election campaign.”

New opinion polls this week suggested that Mrs. Clinton’s approach is working, especially among Democrats. Americans now view her more favorably than they did earlier this year, despite weeks of critical reports about her use of personal email and about donations to the Clinton Foundation, according to a New York Times/CBS News poll. Four out of five Democrats say she is honest and trustworthy, and that she shares the values most Americans try to live by.

One important challenge will be following up on her rhetoric with policy details. After Mrs. Clinton’s remarks on immigration in Las Vegas, the White House press secretary, Josh Earnest, said that President Obama had used

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“as much authority as he could” to help parents and others facing deportation, and appeared at a loss about what more Mrs. Clinton might do.

Clinton advisers said on Wednesday that she wanted to try an additional approach of providing a new application process for some parents who are illegal immigrants to pursue a path toward citizenship.

It remains to be seen how this would work in practice, and what positions Mrs. Clinton will take on complex economic issues that she has barely begun to tackle. But her allies in the Democratic Party seem grateful to have so much now on which to agree with her.

“My sense is that she rightfully perceives a much better political landscape for her today than eight years ago,” said Carter Eskew, a Democratic political consultant who is not involved with her campaign.

“Then, voters were looking for a clean break from President Bush, and she carried the burden of voting for the Iraq war,” he continued. “In this cycle, voters seem to be much more focused on candidates with confidence, experience and perceived ability to get things done — which have always been her greatest strengths. Unless Republicans crack those, they may find running against her very frustrating.”

The Clintons’ Canadian Mining Pal Has Been Accused Of Double-Dealing Before // Daily Caller // Chuck Ross - May 6, 2015

Frank Giustra, the Canadian mining magnate and Clinton Foundation board member, has gone to great lengths recently to shoot down claims that his work with the former president presents a conflict of interest.

But a review of Canadian court documents and other records raises questions over whether Giustra is truly an above-the-board businessman.

The 57-year-old Giustra, who bears the haircut of Caesar, the stature of Napoleon, and was described to The Daily Caller as a “puppet-master,” has interests in a wide variety of industries — including the film industry and the olive oil business.

But his main interest is in mining, and he has made millions investing in shell companies in the industry and turning them for massive profit. Technically, Giustra is the CEO of Fiore Financial, but he is heavily involved and invested in numerous companies, including Endeavour Financial, and its offshoot, the Cayman Islands-based Endeavour Mining.

In Dec. 2008, Endeavour Financial and Rusoro Mining, a company controlled by Russian businessman Andre Agapov, attempted a hostile takeover of Gold Reserve Inc. (GRI), a mining company based in Spokane, Wash.

The rub was this: in 2004, GRI entered a contract with Endeavour in which it paid the company $1.2 million for consultation services while Endeavour had both equity and debt investments in the company. GRI alleged that it was not aware of Endeavour’s investment in Rusoro, and that the Giustra-controlled company breached its confidentiality and engaged in an obscene case of a conflict of interest.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Two Canadian judges sided with GRI in separate rulings in February and April 2009. Giustra and his right-hand man, Gordon Keep, were named by GRI in a lawsuit in 2010, and Endeavour and Rusoro eventually agreed to a multi-million dollar settlement with GRI in 2012.

Stanley Beck, an arbitrator and the former chair of the Ontario Securities Commission, offered scathing testimony during the case.

“I am not aware of any case in which the financial adviser of a company, who is subject to a confidentiality agreement, has subsequently appeared as the financial adviser to a hostile bidder for that same company,” Beck stated, according to court documents.

Another mining industry insider familiar with the companies and the lawsuit told The Daily Caller that Endeavour’s double-dealing was “unprecedented” and that Endeavour’s “financial advisory business suffered…because people were literally appalled.”

Endeavour Financial morphed into a mining company after the ruling, said the insider, who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

Partnership

Clinton’s first documented meeting with Giustra occurred in Jan. 2005 when the former president spoke via satellite for an event arranged by Giustra to discuss tsunami relief. By June, Clinton’s team reached out to Giustra to seek use of the tycoon’s luxurious MD-87 private jet.

“The plane is a business tool,” Giustra told The Globe and Mail in 2008. “No more, no less.”

Clinton has used that so-called business tool 26 times since meeting Giustra, according to The Washington Post. Giustra has accompanied Clinton on 13 of those trips.

Clinton and Giustra developed a closer partnership when, in Sept. 2005, they flew to Kazakhstan on Giustra Air. There Giustra negotiated a deal for a contract that gave one of his companies, UrAsia Energy, access to three uranium mines. Clinton and Giustra also met with Kazakh president Nursultan Nazarbayev, with whom Clinton claimed he wanted to discuss his philanthropic work on HIV/AIDS.

As author Peter Schweizer lays out in “Clinton Cash,” his book about the Clinton Foundation and its many wealthy donors, HIV/AIDS was a strange project for Clinton to undertake in Kazakhstan. As of 2005, only between 0.1 and 0.3 percent of the country’s population suffered from the disease.

After their meetings, Clinton issued a public statement in support of Nazarbayev. That backing was out of line with U.S. policy towards the dictator, who had just won an election with a 90-plus percent showing at the polls.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Weeks after the trip, Giustra donated $31 million to the Clinton Foundation.

But that was just a taste of what was to come. In 2007, Giustra pledged $100 million to form the Clinton-Giustra Sustainable Growth Initiative (CGSGI), which is now known as the Clinton-Giustra Enterprise (CGE) Partnership. The CGE Partnership also has a Canadian arm, which has been the recipient of millions of dollars in donations from “Friends of Frank,” as they are known.

The Clinton-Giustra Kazakhstan trip was reported by The New York Times in 2008 and is revisited in detail in Schweizer’s “Clinton Cash.”

The book, and another Times article, furthered the story by tying together Giustra’s UrAsia to Uranium One, which was eventually absorbed by Russia’s energy agency, Rosatom. Hillary Clinton’s State Department, and other agencies, approved a series of stock transactions that allowed Rosatom to acquire a majority stake in Uranium One. The deal enriched a number of Giustra associates (and Clinton donors) and helped put 20 percent of U.S. uranium deposits under Russian control.

Giustra and the Clintons were also together in Bogota in June 2010 when Hillary made a major concession to Colombian president Álvaro Uribe.

Giustra, who had business interests in Colombia’s oil, mining and timber industries, first met Uribe in 2005 at a Clinton Global Initiative function.

In 2007, Giustra formed a Colombian oil company, Pacific Rubiales, which proceeded to grow at a phenomenal rate. The company was able to purchase an oil company with close ties to the Colombian government that had just been made private. The Colombian government also granted Pacific the rights to build a pipeline.

In July 2007, Pacific Rubiales announced that it was donating $2.2 million to the new CGSGI. Matching funds would be provided by other longtime Giustra associates — companies like Canaccord and GMP Securities, which have underwritten numerous Giustra deals.

According to a press release in which Giustra is quoted, the $4.4 million total pledge amounted to one percent of the $440 million raised by Pacific Rubiales to continue its Colombian crude oil operations.

While Giustra stated that the Pacific Rubiales deal and the one percent donation “shows other companies how they can help make a real difference in developing countries,” the company has been accused of using heavy-handed tactics to thwart labor strikes.

Whether because of the Pacific Rubiales consortium’s donations to the Clinton Foundation or because of the dictates of U.S. policy, Hillary Clinton helped Pacific Rubiales’ interests.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In June 2010, Giustra, Bill and Hillary Clinton traveled to Colombia and held separate meetings with Uribe. After a morning meeting with Bill, Uribe met with Hillary several hours later. In that meeting, she expressed support for a U.S.-Colombia trade agreement, a reversal of her position from the 2008 presidential campaign trail.

In doing so, the U.S. relieved pressure on Colombia to improve its human rights records, especially in the realm of labor relations.

The gist of “Clinton Cash,” which has led to a massive, coordinated rebuttal from the Hillary Clinton presidential campaign, is that without the access that only Clinton could provide, Giustra would not have met leaders like Uribe or Nazarbayev who may have helped his business dealings. And without Giustra, Clinton would not have the convenience of a private luxury jet or to millions of dollars of donations from wealthy Canadian miners.

“My money is more effective backing Clinton than any other person I can think of on this planet,” Giustra told The Globe and Mail in 2008.

Non-disclosure

The Clintons have denied that the appearance of quid pro quo is not as it appears. Giustra has done the same.

“I sold all of my stakes in the uranium company – Uranium One – in the fall of 2007, after it merged with another company,” Giustra said after The Times published its report on the Kazakh deal last month.

While it may be true that Giustra does not directly hold Uranium One stock, he is still tied to the company through his investments in other mining companies and mining financiers. Many of his close associates were still closely involved in Uranium One well into Hillary Clinton’s tenure at the State Department.

Ian Telfer, who was the chairman of Uranium One when it was acquired by Rosatom, donated $2.35 million to the Canadian arm of the Clinton Foundation through his charity, the Fernwood Foundation.

Frank Holmes, the CEO of U.S. Global Investors, held $4.7 million in shares with Uranium One as of 2011. He donated between $250,000 and $500,000 to the Clinton Foundation. Neil Woodyer, who was an adviser to Uranium One and founded Endeavour Mining with Giustra, donated between $50,000 and $100,000 to the foundation.

Many of the companies and their executives are likely among the 1,100 donors that the Clinton Foundation has admitted were not disclosed. That despite a promise the Clintons made in 2008 to disclose all of its donors.

A July 2013 archived page from the Clinton-Giustra Sustainable Growth Initiative website sheds some light on what companies have donated to and sponsored the Canadian wing.

The list includes names like Endeavour Mining, Gold Fields, Gran Colombia Gold, Pacific Rubiales, Rusoro, and, curiously, Uranium One.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GMP Securities and Holmes' U.S. Global Investors are also listed as sponsors. Both companies, described to TheDC as being part of a "triumvirate" along with Endeavour, have helped arrange financing deals for Giustra's numerous mining industry deals and were involved in the Uranium One deal.

A request for comment sent to Giustra's Fiore Financial email account was not returned. The Clinton-Giustra Enterprise Partnership also did not respond to a request for comment.

The Canadian arm of the foundation has claimed that Canadian law prohibits the disclosure of donors without their permission, though the claim has been widely disputed.

In denying the appearance of quid pro quo, both Clinton and Giustra say they have respect for each others' commitment to humanitarian causes. Though as The Globe and Mail noted in its 2008 Giustra profile: "until a few years ago, [Giustra] had only dabbled in philanthropy, funneling to local charities and organizing the occasional fundraiser."

Rusoro-Gold Reserve dispute

If Giustra's interests vis a vis Clinton are not conflicted, the same cannot be said about his dealings with Gold Reserve Inc. and Rusoro.

Giustra was the chairman of Endeavour Financial from 2001 to 2007 and is currently a major shareholder and a board member of Endeavour Mining, which is closely related to Endeavour Financial. The two entities share many of the same personnel, and Giustra's Fiore Financial reportedly shares office space with Endeavour. A recent financial disclosure shows that Giustra holds 6.8 million shares of Endeavour Mining.

Giustra also made the initial pitch to GRI seeking its consulting business, a source familiar with the dealings told TheDC.

"Nobody would do a thing if Frank didn't approve," the source said.

At the time, GRI was one of only two companies with gold mining stakes in Venezuela. The company had invested $230 million since 1993 developing what is known as the Brisas Project.

In Oct. 2004, the company entered a confidential consulting arrangement with Endeavour. The arrangement allowed Endeavour to have access to confidential data related to GRI's finances, operations, and technical specifications for the Brisas prospect.

And the prospect had huge potential. According to GRI's website, the mine contained as much as 10 million ounces of gold and 1.4 billion pounds of copper.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Giustra first approached GRI about a merger with Rusoro in the fall of 2006, though, according to GRI, he did so "without disclosing that both he and Endeavour had a financial interest in Rusoro."

Endeavour owned 7.5 million shares of Rusoro, 7 million stock warrants, and had loaned the company $10 million. Endeavour would also reap 5.5 million shares if the deal went through, according to court documents.

According to the source familiar with the attempted deal, Rusoro's Agapov, who had been implicated in a 2002 Thai banking scandal, believed that he held an advantage because of his Russian nationality. He believed that would give Rusoro an advantage in dealing with Venezuela's communist dictator Hugo Chavez, who was on friendlier terms with Russia than with the West.

According to court documents, Doug Belander, GRI's president, also later testified that in 2007 he was told by representatives from New York investment banks that Giustra and Agapov had "expressed an interest" in combining Gold Reserve and Endeavour.

But GRI wasn't interested.

The first takeover attempt came on Aug. 21, 2008, when Endeavour — curiously — placed a friendly takeover offer on behalf of Rusoro. But to the surprise of Rusoro and Endeavour, GRI balked, saying it had no interest in joining up with Rusoro, which GRI executives believed to be in poor financial health.

In Dec. 2008, Rusoro took a different approach by announcing that it was launching a hostile takeover. GRI shareholders weren't interested either.

That month, GRI filed a lawsuit in Canadian court accusing Endeavour of breaching its confidentiality and of using information it had through the consulting contract to help Rusoro in its takeover attempt.

In a Feb. 2009 ruling, one judge with the Ontario Circuit Court ruled that the case raised "a serious issue that Endeavour improperly preferred the interests of its client Rusoro to those of its client Gold Reserve."

That ruling included the testimony from Stanley Beck, who was then the chairman of GMP Securities, which had done business with Endeavour. Beck stated that during his three-plus decades in the securities industry he had not seen another case of double-dealing like the one undertaken by Endeavour and Rusoro.

Neil Woodyer, the CEO of Endeavour Mining, a longtime business associate of Giustra's and a Clinton Foundation donor, denied any wrongdoing on Endeavour's part.

"Endeavour Financial did not breach its confidentially with Gold Reserve," he told TheDC through email.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Woodyer did not address questions about Giustra's level of involvement in Endeavour or the bid for GRI.

Despite Woodyer's denial, Endeavour and Rusoro settled with GRI in Sept. 2012.

In the settlement, Endeavour agreed to pay $1.5 million (Canadian) — more than the money it received through the consulting contact with GRI — while Rusoro agreed to pay $250,000 in cash, 2.5 million shares of common stock, and a conditional promissory note worth $1 million.

In the end, GRI did not get to mine for gold and copper in Venezuela. The Brisas project sits idle, while small-time prospectors rake through minerals easily found on the surface.

In May 2008, Chavez's regime nationalized the mining industry. But the country is stuck because GRI secured all technical data related to the mine when it was kicked off of the plot. It would take up to 10 years for another entity to collect that data so that mining could begin.

Meanwhile, GRI has been awarded a $750 million default judgement against Venezuela and awaits payment.

Why Clinton's immigration speech left many Republican rivals speechless // Washington Post // David Nakamura and Robert Costa - May 7, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton's fighting words on immigration this week, designed in part to provoke Republicans into a reactionary counterattack, instead drew an unusual early response from several top-tier GOP presidential candidates: silence.

Two days after Clinton vowed to expand on President Obama's executive actions to shield up to 5 million undocumented immigrants from deportation, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker was one of the only leading Republican 2016 contenders to strike back, calling it a "full embrace of amnesty" that is "unfair to hard-working Americans."

By contrast, former Florida governor Jeb Bush, Sen. Marco Rubio (Fla.), Sen. Rand Paul (Ky.) and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie did not weigh in publicly on the remarks Clinton made Tuesday at a campaign stop in Las Vegas. Sen. Ted Cruz (Tex.), one of Obama's most vocal critics on immigration, waited to make a late evening post on Facebook, writing that Clinton "wants to expand and continue" Obama's programs and "lawlessness."

Former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee told MSNBC that Clinton was wrong, saying the country needs to focus on border security first.

The relatively subdued GOP reaction illustrated a dilemma for a Republican Party still wrestling with the hot-button issue of immigration three years after Obama routed Mitt Romney behind overwhelming support from Latinos and Asian Americans.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Although virtually all of the Republican hopefuls have denounced Obama's executive actions, which are wildly unpopular with the GOP's conservative base, they recognize that staking out a hard-line immigration position probably would harm their status with two of the fastest-growing subsets of the electorate. In 2012, Romney advocated "self-deportation" for illegal immigrants, earning him scorn from Latino groups.

"The waters are treacherous, which explains the muted response," said William J. Bennett, education secretary under President Ronald Reagan and now a talk-radio host. "Not one of the campaigns, with the exception of Jeb Bush, have full clarity on where they want to go, and people are doing a lot of moving."

Fergus Cullen, a former chairman of the Republican Party in New Hampshire, home to the first-in-the-nation primary, was even blunter, blaming his compatriots with not putting the issue of immigration reform behind them. House Republicans last summer refused to vote on a bipartisan border control bill, approved by the Senate, that included a 13-year path to citizenship for illegal immigrants.

"Republicans' intransigence has created an obvious opportunity for Hillary to rip off our arms and beat us with the bloody ends," Cullen said. "She's expertly exploiting our party's internal problems."

Last year, Obama delayed his executive actions until after the midterm elections at the behest of jittery Senate Democrats, only to see the party lose control of the chamber anyway. Now, Clinton's enthusiastic embrace of Obama's immigration actions so early in the election cycle has been an unequivocal sign that Democrats, once wary of an issue former Obama chief of staff Rahm Emanuel has called the "third rail of American politics," may believe that immigration is a golden ticket to electoral-college success.

During her appearance in Las Vegas — where a growing Latino population helped power Obama to a 2012 victory in Nevada — Clinton again backed a path to citizenship, and said she would potentially go further than the president to protect immigrants from deportation until Congress reforms border control laws. She goaded Republicans, saying they are supporting "second-class status" for illegal immigrants.

Her pitch to the left was so emphatic that White House aides, who had said Obama's executive actions in November represented the limit of his legal authority, were compelled to defend him Wednesday for not going further.

"The president's views have not changed," White House press secretary Josh Earnest said during his daily briefing when asked whether Obama believed he could do more in light of Clinton's announcement. Asked whether her pledge to expand the deportation relief would hold up legally, Earnest added, "That's something for a future president and future courts to decide."

Public polling has shown split views on Obama's immigration actions. In a Washington Post-ABC News poll in January, 41 percent said the actions should go forward and 56 percent said they should be blocked. But support among Hispanics for the president's initiatives was 80 percent, compared with 28 percent among whites.

Other surveys have showed higher levels of overall support for allowing illegal immigrants to remain in the country and work and to eventually apply for citizenship.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That has presented difficulties for Republican contenders who have struggled to articulate a clear vision on immigration reform.

“One of the biggest challenges we’ve had with Hispanic voters is that we’re defined by what we’re against rather than what we’re for,” said Kevin Madden, a former Romney adviser. “We created a lot of problems for ourselves in 2012 when we had an immigration platform that was defined by ‘self-deportation’ and expected to win their support.”

Bush, who is the former governor of a state with a large Hispanic population and whose wife is Mexican American, has endorsed a path to legal status for the undocumented, but he has pledged to overturn Obama’s executive actions.

Rubio, the son of Cuban immigrants, helped negotiate the Senate’s immigration bill last year but backed away after House conservatives killed it. And Walker has said his views on immigration have changed since he previously voiced support for a citizenship plan.

In a statement, Walker said Wednesday that Clinton’s position “is unfair to hardworking Americans and all immigrants who followed the law to achieve the rights and privileges afforded to U.S. citizens. And by supporting the president’s lawless executive action, Hillary Clinton once again believes she’s above the law.”

Immigration advocates have delighted in Clinton’s proactive move, noting that it was perhaps most vexing for Bush, who has sought to position himself as slightly more moderate among the GOP field on immigration.

“He has been going on two years of going back and forth on the question of citizenship: What’s doable? What’s viable in his party?” said Marshall Fitz, vice president of immigration policy at the left-leaning Center for American Progress. “But he hasn’t formally stuck to his guns on what is the right thing to do, and she called him out on it.”

Republican political strategists, trying to look for an upside, suggested that as Clinton shifts to the left, her candidacy risks seeming emblematic of a third Obama term.

“She’s boxing them in a little, but she’s also linking herself more significantly to Obama,” said Ed Rollins, a veteran Republican consultant. “If his approval ratings are above 50 percent next year, it’s smart. If they’re below 50 percent, she won’t do well.”

Peyton M. Craighill, Anne Gearan, Jenna Johnson, Sean Sullivan and Katie Zezima contributed to this report.

Clarification: This article originally stated that Sen. Ted Cruz’s response was made through an aide. He issued his own statement late Wednesday.

Poll: Hillary Clinton strong in Iowa despite email, foreign cash flaps // Politico // Nick Gass - May 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton remains the overwhelming favorite among likely Iowa Democratic caucus-goers, according to a new Quinnipiac University poll released Thursday, despite ongoing scrutiny of foreign donations to her family's foundation and lingering criticism over the former secretary of state's use of a personal cellphone and email server for official business.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Among likely participants in the Democratic caucus, 60 percent said they would back Clinton, compared with 61 percent who said they would support her in a Feb. 26 Quinnipiac survey that came out before reports of her use of a private email address.

Independent Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders comes in second with 15 percent, followed by Vice President Joe Biden with 11 percent. Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb trail with 3 percent each. Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren, who has said repeatedly that she is not running, was not included.

By more than 4 to 1, Iowa voters say Clinton is honest and trustworthy — 76 percent to 17 percent. By comparison, 84 percent say Biden is honest and trustworthy, versus 10 percent who say he is not.

"One thing is obvious about Iowa Democratic Caucus participants: They are loyal as the day is long, at least when it comes to Hillary Clinton," said Peter Brown, assistant director of the Quinnipiac University Poll. In a Quinnipiac poll last month, however, 49 percent of all Iowa voters said they did not think she was honest or trustworthy.

The poll was conducted April 25-May 4, surveying 692 likely Iowa Democratic caucus participants via land lines and cellphones with a margin of error of plus or minus 3.7 percentage points.

WMUR Poll: Clinton trails or tied with five top Republicans // WMUR // John DiStaso - May 7, 2015

DURHAM, N.H. —In five of the last six presidential general elections, including the last three, the Democratic nominee has won New Hampshire's four electoral votes. That's not a sure thing for 2016, according to the results of a new WMUR Granite State Poll.

Hillary Clinton trails or is in virtual ties with Republicans Jeb Bush, Rand Paul, Scott Walker, Marco Rubio and Ted Cruz, the poll of 706 randomly selected adults shows. That's a sharp change from just three months ago, when the former secretary of state held comfortable leads over all five of those announced or likely candidates.

The decline in Clinton's showing in head-to-head matchups since February mirrors a drop in her favorability rating even among likely Democratic primary voters from a plus-74 percent in February to a plus-58 percent in the new poll, taken April 24 to May 3.

The new poll, conducted by the University of New Hampshire Survey Center, also shows that Granite Staters are aware of the controversy surrounding Clinton's exclusive use of a personal email account to conduct official business, although most said it would make little difference in their votes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The poll shows that former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and Florida Sen. Marco Rubio fare the best against Clinton among the top five candidates in this week's GOP primary poll.

Bush leads Clinton 47 to 41 percent, while Rubio leads her, 47 to 42 percent. Bush holds a strong lead over Clinton among independents, 39 to 22 percent, while independents are split between Clinton and Rubio, with Clinton leading 33 to 31 percent.

The margin of error in the poll is 3.7 percent.

Granite Staters also favor Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul over Clinton, 47 to 43 percent, with independents favoring Paul, 43 to 36 percent. Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and Clinton are in a dead heat, at 44 percent each, with independents favoring Clinton, 36 to 28 percent.

Voters are also split between Clinton and Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, with Clinton leading, .

46 to 45 percent. Independents are split among the two, with 37 percent favoring Clinton and 35 percent favoring Cruz.

The poll further showed that 45 percent of likely general election voters said they have heard a great deal about the Clinton email use issue, while 32 percent have heard a fair amount, 14 percent have heard a little and 8 percent have heard nothing.

But 59 percent of those likely voters said the issue makes little difference in their vote, 34 percent said they are less likely to vote for her because of it, 2 percent they are actually more likely to vote for her and 4 percent were unsure.

The results show a wide gender gap, with women heavily backing Clinton over all five Republicans and men strongly supporting the Republicans.

Among the likely general election voters, 10 percent said they have definitely decided who to support, 18 percent are leaning toward someone and 73 percent are still trying to decide.

Hillary Clinton pushes the limits of campaign finance law // LA Times // Evan Halper - May 7, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton's campaign team had hoped to frame her trip hopscotching through the mansions of some of California's deepest-pocketed donors this week as an exercise in modesty, highlighting the relatively low price of a ticket to the events as a reflection of her commitment to cultivating the grass roots.

But that narrative quickly unraveled Wednesday when word got out that the candidate was also using the California trip as an occasion to begin courting an entirely different group.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton, who has emphasized campaign finance reform in the early stage of her latest White House bid, has apparently already decided the modest approach alone won't be enough. She is going after much bigger checks, much sooner, and in a much more aggressive way than her campaign had revealed.

The candidate will be pushing the boundaries of campaign finance law further than any Democratic presidential contender ever has by directly asking donors to give to a friendly "super PAC" that can raise unlimited amounts of campaign cash from donors, according to a person familiar with her plans. That effort started in California on Wednesday, when Clinton met in San Francisco with potential donors of the organization Priorities USA. She has another meeting planned in Los Angeles on Thursday.

Clinton’s plans to raise money for Priorities USA was first reported by the New York Times. Campaign officials are declining to comment.

Clinton would not be the first contender in this year's race to go after such cash. Republicans are already testing the limits of campaign finance law. Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, who has yet to announce he's running, has been soliciting checks for as much as $1 million for his super PAC. Candidates avoided such activity in the 2012 race, adhering to a law that says they can not coordinate directly with the groups.

But the increasingly permissive nature of the Federal Election Commission, whose members are deadlocked over the question of how candidates can and cannot engage with super PACs, is leading the candidates to take ever bolder approaches. Clinton supporters say she is caught up in a campaign arms race and she has no choice but to use the tools her opponents have at their disposal.

Still, the quick shift on fundraising puts Clinton in an awkward position.

“Just three weeks ago, Hillary Clinton decried unaccountable money in politics and even called for amending the Constitution to ban it,” said Jeff Bechdel, communications director for America Rising, a conservative research group. “Today, she announced she’s going to personally court donors and raise money for her own super PAC. … Clinton’s hypocrisy knows no bounds."

The California trip was supposed to be a chance for Clinton to showcase a more modest approach to fundraising, one that squared with what she promised would be a campaign that is humble, lean and focused on the values of everyday Americans. Even though the events were to be held in the homes of billionaires and mega-millionaires, including hedge fund titan Tom Steyer and media mogul Haim Saban, donors were not to give more than $2,700.

Those who want to give more than $2,700 can encourage others to give checks, becoming what's known as a campaign bundler. Clinton's campaign calls its bundlers “Hillstarters," and those designated as such get perks that include invites to receptions with the candidate. Clinton is making it much easier to get in this circle of fundraisers than she did eight years ago, when supporters had to raise $100,000. Now, they need only generate $27,000 for the campaign.

“It’s a far smaller bundling program than other presidential campaigns and is designed to involve more people and build the donor base," said a campaign aide.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But that effort to engage a larger group of donors early on and set a tone of relative modesty got overshadowed quickly, as donors pushed the candidate to seize the momentum from her announcement and start collecting big checks from big donors eager to write them.

Why Hillary Clinton Embraced Big Money in Politics // NBC News // Perry Bacon, Jr. - May 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton surprised the political world when on her first campaign stop as an official candidate in Iowa last month she said reforming America's campaign finance system would be one of her top priorities. The next week, in New Hampshire, Clinton said it wasn't enough simply to have the names of big donors disclosed, but that there needed to be real limits on how much they can spend on campaigns.

"What good does it do to disclose if somebody's about to spend $100 million to promote their own interest and to defeat candidates who would stand up against them? What good does that do?" Clinton told Democratic activists in Concord, New Hampshire.

She added, "We need to get this corporate and unchecked money out of politics."

But as the New York Times reported on Wednesday, Clinton is not going to practice what she seemed to be preaching. The former secretary of state is meeting with potential donors to Priorities USA, the Democratic super PAC, on a trip to California this week, the first sign of her sanctioning of the group to aid her campaign. Priorities, like the super PAC's that are aiding Republican 2016 candidates, is expected to bring in donations from individuals that will be hundreds of thousands or even millions of dollars. Steven Spielberg gave the group $1 million in 2012.

Clinton is embracing Priorities USA more than President Obama did during his 2012 campaign. In that race, the president, another rhetorical opponent of unlimited donations in politics, allowed some of his top aides to attend the Priorities' events, but did not go to them himself. Obama did appear at an event for Senate Majority PAC, a super PAC designed to aid Democratic U.S. Senate candidates, on the eve of the 2014 elections.

Republicans have already slammed Clinton as a hypocrite, and one of her Democratic primary opponents, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, has pledged not to have a super PAC supporting his candidacy.

But Clinton really had no other choice. The Republican presidential nominee, the Republican National Committee and groups associated with electing a Republican president are expected to spend at least $1 billion and probably closer to $2 billion to elect a GOP president. Democrats will attempt to match this fundraising, if not raise more.

Under the traditional campaign finance spending rules, individual donations to campaigns are limited to $5400. But contributions to super PAC's are unlimited.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Republican candidates, particularly Jeb Bush, are expected to operate much of their campaign operations through their super PAC's. So if Clinton had opted only to raise money through the legal limits, she would be running a campaign raising $5400 per person, while Bush is currently accepting individual donations to his super PAC of $100,000. Clinton in effect would have needed 18 donors for every one Bush donor.

This would not create just a financial disadvantage for Clinton, but perhaps one of time as well, since she would need to spend more hours attending fundraisers and soliciting money over the phone if she needed to build up a larger bloc of donors.

It's not clear how far Clinton will go in embracing super PAC's. Republican candidates Ted Cruz, Rand Paul and Marco Rubio have some of their top aides operating their super PAC's instead of working on their official campaigns, making the super PAC's hugely influential.

So far, the vast majority of Clinton's top strategists are working in her Brooklyn headquarters, so it's not clear if Priorities USA will employ her closest confidants. And Clinton's super PAC has not said if will raise tens of millions from one major donor, the way casino magnate Sheldon Adelson gave more than $20 million to bankroll Newt Gingrich's 2012 campaign.

However she uses the Super PAC, Clinton made the choice to play by the existing rules of politics, instead of taking a more principled stand that likely would have complicated her path to victory. In 2008, Obama made a similar decision in opting out of campaign finance rules that would have placed limits on his overall spending, even though he had praised that system before.

Clinton, like Obama, is participating in what she has bemoaned: a radical shift of the campaign finance system created in the post-Watergate era that was designed to limit the influence of wealthy donors and encourage campaigns funded by a wider bloc of Americans. The 2016 campaign marks in effect the death of that system and a shift towards a new model in which a very small group of wealthy donors finance many campaigns and will likely have a huge amount of influence over the candidates.

Clinton has said she does not like this new system and would consider backing even a constitutional amendment to change it.

But her embrace of the liberal super PAC suggests, Clinton, in a phrase she used during her last campaign, is in to win.

Hillary Clinton's Not the First Democrat to Woo Super-PAC's Donors // Bloomberg Politics // Ali Elkin - May 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton is preparing to cozy up to super-PAC donors, according to a new report, but it's not exactly a first for a Democratic presidential candidate.

As the New York Times wrote on Thursday, “Clinton will begin personally courting donors for a 'super PAC' supporting her candidacy, the first time a Democratic presidential candidate has fully embraced these independent groups that can accept unlimited checks from big donors and are already playing a major role in the 2016 race."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Running for re-election in 2012, President Obama reluctantly endorsed fund-raising by [Priorities USA Action] because of fears that he would be outspent by Republicans who were more aggressive in using what was then a new vehicle for raising large amounts of money that could be used in support of a campaign but not go directly to it," the Times continued. "But he never appeared at any of its fund-raisers."

But Obama did rub shoulders with donors at a Priorities function during his reelection bid, according to Double Down: Game Change 2012, the campaign book by Bloomberg Politics managing editors Mark Halperin and John Heilemann. They write that in October of that year, Obama went to an event at film executive and Democratic bundler Jeffrey Katzenberg's house in Los Angeles. The White House billed the event as a "thank you" to big donors, but in reality, it was a Priorities USA event—"the sort of shindig that Obama had sworn never to attend."

Katzenberg billed it as "unobtainium" and recommended that attendees shell out $1 million to attend. Three of them did a few days before the lunch. The final guest list included Reid Hoffman, Irwin and Joan Jacobs, Vinod Khosla, Seth McFarlane, Sean Parker, Eric Schmidt, and Steven Spielberg. At the event, Obama assured the donors that his sorry debate performance in Denver was a one-time thing.

First on CNN: Clinton invites donors to New York, but only if they've hit their goals // CNN Politics // Jeff Zeleny - May 7, 2015

Washington (CNN) Hillary Clinton is inviting her most loyal fundraisers to New York next week for the campaign's first Finance Leadership Summit, but there's a catch: The welcome mat is extended only to donors who have already met their goal of finding 10 people to write $2,700 checks.

The invitation, which was obtained by CNN from a recipient, illustrates how the campaign is trying to step up the urgency for fundraising. If contributors hope to be part of the inaugural group of so-called "Hillstarters," the invitation says, their first fundraising goal must be met now.

The initial fundraising goal of $27,000 -- a pittance in a campaign expected to raise more than $1 billion -- is intentionally set low by today's big-money standards to try a build a broader nationwide network of donors.

The afternoon summit on May 14 in New York, which includes an optional tour of campaign headquarters in Brooklyn, features Clinton and her senior team of advisers. It's the most robust gathering of donors since Clinton formally entered the race one month ago.

Without a highly competitive Democratic primary race, the campaign has struggled to capture the early attention of some donors. Clinton's presence at the summit underscores the point that donors will be remembered for getting in on the ground floor.

"On behalf of Hillary and the entire campaign," the invitation says, "we thank you for your early support and leadership and we hope to see you in New York on May 14!"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton has already devoted more days raising money than meeting Democrats in early-voting states. She held three fundraising events in Los Angeles alone on Thursday, part of a three-day visit to California this week. She's already done early fundraising stops in New York and Washington.

"There's a lot of enthusiasm," Andy Spahn, a longtime Democratic fundraiser in Los Angeles, told CNN. "There is a tremendous desire to be a part of it."

Spahn, a political adviser to entertainment mogul Jeffrey Katzenberg and others who ultimately sided with Barack Obama in the 2008 campaign, said Democratic donors were largely unified behind Clinton.

In the first month of her candidacy, Clinton has campaigned in Iowa, New Hampshire and Nevada, three of the four early-voting states. She is set to visit South Carolina, the fourth, soon. Before the end of May, aides said, she will also deliver the first major campaign speech.

Her calendar also includes something outside her control: An appearance before the House Select Committee on Benghazi, which is also expected in the coming weeks.

Democratic primary debates will still matter for Hillary Clinton // Chicago Tribune // Jonathan Bernstein - May 7, 2015

The Democrats have announced they will sponsor six presidential nomination debates, and Hillary Clinton rapidly signaled her intention to participate.

Nomination debates (unlike those during the general election) can affect the outcomes of primaries — just ask Rick Perry. We aren't only talking about collapses. A good performance can cause a polling surge, and lesser-known contenders need a shot of good publicity at some point, even if they have won support in the invisible primary. For any of that to make a difference, however, it has to be a competitive race.

From what we know so far, it would take something far more substantial than a few debates to reopen the battle for the Democratic nomination in 2016. Yet Clinton's performance in the debates will count in a different and important way.

Set aside the primaries. Think about the debates as part of the process of representation in a democracy.

People who run for office make promises: They signal who they will be and how they will act if elected. Not only do politicians want to keep the pledges they have made on specific policies. They try to be generally in sync with who they were on the campaign trail too, as political scientist Richard Fenno found in his research on Congress. So a candidate who runs as a partisan will try to govern as a partisan. A candidate who runs as a conservative will govern as a conservative. A candidate who runs as a member of an ethnic group will, if elected, emphasize group identity.

Even if new issues arise out of the blue (and they always will), the president will in effect ask herself: What would the version of me from the campaign do about this? How will I be able to explain what I do now in terms of who I was back then?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Moreover, the promises that count the most are likely the ones made in the candidates' high-profile appearances. For presidential nominees, the biggest such events are convention acceptance speeches and the general-election debates in the fall. But before that, nomination debates are as high profile as it gets.

Thinking of democracy in terms of representation is different from the focus on accountability. Representation involves the politician: what she vows to do, how she governs with those promises in mind, how she explains her actions to constituents in light of those original pledges. It's part of a continuing relationship with voters, a bond that can develop over time as the politician earns her constituents' trust.

Accountability, on the other hand, refers to voters' decisions on how well a politician has done in office and what they do to hold him or her responsible for results. It's what people think democracy is, but it doesn't capture how democracy really works.

Individual elected officials can only rarely deliver specific results that voters identify as the politician's responsibility. Even presidents can't just decide, in a system of separated institutions sharing power, to carry out some policy voters will like, let alone decide to have an economic boom or a foreign-policy success.

And voters don't pay enough attention to politics to know which officials are responsible for what policy. They are prone to do irrational things such as punishing incumbents for bad weather, shark attacks and losses by local sports teams.

So expecting voters to reward or punish politicians for what they've done will rarely work. Yes, there are baseline incentives: Presidents don't want to lose wars or start recessions. But that's about all.

Representation, by contrast, gives politicians the realistic goal of building a strong relationship with their constituents. It provides the democracy that accountability can't — as long as politicians try to be good representatives. And we have plenty of evidence that they do.

Bloomberg View

Jonathan Bernstein is a Bloomberg View columnist covering U.S. politics.

Hillary Clinton Hints Of Going Beyond Obama By Floating The Idea Of Debt Free College // Politicus USA // Jason Easley - May 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign is hinting that they may go beyond President Obama's free community college proposal, by suggesting a plan that will make getting a college education debt free.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Politico reported:

When Hillary Clinton's campaign manager said the words "debt-free college" in an interview with CNBC on Wednesday morning, liberal ears perked up.

Robby Mook's declaration — "what voters are looking for in this election is someone who's going to be a champion for everyday people, for young people that's debt-free college, that's finding that job after you graduate" — stopped short of an endorsement of the policy goal embraced by liberals and by Clinton's likely primary rival Martin O'Malley, but it sent a message to progressive activists that the Clinton camp is paying close attention to their concerns.

Although Clinton has spoken in general terms about making college more affordable and has embraced President Barack Obama's proposal to make community college free, she has yet to publicly support a plan to let students graduate from college without debt. It is one of a handful of areas on which progressive groups and activists are pressuring Clinton, who has yet to release her full policy agenda, from the left.

If Clinton's plan does go beyond the Obama plan of free community college, it will represent a major shift leftward in higher education policy. Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-MA) has been a tireless advocate for Americans who are buried beneath mountains of student loan debt. A debt free college plan from Clinton would represent a strong acknowledgment of Warren's efforts.

With each passing day, the worries of some Democrats that Hillary Clinton would be too centrist to lead a Democratic Party that has moved more to the left are vanishing.

Hillary Clinton is her own person. She should be judged on her own policy proposals, not her husband's presidency. Hillary Clinton has her own distinguished career and many former Sec. of State Clinton's ideas for the future represent today's Democratic Party, not her husband's presidency.

The Billionaire Whose Clinton Foundation Ties Could Be Trouble for Hillary Clinton // Bloomberg // Joshua Green - May 7, 2015

Like countless people before him, Frank Giustra's first meeting with Bill Clinton was a life-altering event indelibly etched in his memory. "We hit it off right away," Giustra recalls. "We hit it off for a whole number of reasons. We had a very similar upbringing. We had similar interests in books. Pretty soon, we were having a great conversation. I think he liked me."

Giustra was experiencing the famous Clinton connection, the tractor beam of personal magnetism that Clinton has deployed to pull people into his orbit since his earliest days in Arkansas. Back then, they were people like Mack McLarty, the well-to-do kindergarten classmate who became Clinton's first White House chief of staff, and Jim McDougal, the local banker and real estate investor who was the Clintons' partner in the Whitewater land deal and eventually wound up in jail. In Arkansas the stakes were comparatively small. Clinton had little money, and his admirers didn't have a whole lot more. Today, in his post-presidency, Clinton has built up a multibillion-dollar family foundation with a global reach. He may soon be back in the White House. The people he solicits are the sort who gravitate to Davos, not Little Rock—people like Frank Giustra.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Giustra is a billionaire mining magnate from Vancouver who met Clinton in 2005 aboard his private jet, which he had lent the former president for a trip to South America. (Clinton really must like Giustra—or his jet—an awful lot, because he borrowed it 25 more times, according to the Washington Post.) Somewhere in the air between Little Rock and Bogotá, Giustra realized, as so many had before him, life would be more glamorous, important, and fun with more Bill Clinton in it: "I said to him, 'Hey, tell me more about what the Clinton Foundation does.' "

Before long, Giustra had pledged $100 million, established a Canadian arm (the Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership), and joined the Clinton Foundation's board. By his own telling, his life has been utterly transformed. "I'd been doing charitable work my whole adult life but on a very small scale," he says. "Then I met Bill Clinton. Just hanging out with him and seeing how he had dedicated his life to this—I know this sounds cheesy, but it's true—he inspired me."

Giustra now sees himself as Canada's answer to Andrew Carnegie and intends, as Carnegie did, to give away his fortune apart from what he requires to live on. The vehicle for his giving shouldn't come as a surprise. "In the philanthropic sense," he says, "all my chips are on Bill Clinton."

Although few people outside the mining industry had heard of Giustra until recently, he's emblematic of the class of plutocrats with whom Clinton has surrounded himself since leaving office. He also represents a new kind of political problem sure to dog Hillary Clinton's presidential bid. As the author Peter Schweizer documents in his book Clinton Cash: The Untold Story of How and Why Foreign Governments and Businesses Helped Make Bill and Hillary Rich, Giustra's globe-trotting adventures with Bill Clinton have coincided with lucrative business deals.

In Colombia, where his investments include oil, timber, and coal mines, Giustra dined one evening in 2010 with Bill and Hillary Clinton, who both met with Colombia's president the next day. Soon after, one company in which Giustra holds a stake "acquired the right to cut timber in a biologically diverse forest on the pristine Colombian shoreline," Schweizer writes, and another was granted valuable oil drilling rights.

A similar situation had unfolded in Kazakhstan in 2005. Giustra and Clinton jetted in to dine with the country's authoritarian president, Nursultan Nazarbayev. Days later, Giustra's mining company signed an agreement giving it stakes in three state-run uranium mines in addition to those it controlled in the U.S. After a $3.5 billion merger, the company was eventually acquired by the Russian atomic energy agency, Rosatom. Because uranium is a strategic asset, the sale required (and received) approval from multiple U.S. agencies, including the Department of State, then run by Hillary Clinton.

Giustra insists these deals were on the up-and-up and Bill Clinton played no role. "He's shown up in two places where I've done business," he says, "but I've traveled to countless countries around the world with him and put money into [charitable] programs in places I have zero business interests in." While Giustra hasn't done charity work in Kazakhstan, he says a deal of that scale is hashed out over many months and didn't require Nazarbayev's permission. He adds that he sold his stake in the uranium mining company two years before Hillary Clinton became secretary of state, and he agreed to share documents with Bloomberg Businessweek that would prove this, although a week later he hadn't produced them.

Previous Friends of Bill have sometimes fallen out of favor when deemed a liability. Ron Burkle, the billionaire supermarket magnate, is the most famous example. Before Giustra, Burkle was the one flying Clinton around in a private jet and enjoying his attention and companionship. That relationship began to sour in 2007 with Hillary's bid for the White House. According to press reports, Burkle's business ties to foreign governments were part of the reason for the split.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Giustra professes to have no concern that politics might prompt Clinton to jilt him, too. "I don't think it's going to happen," he says, "but if for whatever reason Clinton walked away from this, I would just change the name of the damn thing, and I would carry on. I'm dead serious."

Burkle, too, once seemed to regard himself as impervious to political attacks. But he changed his mind. As he complained to Businessweek in March 2010, "If someone wanted to embarrass [Clinton], I got thrown in it, too."

What looms as a greater threat to Hillary Clinton's presidential ambitions than the details of the Russian uranium transaction is that Giustra is the first of what may be a procession of similar figures who will be in the spotlight between now and Election Day. That's because anyone with the means to give millions of dollars to the Clinton Foundation likely also has global financial interests affected by U.S. policy or, at the very least, would benefit from a favorable relationship with the Clintons. As Giustra himself notes, "He's one of the best brand names in the world."

The potential conflicts of interest are nearly limitless—and so is the potential for political damage. According to a study by Vox, a news and policy analysis website, 181 contributors to the Clinton Foundation also lobbied the State Department while Hillary Clinton ran it. That's enough to furnish several more volumes of Clinton Cash, should Schweizer have the fortitude to produce them.

On May 5, the Clinton campaign rolled out a website, the Briefing, to attack Schweizer and rebut the book's insinuations of corruption. But the damage Hillary Clinton has sustained is largely self-inflicted. Although the Clinton Foundation signed an agreement with the White House to disclose its donors as a condition of her becoming secretary of state, it hasn't fulfilled the pledge. A New York Times investigation of Giustra's uranium mining deal turned up donors whom the Clinton Foundation failed to disclose. Bloomberg found an additional 1,100 undisclosed foreign donors. The Boston Globe turned up even more.

This may help explain why a majority of independents in a May 5 New York Times/CBS News poll said that although Hillary Clinton is a "strong leader" who "shares their values," she is "not honest and trustworthy."

Improving her image will be a challenge in light of the scrutiny yet to come. The Clinton Foundation has announced it will continue accepting money from select foreign governments and won't disclose the identities of all its foreign donors. Bill Clinton told NBC News he would keep giving paid speeches because "I gotta pay the bills."

Voters will have to take it on faith that these arrangements are as innocent as the participants claim. Giustra, for one, sounds doubtful they will. "If I didn't know me, and I wasn't there," he says, "I would think, Oh my God, there is some connection between all the good stuff that's happening with Giustra and his donations to the Clinton trips." If Hillary Clinton is going to make it to the White House, she'll need to convince the country otherwise.

Hillary Clinton's Hill Whisperer // National Journal // Sarah Mimms - May 7, 2015

Eager to line up support from top members of the national Democratic Party, Hillary Clinton sent three of her senior aides to Capitol Hill last month. For the Clinton campaign, it was an opportunity to brief members of

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Congress on her plans, avoid any surprises, and shore up support among the party's electeds.

For Clinton's political director Amanda Renteria, it was a homecoming.

After running a failed congressional campaign in California last year, the 40-year-old former staffer for Sens. Dianne Feinstein and Debbie Stabenow returned to Capitol Hill in April as a top liaison between Team Hillary and some of the members she knows well from nearly a decade on the Hill.

Given her knowledge of working in (and running for) Congress and her sterling reputation among Democratic senators, Renteria could be a secret weapon for Clinton in keeping the campaign and the minority party in Congress on the same page.

"Oh, I was so proud of her," Stabenow said beamingly, reflecting on Renteria's performance in a closed-session luncheon with the Democratic senators. "I feel like it's one of the family, for me. … I think she's very well-respected in the caucus. People were very excited to see that she is in this position. I think people have a lot of confidence in her."

In the three weeks since, Stabenow said several members have approached her to praise Renteria and her team of regional political directors for their quick responses to their queries about the campaign's views on policy, surrogacy needs, fundraising, and more. "She understands both the importance and the benefits of having members totally engaged and also the importance of being able to respond quickly with information," Stabenow said.

"I've worked on a lot of campaigns for a really long time and I'm shocked by how good this campaign is at keeping people in the loop. Usually this is the one thing that campaigns do badly. And in the past weeks, I've just been astounded," said Bill Sweeney, Stabenow's current chief of staff who served as Renteria's deputy. "I think that a lot of it really does stem from Amanda's leadership … understanding that folks out here are trying our best to be helpful."

It's been a long and unusual road for Renteria, the daughter of a Mexican-immigrant father and Mexican-American mother, who was raised in California's Central Valley. After graduating from Stanford University, where she played both softball and basketball for the school, Renteria briefly worked at Goldman Sachs. Then she took a job teaching high school, left to get her MBA at Harvard, and then took a job as a budget analyst and consultant to the City of San Jose, before finally landing on Capitol Hill in 2005.

At age 30, Renteria took a job as a legislative aide to Feinstein, her home-state senator. Just two years later, she became the first Latina chief of staff in Senate history, working for Stabenow.

That quick rise was fueled not only Renteria's ambition and work ethic but her warmth and ability to quickly earn the trust of those she's working with, current and former Democratic staffers said.

Nowhere was that more evident than in the fight to pass a farm bill through both chambers of Congress last year. Renteria was instrumental in bridging the gap between not only the two parties, but the regional factions of members that grew up around the bill. That kind of coalition-building could be instrumental to the Clinton campaign, as the presumptive nominee faces criticism from the party's liberal wing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And her relentless optimism helped to keep a team of warring staffers together. "That farm bill almost died about 20 different times I think," one former Senate Democratic staffer said. "But she ... was never sort of, dour. Even at sort of the darkest times she remained positive and determined. That's part of the reason why she's such an effective leader—because then everybody else said, if Amanda still thinks it's possible [then maybe it is]."

Renteria declined to be interviewed for this story, but Sweeney said he sees clearly how she'll translate her skills honed in the Senate to a presidential campaign. "Really, the job of the chief of staff is really just to keep everything running. She was really good at that, good at keeping the trains running on time, keeping everybody in the loop. And that's the key thing she's going to be doing at the Hillary campaign," he said.

After wrapping up the farm bill and seeing Stabenow reelected in a tough 2012 contest, Renteria left the Hill on a high note, preparing to return two years with a very different title: Congresswoman.

It didn't work out that way. Although California's 21st District was redrawn in 2012 to be much more favorable to Democrats and now is 72 percent Hispanic, Renteria lost to incumbent Republican David Valadao by almost 16 points.

The loss was difficult for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, which helped to recruit Renteria for the seat. She was one of their most promising candidates for a seat that the party finally had a shot at after years of Republican control, executive director Kelly Ward said in an interview. But it was one of many in the 2014 cycle to swing toward Republicans, and the DCCC had to switch its focus to protecting its own incumbents rather than trying to make inroads in new territory.

In preparing for the 2016 election cycle, Renteria was the first candidate that the DCCC reached out to, Ward said. Ward had been impressed during the previous cycle by Renteria, a mother of two who she described as "warm, but tough." She was rumored to be considering a second run for Congress, but had told local reporters she was leaning towards running for an open California State Assembly seat.

"Her number one focus was going home and doing right by her community," Ward said.

As a candidate in 2014, Renteria did everything "110 percent," Ward said, and although it's often difficult for "doers" like Renteria, she handled the transition from staffer to candidate, who had to pass a lot of the work she typically did to a staff of her own, better than almost any other candidate Ward had seen.

The 2014 loss "was no fault of hers," Ward said.

And the California Democratic Party is hoping that the energy she brought to Democrats in the Central Valley will pay dividends in 2016, even without Renteria as a candidate. "She brought new people into the party because she … just drew them in because she is so dynamic," Shawnda Westly, the party's executive director said in an interview. Renteria built an incredibly loyal volunteer base in the district that impressed Westly and other members, a skill she could use in building a team for Clinton as well.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The personal experience of campaigning for Congress clearly informs Renteria's work as political director for the Clinton campaign. But it also gives her another connection to members on Capitol Hill. The DCCC, too, has kept in touch with Renteria—not as a candidate, but as a liaison to help keep the campaign committee in the loop with Team Hillary.

"I'd love to have her as a candidate in a presidential election cycle," Ward said, but she understands why Renteria is moving on to the Hillary campaign rather than running another of her own. "I think she is going to do a great job."

Sweeney echoed that sentiment. "Frankly the best thing is if she was in Congress right now, the second best thing is her working to get Hillary elected," he said.

Ja Rule just endorsed Hillary Clinton // Business Insider // Hunter Walker - May 7, 2015

Ja Rule will always be there when Hillary Clinton calls and he will always be on time.

The rapper and former federal prison inmate appeared on Fox Business on Thursday to discuss Magnises, a credit card company he's working with. While there, Ja Rule was asked who he's backing in the 2016 presidential election.

Though he expressed admiration for former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R), Ja Rule said Clinton, who announced her campaign last month, will get his vote.

"I like Hillary. I like Hillary. But, you know, it's crazy because ... I also think Jeb is a good candidate as well," Ja Rule said. "But, you know, I don't — I'm a Democrat, so yeah, so I would vote Hillary."

Clinton's campaign did not immediately respond to a request for comment on Ja Rule's endorsement.

Behind High Walls: Clinton Charity Moves Moroccan Party Out of View // ABC News // Matthew Mosk and Brian Epstein – May 7, 2015

With its private collection of Arabian horses and a restaurant touting biolight cuisine, the Selman palace hotel in Marrakesh presented an opulent backdrop for Wednesday evening’s reception forClinton Foundation members and guests.

Busloads of the Clinton Foundation’s members and sponsors were shuttled here -- 30 minutes away from the conference hotel -- across the exotic, palm-lined city’s ancient walled old city. Torches lined the hotel’s gated entrance and a team of security comprised of retired U.S. Secret Service agents triple checked guests lists as they arrived.

What happened at the event, however, remained hidden behind the sprawling resort’s 12-foot-high walls, off limits to the press. When ABC News producers attempted to take pictures of guests arriving at the front entrance, Moroccan police threatened their arrest. The foundation's spokesman initially professed not to know where the reception was being held, and the location was among the only not included on schedules handed out to the media and published online.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Due to the structure of this event, this session is closed to press," it stated.

The secrecy surrounding the reception was a departure from a comparatively free-wheelingClinton Global Initiative conference -- a three-day event where members of the foundation hear about the results of ongoing charitable projects, and plot the course for new ones. The majority of this conference was open, and unlike some past ones, members of the press were permitted to roam from panel discussion to cocktail party without much hassle. (At a CGI event last year, a New York Times reporter wrote about being watched so closely that a 20-something staffer followed her into the bathroom.)

The Morocco conference is underway at an unusual time for the Clinton Foundation. With Hillary Clinton launching a new presidential bid, and a new book questioning the motivations of some foreign donors to the charity, especially during the period when she was serving as Secretary of State, the foundation has taken pains to push back against perceptions that it is anything but transparent.

During the first panel discussion of the conference, telecom billionaire Mo Ibrahim became the first to address the foreign donation issue that had been weighing on a number of the foundation members and supporters in attendance.

"What is wrong if Saudi Arabia gives money for a farm in Africa? What's the big deal?" Ibrahim asked. "I just could not understand. I didn't see anybody from the foundation standing up."

"You should have stood up and really took issue -- what is this money for?... What have you done with it?" he said.

Clinton shrugged off the topic with a light touch. "I just work here, I don't know," he joked.

"There is one set of rules for politics in America and another set for real life. And you just have to learn to deal with it," Clinton said, quickly turning to the discussion back to the charity's efforts.

Foundation officials said the evening reception was behind closed doors to encourage members to openly exchange ideas as they socialized. They noted that few other charities -– if any –- are asked or expected to open the doors of their private functions.

But at least one reporter covering the conference appeared to believe the openness extended to the evening festivities, and lined up to board the idling tour busses as they prepared to take guests to the Selman. Staff members dutifully checked her ID badge when she stepped to the door, and then promptly turned her away.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton 'fact-check' under fire // Washington Examiner // Sarah Westwood - May 7, 2015

A Kazakh official involved in brokering a controversial mining deal for a major Clinton Foundation donor is behind bars for his role in the transaction, undercutting a Clinton campaign "fact-check" thatattempted to dismiss ethical questions about the former president's ties to the lucrative contract.

Hillary for America and the Clinton-aligned group Media Matterspushed back on allegations that the Clintons had used their political clout to drum up millions in foundation donations and speaking fees by furthering the financial interests of friends in the wake of Tuesday's publication of Peter Schweizer's Clinton Cash.

Schweizer dedicated an entire chapter to a 2005 deal in which Bill Clinton allegedly helped his friend Frank Giustra break into a fiercely competitive uranium market, setting the stage for the high-profile takeover of mining conglomerate Uranium One by Russia.

In response to a spate of stories questioning whether Giustra's hefty donations to the Clinton Foundation influenced Hillary Clinton's position on the Uranium One deal, Giustra released a statement denying his involvement with the company.

He also claimed Bill Clinton "had nothing to do with the purchase of private mining stakes by a Canadian company," as Schweizer and others have suggested.

"That's just dead wrong," said Brian Fallon, a spokesman for Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign, in a video released Wednesday. "The main donor he's talking about sold his stake in the company two years before Hillary Clinton even became secretary of state."

Giustra had to step down from UrAsia's board when Uranium One acquired it in 2007 so his company could "pursue this transaction without any perception of conflict" because he was serving simultaneously as its financial advisor thanks to his position as chairman of Endeavour Financial.

Giustra noted in his statement that he sold his shares "at least 18 months before Hillary Clinton became the secretary of state. No one was speculating at that time that she would become the secretary of state."

"Schweizer spins a tale that in 2010, then-Secretary Clinton pushed the State Department to approve the sale of Uranium One to the Russian government in order to benefit a stakeholder who had donated to the Clinton Foundation," Hillary for America said in its pushback.

The campaign "fact-check" highlighted the fact that Giustra sold his stake "three years prior to the sale" of Uranium One to Russia.

But Giustra's firm, Endeavour Financial, remained Uranium One's financial advisor well after its acquisition of UrAsia, casting doubt on assertions that he severed his ties to the company before Hillary Clinton became secretary of state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Giustra's claim that Bill Clinton played no role in helping UrAsia win mining rights in Kazakhstan in 2005 contradicts what at least one Kazakh official has said about the nature of both Clintons' involvement.

Mukhtar Dzhakishev, the Kazakh official in charge of the country's uranium and nuclear industry, claimed then-Sen. Hillary Clinton had "pressured Kazakh officials to secure a deal for the Canadians" by refusing to meet with the prime minister when he was in the U.S., according to Schweizer.

In 2008, Dzhakishev also said Bill Clinton, Frank Giustra and Kazakh President Nazarbayev discussed the mining deal at a banquet just days before UrAsia acquired significant stakes in three mines, although both Giustra and Bill Clinton deny those conversations.

Dzhakishev was among the key officials whose approval UrAsia would have needed to complete the transaction.

Giustra's company managed to secure a deal that industry insiders deemed a "mystery" less than 48 hours after he and Bill Clinton wrapped up their trip to Kazakhstan.

Mining analysts questioned the arrangement that allowed UrAsia to become "a major uranium producer when it didn't even exist before."

Giustra later gave $31.3 million to the Clinton Foundation.

The deal faced renewed scrutiny in May 2009 when Dzhakishev was arrested for arranging corrupt uranium transactions with foreign companies.

"Authorities singled out the sale of a 30-per-cent stake in Kyzylkum that was allegedly sold for little more than $100,000 in 2005," the Globe and Mail reported the week after Dzhakishev was arrested.

That 30 percent stake was among the assets UrAsia acquired with Bill Clinton's alleged assistance, and belonged to Uranium One at the time Hillary Clinton's State Department allowed it to be bought by the Russian government.

Representatives of Uranium One assured media outlets in 2009 that UrAsia had paid $75 million for the mining stake in question.

"This is just a big misunderstanding, that's all it is," Jean Nortier, Uranium One's CEO, told theToronto Star.

However, Giustra was unable to identify who had sold him the mining stakes after Dzhakishev came under fire.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Canadian securities documents showed a company called the Jeffcott Group, registered in the British Virgin Islands, had owned the disputed stake before UrAsia bought it in 2005.

Giustra told the Globe and Mail he had only been in contact with a representative from Jeffcott during the transaction and said he was "never privy to the Jeffcott purchase price."

According to the World Bank's Stolen Asset Recovery Initiative, Dzhakishev and a friend, Mukhtar Ablyazov, teamed up to form Jeffcott in a scheme to profit off mining deals like the one with UrAsia.

Ablyazov, who was then head of a state-controlled bank and was reportedly Dzhakishev's college roommate, allegedly created Jeffcott and other offshore companies in order to put together joint ventures into which Dzhakishev shifted government-owned mining stakes.

Giustra later purchased the mining stakes in those joint ventures.

By March of last year, the scandal surrounding Dzhakishev threatened Uranium One's rights to the mines Giustra had purchased.

Two of the three mining properties involved in the 2005 UrAsia deal came from Ablyazov, the former Kazakh energy minister who spent about a year behind bars for corruption before Nazarbayev pardoned him in 2003, according to Bloomberg.

In 2010, Dzhakishev was sentenced to 14 years in prison for the scandal.

Just three years before he ended up behind bars, however, Dzhakishev was sitting down with Bill Clinton and Giustra at the former president's Chappaqua, New York home.

Dzhakishev traveled for the meeting to discuss Kazakhstan's interest in a U.S. company the same month Uranium One took over UrAsia, the New York Times reported in 2008.

"Both Mr. Clinton and Mr. Giustra at first denied that any such meeting occurred. Mr. Giustra also denied ever arranging for Kazakh officials to meet with Mr. Clinton. Wednesday, after The Times told them that others said a meeting, in Mr. Clinton's home, had in fact taken place, both men acknowledged it," the Times wrote in January of that year.

The report also notes Giustra's company sent an engineering consultant to Kazakhstan to scope out the mines in 2005, just four weeks before he and Bill Clinton headed to the country for the former president's first trip there since leaving the White House.

That Kazakhstan trip was arranged "hastily" on "last-minute notice," the Times reported.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

How will top 2016 Republicans respond to Hillary Clinton immigration move? // Washington Examiner // Byron York - May 6, 2015

Hillary Clinton shook up the presidential race in both parties with her declaration that she would not only protect President Obama's unilateral executive actions on immigration but that she would go further to offer new status to currently illegal immigrants, and in the end grant "full and equal citizenship" to those who came to the U.S. illegally. It was a move so swift, so consequential — and so far to the left — that Democratic immigration activist groups were stunned.

Some on the right saw an opportunity for Republicans to go on the offensive against Clinton. "Now the GOP campaigns are all filing away footage of [Clinton's] event, in hopes of being able to use it against Hillary next year," wrote conservative blogger John Hinderaker Wednesday.

Maybe not. Rather than quickly condemn Clinton's new position, the two leading Republican presidential candidates most associated with immigration reform — Jeb Bush and Marco Rubio — said nothing at all about it on Thursday.

Bush aides said the candidate himself might address the matter in coming days, while Rubio aides pointed to his previous statements on the issue of immigration reform. For its part, the Republican National Committee criticized the fact that Clinton changed her position but did not criticize her new position itself. The bottom line was that some leading GOP voices were basically silent about Clinton's big move.

The other top Republican in the polls, Scott Walker, has also become identified with the immigration issue, albeit in an entirely different way than Bush and Rubio. Walker rocked the immigration debate inside the GOP recently by suggesting the U.S. should set immigration policy with an eye to the needs of American workers. "The next president and the next Congress need to make decisions about a legal immigration system that's based on, first and foremost, on protecting American workers and American wages," Walker said.

Perhaps not surprisingly, Walker was eager to respond to Clinton's immigration gambit. "Hillary Clinton's full embrace of amnesty is unfair to hardworking Americans and all immigrants who followed the law to achieve the rights and privileges afforded to U.S. citizens," Walker said in a statement Wednesday. "And by supporting the president's lawless executive action, Hillary Clinton once again believes she's above the law. Working families want to secure the border, enforce the law, and fix the broken legal immigration system."

How will Republicans ultimately respond to Clinton? They're in a difficult situation. Both Bush and Rubio have, at different times, declared themselves open to a path to citizenship for the millions of immigrants in the U.S. illegally. Now, both men speak in terms of granting some sort of "legal status" to those immigrants. Clinton noted that in her Nevada remarks when she said that "not a single Republican candidate, announced or potential, is clearly and consistently supporting a path to citizenship. Not one. When they talk about legal status, that is code for second-class status."

Clinton's move has made a big problem even bigger for Bush, Rubio, and the entire Republican Party.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

After the GOP's decisive defeat in the 2012 presidential elections, in which Barack Obama won 71 percent of the Hispanic vote, a number of Republicans expressed their strong belief that the party had to pass comprehensive immigration reform to ever have a chance of winning a significant number of Hispanic voters.

The idea was that reform was a threshold issue — that is, Republicans would have to pass it before Hispanic voters would consider supporting the GOP's stand on other issues. Hence the Gang of Eight effort, led by Rubio. But reform, passed by the Democratic Senate with Rubio's efforts, died in the Republican-controlled House.

So Clinton has made her move. Her new position effectively trumps all other immigration reform offers on the table. Her message to Hispanic voters is: No Republican — not Jeb, not Marco, not anybody — will offer you as much as I will.

The Republican response is unclear. Can Bush and Rubio say they share Clinton's goal of citizenship for millions of currently illegal immigrants but disagree with her way of getting there? That's not terribly strong. Do they stick with the "legal status" that Clinton characterizes as "second-class status"?

The fact is, if the heart of immigration reform is an effort to win the support of Hispanic voters, Clinton's offer has trumped all other immigration reform proposals on the table. There's not much pro-reform Republicans can say: "We'll give you a little less than Hillary — but please look at our issues, like taxes and entitlement reform."

Republicans will have to come up with something, because Clinton plans to press the issue in the coming campaign. "This will be a defining issue in the election," her campaign manager, Robby Mook, said Wednesday on CNBC. And it's a defining issue Clinton clearly believes she can win.

Pennsylvania's Fight Over Paid Sick Days Could Be The Presidential Campaign's // Huffington Post Politics // Jonathan Cohn – May 7, 2015

You've got a nasty head cold, or maybe your kid is home with the flu. If you're a waitress and you call in sick, should the law forbid your employer from withholding your day's wages?

A big debate over that question is taking place in Pennsylvania, pitting conservative state lawmakers in Harrisburg against liberal city officials in Philadelphia. It's the latest in a series of such clashes that have taken place across the country. Underscoring the high stakes of the outcome, the battle is also drawing attention from high-profile Democrats, including Hillary Clinton, in what could be the early stages of an argument that will play out during the 2016 presidential campaign.

Earlier this year, Philadelphia enacted an ordinance that will allow employees to earn up to five full days of paid sick time per year. Under its terms, employees can claim the days for their own illnesses or for those of direct family members, or they can use the days to deal with domestic violence incidents. The law goes into effect next week. Once it does, workers begin accruing paid sick time -- one hour for every 40 that they work -- as soon as they've been on the job for at least three months.

The law doesn't apply to seasonal employees or interns, or to companies where workers have unions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Companies with fewer than 10 employees must provide the time off, but not salary. Even so, as many as 200,000 Philadelphians who didn't have paid sick days before will now get them, according to the law's supporters. When Mayor Michael Nutter signed the measure in February, after vetoing two previous ones, these advocates were ecstatic.

"It's a great day for all of our workers and all of our businesses," said Marianne Bellesorte, an official with Pathways PA, a nonprofit service and advocacy group that works on issues for women, children and families.

But city officials may not have the last word on the matter. As far back as 2013, when Nutter was still blocking the ordinance, conservative lawmakers in the state were talking about passing a law that would invalidate local sick day laws altogether. The clear target of that effort was Philadelphia, since it was the only city considering such a measure and, because of a quirk in the state's constitution, it may be the only city that has the legal authority to do so.

"I think we have an inherent problem with government trying to tell private business what they should do with their employees," John Eichelberger, a Republican state senator, told The Huffington Post in an interview last year. Eichelberger co-sponsored a preemption bill that the Senate passed last month; a similar measure is now before the state's House of Representatives. Tom Wolf, the newly elected Democratic governor, has promised to veto such legislation -- and that's where things stand now. It's not clear whether Republican leaders in the legislature could muster the votes to override him.

A Familiar Fight With Familiar Faces

This isn't the first time conservatives have tried to leverage their superior numbers in state government to block or undermine paid sick days legislation in big cities, where liberals typically hold large majorities. Using a legislative template supplied by the conservative American Legislative Exchange Council (ALEC) and working closely with employers who oppose paid sick days mandates, conservatives have tried to enact preemption laws in more than a dozen other states. In Arizona, Georgia and nine other states, they have prevailed.

Bill Clinton: We had the lowest net worth of any president entering office since Harry Truman // Politifact // Katie Sanders - May 7th, 2015

Former President Bill Clinton is back to making claims about his family's humble financial roots.

A year ago, he was defending Hillary Clinton for claiming that they left left the White House "not only dead broke, but in debt" (which rates Mostly False).

"I had the lowest net worth of any American president in the 20th century when I took office," Clinton said then (Half True).

This time, it's amid scrutiny of all those lucrative speeches and foreign government donations to his family foundation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I'm grateful for our success," Clinton told NBC News' Cynthia McFadden in an interview that aired May 4. "But let me remind you. When we moved into the White House, we had the lowest net worth of any family since Harry Truman."

So, did Bill do better by isolating on presidents since Harry Truman?

The answer is yes.

A humble haberdasher, Harry S. Truman

Detailed financial disclosures were not required for presidents through the 1970s, so we're left to rely on other resources to get a picture of a commander-in-chief's financial assets, said Paul Brace, a professor of political science at Rice University.

Still, we do know a lot about their lives. Let's start with Truman since he's critical.

Truman and his wife Bess were not homeowners when he became president. They rented a Washington apartment, and Bess' mother, who owned the Independence, Mo., home associated with Harry Truman, shared a room with their daughter Margaret, said Alonzo Hamby, a Truman biographer and Ohio University emeritus professor of history.

Truman's journey to public office followed bankruptcy-dodging and a failed haberdashery business in the 1920s. He worked his way up from county judge to a U.S. senator, vice president and president upon Franklin D. Roosevelt's death in 1945. Even when he was earning $10,000 as a senator in 1935 ($171,000 in 2015 dollars), he could not save the family farm his mother owned.

It was Truman's post-White House flirtation with bankruptcy that inspired Congress to pass presidential pensions, said Aaron Crawford, a post-doctoral student at Southern Methodist University.

Experts can't pinpoint his net worth to a specific dollar figure, but all the evidence points to the number being quite low. Joseph J. Thorndike, director of the Tax History Project at Tax Analysts, explored Truman's financial highs and lows using tax returns released by his presidential library.

The man from Hope, and his pre-White House wallet

The Clintons are certainly unique compared to other first families in modern history for a couple big reasons: They did not inherit sizable family estates, and Hillary Clinton was the family breadwinner as Bill worked as a career politician.

Before running for the White House in 1992, Clinton brought in $35,000 a year as Arkansas governor, plus some speaking fees, honorariums and in-kind income, such as living in the governor's residence. Hillary was a senior partner in the Rose Law Firm of Little Rock at the time, earned $92,000 salary and listed her share of her law firm's profit-sharing and retirement plan between $100,001 and $250,000, according to a New York Times examination of the couple's finances in 1992.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Clintons listed their net worth as nearly $700,000 in a 1992 statement, a substantial hike from the $418,692 net worth reported at the end of the 1989, according to the Washington Post.

Lest you worry about the financial wealth of the Clintons, the family was still well off by most any standard. The median household net worth for Americans in 2013 was$81,200 (see page 12), according to the Federal Reserve.

Other presidents since Truman

The experts we contacted didn't rattle off hard numbers as they dissected various presidents' pre-office net worth. Instead, they ruled out the obviously wealthy presidents based on their jobs and family situations. (Truman biographer Hamby used the phrases, "JFK of course was quite rich," "Reagan was at least quite affluent," and "George H.W. Bush was at least wealthy if not filthy rich.")

Eliminating the obvious, experts focused on who might present Clinton with a realistic challenge.

Richard Nixon? He had a pretty lucrative law practice in New York. Lyndon B. Johnson? Journalists and historians disagree on exactly how he built his wealth, experts said, but he at least married a wealthy woman whose father owned Texas radio stations.

Dwight D. Eisenhower? Nah, they said, as he was doing well for himself after World War II, landing on corporate boards and enjoying a good military pension and sales of his memoir, Crusade in Europe. "You save the world, you get good royalties," said Jeffrey Engel, director of the Center for Presidential History at Southern Methodist University.

Most encouraged us to give presidents Jimmy Carter and Gerald Ford a closer look.

Carter had earned a good living as the owner of a peanut warehouse business in Georgia before running for the state Senate in 1962, said Scott Kaufman, a scholar of Ford and Carter at Francis Marion University.

In 1979's Jimmy Carter: A Character Portrait, authors Bruce Mazlish and Edwin Diamond wrote that Carter's fortune was $814,000 when he became president, Kaufman said. That bests Clinton, without even having to break out the inflation calculator.

A separate source — a 1976 Washington Post article sent over by the Hillary Clinton campaign — showed Carter had a net worth (when valuing assets at their original cost) of $512,000, which translates to $1.3 million in 1992 dollars, according to 1975 tax returns he released during his campaign against Ford.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A document from the Gerald R. Ford presidential library suggests Ford had a more modest net worth compared to other presidents. The document, dated Oct. 29, 1973, (the year before Ford became president), showed a net worth of $256,378, which had the same buying power as about $810,000 in 1992. That's more than the Clintons, though not by much.

Ford's finances and dealings were part of the most intense background checks for anyone ever screened for the vice presidency, Kaufman said, coming off the resignation of Nixon vice president Spiro Agnew earlier that month and amid looming worries about legal implications for Nixon in the Watergate scandal.

"They didn't want to appoint someone who might also have problems," Kaufman said.

Our ruling

Bill Clinton urged Americans to remember the Clintons' more modest beginnings with his family's fattened finances in the limelight, saying, "When we moved into the White House, we had the lowest net worth of any family since Harry Truman."

You can decide whether his point is relevant, but Clinton has improved the accuracy of his factoid since making a similar claim last year.

We could not find evidence of a president after Truman whose inflation-adjusted net worth was smaller than the Clintons'.

We rate his claim True.

Hillary and the Burden of Clintonism // The Atlantic // Molly Ball – May 7, 2015

The Democratic presidential candidate's proposals are increasingly at odds with the policies of her husband's administration.

Last week, in the first policy speech of her presidential campaign, Hillary Clinton staked out a position on criminal-justice reform that was a direct repudiation of Bill Clinton's tough-on-crime policies.

It wasn't the first time Hillary Clinton has found herself up against Bill Clinton's record, and it likely won't be the last. As the former first lady stakes out aforthrightly liberal platform for her second presidential campaign, she is increasingly at odds with the legacy of her husband. If the promises she's making now bear fruit, a second Clinton administration could well end up reversing many of the policies of the first one.

Though the criminal-justice contrast was the most widely noticed, Hillary Clinton has already staked out multiple stances that contrast starkly with Bill Clinton's policies. This week, in Las Vegas, she laid out a set of immigration policies including "full and equal citizenship" for undocumented immigrants, protecting the parents of young

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Dreamer" undocumented immigrants from deportation, and softening deportation policies. Bill Clinton, on the other hand, signed several restrictive immigration measures during his tenure, speeding deportations, increasing penalties, and making it harder for the undocumented to gain legal status. The measures were passed by the Republican Congress at the time.

Hillary Clinton recently expressed hope that the Supreme Court would makesame-sex marriage a constitutional right; her announcement video even featured a gay couple talking about their upcoming wedding. Bill Clinton, in 1996, signed the Defense of Marriage Act to deny federal marriage protections to same sex couples—a law that the Supreme Court ruled largely unconstitutional in 2013.

As the campaign continues, progressives can be expected to push Hillary Clinton to take more stances that contravene Bill Clinton's record. Trade and financial regulation are two notable areas of liberal angst: Many critics blame Bill Clinton's repeal of the Glass-Steagall Act for the 2008 financial crisis, and the North American Free Trade Agreement, which he championed, is frequently cited in the current debate over trade authority as an example of a bad free-trade deal. Welfare reform is another Bill Clinton compromise that many modern-day progressives reject. The Hillary Clinton of 2016 has yet to take a position on these issues, though she issued a statement expressing concern about the proposed Trans-Pacific Partnership trade deal. Obama strongly supports the deal, and Hillary Clinton previously supported it as secretary of state.

Tighter financial regulation, including reimposing Glass-Steagall-style regulations, is the top priority of supporters of Massachusetts Senator Elizabeth Warren, whose fans are still hoping she will reverse herself and decide to run for president. The pining for Warren is a symptom of some progressives' continuing suspicion of Hillary Clinton, who, like her husband, has a reputation for pro-business dealmaking rather than bold liberalism. "A growing number of supporters are urging Elizabeth Warren to run because her actions speak even louder than her words," said Erica Sagrans, campaign manager of the Ready for Warren draft effort. "By leading the charge to create our nation's first consumer protection agency, Elizabeth Warren has shown that she can take on the tough fights and win."

What's the significance of Hillary Clinton's departures from her husband's policies? They may serve to remind liberals how frequently Bill Clinton, when he was president, was willing to compromise liberal stances in the service of getting things done—stoking Democrats' fears that, however progressive Hillary Clinton sounds now, she might not govern that way in practice. Hillary Clinton's record in the Senate was likewise that of a dealmaker, and since leaving the state Department and reentering politics, she's talked about trying to break out of the gridlock of the current era. That's going to mean working with Republicans, and potentially agreeing to deals that fall far short of the policies liberals would like to see.

Hillary Clinton's team says her differences with her husband are simply a mark of changing times. It would be silly, after all, to expect the policies of 2016 to be exactly the same as those offered in 1993. Cracking down on crime, for example, was appropriate in the 1990s, when it was an epidemic problem; nowadays, with crime down and growing concern around mass incarceration, different solutions are called for. (Supporters also note that Bill Clinton has now taken a similar stance against his old tough-on-crime policies.)

“Hillary Clinton is running on her own agenda and her proven record as a fighter for everyday Americans," Clinton campaign spokesman Jesse Ferguson told me. "Her policy ideas fit the challenges we face and the times we’re in.”

Much has already been written about the challenge Hillary Clinton faces in positioning herself against the Obama legacy. How can she convince voters looking for a change that that is what she represents when she was an integral part of the Obama administration? And how much of a departure can she call for without alienating Obama's still-loyal base of support?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Yet as Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign takes shape, the Democratic administration with which she's offering the clearest contrast isn't Obama's—it's Bill Clinton's.

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE

Trade Debate Gives Bernie Sanders a Chance to Put Hillary Clinton on the Hot Seat // Bloomberg // Heidi Przybyla - May 7, 2015

Senator Bernie Sanders is setting the first in a number of political traps for Hillary Clinton with next week's start of a congressional debate over trade legislation.

The Vermont independent challenging Clinton for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination is dialing up pressure for her to take a stand on a 12-nation Pacific trade deal she's supported in the past.

Sanders has virtually no chance of winning the Democratic nomination unless Clinton alienates grassroots activists like labor union members, and he's pushing her to do just that. He has been needling her in media appearances and, last month, he marched with labor officials in Washington to protest the upcoming trade vote.

"I have voted against every disastrous trade agreement coming down the pike," Sanders said on Wednesday, arguing that such deals have exported "good-paying jobs to low-wage countries."

"People have got to look at Secretary Clinton's record," he added.

The Senate plans to begin debate next week on legislation granting President Barack Obama the ability to expedite trade agreements like the Pacific deal, which is unpopular among many Democratic voters. The AFL-CIO, environmental groups and other progressive organizations are making its defeat their top legislative priority. Fast-track authority requires Congress to hold an up-or-down vote on international agreements negotiated by the president, meaning there's no opportunity for amendments or filibusters.

Sanders's rhetoric on trade demonstrates how he poses a threat to Clinton even if he doesn't endanger her grip on the nomination. While labor groups fighting the trade legislation are likely to support Clinton as the eventual nominee, she could suffer from an enthusiasm gap if the labor and progressive communities aren't motivated to show up at the polls and turn out their followers.

On April 17, Sanders issued a statement calling on Clinton to oppose the deal. The same day, Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill said she believes any new trade measures must "put us in a position to protect American workers, raise wages and create more good jobs at home," but stopped short of indicating whether she supports or opposes the trade deal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton has in the past expressed support for a Pacific trade deal, which pits key elements of the Democratic coalition against key Democratic leaders—among them Obama, and Clinton's husband, former President Bill Clinton.

It's an opportunity for Sanders, who announced his long-shot 2016 candidacy last week, to show he can shape his party's primary debate, even if he's unlikely to become the nominee.

More contrasts to come

Other areas where Sanders is in a position to draw stark contrasts with Clinton include: Her support for the Patriot Act; her vote in 2002 to authorize the war in Iraq, and her stance on the Keystone XL pipeline. As secretary of state, Clinton said she was “inclined” to approve the pipeline. Since then, much like on the trade measure, Clinton has been silent on Keystone.

On trade, Clinton has to contend not only with her own record, but that of her husband. One of the hallmark legislative successes of former President Bill Clinton's administration was the 1994 North American Free Trade Agreement that unions blame for thousands of lost U.S. manufacturing jobs.

Unions typically provide the campaign foot soldiers who knock on doors, make phone calls and help get Democratic voters to the polls. Right now, they're launching an all-out war against the trade legislation. An AFL-CIO fact sheet said its members have held 450 nationwide events, including rallies in Washington, made 100,000 phone calls and gathered 40,000 petition signatures.

The labor federation is freezing all political action committee contributions to candidates to put those funds toward a campaign to stop fast-track legislation. That includes digital ads pressuring 16 senators to oppose the deal and attacks on Democrats Ron Wyden of Oregon and Michael Bennet of Colorado, who voted for the legislation in committee. Last week, AFL-CIO President Richard Trumka delivered a speech putting elected officials on notice, without mentioning Clinton by name.

'No middle ground'

"We expect those who seek to lead our nation forward to oppose fast-track," Trumka said. "There is no middle ground, and the time for deliberations is drawing to a close."

To Matt Bennett, a former White House aide to President Bill Clinton who supports trade legislation, "The ferocity with which segments of the labor community are fighting this has been surprising." He acknowledged it puts Hillary Clinton in a bind.

"She's torn between what she knows to be important for America's economy and our leadership in the global economy and the necessity of uniting the party behind her," said Bennett, now senior vice president at Third Way, a Democratic policy group.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

House Speaker John Boehner is also leaning on Clinton to declare her position.

Last week, the Ohio Republican said in an interview on NBC's Meet the Press that Obama needs Clinton's help to corral hesitant Democratic senators to support the trade measure. "She can't sit on the sidelines and let the president swing in the wind here," he said.

Martin O'Malley Hires Political Director Before Likely Run // New York Times // Maggie Haberman - May 7, 2015

Martin O'Malley, the former Democratic governor of Maryland, is moving to solidify his team for his all-but-certain 2016 presidential campaign, bringing on a former aide to President Obama as his national political director.

Karine Jean-Pierre will be taking on that role, according to Mr. O'Malley's aides. Mr. O'Malley is expected to announce his presidential candidacy in the coming weeks.

Ms. Jean-Pierre was the deputy battleground states director for Mr. Obama's re-election campaign in 2012. Before that she worked as regional political director in the White House Office of Political Affairs.

Ms. Jean-Pierre has spent time immersed in a crucible of liberal primary politics — she was the campaign manager for Letitia James, the New York City public advocate, in her primary campaign runoff in 2013. She also was a senior adviser to Bill Thompson when he ran for mayor of New York that same year.

Mr. O'Malley has been making repeated trips to early voting states in recent months, and is scheduled to return to New Hampshire next week. He has also been trying to sharpen the distinctions between himself and Hillary Rodham Clinton on key issues.

Martin O'Malley Keeps On Baiting Hillary Clinton // Bloomberg Politics // Sahil Kapur - May 7, 2015

According to the latest polls, it may not be working, but Martin O'Malley remains a mission to paint Democratic presidential frontrunner Hillary Clinton as an inauthentic opportunist, as evident in his messaging so far and signals from people familiar with his political strategy.

The former Maryland governor hasn't yet formally declared his intentions to challenge Clinton for the White House but he has begun portraying her as a politician who shapes her positions according to public opinion. In marked contrast to Senator Bernie Sanders, a Vermont socialist who had an outwardly friendly Twitter exchange with Clinton on the day he announced he was challenging her, O'Malley has gone after the former secretary of state, albeit sometimes without mentioning her name.

"I believe that we are best as a party when we lead with our principles and not according to the polls," he told reporters when he spoke at Harvard on April 16, summing up the theory of his would-be candidacy. "And every election is about the future. And leadership is about making the right decision, and the best decision before sometimes it becomes entirely popular." One day later he took a similar veiled swipe at Clinton on CBS' Face

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Nation. "You can't forge public opinion by following public opinion," he said.

So far, as Clinton has worked to align herself with progressives on a host of issues—sometimes altering her past positions. She has also maintained intimidatingly high popularity levels with Democrats.

O'Malley, by contrast has scant name recognition and barely registers in early primary polls. The lead singer of an Irish rock band named "O'Malley's March," he strikes up the same tune on issue after issue: I was fighting on the progressive side from the start; Clinton wasn't—and in some cases still isn't. (Her campaign declined to comment for this article.)

Here are five notable examples.

Child Refugees at the Southern Border

As Clinton was shoring up her progressive credentials on May 5 at a Las Vegas roundtable by championing relief for undocumented people brought to the U.S. as children, O'Malley spokeswoman Lis Smith released a statement touting his support for letting a flood of children who arrived at the Southern border last year stay in the U.S. after they had fled gang violence in Central America.

"Governor O'Malley stood up when it mattered. When most leaders in the Democratic and Republican Parties were saying that we should close our border to children fleeing violence in Central America, he defied them and said that we could not send children 'back to certain death.' He was criticized for that position, but leadership is about forging public opinion, not following it."

The context: The timing of Team O'Malley's statement made clear that it was a thinly veiled reference to Clinton saying in 2014 that the unaccompanied minors "should be sent back." At the time, the issue received national attention and the Obama White House and Republicans broadly agreed that the children should be processed by the system and deported.

Same-Sex Marriage

Under O'Malley's watch in November 2012, Maryland became one of the first states to approve same-sex marriage, and the former governor loves to brag about his role in the battle. "I believe marriage is a human right, not a state right. I'm glad she's come around to that position," he told reporters in mid-April, referring to Clinton.

The context: Clinton had just completed her 180-degree flip on gay marriage; her campaign said the Supreme Court should declare it a constitutional right for same-sex couples in a landmark case expected to be decided next month. Her evolution was gradual: in 2013, after stepping down as secretary of state, she came out for same-sex marriage. But as recently as June 2014 she told NPR she wants to let states prohibit it if they choose to, a position that gay rights advocates (and, increasingly, Americans) oppose.

Drivers' Licenses for the Undocumented

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As governor, O'Malley signed a law permitting undocumented immigrants to obtain drivers' licenses. "I believe that we do our country a disservice when we make it harder for new American immigrants to abide by the rules of the road and obtain drivers' licenses," he told a group of reporters at Harvard University in April. "And I'm glad she [Clinton] has come around to that position."

The context: During the 2008 primary, Clinton opposed drivers' licenses for people in the U.S. illegally (after initially hesitating during a debate). At the time the Democratic Party was divided on the issue of immigration. Not so anymore. In mid-April, days after launching her 2016 campaign, she came around. "Hillary supports state policies to provide drivers' licenses to undocumented immigrants," her campaign told the Huffington Post.

Social Security Expansion

In early March, O'Malley said he'd push for more generous Social Security benefits as president. He reiterated that position in his April speech at Harvard, saying: "Rather than reducing Social Security benefits or privatizing Social Security, we need to expand Social Security benefits." He wants to pay for it by lifting the cap on payroll taxes for incomes above a certain level. Currently, income above $118,500 is not taxed to support Social Security.

The context: O'Malley was drawing a contrast with Clinton, who in 2008 called for a bipartisan commission to propose changes to Social Security. He was well aware that she hadn't taken a position on the issue of expansion, which has been growing in popularity with progressives. Last month her campaign spokesman Jesse Ferguson said "dealing with challenges facing older Americans is a top priority for her" and touted her "record of fighting against privatizing Social Security and opposing cuts to seniors benefits."

Trade

"Hard Choice? Nope. To me, opposing bad trade deals like TPP is just common sense," O'Malley wrote in an April 22 fundraising email, making a snarky reference to Clinton's 2014 memoir Hard Choices. "American workers whose jobs could be on the line right now are owed more than lip service. They deserve to know where leaders stand."

The context: So far, Clinton has not taken a position on the Trans-Pacific Partnership agreement that the U.S. is negotiating with some dozen countries. Congress could begin debating it as early as next week. The White House supports it; the AFL-CIO and many groups on the left oppose it. "She will be watching closely," Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill said in a statement on April 17, "to see what is being done to crack down on currency manipulation, improve labor rights, protect the environment and health, promote transparency, and open new opportunities for our small businesses to export overseas."

Can Elizabeth Warren Kill President Obama's Trade Deal? // TIME // Haley Sweetland Edwards - May 7, 2015

Elizabeth Warren, the famously fiery populist senator from Massachusetts, has a reputation for having a bit of a reverse-Midas touch, when she wants to: if she decides she is against something, it often turns to smoke.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The latest subject of her withering glare? In a letter to supporters Thursday afternoon, Warren decried a sub-chapter in the Obama administration's proposed trade deal, the Trans-Pacific Partnership, that would allow companies to sue foreign countries through an extra-judicial tribunal made up of three for-profit arbitrators.

If that sounds a little hard-to-follow, that's because it is. But Warren's street cred with liberals is strong enough that they tend to take her lead even when the argument can't be summed up in a simple bumper sticker slogan.

Provisions for these tribunals — known as an investor-state dispute system, or ISDS — have appeared in more than 3,000 trade deals, including the North American Free Trade Agreement, since the 1950s, according to Jeff Zients, the director of the National Economic Council.

But Warren argues that it's different this time around. For one, the Trans-Pacific Partnership is enormous. It includes the U.S. and 11 other countries, including Japan, Australia and Chile, oversees a whopping 40% of the world's total annual GDP, and it's irreversible: once we're in it, there's no getting out.

And for another, she claims that ISDS isn't what it used to be. Two decades ago, when NAFTA was ratified, multi-national corporations were smaller and less powerful than they are today. Her case is that as those interests have gotten bigger and bigger, they've gotten more litigious: in the four decades from 1959 to 2002, there were fewer than 100 ISDS cases world wide. Between 2010 and 2013 alone, there were more than 200.

"Recent cases include a French company that sued Egypt because Egypt raised its minimum wage, a Swedish company that sued Germany because Germany decided to phase out nuclear power after Japan's Fukushima disaster, and a Dutch company that sued the Czech Republic because the Czechs didn't bail out a bank that the company partially owned," she wrote in a Washington Post op-ed this winter.

In February, John Oliver, the Comedy Central comedian and host of Last Week Tonight who also holds sway with liberals, mocked an effort by the tobacco company, Philip Morris, to use ISDS to reverse public health regulations in Uruguay's designed to reduce the smoking rate.

President Obama, backed by most Republicans, a majority of Democrats, and the powerful corporate interest groups, like the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the Business Roundtable, says Warren is just plain wrong. (He'll be at Nike's headquarters in Oregon on Friday explaining why the TPP is great.) ISDS is necessary, the deal's backers argue, to ensure the corporations feel comfortable making direct foreign investments in other countries — particularly those with less well developed court systems.

But policy arguments aside for a moment, will the famous Warren touch work this time around?

In the past, Warren has been successful in taking down very narrow targets. Last fall, she set her sights on Antonio Weiss, the White House's nominee for Treasury undersecretary for domestic finance, and by January, he'd bowed out. Before that, Warren helped doom Obama's plan to nominate former Treasury Secretary Larry Summers to head the Federal Reserve.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Warren's also had some off-days. She failed, for example, in her effort last December to quash Congress's unwieldy continuing resolution and omnibus bill — nicknamed the "Cromnibus" — which included provisions that unwound financial regulations.

And the Trans-Pacific Partnership, for better or worse, may have more in common with the latter than the former. Like the Cromnibus, the TPP is huge, unwieldy, and also includes provisions that many Democrats will like.

Plus, there are technical difficulties. If Congress passes what's known as the "fast-track" bill next week — it's unclear if they currently have the votes they need — there won't be any room for debate about which parts to keep, rewrite, amend or scrap. The fast-track bill binds Congress into an up or down vote on the final version of the trade deal.

And if it comes down to a simple "yes" or "no," Warren's famous touch, however powerful, might not be enough.

GOP

Rubio Headlines Fundraiser For Policy Group That Supports Conversion Therapy // Buzzfeed // Chris Geldner – May 7, 2015

Rubio Headlines Fundraiser For Policy Group That Supports Conversion Therapy

Republican presidential contender Marco Rubio headlined a fundraiser Wednesday night for the conservative Arizona group behind much of the state's socially conservative legislation.

Although there was no media inside the room at the Center for Arizona Policy fundraiser, held at Arizona Christian University, and a spokesperson from Rubio's campaign did not respond to repeated requests Wednesday for comment about the event or what Rubio planned to say, at least two attendees did post on social media from within the event with remarks from Rubio.

"Even as I'm speaking to you now, a human life is being terminated in America," a congressional staffer attending Wednesday's event quoted Rubio as saying. The staffer works for Rep. Trent Franks, who also was in attendance.

"Without faith at the core of our society, you fall into an era of moral relativism," the staffer quoted Rubio as saying.

When Rubio was discussing marriage, the Franks staffer did not quote Rubio directly, but he tweeted, "Dangerous era in America, says @marcorubio, where if you believe in the traditional definition of marriage, you're a bigot."

Rubio did not apparently reference or discuss the center's stated support for conversion therapy — a practiced banned when used on minors in New Jersey, California, and DC — and his spokesperson did not respond to a question asking whether Rubio agrees with the group's view that "homosexuals [can] modify[] their behavior and becoming heterosexual through Christian ministries and counseling."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Just last month, Rubio expressed a different view, saying, "[T]he bottom line is, I believe that sexual preference is something people are born with."

Arizona state Sen. Katie Hobbs, the Democratic minority leader in the state Senate, spoke with BuzzFeed News about the event, noting that an abortion bill was one of the two key pieces of legislation the center pushed in the legislature this term. The other related to vouchers, she said. In the past legislative term, the group had pushed the religious liberty bill that eventually was vetoed by former Gov. Jan Brewer.

Hobbs criticized Rubio's appearance before the Center for Arizona Policy. "I know that's there's folks in their base for whom these social issues matter," she said of the Republican Party, "but average Americans should be worried that these are the issues a presidential candidate is focusing on." She described the group as having power within the state capitol — but also out of the mainstream.

Marco Rubio Campaigns on His Immigrant Story, Cautiously // New York Times // Jonathan Martin and Ashley Parker - May 7, 2015

ANKENY, Iowa — At a recent ice cream social here, Jim Hallihan liked what he heard from Senator Marco Rubio.

He praised the Florida senator's youthful optimism and his eloquent testimony to the opportunities America offered.

But there was something larger that drew Mr. Hallihan, a former Iowa State basketball coach, to Mr. Rubio, 43, the son of poor Cuban immigrants.

"The day of the older white guy is kind of out," said Mr. Hallihan, a 70-year-old white guy.

As Mr. Rubio has introduced himself to curious, and overwhelmingly Caucasian, Republican audiences from Iowa to New Hampshire, he has vaulted to the front ranks of the early pack of likely presidential candidates, partly because of his natural political talent. But it may owe just as much to the combination of his personal story and the balm it offers to a party that has been repeatedly scalded by accusations of prejudice.

He says he is highlighting his background only to share his own twist on the American dream — not out of any desire to make history on behalf of Hispanics. But Mr. Rubio and those around him are also acutely aware of the sometimes raw tensions in his party, between those unsettled by an increasingly diverse society and those who say Republicans must embrace the multihued America of 2015.

To the party operatives and donors who have placed long bets on him, and to the rank-and-file primary voters he has impressed, Mr. Rubio's candidacy seems to affirm the idea that, in a free market, anyone can rise without the benefit of connections or wealth. That he did so as the child of Latin American parents who fled an autocratic government and toiled in the humblest of jobs — maid and bartender — has sent some Republicans swooning.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“The identity politics people in the party want a champion who looks like him to mitigate accusations of racism,” said Ben Domenech, a conservative writer. “And the classical conservatives look at him and say, ‘This is somebody who can sell our ideas to the public.’”

Conservatives have long had a philosophical contempt for politics driven by gender, racial or class designations. But those sentiments are giving way as the party tries to compete with Democrats, who galvanized support among targeted demographics to decisively win consecutive presidential elections.

Republican voters are overwhelmingly white: The composition of the electorate in almost every contested state during the 2012 party primary was about 90 percent or more non-Hispanic white, according to exit polls.

A New York Times/CBS Poll this week found that 68 percent of Republicans think America is ready to elect a Hispanic president. And after nearly eight years in which Republicans have angrily disputed charges that their opposition to President Obama was rooted in racial animus, Mr. Rubio could serve as an unspoken, but forceful, rebuttal.

“The same things that ignited Democrats about Obama are what will ignite Republicans for Rubio,” said Ed Failor Jr., an Iowa Republican strategist.

Or, as Mr. Domenech put it, “If we look to politicians to make us feel good about ourselves, do you want to go with just another Republican caricature, or somebody who has this unique appeal?”

Andrea Szewczyk, 51, a Republican and a schoolteacher in Romeo, Mich., who was surveyed in the Times poll, said she believed that Mr. Rubio’s ethnicity could excite the electorate, much as she said Mr. Obama’s identity did. “We’d get some Democrats voting Republican because of it,” she said.

Indeed, much as many white liberals treasured the opportunity to support Mr. Obama, white conservatives may welcome a Bible-quoting, handsome Hispanic capable of evangelizing the gospel of American exceptionalism in two languages.

Mr. Rubio disputes suggestions that he is capitalizing on the history-making potential of becoming his party’s first nonwhite nominee.

“The presidency is too important to say we’re going to share it among ethnicities,” he said in an interview.

Much as Mr. Obama avoided running expressly as a black candidate, Mr. Rubio is uneasy about explicitly invoking his ethnicity in the primary of a party that can seem split between tapping into and trying to overcome white-resentment politics.

Instead, just as Mr. Obama’s talk of “hope and change” in 2008 allowed voters to project their own vision onto the candidate, Mr. Rubio’s campaign is its own Rorschach test.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

His advisers assert that Mr. Rubio's background is compelling to voters across racial lines, many of whom are themselves only a few generations removed from Ellis Island narratives. But they have also studied the voter rolls to see how Mr. Rubio might spur Hispanic turnout in some heavily white states — say, by delivering him as few as 5,000 Hispanic votes in Iowa.

Still, if some Republicans love the idea of what Mr. Rubio's race represents, others are wary. "Eight years of one demographically symbolic president is enough," said Wayne R. LaPierre, chief executive of the National Rifle Association, at its annual conference last month.

Mr. LaPierre was referring to Mr. Obama and Hillary Rodham Clinton, who, if elected, would be the first female president. (The Republican field includes another Latino, Senator Ted Cruz of Texas, whose father emigrated from Cuba.)

But Mr. Rubio seems mindful of the risks of confronting the most conservative elements of his party over delicate racial issues.

At a candidate forum in New Hampshire last month, he passed up the chance to offer even a gentle reproach to a woman who, citing bilingual store signs and automated phone lines, complained that immigrants were not "coming here and learning English."

"Well, here's the bottom line," Mr. Rubio told her. "If you don't speak English, you're not going to prosper economically in America."

At a similar gathering recently in Iowa, Mr. Rubio recounted vowing to his dying grandfather, in Spanish, that he would study hard and not squander opportunities. But Mr. Rubio told the story in English.

Asked if he was comfortable speaking Spanish on the campaign trail, Mr. Rubio seemed to grow momentarily defensive. "Sure," he said, adding, "I don't want to make Spanish illegal."

"I'm ultimately saying that you have to have a unifying language where your schools are taught, what your laws are written in and how others communicate with each other," he continued. "Every nation needs a unifying language; our unifying language is English."

As for those with dial-1-for-English gripes, Mr. Rubio said, "I know Hispanics that complain about that, especially people in the second or third generation."

Mr. Rubio has met with some pushback in his party from people who see the country changing and want to stop placating those who are unhappy about it.

"You can't allow yourself to be pushed back into 'English only, English only,' " said former Representative Henry

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bonilla of Texas, a Republican and Mexican-American. “This is the U.S.; our language is English. But we’re in a global economy now, so why wouldn’t you want to know more than one language?”

Mr. Rubio does not entirely avoid speaking Spanish: He frequently gives interviews to Spanish-language journalists, especially in Florida. And in his announcement speech in Miami last month, he shared a benedictionlike saying of his late father’s: “En este país, ustedes van a poder lograr todas las cosas que nosotros no pudimos,” Mr. Rubio said. Then he translated it: “In this country, you will achieve all the things we never could.”

But he is careful about how he presents his dual identity. In a video his campaign released shortly after he entered the race, Mr. Rubio was shown answering the questions about him posed in frequent Google searches. “What nationality is Marco Rubio?” he said, reading one. “I’m an American — of Hispanic descent.”

By contrast, Jeb Bush, whose wife is Mexican and often refers to their “bicultural” children, is not so torn: He delights in opportunities to demonstrate his fluent Spanish, and last week he courted voters in Puerto Rico. “I know the power of the immigrant experience because I live it each and every day,” he said there.

The legislative embodiment of the conflicting forces tugging at Mr. Rubio was the effort to overhaul American immigration laws. He helped write a comprehensive bill including a path to citizenship for 11 million undocumented immigrants already in the country. But it died in the Republican-controlled House, and provoked outrage from the party’s most reliable primary voters.

Last month, when Mr. Rubio made his first trip to Iowa after announcing his campaign, he was confronted at a closed-door meeting by Mariannette Miller-Meeks, a former congressional candidate, who pointedly urged him not to retreat from an immigration overhaul.

“My advice to Senator Rubio was to be honest with people, be yourself,” Ms. Miller-Meeks said afterward, “because that will carry a lot of weight.”

'Underdog' Rick Santorum says he'll announce intentions May 27 // Politico // Nick Gass – May 7, 2015

Rick Santorum will announce whether he will make a run for president later this month at an event in his hometown of Butler, Pennsylvania, on May 27.

“Look, it was a great campaign last time,” he told Fox News’ Greta Van Susteren on Wednesday night, referencing his 34-vote victory in the 2012 Iowa Republican caucus. “We were clearly the underdog and we are starting out as looking at this race and we would be in the same position. And so we are very comfortable there.”

Santorum said he is looking at a venue in the town approximately 35 miles north of Pittsburgh “to sort of talk about what it was like growing up there and where America needs to go in the future.”

The former Pennsylvania senator made his 2012 announcement in Somerset, Pennsylvania — an hour and a half east of Pittsburgh and near where his grandfather worked as a coal miner.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Santorum also touched upon the social issues he might tackle if he announces a presidential run.

“Talking about what we can do to help strengthen that family structure is going to be certainly a part of the campaign,” he said.

Why Carly Fiorina is on a media blitz // CNN Politics // Chris Moody – May 7, 2015

A central theme of Carly Fiorina's nascent campaign for the Republican presidential nomination is that she is uniquely positioned to neutralize the historic potential of Hillary Clinton's 2016 bid.

But first, she has to introduce herself to voters, who in large part don't know who she is.

On the day she announced her candidacy, Fiorina sat for two interviews with ABC's "Good Morning America" in New York. Then she hopped on a phone for a mid-morning press call with 65 journalists. After lunch, she was off to Yahoo News' studio for a live sit-down with anchor Katie Couric, followed by a question-and-answer session using the live-streaming app Periscope. That evening, she joined Megyn Kelly on Fox News.

The next day was no different: Fiorina navigated eight interviews, including Glenn Beck's radio show, CNN and "The Late Show with Seth Meyers." Seven more interviews were scheduled Wednesday, followed by five press availabilities over the weekend in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina.

Fiorina's exhaustive schedule is emblematic of candidates who enter the race without a lick of national name ID. For a candidate whose name barely registers in CNN/ORC polls conducted regularly since November, Fiorina — and upstart candidates like her -- must rely on the media's megaphone to get her name heard. Even better-known contenders like Sens. Ted Cruz of Texas, Rand Paul of Kentucky and Marco Rubio of Florida, did a media blitz after announcing their presidential bids.

"Candidates with lower name identification must jump at virtually every opportunity to garner media coverage," said Republican political consultant Ellen Carmichael, who managed press outreach for Herman Cain's presidential campaign in 2011, a candidate who started out virtually unknown. "For some, this means creating their own news by saying things the media deems controversial. For others, it means answering every media inquiry and agreeing to every interview that comes your way. More established candidates, however, have the luxury of passing on requests."

That's one luxury that Clinton is enjoying.

Since her presidential campaign announcement on April 12, Clinton has not held a formal press conference. While on the campaign trail, she has responded — reluctantly at times -- to roughly eight questions from journalists.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Even that count is a charitable one, given that some responses have been little more than short exclamations, such as, "I'm having a great time, can't look forward any more than I am," which she said in response to a question about her strategy in Iowa. When a reporter in New Hampshire asked about her next stop on the campaign trail, she merely said, "Oh, onward."

Clinton has been so reclusive in the first weeks of her candidacy that the New York Times started publishing questions their reporters would have asked her that day on the campaign trail if they had had the chance.

At this early stage in the race, Clinton doesn't need to rely on the media to reach her core supporters. She has a Twitter feed with 3.47 million followers and a new Facebook page that has grown to 800,000 online supporters since her announcement in April. This week her campaign launched a web series called, "The Briefing," which it intends to use to combat what they consider unfriendly media coverage.

It would be hard to see how any other candidate could take such a brazen go-it-alone approach.

Of course, Clinton's absence from media interviews does not come without consequence.

Her lone official challenger, Sen. Bernie Sanders, announced his candidacy last week and quickly booked a round of interviews, which led the liberal magazine Mother Jones to post the jabbing headline, "Bernie Sanders Has Already Taken More Press Questions Than Hillary Clinton."

This is one of the few instances in which die-hard liberal Sanders and conservative Fiorina are in the same boat: The CNN/ORC poll in April found that just 5% of Democratic voters would consider supporting Sanders, compared to 69% for Clinton.

As the campaign progresses, Clinton will become more available for press questions, Clinton spokesman Jesse Ferguson told CNN. But as the frontrunner 19 months until the general election, her campaign strategists know that journalists will still continue to cover her regardless of whether she answers questions.

Her lesser-known opponents—on both sides of the aisle—don't have that benefit.

Jeb Bush is Failing to Impress Iowa Republicans, Poll Shows // New York Times // Alan Rappeport - May 7, 2015

Former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida has been on a fund-raising tear as he prepares before a probable announcement that he is running for president, but he might want to spend some more time in Iowa.

The crucial caucus state that kicks off nominating season is not particularly impressed with Mr. Bush so far, according to a new poll released on Wednesday by Quinnipiac University.

In a survey of 667 Republicans who are most likely to participate in the Iowa caucuses, Mr. Bush comes in seventh with just 5 percent saying they would probably support him. A quarter of Iowa Republicans who might caucus said they would definitely not support him.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The poll shows that 45 percent of the Iowans surveyed had an unfavorable opinion of Mr. Bush, with the same number saying he is not sufficiently conservative.

The figures show the challenge that Mr. Bush could face charting a path to securing the Republican nomination and consolidating conservative voters. The poll has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 4 percentage points.

Quinnipiac's poll shows Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin as the early favorite in Iowa, with 21 percent of likely Republican caucus-goers most likely to back him. Senators Rand Paul of Kentucky, Marco Rubio of Florida and Ted Cruz of Texas are all vying for second place.

"For national unknowns like Walker and Rubio, a fast start in Iowa may be critical to their chances of overall success, while supporters of national names like Bush note that fewer than half of Iowa winners wind up inhabiting the Oval Office," said Peter Brown, assistant director of Quinnipiac's poll.

Jeb Bush Plans to Spend More Time in Iowa // New York Times // Alan Rappeport - May 7, 2015

Former Gov. Jeb Bush will have the chance to correct his polling problems in Iowa with a trip to the state next week.

Mr. Bush will join several others considering White House bids at the Republican Party of Iowa's Lincoln Dinner in Des Moines on May 16. He will also participate in a town hall meeting at Loras College in Dubuque and attend a fund-raiser with Senator Charles E. Grassley in Iowa City.

Jeff Kaufmann, chairman of Iowa's Republican Party, said that while the state does not necessarily feel neglected by Mr. Bush just yet, he'll need to put some serious time in if he wants to connect with voters.

"The amount of time he's going to spend here is going to have to change to move those particular numbers," Mr. Kaufmann said.

The visit will be Mr. Bush's second trip this election cycle. He traveled to Iowa in March to be a guest of honor at a fund-raiser for Representative David Young, a House freshman.

The Republican from Florida heads to the Hawkeye State as his support there has been flagging among likely caucusgoers. A Quinnipiac University poll on Wednesday showed his support at 5 percent, placing him in seventh place behind potential rivals for the nomination.

Supporters of Mr. Bush have noted that past candidates such as Michele Bachmann and Herman Cain performed well in early Iowa polls before flaming out as others began more serious efforts in the state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While Mr. Bush continues to show strength in polls in New Hampshire, where he was atop WMUR's latest Granite State Poll, a strong showing in Iowa will be important for his momentum as next year's nomination contest gathers pace.

"He's going to have the opportunity to address a whole lot of Republican activists in a week," Mr. Kaufmann said. "I look for him to be very active in the state."

One of Jeb Bush's top advisers on Israel: George W. Bush // Washington Post // Robert Costa and Matea Gold - May 7, 2015

When asked this week at an exclusive Manhattan gathering about who advises him on U.S.-Israel policy, Jeb Bush surprised many of the 50-plus attendees by naming his brother, former president George W. Bush, as his most influential counselor.

"If you want to know who I listen to for advice, it's him," Bush said Tuesday, speaking to a crowd of high-powered financiers at the Metropolitan Club, according to four people present.

The remark came as part of an answer to a question about Bush's political advisers and their policy views. Bush was pressed for details about who he surrounds himself with and consults as he thinks through his positions, guests said.

The Republicans in the room who spoke with The Washington Post were granted anonymity to divulge information about the proceedings, where confidentially was insisted upon by the event's host, GOP mega-donor Paul Singer.

Embracing his brother as a foreign policy confidant is a risky and unexpected move for the former Florida governor as he readies for a likely presidential run. While George W. Bush's approval ratings have improved since he left office in 2009, his foreign policy legacy — particularly the long war in Iraq — remains deeply unpopular. He has also become anathema to some conservative activists for presiding over an increase in the federal debt, among other policies.

As he has explored a 2016 campaign for the White House, Jeb Bush has sought to create distance from the family political brand. While Bush has not criticized his brother, he rarely cites him as his guide on policies. And George W. Bush said last month that he planned to stay away from the campaign trail because voters do not like political dynasties.

Jeb Bush's revelation that he regularly speaks with his brother about Israel also indicates that the siblings may be closer than often portrayed. The relationship is is often described as cordial and warm, but distant on policy matters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Tim Miller, a Bush spokesman, played down the significance of Bush's comment.

"Governor Bush has said before that his brother is the greatest ally to Israel in presidential history, he admires his stalwart support for our ally, and that is in line with his commitment to standing with Israel in the face of great threats to their security and our own," Miller said in a statement Thursday.

Singer, a hedge-fund billionaire, hosted the session — which was not a fundraiser — for his friends and associates to hear from Bush. Similar meetings have been held with Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida and former Hewlett-Packard chief executive Carly Fiorina, three of Bush's potential rivals in the 2016 race.

The question that led to Bush's response was about how much he relied on former secretary of state James Baker, a respected party figure but one who angered conservative Republican hawks in March when he addressed the left-leaning pro-Israel advocacy group J Street. During his keynote speech, Baker criticized Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu for not embracing a two-state solution.

Bush said at the Manhattan gathering that he respected Baker, but insisted that he is not part of his foreign policy team. He then said that one person he routinely looks to for guidance on Israel is his brother.

"It was a very positive response, just based on faces around the room," one attendee said. "There didn't seem to be any sort of negative reaction."

But others said that many in the room were surprised by Bush's answer. A majority of registered voters still have unfavorable views of how George W. Bush handled his job as president, according to a Washington Post-ABC News poll in March. Still, there remains deep affection in the GOP for George W. Bush, with 87 percent approving of his White House tenure.

Last month, the former president drew warm reviews for his appearance before a gathering Republican Jewish Coalition, where he answered questions about his time in the White House and his post-presidency.

T. Boone Pickens, With Cash, Backs Jeb Bush // New York Times // Alexandra Stevenson - May 7, 2015

LAS VEGAS — The oil tycoon T. Boone Pickens is backing former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida for president, saying Thursday that he had donated $100,000 to help give Mr. Bush a leg up in the 2016 election.

"I've already backed him," Mr. Pickens said, speaking on the sidelines of a hedge fund conference in Las Vegas, where some of the industry's best-known and wealthiest investors are speaking this week. But, Mr. Pickens quipped, it will take $100 million to get Mr. Bush elected.

Once called a corporate raider by Time magazine, Mr. Pickens has emerged as the latest billionaire to play the political game just as the landscape has started to get colorful. Over the next few weeks and months, some of the country's wealthiest people — many of them from Wall Street — will throw fund-raisers to help candidates supercharge their efforts through donations to their campaigns and to “super PACs.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Called the Super Bowl of the hedge fund industry, the SkyBridge Alternatives Conference has drawn public figures like Ben S. Bernanke, the former Federal Reserve chairman; George Papandreou, the former prime minister of Greece; and the political operative Karl Rove to the Bellagio hotel for three days of debate and discussion.

Much of the focus this year has been on politics and the 2016 election. As V.I.P. guests sipped on champagne and networked in the Bellagio’s high-roller Villa Privé on Tuesday night, rumors swirled that some prominent attendees were absent and dining with Hillary Rodham Clinton at the house of a local head of a business in Las Vegas.

On stage Thursday, Mr. Pickens elicited cheers from an audience of hedge fund managers and financial advisers when he called Mrs. Clinton a “loser.”

He gave a wide-ranging, 30-minute interview during which he complained about gridlock in Washington and expressed frustration that President Obama had vetoed a bill that would have approved construction of the Keystone XL oil pipeline, a cross-border project with Canada. Environmentalists and several leading climate change scientists have urged Mr. Obama to reject the pipeline, contending that its construction makes it easier to move heavily polluting petroleum from the Canadian oil sands.

Mr. Pickens said he thought that Mr. Bush, if elected, would help usher in the project.

“You’ve already passed the House and the Senate,” Mr. Pickens said, adding, “so a new president would fix it.”

While on stage, Mr. Pickens said he was about to “give up on Washington” and complained that the government was spending too many resources in the Middle East to protect its oil interests there. He argued that the government was doing more to protect the oil interests of countries like China and regions like Europe than those of the United States.

“The oil sands in Canada is being offered to the U.S., no special cost, no military protection,” Mr. Pickens added.

Lindsey Graham Slams Hillary Clinton's New Immigration Proposal // Bloomberg Politics // Sahil Kapur - May 7, 2015

The 2016 battle lines are quickly forming on immigration.

South Carolina Senator Lindsey Graham, who is exploring a run for the Republican nomination, ripped into Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton's proposal to expand President Barack Obama's executive actions to additionally offer deportation relief to undocumented parents of young people brought to the U.S. illegally, who have been granted "deferred action" protections.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"She's shown no leadership on this issue. She's been a follower. I think it's just political pandering," Graham said. "No American should want the executive branch to do something this monumental by themselves."

"Clear to me," he said, "this is a sign of her weakness."

Graham argued that he would have the most credibility of any presidential candidate to push through a permanent legislative solution on immigration. "I think I could sit down with Democrats, who've known I've taken a beating to try to get a fair compromise," he said, referring to his co-authorship of a sweeping immigration reform bill that passed the Senate with bipartisan support in 2013 and died in the House. "And I think I could convince my party that now's the time to get this behind us."

He brushed off a question about whether Clinton's endorsement of the idea—which Hispanics and immigrant-rights groups strongly support—poses a problem for Republicans in the 2016 election. "I think what Hispanics want is a fix to the problem," he said. "What she's doing is ensuring a third wave of illegal immigration. I think there'll be a backlash in this country."

While some Republican hopefuls such as Jeb Bush and Florida Senator Marco Rubio have not commented silent on Clinton's new proposal, Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker criticized it as a "full embrace of amnesty" that is "unfair to hardworking Americans and all immigrants who followed the law."

The Clinton campaign has suggested it will make immigration a major issue in the upcoming election.

Arizona Senator John McCain—the party's 2008 nominee, who according to exit polls lost badly among Hispanics—pointed out that a federal judge has halted the "unconstitutional" executive actions that Clinton is offering to expand.

"I think it's very obvious that she's trying to reach out to the Hispanic vote, and get the kind of support that Obama got in the last election. It's clearly a political ploy," he said. "A naked political ploy."

Will it work?

"We Republicans have to give Hispanics reasons to vote for us," McCain said.

Lindsey Graham: '98.6% sure' to run, and on a different path on immigration // USA Today // Susan Page - May 7, 2015

WASHINGTON — South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham, who says he's "98.6% sure" he'll run for the Republican presidential nomination, vows to chart a course on immigration at odds with every other contender in a large and growing GOP field.

Graham's formal announcement, expected within the next few weeks, would add the voice of a leading national-security hawk and an architect of the 2012 Senate immigration bill that for a time raised hopes of a bipartisan agreement on a comprehensive overhaul.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"If I were president of the United States, I would veto any bill that did not have a pathway to citizenship," Graham, 59, told Capital Download, USA TODAY's weekly newsmaker series. "You would have a long, hard path to citizenship ... but I want to create that path because I don't like the idea of millions of people living in America for the rest of their lives being the hired help. That's not who we are."

The third-term senator from a solidly red state insists that his position doesn't doom his long-shot bid for the Republican nomination — and he says the GOP risks electoral disaster in 2016 with its current hard line on immigration.

"We'll lose," he says flatly. "I mean, we've got a big hole we've dug with Hispanics. We've gone from 44% of the Hispanic vote (in the 2004 presidential election) to 27% (in 2012). You'll never convince me ... it's not because of the immigration debate."

Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton spotlighted the GOP's tough stance on Tuesday, announcing in Las Vegas that if elected she would expand President Obama's executive order allowing young people brought to the U.S. illegally as children to avoid deportation. She defended providing a path to citizenship. "Make no mistake: Not a single Republican candidate, announced or potential, is clearly and consistently supporting a path to citizenship — not one," she said.

With Graham's likely announcement, that is no longer true. While he opposes Obama's use of executive orders to protect the "DREAMers," Graham's position on citizenship puts him closer to Clinton than to any of his GOP rivals on immigration.

Most of the other Republican contenders say border security must be tightened before the legal status of an estimated 11 million undocumented residents can be discussed. None of the other hopefuls now endorse simultaneously providing a path to citizenship.

Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, who also helped negotiate the bipartisan Senate bill, now says securing the borders must come first. Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker once said he supported a path to citizenship but now opposes it. Former Florida governor Jeb Bush endorses a path to legal status short of citizenship.

"One of the candidates here helped write the bill; he now says we've got to secure the border first," Graham says, referring to Rubio. "That's not practical. No Democratic Congress is going to give the Republican Party everything we want on border security until you tell them what happens to the 11 million."

Graham took some shots at another fellow senator and presidential rival, Rand Paul of Kentucky, for his approaches on national security issues involving Iraq, Iran, Syria and Israel. "He's a nice man; I like him a lot (but) he's a libertarian. He is one step behind leading-from-behind," Graham said. "At the end of the day, his world view has not stood the test of time and I think he'd be the worst possible person to send into the ring when it came to foreign policy."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Worse than Hillary Clinton?

"She could get to his right very easily," he said.

Graham also blasted Clinton, who by one count has answered just seven questions from reporters since she formally announced her presidential campaign.

"I don't know how people in your business put up with this," he says. "She wants to be president of the United States. She's doing a listening tour from North Korea. Kim Jong Un — whatever the new guy's name is, Kim Jong Un? There's more access to him than I think there is to her."

Lindsey Graham looking at June 1 to announce White House run, sources say // Politico // Katie Glueck - May 7, 2015

Lindsey Graham is telling donors that June 1 is the likely date for his presidential announcement, according to several sources familiar with the conversations.

The announcement would likely take place in South Carolina, possibly near his home base of Seneca, according to the sources, which would enable the GOP senator to highlight a compelling personal story not widely known outside his home state.

Graham grew up in nearby Central, S.C., in the back of a pool hall run by his parents, who died young. He helped raise his sister while going to college and serving in the Air Force. It's a hardscrabble story that could help him stand out in a field of candidates with wealthy backgrounds, including Jeb Bush.

A spokeswoman for Graham said Thursday that she couldn't confirm any information about a potential announcement. The senator's team has suggested they were looking at a mid-May time frame.

Graham's hawkish views would almost certainly be a central feature of an announcement speech as he weighs a bid premised on his experience on defense and foreign policy. While the three-term senator is a long shot to win the GOP nomination, he could play an important role in driving foreign policy and national security issues to the forefront of the primary debate.

Graham will be entering a crowded field of Republican presidential contenders that includes three fellow senators who have already formally kicked off their campaigns — Ted Cruz, Rand Paul and Marco Rubio.

So far, the candidates with whom Graham contrasts — and clashes — with most are Paul and Cruz, the former over foreign policy and the latter over his often-uncompromising conservative positions.

Graham has said he is "98.6 percent" sure he will run, and during appearances in the Palmetto State over the weekend, he all but announced that he's in.

"To our enemies: Get ready, because there's a new way of doing business coming," Graham said last Friday at a state GOP Silver Elephant dinner. "To our friends: Get ready for the America that you used to know. To Iowa and New Hampshire: Hello. To South Carolina, you have my heart."

Rand Paul praises 'monumental' NSA ruling // The Hill // Ben Kamisar - May 7, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) on Thursday praised a court ruling that found the NSA's bulk metadata collection program illegal a “monumental decision for all lovers of liberty.”

“I commend the federal courts for upholding our Constitution and protecting our Fourth Amendment rights,” he said in a statement released by his presidential campaign.

“While this is a step in the right direction, it is now up to the Supreme Court to strike down the NSA’s illegal spying program.”

The Second Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Thursday that the NSA’s program, which culled data from Americans' phone calls, was outside of the authorization set forth by the Patriot Act, the law passed on the heels of the 9/11 attacks that gave broad authority to the intelligence community.

Paul, who is lauded by the libertarian wing of the Republican Party, has pressed for the repeal of the Patriot Act and has offered bills that limit the spying powers of the intelligence community.

Substantial aspects of that law are set to expire by the end of the month, unless Congress acts. Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) wants to extend the entire bill, while others have offered a variety of ways to tamp down the authority it gives to the federal government.

Paul, McConnell part ways on Patriot Act // The Hill // Julian Hattem - May 7, 2015

Sens. Mitch McConnell and Rand Paul are on opposite sides in the battle over government surveillance, putting the alliance between the two Kentucky Republicans to the test.

While McConnell made clear this week that he wants to move forward with his own “clean” legislation to reauthorize three expiring portions of the Patriot Act, Paul, who is running for president, has been one of the law’s most vocal critics.

With a handful of legislative days left until the surveillance measures expire, Paul has been surprisingly mum on whether he opposes McConnell’s plan, though few expect him to stay silent for long.

“I think both McConnell and Paul realized all along in this deal that there were going to be issues where they just had to agree to disagree,” said Josh Withrow, legislative affairs manager at FreedomWorks, which opposes McConnell’s Patriot Act bill. “This will probably be one of those.”

Their relationship got off to a rocky start, when McConnell endorsed Trey Grayson, then Kentucky’s secretary of State, in the 2010 Republican primary against Paul, who shortly after refused to say whether he would back McConnell for Republican leader.

Since then, the two men have struck up a friendship, with Paul providing critical support to McConnell on the campaign trail during his reelection race last year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Returning the favor, McConnell has said he is “almost certainly” supporting Paul in his White House bid, adding that his colleague is “the most credible candidate for president of the United States since Henry Clay.”

“I’m a big fan of his,” McConnell said on CNN last year. “I mean, we started off on opposite paths, but we’ve become great allies. ... I think he’s a very, very smart, capable guy.”

But their relationship will be put to the test in the coming weeks, when the Senate is expected to take up three expiring provisions of the Patriot Act, including the controversial section that the National Security Agency has relied on to collect the phone records of millions of Americans.

The legal powers are set to expire at the end of May, and the Senate’s last scheduled legislative session for the month is May 22.

McConnell has made clear that he supports a speedy extension of the law, so as not to tie “our hands behind our back” when it comes to terrorism. Legislation he recently introduced with Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman Richard Burr (R-N.C.) would renew the Patriot Act provisions unchanged through the end of 2020 and is likely to become the main vehicle moving through the Senate.

“I think, most likely, the outcome is some kind of an extension,” McConnell said this week.

So far, Paul has yet to take a public stand on the legislation.

“We currently are not commenting on future votes,” Paul spokeswoman Jillian Lane said on Wednesday.

Announcing his candidacy for president last month, Paul vowed he would end the National Security Agency’s bulk collection of Americans’ phone records on his first day in the White House.

“The president created this vast dragnet by executive order. And as president, on Day One, I would immediately end this unconstitutional surveillance,” he said.

Last year, Paul voted to filibuster an NSA reform bill that would have extended the Patriot Act provisions to 2017 while also imposing sweeping new limits on the spy agency’s collection of Americans’ communications. Unlike the other lawmakers who opposed the bill, Paul said he cast his vote because the reforms didn’t go far enough.

In a statement at the time, Paul said he “stood on principle by opposing a bill that included a provision reauthorizing elements of the Patriot Act that violate the Bill of Rights.”

“I have always been steadfast against the Patriot Act and I will continue to do all I can to prevent its extension,” he said in the November statement.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That caused a certain amount of grief among his fellow civil libertarians, who questioned whether his strategy wouldn't end up empowering hawks in Congress who are skeptical of limiting the NSA.

This time around, Paul seems to be aiming his fire at other Senate hawks, such as likely fellow White House hopeful Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.).

"One unapologetic senator who I've had a few rounds with said, 'If you're not talking to terrorists, why are you worried?' " he said in April, in an oblique reference to Graham. "Our Founding Fathers would be mortified."

"I think it is a political calculation that he is making by not criticizing McConnell directly," said one person close to the Senate negotiations, who asked to remain anonymous in order to discuss the matter frankly.

That's not to say that Paul will continue to be quiet.

But as the Senate nears the deadline for action, Paul might try to avoid making it a personal fight with McConnell, observers say.

"I would probably expect him to kick and scream without mentioning McConnell's name," the person close to the situation added. "I do not expect Rand Paul to do anything other than theatrics, because he does not want to endanger his relationship with McConnell, and it is clear where McConnell stands."

Chris Christie: Hillary Clinton 'pandering' on immigration // CNN Politics // Chris Moody - May 7, 2015

Sunapee, New Hampshire (CNN)New Jersey Republican Gov. Chris Christie on Thursday slammed Hillary Clinton's call for a "full and equal" path to citizenship for immigrants living in the United States illegally, calling her comments extreme.

"I think the path to citizenship is a problem for folks who have been waiting the appropriate way to get in, so I think we have to have a much broader conversation than just pandering. We should not just be pandering. We should be talking about this, honestly," said Christie, who is exploring a possible bid for the presidency, while meeting with supporters at a restaurant here.

Earlier this week, Clinton surprised supporters by adopting an aggressively liberal stance on immigration -- one she did not embrace during her White House bid in 2008 -- vowing full support for citizenship for undocumented immigrants.

"We have to finally, once and for all, fix our immigration system," Clinton said during a roundtable discussion with undocumented children in Las Vegas on Tuesday. "Make no mistake, today not a single Republican candidate, announced or potential, is clearly and consistently supporting a path to citizenship. Not one. When they talk about legal status, that is code for second-class status."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Immigration has been a difficult issue for both parties in recent years, one that has befuddled the presidential administrations of both President Barack Obama and President George W. Bush, neither of whom could usher a comprehensive bill through Congress. The issue is fraught with political pitfalls, as leaders in both parties see the issue as a gateway toward securing votes from the rapidly growing Hispanic-American population.

Christie, who said he plans to outline his own position on immigration in "a detailed speech" soon, suggested that Clinton's most recent position was unrealistic.

"Her position now is not really addressing what the country wants to hear about this," he said. "That's not a thoughtful position."

"I haven't met a person yet whose undocumented who came here and said, 'The reason I came here was because I wanted to vote,'" Christie said. "They say they come here because they wanted to work. I think that's where the focus has to be."

Christie Brings His Drug Treatment Message to New Hampshire // WSJ // Heather Haddon - May 7, 2015

MANCHESTER, N.H.—New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie brought his campaign to reduce the stigma surrounding drug treatment to a receptive audience Thursday in New Hampshire, a state that has grappled with a wave of overdoses attributed to illegal narcotics.

Mr. Christie spoke about New Jersey's expansion of drug intervention courts at a substance abuse-treatment facility here and met with those who have overcome addiction to now advocate for others to seek help.

The Republican governor called the "war on drugs" that started decades ago "a failure and ineffective."

"I've always felt like this is an illness," Mr. Christie said about drug addiction. "Everybody in life makes mistakes and we need to give people a second chance."

Mr. Christie said that visiting drug-treatment facilities would be a regular occurrence for him as the potential 2016 presidential candidate travels nationally with his political-action committee, Leadership Matters for America. There were 321 drug-related deaths last year in New Hampshire, city officials said.

The governor returned to the Granite State on the first of a two-day swing in the first-in-the-nation primary state. He received a standing ovation at a bar in New Hampshire's Lakes Region and took questions from voters about immigration, tuition costs, health care and national security.

Few voters mentioned the George Washington Bridge scandal, nor did they seem to care about it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"That was a distraction but now that Bridgegate thing is in the past," said Ellen Mehan, a retiree with a lake house in Sunapee, N.H., who came to the One Mile West bar to hear Mr. Christie speak.

Federal prosecutors say three former Christie allies deliberately closed lanes to the bridge for five days in 2013, causing traffic backups in Fort Lee, N.J., to punish Fort Lee's mayor for not endorsing Mr. Christie for re-election.

A past Christie appointee to the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey has pleaded guilty to charges in the case. Two other former Christie allies have pleaded not guilty. Authorities haven't accused Mr. Christie of wrongdoing.

Mr. Christie has been dogged by press questions about the bridge during political travel earlier this week in Louisiana and Mississippi, and in New Hampshire Thursday.

The governor said he has taken steps to address the scandal and it wouldn't reflect on the kind of administration he would administer if he was elected to the White House.

"I don't think you can find one administration, whether it's at the governor's level or the presidential level, that hasn't had mistakes or had problems. What matters is how you respond to them," he said. "We responded swiftly."

Mr. Christie will return to New Hampshire next Tuesday to deliver a second policy speech addressing tax policy, regulation and economic growth, his PAC announced Thursday.

Mr. Christie's advisers are banking on a strong showing in New Hampshire's GOP primary if he chooses to run for president. Mr. Christie has said he would announce a decision on whether he will run by June.

On Friday, he continues his New Hampshire trip with a breakfast visit to an Amherst diner, a private business roundtable hosted by former state Sen. Gary Lambert and a town-hall meeting at Fury's Publick House bar in Dover.

Fiorina Comes Out Against TPP: 'I Am Very Uncomfortable With This Deal' // Daily Caller // Alex Griswold - May 7, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Carly Fiorina said she opposes giving President Obama fast track trade authority and is "very uncomfortable" with Obama negotiating the Trans-Pacific Partnership on "The Laura Ingraham Show" Thursday.

INGRAHAM: I gotta ask you about fast track trade, because you know for me, I believe a populist approach is the way to win and build the Republican Party both among minorities and grassroot supporters. And for me, this fast track deal, the way its being negotiated, the way congressional authority is being eroded, is a terrible idea, especially with Obama doing the negotiations.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What's your take on giving President Obama trade promotion authority?

FIORINA: Well, I believe that free and fair trade advantages the U.S.. But I am very uncomfortable with this deal, and I'm uncomfortable with this deal and giving him trade authority.

Because first of all, I know from personal experience that the Chinese have not lived up to their agreements when they entered the WTO. In other words, partners can cheat on these deals, and we have evidence of partners cheating on these deals.

Secondly to your point, this is an extremely complicated deal, a multilateral deal with a lot of details that we don't know about. And Obama and his administration has demonstrated their inability to negotiate a good deal. And so look, I think the devil's in the details, and we better understand what these details are before we just assume it's a good deal. I don't assume it's a good deal and I do think we need the details.

Republican presidential contenders are split on "fast track" trade authority, with former Arkansas Governor Mike Huckabee joining Fiorina in opposition, but Senators Marco Rubio and Ted Cruz in support.

Republican National Committee to share data with 2016 campaigns // Washington Examiner // David Drucker - May 7, 2015

The Republican National Committee has signed data-sharing agreements with the leading GOP presidential campaigns, providing these entities access to the party's voter file and digital analytics clearinghouse.

The accord, to be announced by RNC Chairman Reince Priebus on Thursday, provides the Republican White House contenders access to the party's $100 million-plus data and voter turnout program, built from scratch following President Obama's 2012 re-election victory. Agreements were reached with the campaigns of the announced candidates as well as and political action committees of the presumed but not yet official candidates.

"The 2016 election will be a data-driven campaign cycle, and I am enthusiastic about the possibilities these agreements provide," Priebus said in a statement shared with the Washington Examiner. "These list exchanges will allow the RNC to benefit from enhancements made by these PACs and campaigns so that the RNC, the eventual presidential nominee, and Republican candidates up and down the ticket will have an even more robust data for use in the general election."

The agreements are a two-way street, as the campaigns and political action committees will share with the RNC updates to any of the data they use in their political activities. Deals have been reached with:

American Future Project (Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal); Carly for President (business woman Carly Fiorina); Cruz for President (Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas); Leadership Matters for America (New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie); Our American Revival (Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker); Patriot Voices (former Sen. Rick Santorum); Reclaim America (Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida); RickPAC (former Texas Gov. Rick Perry); and Right to Rise (former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"By committing to this plan for enhanced data, we can ensure that the party will be prepared to target and turn out voters in the general election with the most complete and up-to-date voter file. We know that voters do not want another four years of Obama-Clinton policies, and this unprecedented data exchange will allow us to win the White House in 2016," Priebus said.

AP-GfK Poll: Republicans open to softer immigration policy // The Big Story // Thomas Beaumont and Emily Swanson - May 7, 2015

WASHINGTON (AP) — Americans appear open to a softer immigration policy than Republican presidential candidates have preached in the past. Even a majority of Republicans in the country can see themselves voting for someone who would protect millions of immigrants from deportation, according to a new poll.

The Associated Press-GfK poll finds that Republicans overwhelmingly want a candidate to reverse President Barack Obama's unilateral action to postpone deportations. But most could see themselves voting for someone who would keep that policy in place.

The poll was conducted before Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton's effort this week to magnify the difference between letting people who are in the country illegally have legal status, which some Republicans support, and letting them gain citizenship, which she supports. The poll suggests that people don't see much difference.

"This country has always had open doors," said Dean Talmadge, a Republican from suburban Seattle. "I don't just have a problem with immigration, as long as they are here, working and following the rules."

That's a sentiment shared by most Americans, who according to the poll, favor a path to citizenship by 53 to 44 percent. It did not make a significant difference if respondents were asked instead whether they supported a path to legal status short of citizenship: 50 percent said they favored it and 48 percent opposed.

Clinton's remarks Tuesday were aimed at Hispanic voters, who heavily supported Obama in 2012, especially in battleground states such as Florida, Colorado and Nevada, where Latinos form an influential bloc.

She also said she would expand Obama's executive action, which shielded many young immigrants brought to the country as children, along with parents of citizens and permanent residents, from deportation.

In the poll, about 6 in 10 Americans and 4 in 10 Republicans support those key measures of the Obama policy. Americans overall were split about evenly on whether they would prefer to vote for a candidate who would keep or undo the executive action.

"I don't have a problem if they want to earn their citizenship while they are here," said Darlene Harmison, a Republican from Colfax, Iowa, a rural town east of Des Moines. "I'm not saying send them all back. But I do agree they need to speak English."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Most GOP presidential prospects support allowing people who are in the country illegally to stay while pursuing legal status. But they stop short of offering citizenship, although a few have not ruled that out as an eventual prospect.

Their positions, which are sometimes in flux and not always fleshed out, seem to reflect what the poll finds to be fragile acceptance among Republican voters of policies that had spelled trouble for past candidates.

Three-quarters of Republicans in the poll say they would prefer to vote for a 2016 candidate who would undo Obama's immigration action — even more than the two-thirds of Republicans who say they oppose a path to citizenship or legal status.

Even so, 55 percent of Republicans either prefer a candidate who would support Obama's policy or say that they could vote for someone who does if they agreed on other issues. Even among conservative Republicans, nearly half — 47 percent — could at least imagine voting for a candidate who would keep it in place.

In 2006, Republican Sen. John McCain, who supported a bipartisan bill that included a path to citizenship, was surprised at the backlash he received from Republicans in early voting states as he began taking steps toward running for president.

"There's no question it was not well received by certain segments of our electorate," said David Roederer, McCain's 2008 Iowa campaign director.

More recently, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, a GOP presidential candidate, faced pushback from tea party supporters when he co-authored legislation that would have set out a path to citizenship for those who met certain conditions, over time. The bill passed the Senate, failed in the House and convinced Rubio that immigration policy would have to be changed only piecemeal.

He still supports a path to citizenship, but wants to start with securing the border and end with letting people who are in the U.S. illegally stay.

Even those viewed as hardliners are not calling for mass deportation of the millions in the country illegally, signaling a possible shift in the GOP political landscape as the nation — judging by the poll and other measures — also evolves.

—

The AP-GfK Poll of 1,077 adults was conducted online April 23-27, using a sample drawn from GfK's probability-based KnowledgePanel, which is designed to be representative of the U.S. population. The margin of sampling error for all respondents is plus or minus 3.4 percentage points. Some questions were asked of a half sample and have higher margins of error.

Respondents were first selected randomly using phone or mail survey methods and later interviewed online.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

People selected for KnowledgePanel who didn't otherwise have access to the Internet were provided access at no cost to them.

TOP NEWS

DOMESTIC

N.S.A. Phone Data Collection Is Illegal, Appeals Court Rules // New York Times // Charlie Savage and Jonathan Weisman - May 7, 2015

WASHINGTON — A federal appeals court in New York on Thursday ruled that the once-secret National Security Agency program that is systematically collecting Americans' phone records in bulk is illegal. The decision comes as a fight in Congress is intensifying over whether to end and replace the program, or to extend it without changes.

In a 97-page ruling, a three-judge panel for the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit held that a provision of the U.S.A. Patriot Act, known as Section 215, cannot be legitimately interpreted to allow the bulk collection of domestic calling records.

The ruling was certain to increase the tension that has been building in Congress as the provision of the act that has been cited to justify the bulk data collection program nears a June 1 expiration. It also comes amid a global uptick in controversy over electronic surveillance, including a push in France to increase domestic spying and a decision by Germany to reduce cooperation on surveillance with the United States.

The ruling ratchets up pressure on Senator Mitch McConnell, Republican of Kentucky, the majority leader. Mr. McConnell has resolutely pressed to maintain the N.S.A.'s existing program against bipartisan pressure to scale it back, and has proposed simply extending the statute. But the court's ruling calls into question whether that statute can still be used to issue fresh orders to phone companies requiring them to turn over their customers' records.

Thursday's ruling is the first time a higher-level court in the regular judicial system has reviewed the N.S.A. phone records program. It did not come with any injunction ordering the program to cease, and it is not clear that anything else will happen in the judicial system before Congress has to make a decision about the expiring law.

The data collection had repeatedly been approved in secret by judges serving on the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, known as the FISA court, which oversees national security surveillance. Those judges, who hear arguments only from the government, were willing to accept an interpretation of Section 215 that the appeals court rejected on Thursday.

The court, in a unanimous ruling written by Judge Gerard E. Lynch, held that Section 215 "cannot bear the weight the government asks us to assign to it, and that it does not authorize the telephone metadata program." It declared the program illegal, saying, "We do so comfortably in the full understanding that if Congress chooses to authorize such a far-reaching and unprecedented program, it has every opportunity to do so, and to do so unambiguously."

The House appears ready to pass a bill next week that would end the government's bulk collection of phone records. That bill, known as the U.S.A. Freedom Act, would replace it with a new program that would preserve the N.S.A.'s ability to analyze links between callers to hunt for terrorists, but keep the bulk records in the hands of phone companies, which would be free to dispose of them after 18 months. The N.S.A. keeps them for five years.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the appeals court ruling raises the question of whether Section 215, extended or not, has ever legitimately authorized the program. The statute on its face permits only the collection of records deemed "relevant" to a national security case. The government secretly decided, with the FISA court's secret approval, that this could be interpreted to mean collection of all records, so long as only those that later turn out to be relevant are scrutinized by analysts.

However, Judge Lynch wrote: "Such expansive development of government repositories of formerly private records would be an unprecedented contraction of the privacy expectations of all Americans. Perhaps such a contraction is required by national security needs in the face of the dangers of contemporary domestic and international terrorism. But we would expect such a momentous decision to be preceded by substantial debate, and expressed in unmistakable language."

Judge Lynch was appointed by President Obama. He was joined in the decision by Judge Robert D. Sack, a Clinton appointee, and Judge Vernon S. Broderick, another Obama appointee. Judge Broderick usually hears Federal District Court cases but was sitting on the appeals court for this case as a visiting judge.

The appeals court sent the matter back to a Federal District Court judge to decide what to do next. The government could also appeal the ruling to the full appeals court, or to the Supreme Court. Parallel cases are pending before two other appeals courts that have not yet ruled.

Alexander Abdo, who argued the case for the American Civil Liberties Union, praised the ruling as a "victory for the rule of law that should spur Congress into action." Several lawmakers who helped draft the U.S.A. Freedom Act seized on it as justification for enacting their bill. Among them, Senators Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, and Mike Lee, Republican of Utah, said in a joint statement: "Congress should not reauthorize a bulk collection program that the court has found to violate the law. We will not consent to any extension of this program."

Mr. McConnell and another supporter of the existing program, Senator Richard M. Burr of North Carolina, the chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, took to the Senate floor on Thursday and gave no ground.

Mr. McConnell blasted the House bill as "an untested, untried and more cumbersome system" that would neither "keep us safe or protect our privacy."

"Section 215 helps us find a needle in the haystack," he said. "But under the U.S.A. Freedom Act, there might not be a haystack at all."

But Senator Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said both sides now have to come to the table because it was not clear that either option — the U.S.A. Freedom Act or extending the existing program — has the 60-vote support necessary to overcome a filibuster.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. McConnell has the power to decide which bills get brought up for a vote. To create more time for debate, Democrats might permit an extension of the existing statute for a month, said a person familiar with the negotiations who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss their progress. The Democrats would do that in exchange for a promise by Mr. McConnell to allow a vote on the House bill in June.

Still, even if there were votes in Congress for a short-term extension of the existing statute , Thursday's ruling would create potential political and legal difficulties for keeping the program going in the interim.

To bridge any gap between the existing program and a new one, the Obama administration would have to ask the FISA court to reauthorize the program and a FISA judge would have to agree to do so, notwithstanding the Second Circuit's ruling that Section 215 cannot authorize such an order.

(The FISA court is not directly subject to the Second Circuit's authority because it has its own appeals court.)

In a statement, Edward Price, a spokesman for the National Security Council, said the administration was still evaluating the ruling but reiterated that President Obama's support for legislation that would transform the program is in line with the U.S.A. Freedom Act.

The bulk phone records program traces back to October 2001. After the Sept. 11 attacks, President George W. Bush secretly authorized the N.S.A. to begin a group of surveillance and data-collection programs, without obeying statutory limits on government spying, for the purpose of hunting for hidden terrorist cells.

Over time, the legal basis for each component of that program, known as Stellarwind, evolved. In 2006, the administration persuaded a FISA court judge to issue an order approving the bulk phone records component, based on the idea that Section 215 could be interpreted as authorizing bulk collection.

Many other judges serving on the FISA court have subsequently renewed the program at roughly 90-day intervals. It came to light in June 2013 as part of the leaks by the intelligence contractor Edward J. Snowden.

The revelation led to a series of lawsuits challenging the program. Different district court judges reached opposing conclusions about its legality. Thursday's ruling did not address the A.C.L.U.'s separate argument that bulk collection of records about Americans — regardless of the claimed statutory basis — is unconstitutional.

FBI knew shooter might go to Muhammad drawing contest // Washington Post // Adam Goldman - May 7, 2015

FBI Director James B. Comey said Thursday his agents learned hours before the start of a cartoon contest and exhibit depicting the prophet Muhammad that one of the gunmen had expressed interest in going to the controversial event in Texas, but there was no indication he was planning an attack.

Comey said the FBI sent an intelligence bulletin to local authorities through its Dallas field office that included a picture of Elton Simpson, 30, and other details such as his associates and possible license plate numbers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“But we didn’t know more than that,” Comey said in an interview with reporters at FBI headquarters.

Simpson and his roommate, Nadir Soofi, 34, who lived in Phoenix, were killed by a local traffic officer as they opened fire at a conference center in Garland, Tex., where the competition was taking place.

The two men were heavily armed, U.S. law enforcement officials said. They had six weapons — four handguns and two semiautomatic assault rifles. Soofi is thought to have purchased one of the rifles on Craigslist, officials said.

All of the weapons were purchased legally, according to officials who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss an ongoing investigation.

Comey also provided details about the FBI’s long-standing interest in Simpson. He said FBI agents in Phoenix began investigating Simpson in about 2006, based on information that he was looking to travel to Somalia to join al-Shabab, an al-Qaeda affiliate and a U.S.- designated terrorist organization.

Simpson was arrested in 2010 after he bought a plane ticket to South Africa. He was charged with lying to FBI agents in connection with terrorism. He was convicted, however, of a lesser charge the following year and sentenced to three years’ probation.

Comey said the FBI continued to investigate Simpson until 2014. Agents in Phoenix reopened the case in March, Comey said, after “we developed information that he was making statements on social media that might indicate a renewed interest in jihad, but this time with” the Islamic State.

He added that the “investigation was open, but far from complete.”

Comey declined to discuss whether the FBI was also looking at Soofi, but other officials said agents in Phoenix were preparing to investigate him when the shooting took place.

In an interview with the Wall Street Journal, Soofi’s mother, Sharon Soofi, said her son had discussed Anwar al-Awlaki, the radical American preacher who took on a prominent role in al-Qaeda’s Yemen affiliate before he was killed in a 2011 drone strike.

Soofi’s mother said her other son, Ali Soofi, lived with his brother and Simpson. She said Ali Soofi was concerned about Simpson’s influence on his brother and recently moved out.

Comey said the FBI will review whether the bureau made any missteps and could have stopped Simpson and Soofi before the attack. But, he said, he hasn’t seen any indications that his agents missed a major warning sign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The roommates apparently fell under the sway of the Islamic State, which has been using social media, including Twitter, to encourage attacks in the United States.

Comey said the Islamic State's effort to recruit and motivate people in the United States to try to do harm was paying dividends.

"If you can't travel, kill where you are," Comey said, echoing the Islamic State's message to followers. He described the Islamic State's message as a siren's song, one easily accessed on phones or computers.

"It's almost if there is a devil sitting on the shoulder saying, 'Kill,' 'Kill,' 'Kill,' 'Kill,' all day long," he said.

Comey also discussed whether the attack was actually directed by the Islamic State. He said al-Qaeda previously would train its operatives so they could be vetted before getting an assignment.

"But what we see [the Islamic State] doing is trying in a way to test people's bona fides by urging them to kill," he said. "Sometimes supplying with them hit lists, sometimes suggesting particular targets, but other times just 'kill in our name.' In a way, the old paradigm between inspired or directed breaks down here.

"The distinction is irrelevant. I find it not to be a useful framework any longer."

Justice Department to launch federal investigation of Baltimore police // WaPo // Sara Horwitz – May 7, 2015

Attorney General Loretta E. Lynch has decided to launch a federal investigation into whether the Baltimore Police Department has engaged in a "pattern or practice" of excessive force.

Lynch's announcement about the Justice Department's probe — the latest in a string of municipalities that are being investigated by the federal government for civil rights violations — could come as early as Friday, according to two law enforcement officials.

A Justice Department spokeswoman declined to comment Thursday night.

Lynch hinted Thursday that a decision could come soon, when she testified during her first hearing on Capitol Hill as attorney general. She said that she would decide "in the coming days" whether to have the department's civil rights division open an investigation into the Baltimore police force.

Baltimore Mayor Stephanie Rawlings-Blake on Wednesday called on the Justice Department to open a federal investigation. Rawlings-Blake made the request after Baltimore State's Attorney Marilyn J. Mosby filed criminal charges against six Baltimore officers who were involved in the arrest of Freddie Gray, who died of injuries sustained while he was in police custody.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Baltimore Police Commissioner Anthony W. Batts welcomed any federal review. “I think it’s a good thing,” Batts told WBAL-TV on Thursday after a conference of police chiefs. “We could use the extra weight. Lawsuits are down. Citizen complaints are down. Officer-involved shootings are down. But the community doesn’t feel it.”

Mosby said Gray was arrested illegally, was treated callously by the officers and suffered a severe spinal injury April 12 in the back of a police van while his pleas for medical help were ignored.

Gray’s death April 19 ignited protests and rioting in Baltimore and is the latest case to spark anger about law enforcement tactics in low-income neighborhoods across the country.

“We all know that Baltimore continues to have a fractured relationship between the police and the community,” Rawlings-Blake (D) said when she asked the Justice Department for federal help. “I needed to look for any and all resources I could bring to my city to get this right for my community.”

In her first official trip as attorney general, Lynch visited Baltimore on Tuesday and met with the mayor, law enforcement officials and community leaders. She also met with Gray’s family and spoke with an officer who was injured in the violence. Vanita Gupta, acting assistant attorney general for the civil rights division, has also been meeting with Baltimore officials since the outbreak of violence after Gray’s funeral April 27.

“The situation in Baltimore involves a core responsibility of the Department of Justice — not only to combat illegal conduct when it occurs but to help prevent the circumstances that give rise to it in the first place,” Lynch told the Senate Appropriations subcommittee on commerce, justice, science and related agencies. “When there are allegations of wrongdoing made against individual officers and police departments, the Department of Justice has a responsibility to examine the evidence and, if necessary, implement changes.”

Since 1994, the Justice Department has been able to investigate local police departments under the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act. The departments in Ferguson, Mo., and Cleveland are undergoing federal civil rights investigations. A white police officer in Ferguson fatally shot unarmed teen Michael Brown in August, and 12-year-old Tamir Rice was shot and killed by a Cleveland police officer in November.

Baltimore resident Kevin Moore captured video of Freddie Gray being loaded into a police paddy wagon on April 12. In this video, Moore reflects on what he witnessed and talks about the charges brought against six officers in the death of Gray. (DeNeen Brown and Ashleigh Joplin/The Washington Post)

Over the past two decades, some city officials have asked the Justice Department to investigate and help reform their departments, as Rawlings-Blake did this week.

Former D.C. police chief Charles H. Ramsey called in the Justice Department after a 1998 Washington Post series found that D.C. police had shot and killed more people per resident in the 1990s than any other large American city police force.

Federal “pattern or practice” probes focus on the entire police department, rather than investigating the conduct of certain officers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In that way, they are different from civil rights investigations of certain individuals, such as the two-year-long probe into the death of Trayvon Martin, the 17-year-old African American from Florida who was unarmed when he was fatally shot by a former neighborhood watchman; the civil rights investigation into the death of Brown; and the ongoing probe into the death of Eric Garner, an African American man who died after being placed in a chokehold by a white officer on Staten Island.

Ramsey, now Philadelphia's police commissioner, said at a law enforcement gathering two years ago that he asked the federal government for help because the D.C. community "did not have confidence that we could fix the problems on our own."

Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.) made the same point during the congressional hearing with Lynch on Thursday morning when she said she supported the mayor's request to open an investigation. She sent a formal letter to the attorney general Thursday afternoon.

"Last year, 120,000 police stops occurred in Baltimore," Mikulski said. "We're a population of 610,000. That's a lot. I don't know what the appropriateness of that is, but I think we need to look at it.

"But I want to say this," Mikulski added. "In many cities throughout the country, and including my own town of Baltimore, and in communities primarily that have significant populations of color, there has been now a tattered, worn and even broken trust between the community and the police department. We've got to restore that trust."

Tornadoes Hit Plains States, Battering Oklahoma // New York Times // The Associated Press - May 7, 2015

OKLAHOMA CITY — The authorities on Thursday began surveying the damage left behind by spring storms carrying tornadoes that swept across the Plains and brought floods, forced the evacuation of an international airport and destroyed homes near Oklahoma City.

At least 12 people were injured, but no deaths were reported from tornadoes that hit rural parts of Kansas and Nebraska, as well as Texas.

The Oklahoma City area seemed to be the hardest hit. A tornado destroyed homes in Grady County, southwest of the city, and it appeared another tornado touched down in the area later Wednesday evening when a second storm came through.

"We do strongly think there was a tornado on the south side of Oklahoma City," a meteorologist, Michael Scotten, said after the second storm hit.

The storm flipped vehicles on Interstate 35 and left power lines strewn across the roadway, Mr. Scotten said. Officials twice evacuated the Will Rogers World Airport in Oklahoma City, sending passengers and staff members into a tunnel outside the security zone.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Before sunrise Thursday in northeast Oklahoma City, fire department divers worked for hours to rescue a driver who was trapped in a car by the high waters left in the wake of the storms. Capt. Dee Patty of the Oklahoma City Policy said the driver had used her cellphone to call for help.

Five to eight of rain had fallen in the area, said Forrest Mitchell, a meteorologist with the National Weather Service in Norman, Okla. A measurement of 7.1 inches at the Oklahoma City airport set a daily rainfall record, he said, topping the previous record of 2.61 inches.

A spokeswoman for Oklahoma City, Kristy Yager, said the rainfall prompted the city to issue a flash flood emergency for the first time in its history.

Lara O'Leary, a spokeswoman for Emergency Medical Services Authority, said ambulances had responded to water rescue calls from "all over" the Oklahoma City metropolitan area. Two ambulance crews required help after getting stuck in high water, she said.

Ms. O'Leary said ambulances had taken 12 residents from a trailer park in south Oklahoma City to hospitals. She had no details about their injuries.

The emergency management director for Grady County, Dale Thompson, said about 10 homes had been destroyed in Amber and 25 in Bridge Creek. As the storm moved to the east, forecasters declared a tornado emergency for Moore, where seven schoolchildren were among 24 people killed in a storm two years ago. When the first of the storms moved through Wednesday, school districts held their pupils in safe places.

Also in Grady County, all animals were accounted for after a zoo in Tuttle was hit by a tornado, Alisa Voegeli, a dispatcher at the sheriff's office, said. The damage had initially prompted fears that wild animals had escaped.

A flash flood warning was in effect for parts of six counties in central Oklahoma and two counties in north-central Texas. That area also experienced possible tornadoes late Wednesday, but there were no immediate reports of damage or injuries, Mr. Mitchell said.

In Nebraska, 10 to 15 homes were damaged near Grand Island, and between Hardy and Ruskin, near the Kansas line.

At least nine tornadoes were reported in Kansas, the strongest of them in the sparsely populated north-central part of the state. That included a large tornado near the tiny town of Republic just south of the Nebraska state line, where some homes were damaged. In Harvey County, a tornado destroyed a hog barn and damaged trees, according to the National Weather Service.

The Storm Prediction Center had warned that bad weather would come to the region known as Tornado Alley and said more storms were possible later in the week.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

INTERNATIONAL

Senate Passes Bill Giving Congress Right to Weigh in on Iran Nuclear Deal // WSJ // Kristina Peterson - May 7, 2015

WASHINGTON—The Senate overwhelmingly passed a bill Thursday establishing Congress's right to weigh in on international negotiations to curb Iran's nuclear program.

The 98-1 vote capped weeks of bipartisan efforts to strike a delicate deal on the legislation and then protect it from unraveling on the Senate floor under the weight of GOP attempts to push the Obama administration to take a harder line with Iran.

The underlying agreement, reached last month by Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Bob Corker (R., Tenn.) and the panel's top Democrat, Ben Cardin of Maryland, withstood two weeks of procedural machinations before passing easily Thursday, with only Sen. Tom Cotton (R., Ark.) opposed.

Senators said the vote marked a rare reclaiming of congressional authority over foreign policy, after years of taking a back seat to recent presidents.

"It's the first time in the eight years and four or five months that I've served in the Senate that I can remember Congress asserting itself and taking power back" from the executive branch, Mr. Corker said after the vote.

Thursday's action, however, is likely to be the high-water mark for congressional consensus on the nuclear negotiations, as the lawmakers have signaled they will likely diverge along partisan lines on the substance of the deal itself.

Democrats who were willing to buck an initially resistant White House for the right to scrutinize the deal are less likely to challenge it over the nuts and bolts of the agreement due by the end of June.

On Thursday, 151 House Democrats signed a letter to President Barack Obama backing the administration's negotiations with Iran and urging him to remain committed to diplomatic efforts. The U.S. and five other international powers are trying to reach a comprehensive pact on Iran's nuclear program by a self-imposed deadline at the end of June after agreeing on the framework of a deal in March.

Meanwhile, Republicans who worked with Democrats to stave off GOP amendments on the Senate floor that could have derailed the bill are likely to take a more critical eye than Democrats toward the nuclear talks' outcome.

"From what we've seen so far, we're very skeptical—I certainly am," said Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.).

In particular, while the crop of 2016 GOP presidential candidates fell in line with Mr. Corker's bill, many already are stressing their opposition to the deal's outlines as they seek to establish foreign-policy credentials in the crowded Republican primary field. Sen. Bernie Sanders (I., Vt.) who is running to be the Democratic presidential nominee, also backed the bill.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The bill would prevent Mr. Obama from waiving sanctions on Iran for 30 days while Congress reviews any final agreement to diminish Iran's nuclear capabilities. Lawmakers would then be able to vote to disapprove the deal, or take no action.

But skeptics noted that even if lawmakers voted to disapprove an Iran deal, Mr. Obama could veto that action—and that critics of any deal aren't expected to have enough votes to override a veto.

"This bill as drafted will provide some political cover to Senate Democrats to say they have voted to provide strict scrutiny and congressional approval of an Iran deal," presidential candidate Sen. Ted Cruz (R., Texas) said this week. "And yet as currently drafted, it is a virtual certainty that no matter how terrible this deal is, it will go into effect and this legislation is unlikely to stop it."

Republicans had pushed to vote on dozens of amendments that Democrats warned could sink the deal. The Senate defeated two contentious GOP measures before Mr. Cotton made an unorthodox procedural move last week that scuttled bipartisan talks to bring up more amendments for quick votes.

Mr. Cotton's move, like objections from Sen. David Vitter (R., La.), thwarted the ambitions of Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R., Ky.), who has sought to make allowing more amendment votes a trademark of his control of the Senate.

"I do regret we weren't able to follow through on the amendment process," said Mr. Corker, who noted it had been "hard to get the genie back in the bottle" after Mr. Cotton's effort to bring up votes on amendments from himself and Mr. Rubio.

Mr. Cotton said he opposed the bill because it didn't require a final deal with Iran to come to the Senate as a treaty, which would require the approval of two-thirds of the chamber.

"Congress should not accept this usurpation, nor allow the president any grounds to claim that Congress blessed his nuclear deal," the freshman senator said.

The White House had initially urged Democrats to reject the bill, but dropped its objections after Mr. Cardin brokered a compromise with Mr. Corker. The lawmakers' deal shortened the initial review period and boosted support for the bill to a veto-proof majority.

As part of the deal, the administration will also have to provide detailed reports to Congress on Iran's terrorist activities and certify to lawmakers every 90 days that Iran is complying with the nuclear agreement.

"What we're seeing is a determined bipartisan corps of members of the Foreign Relations Committee who want to see the Senate be relevant again in foreign relations and be more than just a speed bump on the way towards agreements internationally," said Sen. Chris Coons (D., Del.).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Scrutiny of the deal is expected to escalate as negotiators near the June deadline. Mr. Corker said he would be focusing on the quality of inspections meant to ensure Iran is meeting its obligations.

The Obama administration has been trying to sell the idea of an agreement with Iran to Arab allies, who have asked for military equipment and security assurances. Mr. Obama is meeting with top officials from six Arab countries at the White House and at the presidential retreat at Camp David next week.

Exit poll: Conservatives running strong in Britain election // USA Today // Kim Hjelmgaard, Jane Onyanga-Omara, and John Bacon - May 7, 2015

LONDON — An exit poll showed an unexpectedly strong vote for returning Prime Minister David Cameron and his Conservative Party to power in Britain's election Thursday, though the party appeared to fall short of an outright majority.

The poll by Britain's broadcasters showed the Conservatives would win 316 seats in Parliament – 10 short of a majority. A renewed coalition with the central Liberal Democrats could make up the difference to allow Cameron to form a new government.

The exit poll showed the Labour Party lagged with a projected 239 seats.

Pre-election polls showed a near toss-up between the Conservatives and Labour, led by Ed Miliband.

The Scottish National Party was in third place with 58 seats, followed by several other parties.

The poll suggested that Labour will come up short when the votes are counted because it lost most of its Parliament seats representing Scotland to a resurgent Scottish National Party, which favors independence from Britain.

The centrist Liberal Democrats appeared to perform poorly, garnering only 10 seats, according to the exit poll. But that would be enough to renew their current coalition with the Conservatives to form a government.

If the exit poll is accurate, it would appear to give Cameron a decisive lead going ahead with any potential coalition talks.

"I'd treat the exit poll with HUGE caution. I'm hoping for a good night but I think 58 seats is unlikely!" Scottish National Party leader Nicola Sturegon tweeted immediately after the results.

Paddy Ashdown, chairman of the 2015 general election campaign for the Liberal Democrats, who formed the previous coalition government with the Conservative Party, told the BBC he believed the exit poll was wrong, and that another survey by market research firm YouGov had predicted the party would get 31 seats.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Opinion polls are all over the place," he said.

Labour Party deputy leader Harriet Harman told the broadcaster: "If that poll is right about this election, the Tories (Conservatives) have more or less lost the majority for the coalition. If it's right, the question is whether they would be able to form a majority in the new parliament."

A majority of 326 seats is needed to govern without a coalition partner.

Polls closed at 10 p.m. local time (5 p.m. ET).

Around 50 million people voted in the election in some 50,000 polling stations up and down the country that included schools, community centers, churches and even pubs.

Heading into the voting, polls showed Cameron's Conservative Party was in a statistical dead heat with would-be leader Miliband of the Labour Party.

The candidates showed up early to vote, then slipped out of public view while awaiting the nation's decision. But their Twitter feeds didn't go silent.

"Let's not just reject the Conservatives today, let's reject the Tories' plan that always puts the rich and powerful first. #VoteLabour" Miliband tweeted several hours after voting began.

Cameron's Twitter counter: "Remember, Britain has the chance of a strong, stable Government - but only if you #VoteConservative today"

Supporters of both parties also could be heard on social media. But many Brits just wanted to be sure their countrymen voted.

"I've #voted exercise your democratic right and make sure this parliament really is the people's. #generationvote" tweeted Abitha Pallett, who described herself as a model, student and freelance journalist in London.

The final election tally detailing which 650 candidates have won seats in the House of Commons could come as early as Friday afternoon.

The expectations of a tight race meant that for the first time in generations minor parties with more niche interests could have a major impact on the composition of that government.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Scottish National Party, for example, wants to see Scotland leave the union with England. The U.K. Independence Party thinks Britain should abandon its membership of the European Union.

For many voters, the choice was difficult.

"When I went to vote this morning, I wasn't sure who I was going to vote for. It's hard to know who's best," said Ralph Prime, 51 of London, who ended up going with the Conservatives. "I spent a lot of time in the military and they're the only people I feel gave us appreciation," he said.

"Labour and Conservative — they just seem so alike nowadays," Prime added.

Outside a Westminister polling station, Diana Karter, 60, wouldn't say who she voted for, only that "it's a party I've not voted for since my early years."

Ezerol Petrie, 39, from Brixton in south London, is supporting the Labour Party and said he hopes for a prime minister who can stabilize the economy and provide more opportunities for young people, and for immigrants.

"Many (immigrants) have been working for many years, paying taxes and nothing's been done for them," he said.

Isatu Hamzie, 46, said she voted for Labour because she thought the party was best suited to help families and single parents like her.

"It's been tense for the past few years," she said outside a Westminster polling station about the tight political race. "I've never seen anything like it."

British academics and political experts say that while the results Friday may show which party won the most parliamentary seats, if no party gets the 326 seats needed to win an overall majority, it may be several days or even weeks before it becomes clear which party will be able to form the next government.

Yemen Al Quaeda Leader Who Claimed Credit for Charlie Hebdo Attack Killed in U.S. Drone Strike // NBC News // Daniella Silva - May 7, 2015

A senior al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula leader who claimed the group's responsibility for the Charlie Hebdo massacre and the murder of an American hostage during a botched raid in December has been killed in a U.S. drone strike in Yemen, it was announced Thursday.

Al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP) announced the death of leader Nasr bin Ali al-Ansi and other operatives by a U.S. drone strike in a video, which was verified by security consulting firm and NBC News partner Flashpoint Intelligence.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Al-Ansi had appeared in several militant videos for the group, including one claiming responsibility for the Paris attack on the satirical magazine Charlie Hebdo on Jan. 7, which left 12 people dead.

In the 11-minute video titled "Message regarding the blessed raid in Paris," al-Ansi said AQAP "chose the target, laid the plan and financed the operation," according to a translated transcript of the video put out by the group's official media wing.

Al-Ansi had also previously claimed the group was responsible for killing American hostage Luke Somers following a botched U.S. raid in December, according to Flashpoint.

Somers, 33, had been held by the group for a year before U.S. military forces set out to rescue him in an initial, failed first attempt. AQAP then released a video threatening to kill Somers within three days if their demands were not met.

In a second commando raid, the U.S. military failed to rescue Somers after his captors were alerted to their presence — possibly by a barking dog. The group shot and killed Somers along with a South African hostage. Six militants were also killed during the operation.

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS

Hillary Clinton's eight questions // Politico // Hadas Gold - May 7, 2015

Since announcing her bid for the presidency last month, Hillary Clinton has answered a grand total of eight questions from the media. Reporters have grown so frustrated by the limited media availability that they're beginning to publish the hypothetical questions they would ask Clinton -- if only they could. Of course, Clinton has no obligation to the press.

More confounding, however, is the way her campaign is spinning the issue: On Wednesday, Clinton spokesperson Jesse Ferguson posted this "philosophical" question on Twitter: "If a candidate answers hours of questions from real people on camera but they didn't come from press, did they happen?"

Ferguson is referring to the hours of round tables and events Clinton has had with voters in early states like Iowa and New Hampshire where she is asked and answered questions from voters. What Ferguson fails to mention is that many of the people asking the questions at these events were preselected by the campaign or the group hosting the campaign such as the recent immigration event in Las Vegas. This is far from a unique approach. Most campaigns do the same in order to ensure a positive reception.

So, to answer Ferguson's question, No: While questions from "real people" are incredibly valuable and should be paid attention to, questions from these often preselected voters are not a substitute for questions from the media.

Ferguson's tweet gives us an insight into how the Clinton campaign hopes to handle the media -- by going around them. Clinton does not need the media; she's got nearly 100 percent name recognition and very little competition from fellow Democrats. And, again, she has no obligation to the increasingly frustrated press.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton's liberal lean on immigration — and what it means for 2016 // Washington Post // Philip Bump - May 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton's announced Monday that she supported a full path to citizenship for people in the country illegally and possibly an expansion of President Obama's executive action on immigration. The move was hailed by progressives as surprisingly ... progressive. The only Republican whose stated position on the subject is anywhere close to Clinton's is Jeb Bush. And that, many feel, is one reason why it's now Clinton's professed position.

Last week, we looked at LIBRE, an organization heavily funded by the Koch brothers and which has been providing support services to Hispanics as part of an effort to introduce conservative political arguments and to collect contact information. As we noted then, Hispanics identify heavily as Democratic, but less so in recent years than Asian or black voters (based on annual surveys from Pew Research).

That's party identification -- not voting. To see voting, we can look at past exit polling. Looking at House races every two years, Hispanics have consistently voted more heavily Democratic than the voting population on the whole -- but the margin has been declining for the past two elections.

It's hard to say how Hispanics feel about the 2016 matchups so far, because many public polls don't offer breakdowns by race and many others focus on Iowa and New Hampshire, where Hispanic voters are not a large part of the electorate. Two polls, one from SurveyUSA in North Carolina and one from Mason-Dixon in Florida, do have breakdowns that compare Clinton to possible Republican primary opponents.

The match-ups against Bush and Marco Rubio (whose position on immigration has moved right in recent years) are closer among Hispanics than those against other candidates -- though Clinton still has a lead with Hispanics against both in both states.

Notice on the bottom graphs above that Hispanics are also more likely to say that they're undecided. There's a broader margin of error with the group in both polls, since the sample size is smaller. But compared to black voters, for example, the margins are much more modest. In the Mason-Dixon Florida poll, black voters prefer Clinton over Bush by 87 points and over Rubio by 77. Among Hispanics, it's 7 points and one point, respectively. The caveats, of course: Two polls, it's very early, etc.

When Obama announced his expanded immigration actions last fall, his support among Hispanics surged. Clinton doesn't need that surge right this moment. But next fall, she clearly hopes that her position on immigration will start letting a little more sunshine between her and whoever her opponent turns out to be.

The media's real role in 2016 // Politico // Dylan Byers - May 7, 2015

Let's be honest with ourselves for a second: This is Hillary Clinton's election to lose.

On Nov. 8, 2016, Clinton will start — start — with a minimum 247 of the 270 electoral votes she needs to win. If you give her Colorado and Virginia — which many political strategists would, given the Hispanic population in one and the rising influence of the northern-centered population in the other — she'll start with 269. That means Clinton doesn't need Ohio or Florida. She just needs one small state like Iowa, Nevada or New Hampshire to put her over the edge. And because she's got a boatload of money and no viable primary challenger, she'll have plenty of time and resources to lock at least one of those states up.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In order to shift the map ahead of Election Day, the Republican nominee would have to find a way to win Colorado and/or Virginia. That means winning over Hispanics, which will be a difficult task for a nominee who has spent a months-long primary trying to win over the conservative grassroots. It also means winning over enough members of Virginia's white working class to counter the more populated liberal-urban centers in the north. Not impossible, of course, but hard.

Unless ... unless one of two things happens: 1. The Republicans build an Obama 2008-level narrative around their nominee, significantly broadening their candidate's appeal to independents and Democrats. 2. Some legitimate controversy, historic stumble, unconscionable error or jaw-dropping gaffe completely reorients the way voters view Hillary Clinton.

As of now, the first option seems unlikely. Republicans have not produced a candidate who looks poised to pull off a 'hope and change' style campaign, despite Marco Rubio's attempt to brand himself as the candidate for a "new American century." The second option would require a controversy or error so major — and legitimate — that it didn't go away. Such a controversy would have to be far bigger than a secret email account or questionable Clinton Foundation donations. The inconsequence of those stories can be seen in the latest New York Times/CBS News poll, which found that "Americans now view Mrs. Clinton more favorably and more see her as a strong leader than they did earlier in the year, despite weeks of scrutiny about her ethics."

The conventional wisdom among Clinton's supporters is that Clinton is invincible, because she has already weathered all the storms of media scrutiny. She has been in the public eye for 25 years and endured countless controversies, from Whitewater to Lewinsky to Benghazi. The book has been thrown at her, and the book lost.

This argument overlooks two important factors: First, the national media has never been more primed to take down Hillary Clinton (and, by the same token, elevate a Republican candidate). Even before she announced her presidential bid, The New York Times alone had published more than 40 articles related to her private email account, spurring other stories across the national print, digital and television media. Since announcing her bid, the national media has spent the bulk of its time investigating potential lines of influence between Clinton Foundation donations/speaking fees and Clinton's actions as secretary of state. The Times, The Washington Post and others even struck deals for early access to anti-Clinton research.

Second, the media environment is radically different from the 1990s or even the 2000s. The power and volume of social media means that controversies can be both disseminated and elevated to unprecedented levels. In today's media environment, nothing with even a whiff of gunpowder comes across the transom without blowing up, because blowing stuff up is what the media does. Or, as Danniel Henniger notes in today's Wall Street Journal, the "electronic elements have reached critical mass... [and] the new political media that will drive the 2016 presidential contest are like the surface of the oceans — huge, always moving, unpredictable and potentially destructive."

The rest, as they say, is noise. The media can cover every minor process development and chase Hillary to every Chipotle, but without a transformational Republican candidate and/or an unforeseen controversy of truly epic proportions, Hillary Clinton will waltz to the nomination and enter Election Day with a significant advantage over her Republican challenger.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Meeting Hillary Clinton was like talking to a mentor // Iowa City Press-Citizen // Carter Bell Guest Opinion - May 6, 2015

Walking in the door alone, without any staffers in front or behind her, Hillary Clinton entered the Jones Street Java House.

“What’s are people talking about on campus? What would you say are students’ number one priority?” she asked me a few minutes later after ordering coffee from the owner’s son and greeting the other patrons in the coffee shop.

It was a bright, clear Iowa morning on Tuesday, April 14. A bit taken aback by her straightforward and candid questions, a bit nervous meeting for the first time a woman I admired so much, my brain scrambled to orient itself. “Uh, jobs! Now and after graduation. The jobs we have now are minimum wage (or less if we wait tables), and while our parents talk about how they could work a summer and pay for a year of college, our jobs now don’t even pay our rent, let alone our tuition, fees, textbooks, food, phone bill, and other expenses. So then we’re also concerned about jobs after graduation: will we find a job at all? Will it pay enough to help pay back our student loans and still pay the current bills?”

Clinton listened intently, sympathizing and commenting how she worked during school as well.

Clinton was shocked when I told her that my friends and I have not taken or have put off taking certain classes because the textbooks cost hundreds of dollars. When talking about the cost of tuition itself, Clinton commented how the average student debt for a student graduate in the state of Iowa is more than $29,000. Later, we talked about my grandmother, and Clinton said she hopes to have a similar type of close relationship with her granddaughter, Charlotte.

Clinton talked a lot with one of my fellow coffee-goers, Austin, who works at a hospital and takes night classes at St. Ambrose University. I was shocked by how much Clinton knew about all that he talking about. Inpatient versus outpatient services, the midnight rule, and the nursing shortage, Secretary Clinton knew exactly what he was talking about and never missed a beat.

Sara, another woman at coffee shop, talked with Clinton about how blessed but rare her situation with childcare is: a very affordable in-home daycare provider and grandparents close to also watch her baby. Secretary Clinton agreed that we must do something so affordable, high quality day care is not longer an exceptional circumstance.

People ask me about how my coffee with Hillary Clinton was, and the truth is, it still hasn’t really sunk in. I still have a hard time believing it happened because it felt like I got coffee with a mentor or favorite professor, not a presidential candidate. The conversation didn’t feel staged or forced; it flowed naturally between the four of us on college affordability, women’s health, job shortages, childcare, our families, and our hopes, dreams and fears for the future.

Carter Bell is a junior Political Science major at the University of Iowa originally from Waukee, Iowa. She is involved with University Lecture Committee, University Democrats, and the President's Committee on Sexual Misconduct.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

'I Gotta Pay Our Bills' // WSJ // Daniel Henninger - May 6, 2015

Staring at identical Rorschach blots of the Clintons' now-famous foundation, their 24-karat speeches, the missing emails and nonstop nonanswers about all of it, Republicans and Democrats come to separate conclusions.

Republicans keep asking: Will she get away with it? Democrats alter one word in this question: Will she get by with it? Conservatives think the liberal media will cover for Hillary. Liberals expect the Clinton machine will beat the rap, again.

Some bipartisan advice for aging elephants and donkeys: You're not in 1993 anymore.

The media environment in which this new edition of Whitewaterish stories is appearing didn't exist when Bill and Hillary lived in the White House. Back then, the Clinton sagas about all those things gone missing or unremembered would get published in this newspaper, the Washington Post, New York Times, Los Angeles Times, Boston Globe and the wire services, with a late-day kicker from evening newscasts. In terms of message-carry, the Clinton years might as well have been the age of the telegraph.

The World Wide Web, the oxygen of life now, was just coming to life when Bill Clinton was president. Google appeared in 1998. The opinion-transmission monster called "social media" didn't arrive until 2004, with Facebook.Twitter hit in 2006. And it wasn't until the Obama presidency that every single person with a political ax to grind owned the modern version of the frontier equalizer—a smartphone.

Today, these electronic elements have reached critical mass: The people paying really close attention to political news at such an early stage of a presidential campaign are vastly more numerous than ever.

So when Bill Clinton tells an NBC reporter somewhere in Africa, "I gotta pay our bills," it flows instantly into a complex political ecosystem that reinterprets what he said, and not in a good way. James Carville and the rest of the Clinton surrogate crew don't have enough spin time in their lives to offset this torrent. Type "I gotta pay our bills" into Twitter's search window, and the screen will fill with tiny blue birds cackling about the Clintons' family wage slave.

Stories describing Hillary Clinton's missing State Department emails started to appear in early March. The Clinton response was classic 1994: stonewall. Today, stonewalling is catnip to social media. The Clinton phalanx can erase her servers to stonewall Trey Gowdy's House committee, but it can't erase the zillions of opinions sent, received and read about the erasures and excuses.

Which raises the question: Why don't the Clintons reduce the volume of negative opinion flow by coming clean, or at least cleaner, some of the time about what they do? Instead, they let stories like the missing emails or grants to the Clinton Foundation from a Kazakhstan-connected donor continue to feed on themselves and self-multiply via the electronic galaxy that is Twitter, Facebook, blogs, newspaper websites, Politico, Instapundit, RealClearPolitics, TV and radio talk shows.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Skeptics will say most of this activity is just being recycled through the already convinced right and left. And that many of these people are political trolls with no life beyond outputting snide remarks. Could be, but no one knows that for sure.

What we do know is that along with the snark, they have also been posting the URL links to all the major Clinton newspaper stories the past two months.

Those stories have been forwarded to and read by people who normally would never see them. And the takeaway from the experience isn't terrific for Hillary or the Democrats.

In Wednesday's print version of the New York Times/CBS poll, a chart announced that a wondrous 82% of Democrats think Hillary is "honest and trustworthy." Excavate your way through the Times' online tabs, though, and you discover that among independent voters, 41% think she's honest. That number is close to the red zone for candidates.

The Clintons didn't know what hit them in 2008, when Barack Obama's progressive techies used barely understood social media to run over them. Not much seems to have changed. Bill, we learned during the email mess, doesn't use email, and Hillary's explanations of how she used cellphones as secretary of state sounded like something your grandma would come up with.

It's not clear that anyone fully understands how social media shape opinions or how long they last. But in their power and volume, the new political media that will drive the 2016 presidential contest are like the surface of the oceans—huge, always moving, unpredictable and potentially destructive. The Republicans are out there bobbing, too. Their time will come.

The irony, on the evidence of the campaign so far, is that the social media that defeated the Clinton machine in 2008 could do it again. But this time there won't be an organized intelligence at the controls, not even the vast right-wing conspiracy. That, too, was so 1990s.

The odd history of why the Clintons keep all their money in cash // WaPo Blog // Max Ehrenfreund - May 7, 2015

Bill Clinton received some criticism this week for his defense of the paid speeches he gave after leaving the White House. "I got to pay our bills," the former president told NBC's Cynthia McFadden, adding that he had taken "almost no capital gains" in the past 15 years.

That statement was not entirely accurate. Clinton and his wife, Hillary Rodham Clinton, did enjoy returns on their investments at first, according to tax returns she released during her first campaign for the office her husband held.

Since 2007, however, their wealth has earned them almost nothing, and they probably have not taken significant capital gains, according to a review of Hillary Clinton's financial disclosures from her time as secretary of state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Clintons' portfolio has performed poorly because it is almost entirely in cash. As of 2012, when Hillary Clinton left the State Department, the couple's wealth was in an account at JPMorgan likely worth between $10 million and $25 million.

Just like everyday Americans, the Clintons keep their money in a regular old savings account. The former president pays the bills with money he earns by working, not from dividends and interest.

It's just that for most American dads nearing retirement, their jobs haven't paid quite as well as Bill Clinton's most recent speechmaking gig.

In a global economy with an increasingly unequal distribution of wealth, the Clintons' massive savings account is unusual. People as rich as they are typically put their money to work in hedge funds, bonds, real estate or just about anything else that's profitable, rather than keeping it in cash.

Not all the wealthy are politicians, though. The Clintons' financial strategy is a response to the intense scrutiny placed on them throughout their career in American public life and a reminder, in dollars, of how much they've been willing to give up to achieve their ambitions.

When Bill Clinton became president, the couple assigned their money to a blind trust, managed by an independent adviser who made decisions without their knowledge or instructions to avoid conflicts of interest. They didn't have much at the time, and eight years later, they left the White House in debt. The former president did have bills he had to pay legals bills resulting from his tumultuous tenure in the Oval Office.

Bill Clinton began giving speeches around the world, collecting a cool six figures with most of his appearances. Soon the adviser of the trust had some real money to invest.

The Clintons continued to hold their wealth in trust until Hillary Clinton's first presidential campaign. Federal officials told them that their trust was out of date, and to comply with the rules on ethics, they would have to liquidate it.

The Clintons sold all of their assets and did not reinvest the proceeds. The income they would pass up by keeping the money in cash and U.S. Treasury bonds was a price they were willing to pay to shield Hillary Clinton from any questions about conflicts of interest.

Others of similar stature have also changed their investment strategies. President Obama and First Lady Michelle Obama hold less than $5 million in Treasury bonds and several hundred thousand dollars in index funds, according to their most recent financial disclosure.

The Clintons' finances are unusual even among politicians in that as of 2012, almost all their money was in cash, and they had a lot of it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In 2008, they kept the money at Citibank, mostly in Treasuries. They moved the money into Treasuries and cash at JPMorgan in 2009, when it was worth at least $10 million. (On the federal disclosure forms, the values of assets are reported in ranges.)

By 2011, all the money less than $25 million was in cash.

The 2012 disclosure states that the Clintons earned between $50,000 and $100,000 in interest on the account, a rate of between 0.2 percent and 1 percent.

Bill Clinton earned more in royalties on his books. His book about the economy, "Back to Work," brought him between $100,000 and $1 million that year. "My Life," the autobiography he published in 2004, added another $50,000 to $100,000. His speeches, by far, were his largest source of income. His wife's memoir, "Hard Choices," was published after she left the State Department, and it is not known how much the book is generating in royalties.

There are still other questions about the Clintons' money. If the former senator and first lady had simply wanted to avoid questions about her finances on the campaign trail, it isn't obvious why she and her husband didn't simply invest in index funds, as the Obamas have done.

After deciding to keep the money in cash, though, the Clintons then apparently ignored the federal limit on deposit insurance. The government insures a joint account owned by two people for up to $500,000. They might have deposited the money at several banks, in case JPMorgan were to fail. President George W. Bush, for example, kept some of his money in certificates of deposit at a number of banks.

Whatever their reasons, the irony is that Bill Clinton's speeches have generated as much controversy as any investments the couple might have made.

A number of those who have paid him to speak have also donated money to the couple's charity, the Clinton Foundation. News media and a new book by the conservative author Peter Schweizer have scrutinized whether contributions to the charity created conflicts of interest while Hillary Clinton was in office.

Debunking Hillary Clinton's liberal 'problem' // WaPo Blog // Chris Cillizza – May 7, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton takes part in a roundtable discussion with young Nevadans on immigration at Rancho High School in Las Vegas on May 5. (Mike Blake/Reuters)

One of the most persistent tropes of the 2016 election is that some large number of liberals are deeply dissatisfied with the centrist approach to politics long championed by Hillary Rodham Clinton and, as a result, are actively engaged in a search for a more progressive alternative.

Persistent -- and wrong. The truth is that scant evidence exists in any poll to suggest that Clinton is anything short of beloved (or, at the very least, be-liked) by the party's liberal base.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Take a new Iowa poll conducted by Quinnipiac University. In it, Clinton stands at 60 percent in a hypothetical caucus vote, with Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) running second at 15 percent. Clinton's standing among the base of the party? She gets 61 percent among those who consider themselves "very" liberal and 66 percent among the "somewhat" liberal. Her poorest performing ideological group is "moderate/conservative" Democrats, where she wins only 58 percent.

Take it a step further. It's not just that liberals in Iowa are going to vote for Clinton. They also have an extremely positive view of her. Overall, 83 percent of likely Iowa Democratic caucus-goers told Quinnipiac that they view Clinton favorably. That number jumps to 88 percent among "very" liberal Democrats. So, 9 in 10 of the most liberal voters in Iowa like Clinton. Not exactly a liberal problem, right?

And it's not just Iowa. The last national poll conducted by the Washington Post-ABC News, in late March, showed similar popularity numbers for Clinton. Eighty four percent of Democrats rated her favorably. Seventy seven percent of self-identified "liberals" had a favorable opinion of Clinton, including 50 percent who felt "strongly" favorable toward her.

Poll after poll -- in key states and nationally -- shows the same thing. Are their voices within the party -- Sanders, Elizabeth Warren, Bill de Blasio -- who wonder aloud whether Clinton is sufficiently committed to liberal ideals to carry the party's banner basically unchallenged in 2016? Yes. But, remember two things: 1) It is in the interests of people like the trio I mentioned above to elevate themselves as leaders of the left, a calculation to which Clinton is really a sidebar and 2) There is NO evidence that these few prominent voices represent any substantial bloc of, you know, actual voters. Pockets of discontent toward Clinton exist, but they are pockets, not a whole pair of pants. (Ugh.)

And, to the extent that there remains any doubt about Clinton among liberals, she is moving forcefully to address it. She surprised almost everyone on the left with her aggressive endorsement of a path to citizenship for undocumented workers and also recently spoke about prison reform, a cause near and dear to liberals. And, don't forget that Clinton -- from her announcement video on -- has put income inequality front and center in the campaign.

Look, Clinton has plenty of potential problems in the race. The baggage she carries from her years in the public spotlight. Her husband and his role in the campaign. The Clinton Foundation. The e-mail server. You get the idea.

But it is a fallacy to talk about her "liberal" problem. She doesn't have one.

Clinton's claim that no GOP candidate has consistently supported a path to citizenship // WaPo Blog // May 7, 2015

"We can't wait any longer for a path to full and equal citizenship. Now, this is where I differ with everybody on the Republican side. Make no mistake: Today not a single Republican candidate, announced or potential, is clearly and consistently supporting a path to citizenship. Not one."

–Hillary Clinton, roundtable in North Las Vegas, Nev., May 5, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This was an interesting statement by former secretary of state Hillary Clinton, made as she laid out her policy goals for tackling illegal immigration. She tried to draw a stark distinction between her stance and the growing field of Republican candidates.

But one of those candidates, Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.), was a key member of the bipartisan coalition that passed a comprehensive immigration overhaul in the Senate in 2013. That bill died in the House, and Rubio has since said it is better to tackle the problem piecemeal, starting with better border security.

But what's his position on citizenship? Note that Clinton made a point of saying "clearly and consistently"—modifiers that leave the actual meaning of her statement open to some interpretation.

The Facts

In 2014, as the Senate bill was debated in the House, Rubio at one point mused that he would be "open" to a bill that did not include a path to citizenship, on the grounds that it was better than the status quo, but he added: "Do I think it is in the best interest of this country to have millions of people here who can never become Americans? I don't."

Similarly, in a 2014 interview with Simon Conway, he said:

"The part that's difficult is, is what do you do with millions of people in this country who are here illegally? What do you do about it? And I think that the couple of things we're not going to do — we're not going to award citizenship to people or give them a benefit they wouldn't otherwise have. And we're also not going to round up and deport 12 million people. So the problem with finding a solution between those two different positions is people are not willing to even talk about it until they believe the laws are going to be enforced."

Rubio has continued with that theme in 2015. His book, "American Dreams" was published in January and described his current thinking. He outlined a three-step plan under which undocumented immigrants must come forward and register, and then, if qualified, apply for a temporary non-immigrant visa. This would give them a work permit. Rubio then writes:

"Third and finally, those who qualify for a nonimmigrant visa will have to remain in this status for at least a decade. After that, they would be allowed to apply for permanent residency if they so choose. Many who qualify for this status will choose to remain in it indefinitely. But those who choose to seek permanent residency would have to do it the way anyone else would, not through any special pathway."

Rubio's reference to not having a "special pathway" led some reporters to conclude he had backed away from an explicit path to citizenship. But in numerous interviews, Rubio denied that was the case.

In a New York Times interview, published Dec. 31, 2014:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Q: “In your book, you propose a piecemeal approach starting with more border security and ending with permanent residency. Are you dropping the idea of citizenship for those who came here illegally?”

A: “Once you have permanent residency, which is a green card, existing law allows you to apply for citizenship.”

On CNN, Jan. 23, 2015, Rubio said he still believed there should be a path to citizenship at the end:

“Once you have a green card, under existing law, in three to five years, depending on whether you got it through marriage or work, you would be able to apply for citizenship. Now, I don’t think it’s wise to have 12 million people who are forever in this country who feel American but are permanently barred from becoming citizens. Other people think that should be the price of having violated our laws in the first place. We can debate that. But we have to deal with that issue realistically, and we can’t until illegal immigration is under control first.”

On CBS’s “Face the Nation,” April 19, 2015, Rubio said:

“And then the third step would be to pass the bill that goes to the 10 million people that are here, or 12 million that are here illegally. …And after a substantial period of time in that [work permit] status, assuming they haven’t violated any of the conditions of that status, they would be allowed to apply for legal residency, just like anybody else would, not a special process. And after you’re a legal resident, after a number of years, by law, you’re allowed to apply for citizenship.”

As always with these issues, there are complexities in the weeds. Rubio, in his comments, makes it sound relatively easy to obtain legal residency — a green card— after the 10-year wait is completed. But there is a cap on the number of green cards that are issued — 625,000 a year — and there also are country and category caps. As a result, there is a waiting list of 4.4 million people outside the United States seeking green cards.

So how would 11 million people suddenly qualify for green cards?

The Senate bill supported by Rubio actually addressed this problem, in an obscure provision (section 2302) that was informally known by Senate aides as the “ShamWow visa.” (The ShamWow towel supposedly soaks up an enormous amount of liquid.) But it’s unclear if Rubio would support such a provision now, especially because in the CBS interview he reiterated that there would not be “a special process” for applying for legal residency.

“He’s always talked about fixing the legal immigration system before letting illegal immigrants apply for green cards,” Rubio spokesman Alex Conant said. “Part of fixing the legal immigration system means dealing with the big backlog.” Conant noted that Rubio voted for the Senate bill, but he did not specifically answer a question on whether Rubio still supports section 2302.

Conant added: “As recently as the National Review Summit on Friday, Marco was arguing that we should want people who are going to be here for the rest of their lives to become Americans. He has said it would not be wise to have millions of people permanently in this country who could never become citizens.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Depending on one's perspective in the debate, Rubio is either trying to have it both ways or is simply being a bit obtuse. Lynn Tramonte, deputy director of the pro-immigration advocacy group America's Voice, said that Rubio has been "deliberately vague" on what he supports, and that it would be difficult for undocumented immigrants to get green cards unless special provisions were enacted. She added: "I don't see him as an advocate for a path to citizenship."

But Alex Nowrasteh of the libertarian Cato Institute said: "Senator Rubio has consistently, if not clearly, supported a path to citizenship for most unauthorized immigrants." In his view, "Rubio's strategic and policy changes do not mean he opposes a path to citizenship. Rubio has merely reordered his reform priorities." He agreed, however, that Rubio has not been especially clear about his position.

Clinton spokesman Josh Schwerin defended Clinton's language: "Any candidate who is intentionally vague on the issue is, by definition, not clear and consistent in their support."

The Pinocchio Test

This is a difficult situation to evaluate. Clinton certainly wanted to paint all of the Republican candidates with an anti-immigration brush, but gave herself some wiggle room on Rubio by adding in the modifier of "clearly and consistently."

But that's an all-purpose modifier that could be applied to every politician on just about every issue, including Clinton herself.

In straining to suggest Rubio's stance is the same as other Republicans, Clinton goes too far. Rubio has consistently said he supports a path to citizenship. Clinton would have a better case if she specifically said Rubio needs to provide more clarity on how quickly his plan would grant immigrants that citizenship–especially if he no longer supports creating a new visa category that would smooth the path to a green card. After all, that's a critical step on the way to citizenship.

We wavered between One and Two Pinocchios, but ultimately tipped toward Two. Rubio has taken a relatively lonely position in the GOP on immigration, and it's not quite fair to suggest his position on citizenship has been inconsistent.

(Update: Our friends at PolitiFact correctly note that Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, who also backed the Senate bill, is also considering a presidential run and has not wavered from advocating a path to citizenship. They gave Clinton a "mostly false," equivalent to Three Pinocchios. Given that Clinton mentioned "potential" candidates, that may be a fair assessment.)

Two Pinocchios

--

Alexandria Phillips
Communications | Press Assistant
Hillary for America
https://www.hillaryclinton.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

--

You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
To: johnpodestatemp@outlook.com
Date: 3/30/2015 2:55:26 AM
Subject: Fwd: Hillary Clinton Tells Malcolm Hoenlein Wants to Improve Relations With Israel

---------- Forwarded message ----------
From: Haim Saban <kussa@saban.com >
Date: Mon, Mar 30, 2015 at 9:26 AM
Subject: RE: Hillary Clinton Tells Malcolm Hoenlein Wants to Improve Relations With Israel
To: "Hspeumpottsa Abedin (Huma@clintonemail.com)" <Huma@clintonemail.com >
Cc: Laura Hartigan <lhartigan@saban.com >, Alex De Ocampo <adeocampo@saban.com >, "john.podesta@gmail.com " <john.podesta@gmail.com >

Also pls be aware that these articles will be mailed to thousands of people who are interested in the subject matter and who have been asking themselves ,,,,and me ,many times ”Where is Hillary on this”

Well ,,,,,now they will know.

Adding John .

From: Haim Saban
Sent: Monday, March 30, 2015 5:56 AM
To: Hspeumpottsa Abedin (Huma@clintonemail.com)
Cc: Laura Hartigan; Alex De Ocampo
Subject: FW: Hillary Clinton Tells Malcolm Hoenlein Wants to Improve Relations With Israel

Hey Huma.

A very good statement ,,,,,w/o saying anything that would show even a sign of criticism of the administration.

Very smart and politically correct.

Pls say thanks to the lady.

Below: NYT & Algemeiner

Clinton Wants to Improve Ties With Israel

By MAGGIE HABERMANMARCH 29, 2015

Former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton told a representative of a group of prominent Jewish leaders on Sunday that she wanted to put the relationship between the United States and Israel back on “constructive footing,” the representative said.

Mrs. Clinton’s comments, made in a phone call to Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, contrasted in tone from recent remarks by members of the Obama administration, who have publicly criticized Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu of Israel amid tensions over a nuclear deal with Iran and comments Mr. Netanyahu made in the final days of his re-election campaign this month.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Secretary Clinton thinks we need to all work together to return the special U.S.-Israel relationship to constructive footing, to get back to basic shared concerns and interests, including a two-state solution pursued through direct negotiations between Israelis and Palestinians," Mr. Hoenlein said in a statement issued by his organization on Sunday evening. "We must ensure that Israel never becomes a partisan issue," he quoted her as saying. Mrs. Clinton knows Mr. Hoenlein from her time in the Senate.

A spokesman for Mrs. Clinton confirmed that she had spoken to Mr. Hoenlein, but would not elaborate on what they had discussed or say if he had quoted her accurately.

Mrs. Clinton's comments are her first on the United States- Israeli relationship to be made public since Mr. Netanyahu's re-election on March 17, when the strains between the two countries reached their height in the days surrounding the election. Mr. Netanyahu urged supporters to counter Israeli Arabs who he said were voting in "droves," comments widely criticized as racist , and asserted that no Palestinian state would be established on his watch, a statement that President Obama 's chief of staff, Denis McDonough, called "very troubling."

After his victory, Mr. Netanyahu backed off both statements. Obama administration officials have left open the possibility of changing the United States' stance on Israel at the United Nations since the election. Historically, the United States has acted as a shield for resolutions that Israel found troublesome.

A senior White House official was quoted by The Wall Street Journal recently suggesting that some in the Obama administration felt "personally sold out," after accusations that Israel had spied on negotiations for an Iran nuclear deal and that those aides could be around for the "next administration," a clear reference to a potential Clinton White House.

http://www.nytimes.com/2015/03/30/us/politics/hillary-clinton-wants-to-improve-relations-with-israel.html?_r=0

Algemeiner

Hillary Clinton Breaks Silence on US-Israel Tensions Under Obama, Calls for Return of 'Constructive' Relationship

March 29, 2015 7:50 pm 65 comments

After weeks of escalating criticism of Israel by the Obama Administration, Hillary Clinton, former Secretary of State and the leading 2016 Democratic presidential contender, on Sunday called for the renewal of the "special" relationship between the US and the Jewish state.

In a telephone conversation with Malcolm Hoenlein, Executive Vice Chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, Clinton said that she "thinks we need to all work together to return the special US-Israel relationship to constructive footing, to get back to basic shared concerns and interests."

The Secretary said this includes "a two-state solution pursued through direct negotiations between Israelis and Palestinians." She further noted that, "we must ensure that Israel never becomes a partisan issue."

Mr. Hoenlein, who initiated the conversation, said that, "Secretary Clinton's views are of special importance and timeliness given recent issues in the US-Israel relationship. We note her call for direct negotiations between Israelis and Palestinians, which, we believe, is the only possible route to a true peace."

Clinton's comments follow weeks of escalating criticisms from the Obama Administration mainly addressing comments made by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu days before his reelection earlier this month. The latest attacks follow a pattern of aggressive language directed towards Israel's leaders throughout the Obama presidency which has been marked by a number of stark policy differences between the Israelis and the White House.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A number of major Jewish leaders have spoken out in recent days, calling on the White House to tone down its rhetoric and to respect the historic bipartisan nature of US-Israel relations.

Explaining the significance of Clinton's comments Hoenlein told The Algemeiner, "As the leading candidate for the Democratic nomination, her words are especially significant and impactful."

"We believe that it is particularly important, given the challenges Israel and the region are facing, that the US and Israel stand together to advance their shared concerns and interests," Hoenlein added. "There is too much at stake to do otherwise."

http://www.algemeiner.com/2015/03/29/hillary-clinton-breaks-silence-on-us-israel-tensions-under-obama-calls-for-return-of-special-relationship/

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jesse Ferguson" <jferguson@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Josh Schwerin" <joshschwerin@gmail.com>
hrcrapid <HRCrapid@googlegroups.com>
Date: 4/27/2015 2:58:41 AM
Subject: RE: First Read: 'Clinton Cash' Author Speaks Out

Can we update the doc of all the stuff showing this guy was debunked (including this below)?

From: hrcrapid@googlegroups.com [mailto:hrcrapid@googlegroups.com] On Behalf Of Josh Schwerin Sent: Monday, April 27, 2015 9:20 AM
To: hrcrapid
Subject: Fwd: First Read: 'Clinton Cash' Author Speaks Out

Conservative author admits evidence on Hillary Clinton is circumstantial

In back-to-back interviews over the past 24 interviews, conservative author Peter Schweizer admits he doesn't have direct evidence that Hillary Clinton intervened to assist individuals and entities because they donated large sums of money to the Clinton Foundation. On ABC yesterday, Schweizer was asked if he had proof that Hillary Clinton directly took action to benefit a Clinton Foundation donor from the sale of a uranium mining company. "No, we don't have direct evidence. But it warrants further investigation because, again, ... this is part of the broader pattern. You either have to come to the conclusion that these are all coincidences or something else is afoot." In an interview with NBC's Savannah Guthrie this morning , Schweizer said, "What we have is a pattern of behavior," adding that this pattern consistently shows Clinton Foundation donors benefiting from Hillary Clinton's State Department. More Schweizer: "I think it should be [criminally] investigated... I don't think a quid-pro-quo needs to be a standard," citing the charges that brought down former Virginia Gov. Bob McDonnell. When Guthrie asked him about his ties to the conservative movement and GOP politics, Schweizer said, "I am not claiming to be neutral," though he also stated that he's taken on conservatives, too.

---------- Forwarded message ----------
From: First Read from NBC News <email@mail.nbcnews.com >
Date: Mon, Apr 27, 2015 at 9:14 AM
Subject: First Read: 'Clinton Cash' Author Speaks Out
To: Joshschwerin@gmail.com

First Read is a morning briefing from Meet the Press and the NBC Political Unit on the day's most important political stories and why they matter brought to you by NBC News' Chuck Todd, Mark Murray and Carrie Dann.

FIRST READ: 'CLINTON CASH' AUTHOR SPEAKS OUT

First Read is a morning briefing from Meet the Press and the NBC Political Unit on the day's most important political stories and why they matter

Conservative author admits evidence on Hillary Clinton is circumstantial

In back-to-back interviews over the past 24 interviews, conservative author Peter Schweizer admits he doesn't have direct evidence that Hillary Clinton intervened to assist individuals and entities because they donated large sums of money to the Clinton Foundation. On ABC yesterday, Schweizer was asked if he had proof that Hillary Clinton directly took action to benefit a Clinton Foundation donor from the sale of a uranium mining company. "No, we don't have direct evidence. But it warrants further investigation because, again, ... this is part of the broader pattern. You either have to come to the conclusion that these are all coincidences or something else is afoot." In an interview with NBC's Savannah Guthrie this morning , Schweizer said, "What we have is a pattern of behavior," adding that this pattern consistently shows Clinton Foundation donors benefiting from Hillary Clinton's State Department. More Schweizer: "I think it should be [criminally] investigated... I don't think a quid-pro-quo needs to be a standard," citing the charges that brought down former Virginia Gov. Bob McDonnell. When Guthrie asked him about his ties to the conservative movement and GOP politics, Schweizer said, "I am not claiming to be neutral," though he also stated that he's taken on conservatives, too.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton Foundation: "Yes, we made mistakes"

Meanwhile, in a blog post on Sunday , the Clinton Foundation's acting CEO, Maura Pally, acknowledged that the Clinton Foundation made mistakes in its filings of 990 tax forms. "Our total revenue was accurately reported on each year's form - our error was that government grants were mistakenly combined with other donations... So yes, we made mistakes, as many organizations of our size do, but we are acting quickly to remedy them, and have taken steps to ensure they don't happen in the future." Pally also explained why some Clinton Foundation-related donations weren't disclosed like others were -- because they were to a Canadian offshoot. "[T]he Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership (Canada) is publicly listed as a donor on our website. But as it is a distinct Canadian organization, separate from the Clinton Foundation, its individual donors are not listed on the site. This is hardly an effort on our part to avoid transparency - unlike in the U.S., under Canadian law; all charities are prohibited from disclosing individual donors without prior permission from each donor."

Why is the Clinton Foundation STILL taking foreign donations?

But here's a big question that we have as Hillary Clinton has begun her presidential candidacy and as she stands a decent chance of sitting in the Oval Office in 2017: Why is the Clinton Foundation taking ANY foreign money at all? As we wrote last week, and as Pally confirms in her blog post, the Clinton Foundation still receives foreign money from six foreign countries -- Australia, Canada, Germany, the Netherlands, Norway, and the U.K. A Clinton Foundation official has told NBC News, "You just can't pull the plug" on existing programs, especially when they involve multi-year grants. But in a world where appearances do matter, should the Clinton Foundation be receiving those donations anymore?

Jeb: I've raised more money in 100 days than any GOP operation in history

The New York Times : "Jeb Bush told donors [in Miami] that he believed his political action committee had raised more money in 100 days than any other modern Republican political operation, according to those who heard him." Of course, there's one hitch with any record: The money Jeb is raising is through his Super PAC, which is able to raise unlimited amounts of money. And while the Clinton Foundation money is legitimately receiving attention, so should the loophole that Jeb Bush is exploiting in campaign finance law -- that presidential candidates can't coordinate with Super PACs. But since Jeb TECHNICALLY isn't a presidential candidate, he's raising all of this money for his Super PAC.

George W. Bush comments on his brother's campaign, Obama's Iran policy

Over the weekend, it turned out Jeb Bush's older brother -- former President George W. Bush -- made some news. The Washington Post : "At a closed-door dinner Saturday night before nearly 800 members of the Republican Jewish Coalition, the 43rd president noted that it could hurt former Florida governor Jeb Bush if he campaigned alongside another Bush who served in the White House, according to several attendees. 'He said that one of the challenges his brother is going to have is that the country doesn't like dynasties,' recalled David Volosov, a RJC member from Silver Spring, Md. 'People are going to say, "Oh, here comes another Bush." His response is that he is going to stay as far as way as he can. He is going to stay away from the whole process.'" More from the New York Times : "Mr. Bush voiced skepticism about the Obama administration's pursuit of a nuclear deal with Iran. Although he had begun the diplomatic effort to press Iran to give up its nuclear program, Mr. Bush questioned whether it was wise to lift sanctions against Tehran when the Islamic government seemed to be caving in, and suggested that the United States risked losing leverage if it did so."

Click here to sign up for First Read emails. Check us out on Facebook and also on Twitter . Follow us @chucktodd , @mmurraypolitics , @carrienbcnews

---

FIRST READ'S MORNING CLIPS

OBAMA AGENDA: A different Abe (Shinzo) to address Congress

Prime Minister Shinzo Abe will be the first Japanese leader to address a joint session of Congress this week -- and he'll talk about his nation's role in global security. The Wall Street Journal: "When Shinzo Abe goes to Washington for a pomp-filled visit this week, the Japanese leader faces a delicate balancing act: selling Americans on his vision of the future-a newly vibrant, muscular, more equal Japanese partner-while trying to quell doubts stoked by his views of the past."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The New York Times explores the administration's efforts to take its cybersecurity pitch to a skeptical Silicon Valley.

The Washington Post ed board backs Obama on trade. "With a furious political battle over trade looming on Capitol Hill, it's high time Mr. Obama personally and aggressively took on the phony arguments that "progressives" are marshalling in a desperate attempt to block trade measures whose merits would withstand honest scrutiny."

In rare comments on global issues, George W. Bush took on Obama's foreign policy, criticizing the Iran deal and his efforts to counter the Islamic State, writes Bloomberg.

CONGRESS: Will GOP amendments doom bipartisan Iran legislation?

"A bill to give Congress a voice in the nuclear deal with Iran is now endangered by Republican amendments that would peel away bipartisan support for a measure begrudgingly accepted by the White House this month," writes the New York Times.

More, from POLITICO : "Republican and Democratic leaders, who back the review bill, plan to muster enough votes to block any seriously problematic amendments while still allowing their members to take some political potshots. If they let through any bombshells that significantly undermine the White House's negotiations, they risk losing Democratic support and the veto-proof majority that Corker has painstakingly assembled.

The odd media story around Harry Reid's New Years Day accident continues with this, from the Las Vegas Sun: "A Las Vegas man claims he started a false rumor that the injuries suffered by Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid several months ago were the result of an attack by Reid's brother, not an exercise accident."

OFF TO THE RACES: GOP struggling to adjust to gay-marriage landscape

Here's the Des Moines Register's wrap of the Iowa Faith and Freedom Coalition's Saturday cattle call.

Big picture, in the New York Times : "Republican presidential candidates are struggling to adjust to a rapidly changing legal, political and cultural landscape this primary season, as the Supreme Court prepares to hear arguments Tuesday on whether same-sex marriage is a constitutionally protected right."

BUSH: In Miami Beach, Jeb Bush told super PAC donors that they've raised more money in the organization's first 100 days than any other Republican operation in history.

CLINTON: Hillary Clinton writes a Des Moines Register op-ed: "When I came to Iowa, I wanted to do something a little different. No big speeches or rallies. Just talking directly with everyday Iowans. Because this campaign isn't going to be about me, it's going to be about Iowans and people across our country who are ready for a better future. It's not enough to just get by, you deserve to get ahead and stay ahead. And everywhere I went, I met Iowans with great ideas for how we can get there."

The acting chief executive of the Clinton Foundation admits that the organization "made mistakes" in how it disclosed donors.

More, from the Washington Post : "Nevertheless, the foundation explained for the first time publicly that one of its affiliates - a Canada-based charity that bears Bill Clinton's name - would continue to keep its donors secret because of restrictions in Canadian law."

Here's Savannah Guthrie's interview with "Clinton Cash" author Peter Schweizer.

CRUZ: The gay businessman who hosted an event for Ted Cruz has apologized for showing "poor judgment."

RUBIO: He detailed his immigration philosophy to the Des Moines Register ed board.

WEBB: He attended a private event with veterans in Des Moines.

And around the country...

CALIFORNIA: The New York Times looks at the divide between rich and poor in drought-stricken California.

PROGRAMMING NOTES.

 Monday's "News Nation with Tamron Hall" line-up: Tamron Hall speaks with Nick Cienski survivor of the avalanche at base camp at Mount Everest, Kenji Yoshino, Chief Justice Earl Warren Professor of Constitutional Law at NYU Law School about SCOTUS taking up same sex marriage, Parker Molloy, transgender rights advocate and Upworthy.com trends writer about Bruce Jenner, and Tim Smith, Jerel Maddox, and Kentrell Collins of Oxygen's new show: "The

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Prancing Elites".

 Monday's "Andrea Mitchell Reports" line-up: NBC's Kristen Welker is filling in for Andrea and will have the latest on the Nepal earthquake with USAID Director of Foreign Disaster Assistance Jeremy Konyndyk and the United Nations World Food Programme Chief Spokesperson Bettina Leuscher, NBC's Pete Williams and Brian Mooar, Clinton campaign surrogate Ann Lewis, Fmr. RNC Chairman Michael Steele, the Washington Post's Chris Cillizza and Bloomberg Editor Jeanne Cummings.

PROP 8 ATTORNEYS: MARRIAGE EQUALITY COMING SOON

The lawyers who argued in favor of overturning California's same-sex ban in front the Supreme Court said Sunday they believe the votes exist for the Supreme Court to rule in favor of legalizing same-sex marriage in all 50 states.

David Boies and Ted Olsen said on Meet the Press that based on a previous ruling that struck down the federal Defense of Marriage Act - which prevented legally married same-sex couples from receiving federal benefits - the Court will rule to overturn the ban.

"If you read what the Supreme Court said in that case, there's really no other way for the Supreme Court to come out in the case that's up for argument on Tuesday," Ted Olson said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

"The first part of that case is whether states have to recognize the rights of individuals who wish to get married in that state. I think that will end the debate right there."

They said that the impact of the ruling will be based on the number of justices voting one way or the other.

"I think civil rights cases ought to be decided 9-0 or 8-1, the way the racial and civil rights decisions were largely made," David Boies said in the same interview.

"It sends a message that this country doesn't tolerate discrimination. So, I think the more justices that sign on, the better."

However, the likelihood of a unanimous or near-unanimous decision is unlikely based on the votes of other cases. "We were hoping that all nine justices would fall in line once the case finally was decided because of the inherent rights of individuals," Olson said.

"I'm still optimistic it'll be more than five votes. But we can count the justices that already decided the Defense of Marriage case and their explanation for why they decided that."

Public opinion on same-sex marriage, which has changed rapidly in the last five years, will also influence the justices. At the time California's same-sex marriage ban was overturned, less of the country was in favor of legalization, Boies said.

"Now overwhelmingly it's taken over the country," he said. "Just in the last couple of years, we've seen a tremendous movement that I think makes it easier now for the Supreme Court to make that total decision."

WHAT HILLARY CLINTON CAN LEARN FROM TEDDY ROOSEVELT

Presidential Historian Doris Kearns Goodwin explains how Hillary Clinton could take a page out of Teddy Roosevelt's book to deal with the "Clinton Cash" issue.

#NERDSCREEN: AGREEMENT ON TRADE?

While the two parties don't agree on much - trade is one place where overall, they do agree.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

LATEST NEWS

- First Read: 'Clinton Cash' Author Speaks Out
- Turkish Rescuers Pull Out Man Alive From Kathmandu Wreckage
- Dawen On Making Music And A Home in Taiwan
- First Read's Morning Clips
- Three New Fitness Trends to Spice Up Your Workout

Powered by LiveIntent AdChoices

This email was sent to: Joshschwerin@gmail.com

This email was sent by:
NBC News
30 Rockefeller Plaza
New York, New York, 10112

Privacy | One Click Unsubscribe | Manage Your Subscription Preferences

Privacy
One Click Unsubscribe
Manage Your Subscription Preferences

--
Josh Schwerin
Cell: 518-369-5469

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jake Sullivan" <jake.sullivan@gmail.com>
To: "Dan Schwerin" <dschwerin@hrcoffice.com>
Date: 4/2/2015 12:54:56 PM
Subject: Re: Iran statement

If not out, pls add following. If out, fine:

> The understanding that the major world powers have reached with Iran is an important step toward a comprehensive agreement that would prevent Iran from getting a nuclear weapon and strengthen the security of the United States, Israel, and the region. President Obama and Secretary Kerry have been persistent and determined in pursuit of this goal, building on a decade of bipartisan pressure and diplomacy. Getting the rest of the way to a final deal by June won't be easy, but it is absolutely crucial. I know well that the devil is always in the details in this kind of negotiation. So I strongly support President Obama and Secretary Kerry's efforts between now and June to reach a final deal that verifiably cuts off all of Iran's paths to a nuclear weapon, imposes an intrusive inspection program with no sites off limits, extends breakout time, RESOLVES THE MILITARY DIMENSION, and spells out clear and overwhelming consequences for violations. The onus is on Iran and the bar must be set high. It can never be permitted to acquire a nuclear weapon. It is also vital that these efforts be part of a comprehensive strategy to check Iran's regional ambitions, defend our allies and partners, and reinforce American leadership in the Middle East. There is much to do and much more to say in the months ahead, but for now diplomacy deserves a chance to succeed.

On Apr 2, 2015, at 7:07 PM, Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hrcoffice.com > wrote:

> One small tweak below and now good to go.
>
> > The understanding that the major world powers have reached with Iran is an important step toward a comprehensive agreement that would prevent Iran from getting a nuclear weapon and strengthen the security of the United States, Israel, and the region. President Obama and Secretary Kerry have been persistent and determined in pursuit of this goal, building on a decade of bipartisan pressure and diplomacy. Getting the rest of the way to a final deal by June won't be easy, but it is absolutely crucial. I know well that the devil is always in the details in this kind of negotiation. So I strongly support President Obama and Secretary Kerry's efforts between now and June to reach a final deal that verifiably cuts off all of Iran's paths to a nuclear weapon, imposes an intrusive inspection program with no sites off limits, extends breakout time, and spells out clear and overwhelming consequences for violations. The onus is on Iran and the bar must be set high. It can never be permitted to acquire a nuclear weapon. It is also vital that these efforts be part of a comprehensive strategy to check Iran's regional ambitions, defend our allies and partners, and reinforce American leadership in the Middle East. There is much to do and much more to say in the months ahead, but for now diplomacy deserves a chance to succeed.
>
> On Apr 2, 2015, at 6:49 PM, Jake Sullivan <jake.sullivan@gmail.com > wrote:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Give me 10 or so to confirm one thing.

On Apr 2, 2015, at 6:44 PM, Jennifer Palmieri <jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com > wrote:

Looks great. If folks are good, let's get out.

Sent from my iPhone

On Apr 2, 2015, at 6:14 PM, Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com > wrote:

+ Brian

From: Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hrcoffice.com >
Date: Thursday, April 2, 2015 at 6:11 PM
To: John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >, Jennifer Palmieri <jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com >, Robby Mook <robbymook2015@gmail.com >, NSM <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com >, Jesse Ferguson <jesse@jesseferguson.com >, Kristina Schake <kristinakschake@gmail.com >
Cc: Jacob Sullivan <Jake.sullivan@gmail.com >
Subject: Iran statement

HRC has signed off on the statement below and asks if she should tweet as well. Anyone have any concerns?

The understanding that the major world powers have reached with Iran is an important step toward a comprehensive agreement that would prevent Iran from getting a nuclear weapon and strengthen the security of the United States, Israel, and the region. President Obama and Secretary Kerry have been persistent and determined in pursuit of this goal, building on a decade of bipartisan pressure and diplomacy. Getting the rest of the way to a final deal by June won't be easy, but it is absolutely crucial. I know well that the devil is always in the details in this kind of negotiation. So I strongly support President Obama and Secretary Kerry's efforts between now and June to reach a final deal that verifiably cuts off all of Iran's paths to a nuclear weapon, imposes an intrusive inspection program with no sites off limits, extends breakout time, and spells out clear and overwhelming consequences for violations. The onus is on Iran and the bar must be set high. It is also vital that our efforts to deny Iran a nuclear weapon be part of a comprehensive strategy to check its regional ambitions, defend our allies and partners, and reinforce American leadership in the Middle East. There is much to do and much more to say in the months ahead, but for now diplomacy deserves a chance to succeed.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	6/4/2015 12:37:26 AM
Subject:	H4A News Clips 6.4.15
Attachments:	6.04.14 H4A News Clips.docx

H4A News Clips

June 4, 2015

SUMMARY OF TODAY'S NEWS

Today Hillary Clinton will give a speech at the Barbara Jordan Gold Medallion Presentation in Houston, Texas. Clinton will call for swift action to restore the Voting Rights Act and will discuss ways to make it easier for voters to access the voting booth and cast their ballots. Clinton will also attend two fundraisers while in Texas.

Jeb Bush is expected to announce his candidacy for president on June 15th.

LAST NIGHTS EVENING NEWS

There was not 2016 coverage on any network tonight. Instead they covered the hurricane growing and tornado threats, new evidence in the home of the family that was killed in Washington DC, and the price of cancer medication.

SUMMARY OF TODAY'S NEWS..... 1

LAST NIGHTS EVENING NEWS..... 1

TODAY'S KEY STORIES..... 4

Hillary Clinton to Speak at Latino Leaders Conference // Latin Post // Robert Ugarte - Jun 04, 2015 4

Clinton to call for at least 20 days of early voting nationwide // WaPo // Anne Gearan – June 3, 2015 5

Hillary Clinton Is Alone at the Top of Democratic 2016 Hill Endorsements // National Journal // Alex Brown – June 2, 2015 6

SOCIAL MEDIA..... 7

Matt Corridoni (5/3/15, 3:18 pm) - "We can already trade & we should...[but #TPP] is bad for us as a country." - @GovernorOMalley taking a clear stance, once again, on trade..... 7

Lisa Lerer (5/3/15, 5:24, pm) - Law school seminar or Lincoln Chafee's presidential announcement? 7

Trip Gabriel (5/3/15, 7:50 pm) - Carly Fiorina releases her net worth: $59 million. Effective federal tax rate: 20 percent..... 7

Ari Berman (5/3/15, 8:12 pm) - Would be very big deal if every state had 20+ days of early voting, as HRC wants. 14 states have no early voting http://www.washingtonpost.com/blogs/post-pol 8

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 8

Heroin epidemic leaves mark on 2016 presidential race // WaPo // Katie Zezima – June 3, 2015.... 8

Hillary's Popularity Rollercoaster // Politico // Jack Shafer – June 3, 2015..... 11

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton is Too Liberal for Bill Clinton // Politico // Alan Greenblatt – June 2, 2015 12

Concerns about Clinton records dates back to her tenure at State // CNN // Laura Koran – June 3, 2015 14

Axelrod: Clinton "Hurt" By Only Doing "Sporadic" Events, Challenge Is For Her To Take "Risks" // Buzzfeed // Andrew Kaczynski & Megan Apper – June 3, 2015..... 15

Democrats Wage a National Fight Over Voter Rules // NYT // Maggie Haberman & Amy Chozick – June 3, 2015 19

Clinton to propose at least 20 days of early voting in every state // USA Today // David Jackson – June 3, 2015 22

Hillary Clinton to Attack G.O.P. Rivals on Voting Rights // NYT // Amy Chozick – June 3, 2015 22

Hillary Clinton Works For The Support Of An Old Ally: The Teachers Union // Buzzfeed // Ruby Cramer – June 3, 2015 23

Democrats finally get a contest as Hillary Clinton draws challengers // WaPo // Philip Rucker, Robert Costa & Anne Gearan – June 3, 2015..... 26

Clinton pollster downplays Hillary's sinking poll numbers // Politico // Nick Gass – June 3, 2015. 29

The Beltway's Clinton derangement syndrome: What I saw inside a Hillary campaign briefing // Salon // Joan Walsh – June 3, 2015..... 30

When it comes to the Clintons and Wall Street: Democratic opponents are silent // McClatchy // Anita Kumar & Greg Gorden – June 3, 2015..... 33

21 New 'Clinton Cash' Revelations That Have Imperiled Hillary Clinton's Campaign // Breitbart – June 3, 2015 34

Iowa Poll: Bill and George W. May Not Hurt Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush // Bloomberg // David Knowles – June 3, 2015 41

Clinton rivals pounce as her ratings fall // WaPo // Philip Rucker, Robert Costa and Anne Gearan - June 3, 2015 42

Bush and Clinton seem inevitable. Except to voters. // Yahoo News // Matt Bai - June 4, 2015..... 46

Why Hillary Can't Run on Her State Department Record // Bloomberg // Josh Rogin – June 3, 2015 48

Americans split on whether Clinton cares about their needs // AP // Julie Pace & Ken Thomas – June 3, 2015 51

Campaign Reporters Told There Will Be 'NO Opportunities To Interview Hillary Clinton' // The Daily Caller // Chuck Ross – June 3, 2015 53

Whoa, If True: Hillary Clinton Blows Off Autograph-Seeking Voter // Bloomberg // David Weigel – June 3, 2015 53

Georgina Bloomberg is backing Hillary for President // NY Daily News // Annie Karni – June 3, 2015 55

Bill Clinton to Give Secret Address to Health Insurers // The Weekly Standard // Michael Warren – June 3, 2015 56

2016 Democratic White House hopefuls jockey for Hispanics' support // The Washington Times // S.A. Miller – June 3, 2015 56

Meet the woman who's guiding Hillary Clinton's stance on police reforms // Fortune // Nina Easton – June 3, 2015 59

The campaign to put Julian Castro on Hillary Clinton's VP shortlist // GABRIEL DEBENEDETTI and ANNIE KARNI // Politico – June 4, 2015..... 61

Hillary Clinton Cannot Afford to Lose Black Voters // National Jounal // EMILY SCHULTHEIS – June 3, 2015 64

Emily's List Focuses Its 'Madam President' Program on Clinton // NYT // Jonathan Martin – June 3, 2015 66

Clinton campaign snares Box CEO in courting young tech millionaires // Reuters // Sarah McBride – June 3, 2015 67

Clinton campaign opens five more Iowa offices // The Des Moines Register // Tony Leys – June 3, 2015 69

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 69

Chafee to unveil presidential run, puzzling longtime allies // AP – June 3, 2015..... 69

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Lincoln Chafee expected to announce longshot presidential bid // WaPo // Jose DelReal – June 3, 2015 71

Launching '16 bid, Chafee refuses to rule out talks with IS // AP // Lisa Lerer – June 3, 2015..... 72

Iraq War focus for Lincoln Chafee campaign launch // CNN // Dan Merica – June 3, 2015..... 74

In Presidential Bid, Lincoln Chafee Calls For Metric System // WSJ // By ron Tau & Reid Epstein – June 3, 2015 76

Does Anybody Remember Lincoln Chafee's Facebook Password? //..... 77

Bloomberg // Ben Brody – June 3, 2015..... 77

President Obama's popularity numbers are running well behind historic norms // WaPo // Scott Clement – June 3, 2015 78

O'Malley's Mangled Wage Statistic // FactCheck // Brooks Jackson – June 3, 2015..... 79

Martin O'Malley counters Hillary Clinton: I'm not new to immigration reform // Politico // Jonathan Topaz – June 3, 2015 81

Martin O'Malley : Makes No Sense To Keep 11 Million In Shadow Economy // NBC News // Suzanne Gamboa – June 3, 2015 83

Martin O'Malley Wrongly Says That Wages Haven't Gotten Better For Americans // HuffPo // Brooks Jackson – June 3, 2015 85

O'Malley on the Stump // NYT // June 3, 2015 87

Martin O'Malley Calls For More Restrictions on NSA Surv eillance // TIME // Sam Frizell – June 3, 2015 87

O'Malley super PAC to air early television ads in Iowa // WaPo // John Wagner – June 3, 2015.... 88

Wall Street Execs Take Aim at O'Malley Campaign Hypocrisy // Fox News // Charlie Gasparino – June 3, 2015 89

Sanders Calls for 'Political Revolution' // The Weekly Standard // Michael Warren – June 3, 2015 . 91

Bernie Sanders Calls for More and Earlier Debates // NYT // Alan Rappeport – June 3, 2015 93

Sanders slams Jeb Bush over Social Security remarks // The Hill // Rebecca Shabad – June 3, 2015 94

GOP..... 95

Jeb Bush to announce presidential bid June 15 in Miami // Miami Herald // PATRICIA MAZZEI AND ALEX LEARY – June 4, 2015..... 95

Jeb Bush, Taking His Time, Tests the Legal Definition of Candidate // NYT // Eric Lichtblau & Nick Corasaniti – June 3, 2015 97

With some donors doubting Jeb Bush, Marco Rubio seizes an opening // WaPo // Matea Gold & Sean Sullivan – June 3, 2015 100

Why Jeb Bush Can't Bank On Faith Like His Brother Did // NPR // Don Gonyea – June 3, 2015.. 102

There will be blood: Prepare for nasty Jeb Bush — but don't expect any fingerprints // Salon // Jim Newell – June 3, 2015 104

Fox News Poll: Bush, Walker, Carson top GOP pack, support for Clinton down // Fox News // Dana Blanton – June 3, 2015 106

Republican Conservative Base Shrinks // Gallup // Frank Newport –June 3, 2015..... 108

Rick Santorum Wants Pope Francis To Stop Talking About Climate Change // HuffPo // Ed Mazza – June 3, 2015 110

George W. Bush tops Obama on favorability in new poll // The Hill // Mark Hensch – June 3, 2015 110

Texas' Economic Hiccup Complicates Rick Perry's 2016 Pitch // WSJ // Nathan Koppel & Colleen Mccain Nelson – June 3, 2015..... 112

Scott Walker Says 2016 Announcement Coming After Budget Wrap at End of June // Ali Elkin – June 3, 2015 114

Wisconsin Abortion Ban Would Allow Father To Sue For Emotional Distress // HuffPo // Laura Bassett – June 3, 2015 114

Scott Walker dead set against path to citizenship but has no answer for what to do with 11 million undocumented

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

residents // Tampa Bay Times // Alex Leary – June 3, 2015..... 115

Rand Paul calls out Jeb Bush for defending NSA // Politico // Katie Glueck – June 3, 2015 117

When Rand Paul steps in it // Politico // MANU RAJU – June 4, 2015..... 118

Scott Walker: Women Mostly Worry About Rape Pregnancies 'In The Initial Months' // Talking Points Memos // Ahiza Garcia – June 3, 2015..... 121

Rand Paul: GOP Isn't Entirely Responsible For Creating ISIS // HuffPo // Sam Levine – June 3, 2015 121

'I use them, they use me': Local politicians profit from presidential hopefuls in early-voting states // LA Times // Seema Mehta – June 3, 2015..... 122

TOP NEWS..... 125

DOMESTIC..... 125

Inequality a Major Issue for Americans, Times/CBS Poll Finds // NYT // Noam Scheiber & Dalia Sussman – June 3, 2015 126

Working dads make more money than working moms in every state // WaPo // Danielle Paquette – June 3, 2015 129

Republican Senators Will Sponsor A Bill To Protect Pregnant Workers For The First Time Ever // Think Progress // Bryce Covert – June 3, 2015..... 130

House GOP votes to block administration on immigration // AP // Erica Werner – June 3, 2015.. 131

INTERNATIONAL..... 131

ISIS Making Political Gains // NYT // Anne Barnard & Tim Arango – June 3, 2015 131

Cuba officially off U.S. terror blacklist // CNN // Kevin Liptak – June 3, 2015..... 134

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS..... 136

Romney defeating Bush in GOP establishment primary // The Hill // Brent Budowsky – June 3, 2015 136

Hillary Clinton is political, but her foundation isn't // Boston Globe // Dan Payne – June 3, 2015 137

Democrats, Don't Freak Out! // Slate // Jamelle Bouie – June 3, 2015 138

A 'favorable' way to stop Hillary Clinton's 'trust' fall // WaPo // Jonathan Capehart – June 3, 2015 140

MISCELLANEOUS..... 141

Lanny Davis: Hillary Clinton and the frenzy of the media // The Hill // Lanny Davis – June 3, 2015 142

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Hillary Clinton to Speak at Latino Leaders Conference // Latin Post // Robert Ugarte - Jun 04, 2015

Hillary Clinton, the Democratic Party's top presidential contender, will return to Nevada later in June to give a speech at a large conference of Latino political leaders. She continues to be a favorite among Latinos and continues to push for the community's backing.

Clinton, the first Democratic candidate to vie for the party's nomination, will return to Las Vegas on June 18 in a dash of appearances spanning the country. The Associated Press reports Clinton will attend the 32nd annual National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials (NALEO) conference, speaking in front of various Latino leaders from across the nation.

The NALEO conference "presents a unique opportunity for Latino policymakers to meet with their colleagues from all levels of government to address the challenges and opportunities facing our communities and our nation," according to its website.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton will speak at around 11:30 a.m. local time and the conference is only accessible to those attending and the media.

Because of the conference's focus, Clinton will undoubtedly be talking about Latino issues, but the topics have not been revealed as of yet. The NALEO conference website adds that Congresswoman Dina Titus, D-Nevada, Nevada Sen. Mo Denis, D-Las Vegas, Nevada Sen. Ruben Kihuen, D-Las Vegas, and Assemblywoman Irene Bustamante Adams, D-Las Vegas, will also speak.

The last time Clinton visited Las Vegas she proclaimed her administration would work towards establishing a path to citizenship for the 11 million undocumented immigrants in the nation.

"We cannot wait any longer for a path for full and equal citizenship," she said in early May, calling the Republicans' plan for legal status as "code for second-class status."

Despite winning over many Latinos and retaining her place as the darling of the Democratic electorate, Clinton has begun slipping in the polls. A CNN/ORC poll released on Tuesday showed the Democratic candidate's numbers have started going down.

In March Clinton's favorability rating stood at 53 percent; however, at the end of May, it has fallen to 46 percent as her "unfavorable" rating rose to 50 percent. Yet, among non-whites Clinton remains strong with 65 percent.

The poll showed Clinton continued to surpass her Republican opponents as the favored candidate.

In the past month, Clinton has made an effort to include Latinos in her campaign, having included Lorella Praeli and Xochitl Hinojosa, both well-known Latino leaders.

Clinton's visit to Las Vegas is part of a series of trips to states with early caucuses or primaries. The Las Vegas Review-Journal explains Clinton will be in Iowa from June 13 to 14, in New Hampshire on June 15, and in South Carolina on June 17.

Clinton to call for at least 20 days of early voting nationwide // WaPo // Anne Gearan – June 3, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton plans to call for an early voting period of at least 20 days in every state.

Clinton will call for that standard in remarks Thursday in Texas about voting rights, her campaign said. She will also criticize what her campaign calls deliberate restrictions on voting in several states, including Texas.

The former secretary of state's address at historically-black Texas Southern University in Houston comes as Democrats pursue legal challenges to voting rule changes approved by Republican legislatures in several states.

Clinton and her allies claim the changes are aimed at narrowing the electorate in ways that benefit Republicans.

“This is, I think, a moment when we should be expanding the franchise,” Clinton campaign chairman John Podesta said in an interview. “What we see in state after state is this effort by conservatives to restrict the right to vote.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The legal effort began late last month with lawsuits in Wisconsin and Ohio, both presidential battleground states.

“This lawsuit concerns the most fundamental of rights guaranteed citizens in our representative democracy — the right to vote,” lawyers wrote in a federal complaint filed Friday in Wisconsin.

The challenge to a cutback in early voting in Wisconsin was filed by lawyers including Democratic election lawyer Marc Elias, who is the Clinton campaign’s top lawyer. Elias was not acting on behalf of the campaign, although all Democrats including Clinton could benefit if early voting were expanded.

“That right has been under attack in Wisconsin since Republicans gained control of the governor’s office and both houses of the State legislature in the 2010 election,” the lawsuit alleges.

Hillary Clinton Is Alone at the Top of Democratic 2016 Hill Endorsements // National Journal // Alex Brown – June 2, 2015

Hillary Clinton has racked up a slew of congressional endorsements in her presidential bid. Her rivals either can't compete on the Hill or are only doing so quietly.

Clinton's endorsement tally already stands at triple digits—nearly half of all sitting Democrats. But lawmakers say they've heard little outreach from Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley, Clinton's underdog rivals to lead Democrats' 2016 ticket.

Even the group that provides the underdogs' best chance at winning allies says the phone has stayed firmly on the hook: Both Sanders and O'Malley are running to Clinton's left, but the Congressional Progressive Caucus says it has heard no calls for support from either candidate. Instead, caucus cochair Raul Grijalva has thrown his support behind Clinton, as have fellow liberals like Reps. Rosa DeLauro and Jan Schakowsky.

While members say they would welcome the chance to hear from presidential hopefuls, it appears those candidates have decided the road to the nomination doesn't run through the Beltway—at least yet. "We've certainly had opportunities in the past to have some of those declared candidates come before us," said House Democratic Caucus Chair Xavier Becerra, citing an O'Malley appearance on the Hill last year. "Certainly this caucus will invite any declared candidate for president to come before us and address the caucus members, because the members are very interested."

Haley Morris, a spokeswoman for O'Malley, said his team has already started a thorough outreach campaign. But when it comes to Washington Democrats backing Clinton, she said, O'Malley is "not worried about establishment backing establishment."

Observers say there could be several reasons for the quiet on Capitol Hill. First, at this early stage in the race, candidates are far more focused on fundraising and building a ground game than getting members of Congress on board. "I haven't really seen any [outreach] at all," said Rep. Dutch Ruppersberger of Maryland. "There will probably be more action here when the primaries start coming up."

Ruppersberger, who has not yet made an endorsement, cited his close ties to both Clinton and O'Malley as his reason for staying out of the primary so far.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Meanwhile, the candidates likely realize that Congress, too, has its focus elsewhere right now. "This is appropriations season," laughed Ruppersberger. And eight months out from Iowa's first-in-the-nation caucus, most members are unlikely to get behind a candidate who has yet to challenge Clinton in the polls.

But even with many members in wait-and-see mode, Clinton's challengers have already seen many of their potential allies back the front-runner—including in the home states of Clinton's rivals.

In O'Malley's home state of Maryland, with its clout-heavy congressional delegation, Clinton has earned several high-profile endorsements: Minority Whip Steny Hoyer and Budget Committee ranking member Chris Van Hollen, both Marylanders, have endorsed Clinton. Sens. Barbara Mikulski and Ben Cardin back Clinton as well.

Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont has endorsed Clinton, leaving undecided Rep. Peter Welch as Sanders' only remaining home-state endorsement opportunity. Meanwhile, the entrance of former Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia and former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee into the race hasn't stopped half a dozen Virginia and Rhode Island members from backing Clinton over their long-shot contenders back home.

Of course, no congressional endorsement will change Clinton's status as the favorite, and her challengers may be content to watch her rack up Capitol Hill endorsements as they paint her as a creature of the Washington establishment. While O'Malley will tout his state executive experience, Sanders—an independent and self-described socialist—will likely have little trouble distancing himself from the other candidates.

SOCIAL MEDIA

Matt Corridoni (5/3/15, 3:18 pm) - "We can already trade & we should...[but #TPP] is bad for us as a country." - @GovernorOMalley taking a clear stance, once again, on trade

Lisa Lerer (5/3/15, 5:24, pm) - Law school seminar or Lincoln Chafee's presidential announcement?

Trip Gabriel (5/3/15, 7:50 pm) - Carly Fiorina releases her net worth: $59 million. Effective federal tax rate: 20 percent.

Ari Berman (5/3/15, 8:12 pm) - Would be very big deal if every state had 20+ days of early voting, as HRC wants. 14 states have no early voting http://www.washingtonpost.com/blogs/post-pol ...

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE

Heroin epidemic leaves mark on 2016 presidential race // WaPo // Katie Zezima – June 3, 2015

When aspiring presidential candidates step into Mayor Ted Gatsas's office here, he doesn't let them leave without telling them about what he calls one of the most pressing, dire issues his city faces: drug abuse.

"Every candidate that comes in here, what I say to them is, 'It's not only an issue here in Manchester, New Hampshire. It's a national issue,' " said Gatsas (R). "If we don't get our arms around it, it's going to take over our country."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The nation is in the throes of an epidemic of prescription-drug and heroin abuse — a wave that's leaving its mark on the 2016 presidential campaign, too.

Hillary Rodham Clinton has told supporters that drug abuse and mental health will be key issues in her Democratic presidential campaign, and she launched a policy-focused outreach effort on the issue. New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie (R) recently participated in a round-table discussion at a drug treatment facility here. Republican Carly Fiorina has spoken movingly about losing a stepdaughter to addiction. Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) has made reforming drug laws and the criminal-justice system a centerpiece of his presidential campaign. And former Florida governor Jeb Bush (R) said he learned about New Hampshire's heroin problem while touring as a potential presidential candidate.

Drug addiction and treatment are no longer problems acknowledged only with infrequent stump lines. They are driving a sustained conversation on the presidential campaign trail.

And that conversation revolves around ending — not stepping up — the war on drugs. It centers on the language of addiction and treatment, on the sharing of deeply personal experiences and on calls from candidates for the criminal-justice system to be restructured to make the government's response to illegal use less punitive.

It is being driven by voters such as Pamela Livengood of Keene, N.H., who told Clinton last month that she has had to take on the care of her grandson because of drug abuse.

"Grandpa and I have guardianship of him because of all the growing drug problem in our area that my grandson's mother can't be quite so responsible," Livengood said carefully. "So we've picked it up and took over, but we also need to see more for substance abuse help in our area. There are very limited resources here."

Clinton responded that she was "really concerned because, Pam, what you just told me and I'm hearing from a lot of different people." She described drug use as a "hidden . . . quiet epidemic," different from the headline-grabbing phenomenon of the 1980s, that is "striking in small towns and rural areas as much as any big city."

According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the number of deaths nationwide involving heroin increased from 3,041 in 2008 to 8,260 in 2013, the most recent year for which statistics are available. In 2013, 16,235 people died from overdosing on prescription opiates; in 2008, 14,800 people died. Drug overdoses were the nation's leading cause of injury death in 2013,according to the CDC. Among people 25 to 64, overdoses caused more deaths than traffic accidents.

Here in New Hampshire, the state's medical examiner has called heroin abuse "the Ebola of Northern New England." New Hampshire recorded 325 drug overdose deaths last year; about 90 percent of them involved opiates, according to the medical examiner's office. The state also has seen a rapid increase in the number of deaths from the painkiller fentanyl, which is often mixed with heroin.

"I am not at all surprised that it's coming up in community conversations around New Hampshire, because this is the community conversation that is happening in New Hampshire right now," said Tym Rourke, chairman of the commission on alcohol and other drug abuse prevention set up by Gov. Maggie Hassan (D).

Christie held a roundtable discussion last month at the Farnum Center, a drug abuse treatment facility here and relayed a story he often tells, about how a law-school classmate struggled with an addiction to prescription painkillers. The friend died in a New Jersey hotel room with an empty vodka bottle and an empty painkiller bottle.

"This is a treatable problem," Christie said. "And we need to start talking about it like an illness, not like some moral failure."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On the same trip, the New Jersey governor discussed addiction at a Manchester pizza place that had recently experienced the death of an employee from a heroin overdose.

For years, Christie — a former prosecutor — has been advocating treatment over incarceration for low-level drug offenders, sometimes framing that approach as part of being "pro-life for the whole life."

In response to a surge in opioid deaths in New Jersey, Christie signed a bill in April to establish a statewide task force. He has expanded drug courts and broadened access to naloxone, a drug that can reverse the effects of an opiate overdose.

Paul has made reforming drug laws one of the signature issues of his time in the Senate and in his presidential campaign, often telling audiences that the war on drugs has failed — that it has "created a culture of violence and put police in an impossible situation," as he said in Las Vegas in April — and that low-level drug offenders should go into treatment rather than being jailed.

Carly Fiorina's stepdaughter Lori Ann Fiorina died in 2009 at age 35 after struggling for years with alcohol and drug addiction. Hours after announcing her presidential bid last month, Fiorina said the country must change the way it deals with people who are addicted to drugs.

"Drug addiction shouldn't be criminalized," she said on a conference call. "We need to treat it appropriately."

For all the talk, there's little yet in the way of policy plans. The first votes of the 2016 campaign are still months away, and so far, no candidate has come up with concrete proposals on how he or she would handle the epidemic from the Oval Office.

Over the past week, Clinton's campaign has started to move in that direction. Campaign advisers held Google hangouts with treatment providers, law enforcement officials and others in Iowa and New Hampshire, and Clinton asked voters to share their thoughts on and experiences with substance abuse with her in a Facebook chat. The campaign has said it will use the information to develop policy proposals.

Clinton herself has spoken about addiction numerous times in New Hampshire and brought it up at a campaign event in Iowa. The former U.S. secretary of state said she had heard all over Iowa about two issues: mental illness and drugs.

"The drug epidemic, meth, pills in Iowa — and then I got to New Hampshire and at my very first coffee shop meeting I heard about the heroin epidemic in New Hampshire," Clinton said in Mason City, Iowa, last month. "This is tearing families apart, but it is below the surface. People aren't talking about it, because it's something that is hard to deal with."

During a stop in Davenport, Iowa, on Saturday, Clinton rival Martin O'Malley was asked by two women in the audience about the issue. Both were wearing T-shirts with a photo showing one of the women's sons, who had died of a heroin overdose.

"Sadly, many of us are becoming much more expert on the tragedy of heroin overdose deaths in our country because of what's happened recently," said O'Malley, the former Maryland governor, who hugged both women.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Malley sought, with limited success, to combat the issue during his tenure as governor, which ended in January. In 2014, 578 people in Maryland died of heroin overdoses, a 25 percent increase over 2013 and more than twice the number who died from using the drug in 2010.

One question Republican candidates will face — but which Clinton and O'Malley will not — is how they plan to cover addiction treatment if they want to repeal the Affordable Care Act. That law mandates that insurance plans make substance-abuse and mental-health treatment essential benefits.

But even under the ACA, treatment is often hard to come by, and barriers to access remain. A report issued last month by the National Alliance on Mental Illness suggested that some patients are still being denied care.

"The issue is, [candidates are] talking about it, but are they committed to making sure that adequate funding and services are available for these people?" said Dedric L. Doolin, senior deputy director of the Area Substance Abuse Council in Cedar Rapids, Iowa. Doolin wants candidates to ensure long-term treatment will be funded.

Here in Manchester, Gatsas, the mayor, said he is bringing together law enforcement officials, treatment providers and others to try to tackle the issue locally. But they will not be the only ones hearing from the mayor, who said he plans to continue to press the issue with current and prospective presidential candidates. He predicts that his constituents will, too.

Candidates now "hear it even more on the stump, because people want to know, 'What are you going to do?' "

Hillary's Popularity Rollercoaster // Politico // Jack Shafer – June 3, 2015

Political journalists abhor a vacuum, especially the vacuum that forms 17 months before a presidential election, attaches itself to their brains like a sea lamprey and sucks hard.

Oh, political journalists have so much to write about this distant from a general election. There are speeches to cover, fundraising numbers to chase, campaign jockeying to chronicle, backstories to collate, campaign staff rosters to collect, press management schemes to detect and vats of wonkery to fry. Such coverage is all necessary and good, but at this point even the press hounds will concede that they're mostly barking at dust and vapor, waiting for the field to thin and for primary ballots to be cast so they can write more concretely about the race. (After all: Just how much public appetite is there for in-depth coverage of George Pataki or Lincoln Chafee?)

Until then, journalists casting for something tangible to hang their thoughts upon are reaching for poll data—like the figures released this week from CNN/ORC and Washington Post/ABC News, which show Hillary Clinton's "favorability" numbers crumbling to a 14-year-low of 46 percent. "The honeymoon is over for Hillary Clinton, according to two new polls," reported the National Journal. "As revelations mount, Hillary Clinton's poll numbers plunge," proclaimed the Atlantic Journal-Constitution. The conservative press, including Breitbart and the Washington Examiner danced on the new polls. "Is Hillary 'Likeable Enough'?" asked National Review.

While glory awaits the journalist who buries Hillary Clinton, carves her tombstone and tidies her grave, the makings of her demise cannot be read in these poll results. Clinton rides a favorability rollercoaster, and has been riding it hard for the past 23 years, as the American Enterprise Institute's Karlyn Bowman and her team demonstrate in a recent analysis of Clinton polling data. As an infographic they produced indicates, Clinton favorability numbers vary with the role she's playing. Her numbers grew steadily in the campaign year of 1992 and higher still when she became First Lady in 1993. First ladies, notes Bowman, "generally receive positive marks."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Clinton's numbers suffered whenever she stepped outside of the traditional First Lady function to join the policy and politics tussle (the healthcare debate) or became attached to White House "scandals" (Travelgate, Whitewater, Lewinsky, et al.). As a U.S. senator (2001-2009), Clinton's numbers varied much less, dropping some during her 2008 run for president. Then came her secretary of state years (2009-2013), when she exuded diplomacy and did her soaring best in the polls. Her numbers descended again as she became identified with the Benghazi attack in 2013.

How to best interpret Clinton's latest decline? When asked to rate Hillary Clinton on a favorable-unfavorable continuum, it has usually mattered to respondents what Clinton's duties were. Now that she's running for president, it's predictable that some of the respondents who liked Clinton enough to give her a favorable rating when she was a self-effacing, team-playing diplomat might not like her enough to give her a favorable rating when they view her as a private citizen prepping a presidential candidacy. (This timeline from the Pew Research Center ties Clinton career "milestones" to her favorability ups and downs.)

Clinton's numbers could easily go lower, of course, given the twin backdrops of the email controversy and the Clinton Foundation coverage. Also, in the coming months, as the Republican field winnows out, the remaining candidates will increase the frequency of their attacks on Clinton, their most credible opponent on the Democratic side, and lower her favorability still more.

But it's hard to imagine a favorability-ratings veteran like Hillary Clinton panicking at this week's or next week's numbers. As the wise man once said, Clinton operates in glacial time, and has the patience to build support—and favorability—as the campaign throttles up. She has almost 30 years of hand-on experience handling political calamities and downturns. Plus, as low as her favorability ratings have dropped, they're still about 15-to-20 percentage points higher than several of her Republican opponents.

It's always easier for a politician to survive a trough when she has so much experience living on the crest.

Hillary Clinton is Too Liberal for Bill Clinton // Politico // Alan Greenblatt – June 2, 2015

The biggest irony of the 2016 campaign is Hillary Clinton running as the sort of liberal Bill Clinton once ran against. The Democratic party has moved too far left to accept the former president, or at least the version of Bill Clinton that dominated Democratic politics back in the 1990s.

The overarching project of his political career was to pull the party back toward the center. Barney Frank recalls, while Clinton was in office, getting no response to a letter he'd sent to "The Democratic President of the United States" because the post office classified it as "addressee unknown." Within a few years of Clinton's reign, politicians such as Paul Wellstone and Howard Dean began to refer to themselves as representatives of the "Democratic wing" of the Democratic Party.

To succeed today, Hillary Clinton—like any national Democrat—must win over that wing. But doing so will encourage Republicans to paint her as too beholden to the party's liberal, urban, heavily minority base. If those attacks succeed and she loses, it will be back to the future for the GOP. That line of attack is why Bill Clinton self-consciously sought to ditch the losing liberal policies of the party's previous presidential nominees, such as Michael Dukakis and Walter Mondale. Democrats lost five out of the six presidential elections between 1968 and 1988, going 0-for-3 by the time Clinton ran in 1992. There was a lot of talk at the time about the GOP holding a "lock" on the Electoral College. Clinton and other so-called New Democrats thought they could regain voter trust by taking a tougher line on social and spending issues. Hillary Clinton is doing the opposite.

She is being dragged left by younger voters and minority groups, who make up essential elements of today's Democratic coalition and tend to favor federal solutions more readily, according to polls, than older, whiter voters. The party's votes now overwhelmingly come from big cities, territory in which Democratic mayors such as Bill De Blasio in New York and Eric Garcetti in Los Angeles have made addressing income inequality central to their mission through measures such as lifting the minimum wage and building more affordable housing. President

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama, having grown convinced that Republicans intend to give him nothing, responded to the GOP's big victory last fall by making deals with Cuba and Iran and moving left on issues such as immigration, free community college and paid family leave. (Unpaid family leave was one of President Clinton's earliest legislative accomplishments.)

It all shows how far the party, and the Clintons, have come. The most resonant phrases from Bill Clinton's day—aside from the sex stuff—were the exact opposite of any progressive call to arms, such as "end welfare as we know it" and "the era of big government is over." But the era of big government being over—if that chime ever indeed did sound—is long since done. Put aside the expansions of federal programs that took place under Obama and George W. Bush. Although Obama and some other Democrats were willing to entertain thoughts a few years ago of trimming Social Security as part of a bigger budget deal, pledging to preserve or even expand the program has once again become a litmus test for party officials.

As president, Bill Clinton not only signed the anti-gay Defense of Marriage Act (an act for which he has since repented). He also signed a welfare law that cut off immigrants from receiving many benefits. Legal immigrants. Imagine any national Democrat agreeing to either of those things today. "They've moved left partly because they've won," says Lara Brown, a political scientist at George Washington University. "Parties typically go as far toward their core ideology as they can, as long as they keep winning."

President Clinton did champion many progressive causes, including universal health care (a botched effort run by Hillary Clinton), gun control and expansion of the earned-income tax credit, an anti-poverty program Clinton himself wished had a zippier brand name. But Clinton also argued that by melding liberal principles and conservative ideas, voters who had written off the Democratic Party would again listen to its message, which remained broadly populist on economic matters. Clinton believed Democrats had to shed any lingering hippie image and talk tough on crime. When still the governor of Arkansas, Clinton left the campaign trail in 1992 to preside over the execution of a cop killer who was mentally impaired. He also went out of his way to distance himself from civil rights leader Jesse Jackson—his "Sister Souljah moment."

Triangulation (remember that?) wasn't just about Clinton positioning himself to the left of old-line liberals. He picked the Republicans' pockets on their most popular issues, forcing them out alone on a limb to defend their most extreme positions. "Back when he ran in 1992, my party, the Democratic Party, had lost three consecutive elections, one of them in which we carried only one state," says Evan Bayh, a former governor and senator from Indiana who, like Clinton, enjoyed success in the 1990s by seeking the center. "Any time a party has lost three consecutive elections, it becomes a bit more willing to explore the notion of principled compromise so it's able to pursue some of its objectives."

Barney Frank, the liberal former congressman from Massachusetts, makes this point explicitly in his recent memoir. "At the time, many on the left believed he was 'too moderate,'" Frank writes. "In the political climate of the times, I continued to believe that Bill Clinton was the most liberal electable president."

Concerns about Clinton records dates back to her tenure at State // CNN // Laura Koran – June 3, 2015

Officials at the National Archives and Records Administration -- the agency tasked with managing official government records -- were in touch with the State Department about plans to preserve former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's records shortly before she left that office, newly released emails reveal.

The emails were obtained by CNN through a Freedom of Information Act request submitted to NARA in March, shortly after it was revealed that the former secretary exclusively used a personal email server while in office, preventing many from being archived until she ultimately submitted them to the Department.

One email in particular shows that concerns were raised two and a half years ago that any retention of documents on Clinton's part could create controversy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Before I forget," Chief Records Officer for U.S. Government Paul Wester told two of his colleagues in December 2012, "when we meet later this week we need to discuss what we know, and how we should delicately go about learning more about, regarding the transition plans for Secretary Clinton's departure from State."

Wester then refers to someone identified only as Tom who, "heard (or thought he heard) from the Clinton Library Director that there are or may be plans afoot for taking her records from State to Little Rock."

"Tom then got to asking questions about what we are doing to make sure everyone leaving the Administration does not leave with Federal records," the email continues.

Ultimately, Wester says he spoke with Tom and explained how previous administrations have handled records retention and how NARA is seeking to clarify their guidance ahead of the upcoming inauguration when some high level officials planned to leave the administration.

He also says he told Tom copies of records can sometimes be kept in an approved way, citing the example of former Treasury Secretary Paul O'Neill used records to work on his memoir, "to illustrate how 'walking off with the records' is sometimes not really 'walking off with the records.'"

Nevertheless, Tom (and another individual referred to only as Jay) appeared concerned, Wester said.

"Tom seemed to understand all of this, but he and Jay continued to invoke the specter of the Henry Kissinger experience vis-a-vis Hillary Clinton," Wester said, referring to a controversy surrounding former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger's decision to hold on to his official records.

There are several redactions in this and other emails obtained by CNN.

Clinton ultimately retained her emails on a private server until they were requested by the State Department late last year. She and her staff then turned over 55,000 pages of emails, keeping those they deemed irrelevant to her time in office.

The emails obtained by CNN also illustrate how officials at NARA came to learn of the Clinton controversy after they were reached out to by staff on a congressional committee, then a few days later by New York Times reporter Michael Schmidt, who broke the story in March.

After speaking with Schmidt, NARA's General Counsel Gary Stern wrote to other NARA officials to explain the details of the story and their conversation.

"This case, if true, would present a concern," he writes, "although it may be the case that the State Department has already taken appropriate action to recover the records."

Axelrod: Clinton "Hurt" By Only Doing "Sporadic" Events, Challenge Is For Her To Take "Risks" // Buzzfeed // Andrew Kaczynski & Megan Apper – June 3, 2015

Former Obama strategist David Axelrod says Hillary Clinton's "sporadic" campaign appearances are hurting her candidacy. Axelrod added that Clinton will have a problem unless she gets into the "routine of campaigning."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I thinks she's being hurt right now by her sporadic appearances, you want to be the regular routine of campaigning and it's important that she gets there and gets there quickly," Axelrod told ABC Wisconsin-affiliate WISN Tuesday. "If she does, I think all of this will be forgotten. I think if she continues in this fashion it will be a problem."

Axelrod was in Milwaukee to speak about his new book at a Marquette University Law School forum.

Speaking the event, he said it was likely she would be the nominee, although "inevitability" is a burden for her in 2016.

"The high likelihood is that Hillary will be the nominee but having said that I think inevitability is not her friend," Axelrod told a crowd at the school. "I think it's a real burden."

Axelrod said he saw "two Hillary Clintons" during the 2008 race: one that was cautious and one that was "a very effective candidate."

"I saw two Hillary Clintons in 2007, 2008. In 2007 she was kind of constrained in this straight jacket of inevitability and she carried that inevitability around like a porcelain vase and she was very cautious, unadventuresome, unrevealing," Axelrod said.

"And then she lost the Iowa Caucuses and she became a different candidate. She threw all that caution away. She was much more revealing of herself, much more connecting with other people, much more of an advocate than she had been. In my view, a very effective candidate. It was just too late."

Axelrod questioned if Clinton was once again following the "temptation to be cautious."

"The question she'll have to answer is which candidate is she going to be in 2016 because once again there's this veil of inevitability and there's a temptation to be cautious," he said.

"You have to take some risks along the way," added Axelrod. "I think that's the challenge for her if she's gonna go all the way but I think she certainly has a chance to do that."

Hillary Clinton's honesty problem // The Hill // Niall Stanage – June 3, 2015

Is it possible to win the White House if more than half the electorate thinks you're dishonest?

Hillary Clinton may yet put that question to the test. It's not the kind of challenge any candidate would relish, but two new polls released on Tuesday underlined the presidential hopeful's difficulty in persuading the public of her integrity.

Both those polls found Clinton deep underwater when voters were asked whether they viewed her as honest and trustworthy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

An ABC News/Washington Post poll found 52 percent of people answering “no” to that question, compared to 41 percent who expressed trust in Clinton.

A CNN poll made even grimmer reading for the former secretary of State. It found 57 percent of adults asserting that Clinton is not honest or trustworthy, and only 42 percent saying that she is.

Those figures were enough to send a shiver down some Democrats’ spines.

“We’re about 30 to 60 days away from real nervousness, if not panic, in the Democratic establishment,” said one strategist who declined to be named, citing a fear of retribution by Clinton loyalists.

The strategist argued that Clinton’s campaign has consistently underestimated the damage that has been wreaked by negative stories about donations to the Clinton Foundation and the former secretary’s use of a private email account while at State.

“There is this attitude that this is something that the media or the right-wing are fixated on, and they are missing the bigger dynamic here,” the strategist said of the Clinton campaign. “The bottom line here is that there is this pervasive belief that the story is going to go away and they can mitigate this with silence. And it ain’t working.”

The Clinton campaign contends that the candidate’s low numbers are symptomatic of a general distrust of political figures. Campaign officials believe the higher ratings Clinton enjoyed at the State Department were bound to slide as she returned to partisan politics.

Further, they assert that her policies will, over time, foster a different, more important kind of trust among voters.

Observers who follow every political twist and turn might imagine that opinions of Clinton would be hard to change, for good or bad, given that she has now been a top player on the national political stage for a quarter-century.

The polling figures do not bear that out, however.

In the past year, the former first lady’s polling numbers on the “honesty” question have flipped.

One year before Tuesday’s ABC News/Post poll showing her 11 points underwater on the issue, the same organization found her with a net positive of 11 points, with 53 percent of those polled thinking of her as trustworthy versus 42 percent saying she was not.

When CNN/ORC asked the question in a March 2014 survey, 56 percent said Clinton was honest, while 43 percent disagreed — a net positive of 13 points. Today her standing on the question in the equivalent poll is a net negative of 15 points.

Republicans see those figures as little more than an increased public acceptance of what they have long believed to be true.

“She is paranoid, she is ethically squirrelly and she believes there are two sets of standards: one for the Clintons and one for everyone else,” said GOP strategist Rick Wilson.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Wilson was buoyed by what he considered fresh evidence of the shallowness of Clinton's support.

"She is always 'inevitable' right up until the moment she is no longer inevitable," he said.

Independent observers don't believe the situation is quite so dire for Clinton. They note that she has often performed worse on questions of honesty and likability than on other metrics such as having strong leadership skills.

"It's certainly not good news but these are not necessarily the kind of numbers that make a candidate unelectable," said Peter Brown, the assistant director of the Quinnipiac University Polling Institute.

An April Quinnipiac poll in three swing states — Colorado, Iowa and Virginia — showed the same weakness for Clinton on the honesty question, most conspicuously in Colorado, where a startling 56 percent of voters viewed Clinton as dishonest versus only 38 percent who saw her as honest.

But, Brown notes, "We have elected presidents who voters did not necessarily like."

Others, including journalist Ron Brownstein, have pointed out that exit polls from the 1996 presidential election showed that 54 percent of voters did not view President Clinton as honest or trustworthy. He won handily regardless.

But a related question is whether a distrust of Hillary Clinton would stymie her efforts to maximize Democratic turnout.

"Her husband transcended numbers like this and it's not crazy to think that she can as well, especially because American politics is so partisan now," said Kyle Kondik of the University of Virginia Center for Politics. "Democrats and Democratic-leaning independents may not think Clinton is very trustworthy, but they're going to like her a heck of a lot more than any Republican. Clinton's main concern is getting those voters to show up."

Still, right now, some Democrats just want to see evidence that the decline in personal trust in Clinton can be stopped before it becomes a larger problem.

"At some point they are going to have to address this head-on, publicly," the Democratic strategist said, "and the clock on that is beginning to tick loudly."

Democrats Wage a National Fight Over Voter Rules // NYT // Maggie Haberman & Amy Chozick – June 3, 2015

Democrats allied with Hillary Rodham Clinton are mounting a nationwide legal battle 17 months before the 2016 presidential election, seeking to roll back Republican-enacted restrictions on voter access that Democrats say could, if unchallenged, prove decisive in a close campaign.

The Democrats began last month with lawsuits filed in Ohio and Wisconsin, presidential battleground states whose governors are likely to run for the Republican nomination themselves. Now, they are most likely going to attack a host of measures. They include voter identification requirements that Democrats consider onerous, time restrictions imposed on early voting that they say could make it difficult to cast ballots the weekend before Election Day, and rules that could nullify ballots cast in the wrong precinct.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The effort, which is being spearheaded by a lawyer whose clients include Mrs. Clinton's campaign, reflects an urgent practical need, Democrats say: to get litigation underway early enough so that federal judges can be persuaded to intervene in states where Republicans control legislatures and governor's offices.

A similar lawsuit was begun last year in North Carolina. Other potential fronts in the pre-emptive legal offensive, Democrats say, could soon be opened in Georgia, Nevada and the increasingly critical presidential proving ground of Virginia.

Almost all of those states have growing African-American or Hispanic populations, groups crucial to Mr. Obama in 2012 but whose voting rights Democrats say could be impinged next year, damaging the party's prospects.

Democrats seeking office at every level in 2016 could gain if lawsuits in their states are successful. But Mrs. Clinton, who has a wide lead in public polls, is certain to benefit if she is the party's nominee.

On Thursday, Mrs. Clinton will tackle the issue of ballot access head-on in an address at Texas Southern University, a historically black college in Houston. She is expected to condemn the Supreme Court's 2013 rulingstriking down an important provision of the Voting Rights Act, which opened the way for states to pass laws requiring voters to present government-issued photo identification at the polls.

Mrs. Clinton is also expected to single out laws in Texas and in North Carolina, Ohio and Wisconsin, which voting rights groups say limit participation, especially among minorities, the poor and younger voters who disproportionately cast their ballots for Democrats.

Her speech, which is expected to be similar in scope and tenor to her remarks about overhauling the criminal justice system, will tie voting rights into the broader civil rights strife that has erupted over the recent deaths of several unarmed black men at the hands of white police officers, aides said.

For Mrs. Clinton, such speeches can do much to reinforce her liberal credentials while reassuring black voters who supported Mr. Obama that she is on their side.

In the same way, even if the lawsuits are unsuccessful, Democratic strategists say, they serve an important political purpose for Democrats by highlighting Republicans' responsibility for the statutes being challenged. Democrats will also remind the party's base that Republicans have tried to mobilize their own core voters by warning, as Mitt Romney did in 2012, against the possibility of widespread voter fraud by Democrats.

Both those points could help fire up minority leaders and voters, Democratic strategists say.

Republicans, however, argue that the lawsuits are a transparent ruse aimed at energizing minority voters, whom Mrs. Clinton badly needs to turn out in numbers similar to those Mr. Obama drew in his 2012 re-election.

"I think it has been a growing trend in the last 10 years for campaigns to use litigation like this as a campaign weapon," said Hans von Spakovsky, a Republican election law expert at the conservative Heritage Foundation. "The claims that they keep making, that this is going to depress turnout, just keep proving to be not true, and many of these issues have already been litigated."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

According to the nonpartisan Brennan Center for Justice at New York University School of Law, there are 14 states with new voter laws in place for the first time in a national race.

The lawsuits filed in Ohio and Wisconsin, like the 2014 North Carolina case, were brought by Marc Elias, a leading Democratic lawyer on voter protection issues who represents four of the party's national campaign committees.

Mr. Elias is also the general counsel for Mrs. Clinton's campaign, and her aides have spoken favorably of the lawsuits.

The lawsuits are typically filed on behalf of people who say they have been, or could be, disenfranchised. In the Ohio case, a black pastor is among the plaintiffs.

Mrs. Clinton's campaign is not a party to the lawsuits, although her aides have said her team supports them. People involved in the actions have refused to say who was paying for them.

But Mr. Elias suggested that the litigation was simply common sense. "We should all want to ensure that all eligible voters can exercise their right to vote and have their vote counted," he said. "It's unfortunate that some Republicans see a benefit in making it harder for people to vote."

Since the election fight in 2000 between George W. Bush and Al Gore, court battles have become a routine and increasingly strategic component of presidential campaigns. The new round of lawsuits is occurring relatively early and is a more preventive effort than in past election cycles, experts say.

More broadly, the legal campaign is shaping up as something of a delayed Democratic response to the Republican takeovers of a number of governorships and legislatures in the same states after the rise of the Tea Party movement in 2009 and 2010, as well as to the Supreme Court's ruling on the Voting Rights Act in 2013.

As a result of both changes, a series of stringent state laws were enacted in some of those states that Democrats say are intended to curtail voting by important segments of Mr. Obama's political coalition, African-American and younger voters in particular.

Donna Brazile, the campaign manager for Mr. Gore in the 2000 presidential race and a member of a Democratic National Committee task force that was formed after the party's disastrous losses in 2014, said she and Mr. Elias had for months been sounding an alarm within the party about voting-rights conditions in a number of states.

Instead of idling, she said, Democrats had to "proactively" seek changes in states where voter protections might be changed, whether through litigation or legislation.

Republicans have used such laws for mobilization purposes of their own, denouncing voter fraud as they appeal to an increasingly conservative party base. Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, for example, has repeatedly boasted to Republicans across the country about having enacted tougher voting laws in his state.

"Any measure that protects our democracy by making it easier to vote and harder to cheat is a step in the right direction," said Kirsten Kukowski, a spokeswoman for Mr. Walker. "This is a bipartisan issue, and Hillary Clinton and the Democrats are on the wrong side."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rick Hasen, an election law expert at the University of California, Irvine, called the Democratic lawsuits "long shots," saying that so-called voter protection lawsuits had often failed in the courts. "In terms of success, some of these things are a stretch," he said.

Mr. Elias emphasized that the seeds of the Ohio and Wisconsin suits had been planted before Mrs. Clinton was a candidate. Mr. Elias and Robby Mook, now Mrs. Clinton's campaign manager, began collaborating on voter-protection efforts last year, before it was clear she would run or that they would be involved, people briefed on their work said.

But their efforts now — whether parallel or in concert — involve much higher stakes. Unlike Mr. Obama, who could rely on a much wealthier Democratic National Committee to pursue voter registration for several years leading up to his re-election campaign, the party's standard-bearer this time will have no such backup: The national committee has struggled financially of late and has largely outsourced its registration efforts to nonprofit groups.

That means Mrs. Clinton, if she is nominated, may have to compensate for underwhelming efforts to register voters by maximizing the ability of existing Democratic voters to cast their ballots.

As Mrs. Clinton prepares to head to Texas Southern University, where she will receive an award named for the former congresswoman and civil rights leader Barbara Jordan, some Democrats see voter protections as a safe topic for her to explore at this stage of the campaign, one that will not turn off voters she needs in a general election.

But Michael Waldman, president of the Brennan Center and a former speechwriter for President Bill Clinton, said the subject was riskier than it might seem.

"There's been such a hotly contested wave of new laws that it's not such a safe issue anymore," said Mr. Waldman. "It's not just something for Fourth of July orations."

Clinton to propose at least 20 days of early voting in every state // USA Today // David Jackson – June 3, 2015

Hillary Clinton plans to use a voting rights speech Thursday in Texas to call for an early voting period of at least 20 days in every state, her presidential campaign says.

Clinton also plans to criticize what Democrats call Republican efforts to restrict voting — especially for African Americans and Latinos — through devices like voter identification laws.

"This is, I think, a moment when we should be expanding the franchise," Clinton campaign chairman John Podesta tells The Washington Post. "What we see in state after state is this effort by conservatives to restrict the right to vote."

Clinton is slated to deliver her voting rights speech at Texas Southern University in Houston.

Hillary Clinton to Attack G.O.P. Rivals on Voting Rights // NYT // Amy Chozick – June 3, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton will accuse some of her Republican rivals on Thursday of supporting a spate of new state voting laws that threatened the democratic process merely for their own political gain, her campaign said Wednesday.

In a speech at the historically black Texas Southern University in Houston, Mrs. Clinton will propose a series of voter-protection policies, including ensuring greater access to online voter registration, reducing wait times at voting precincts and setting a nationwide early voting standard of at least 20 days before an election. She will also underscore her support for allowing ex-felons to vote.

Mrs. Clinton will also call on Congress to reenact parts of the Voting Rights Act that the Supreme Court struck down in 2013, according to an outline of her speech provided to reporters on Wednesday.

It will be one of her most substantive and sharply political events since Mrs. Clinton declared her candidacy for president in April. For the most part, her campaign stops have included orchestrated round-table policy discussions with a handful of voters in early nominating states — not in-depth policy proposals or fiery political attacks.

In a sharpening of her partisan edge, Mrs. Clinton will also single out some of her potential Republican rivals, including Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida, and former Gov. Rick Perry of Texas, whose states have enacted laws that impose additional requirements on voters.

Mrs. Clinton will present a state-by-state critique of new voting laws in states across the country that require voters to present government-issued identification, an effort that voting rights activists say disproportionately hurts minority and young voters, groups that tend to vote Democratic.

Hillary Clinton Works For The Support Of An Old Ally: The Teachers Union // Buzzfeed // Ruby Cramer – June 3, 2015

Three Democratic candidates each traveled to Washington this week to court the endorsement of the American Federation of Teachers — and after taking part in the hour-long meetings, the thing that stood out most to Randi Weingarten, the union, president, was this: Hillary Clinton knew what she was doing.

The other two, Martin O'Malley and Bernie Sanders, maybe less so.

The AFT meetings, which took place over the course of Tuesday and Wednesday, may offer Clinton the possibility of an early, influential endorsement from the major teachers union that endorsed her in the 2008 presidential race. Weingarten herself is close to and has supported Clinton for years. She sits on the board of Priorities USA Action, the super PAC raising millions to support her candidacy.

On matters of education policy, according to Weingarten, Clinton engaged the group with noticeably more depth and granular detail than her competitors. It was, she said, the most striking difference between the three candidates, particularly on the set of issues that have created fissures inside the Democratic Party, including testing, teacher evaluations in tenure decisions, and Common Core.

"Both in terms of the presentation as well as the questions, Secretary Clinton was clearly understood and spoke in great depth," said Weingarten. "The members of the board did not ask Sen. Sanders or Gov. O'Malley as many questions about public education. I don't frankly…" Weingarten paused. "I really don't… Let me just observe that it was interesting. I don't really want to draw a conclusion about it."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Weingarten said that all three candidates — Clinton; Sanders, the U.S. senator from Vermont; and O'Malley, the former Maryland governor of Maryland — voiced strong support for public school teachers. But Clinton "talked so granularly about the issues that people felt a freedom to ask follow-up questions," she said.

The three meetings, hosted at AFT's headquarters, were each attended by about 150 union members, around one third of whom are on the group's executive council. Each of the candidates gave brief introductory remarks before answering questions from the audience. The conversation with Clinton, O'Malley, and Sanders touched on five key areas, said Weingarten: the "imbalance in the economy," public education, health care, retirement security, and the democracy.

The AFT effort to engage the candidates marked the first formal endorsement meeting of its kind by a union or interest group in the 2016 Democratic primary.

The meetings were not open to the media. But in an interview on Wednesday evening, Weingarten described AFT's endorsement process and outlined in broad strokes each candidate's message. She declined to elaborate on any shades of difference in policy or position between Clinton, O'Malley, and Sanders.

Prior to the meetings, the candidates each completed a policy-focused questionnaire, which AFT leadership began preparing in collaboration with its members in February. The attendees on Tuesday and Wednesday formulated their questions for the three Democrats — which were not prescreened — having reviewed their responses to the questionnaire. AFT plans to use the documents, as well as taped video from the three meetings this week, during the election.

AFT also invited Republican candidates to participate in the same process. None acknowledged receipt of the questionnaire, according to Weingarten.

Lincoln Chafee, the former Republican and Independent from Rhode Island who announced his presidential campaign on Wednesday as a Democrat, declined to participate, telling AFT officials his record could speak for itself, Weingarten said.

Asked about her past support for Clinton in relation to AFT's endorsement, Weingarten said it wouldn't be an issue, noting that some of her colleagues had relationships with O'Malley and Sanders: "I'm one person on the board."

Since she launched her campaign in April, Clinton has not discussed the finer points of her positions on a number of policies important to teachers unions. (She is expected to outline a more detailed agenda following her formal campaign launch speech on June 13 on New York's Roosevelt Island.)

The AFT backed Clinton over Barack Obama in October 2007. The largest teachers union, National Education Association, did not endorse a candidate in the 2008 Democratic primary, though the union did back Obama's re-election.

Eight years later, however, Clinton may face more pressure from a share of the Democratic Party, and donor community, that has fought unions for more charter schools, voucher programs, and measures that test teachers and link tenure to achievement.

Wealthy Democrats who have made education their top priority have already said that Clinton, despite her lead in early polling, should make her beliefs known sooner rather than later. Ann O'Leary, the campaign's top policy adviser, told the New York Times earlier this year that Clinton would be engaging with leaders on both sides of the debate more than Obama administration has: "both the teachers union and the reformers will really feel like they have her ear in a way they haven't."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Weingarten said she wasn't worried. The union leader was head of the New York-based United Federation of Teachers when she first backed Clinton, then the state's junior senator. Weingarten dismissed the donors, saying Clinton "follows the evidence, not ideology — that's what she told our members."

Asked to detail Clinton's stance on the issues discussed, Weingarten said the candidate "addressed issues of testing, of standards, and she did it in a very direct way. She basically said, which was the bottom line over and over again, you cannot help students, virtually all students, if teachers aren't our partners."

Weingarten said Clinton signaled a need for "a change in that direction."

But she added that, when it comes to AFT's endorsement, the union will take into account characteristics such as "tenacity," "openness," and "integrity."

"As people are on the campaign trail, they'll be more and more specific about policies," Weingarten said. "The different was, Secretary Clinton spoke in a very extensive way about policies and practices that would help more and more children be ready for life and career and college — and that there was a depth there in terms of the conversation that she had. That was the big difference."

The topic of the Trans-Pacific Partnership, another issue dividing the Democratic Party, also came up in each of the three meetings. Weingarten said that Clinton's comments to the AFT members were consistent with her public remarks on the issue: that she would support a trade deal that protects U.S. workers and wages, and strengthens national security, but would not weigh in on this trade deal until the president finished the negotiations that are still shaping its makeup.

Democrats finally get a contest as Hillary Clinton draws challengers // WaPo // Philip Rucker, Robert Costa & Anne Gearan – June 3, 2015

A once-sleepy Democratic presidential primary contest is fast coming alive as Hillary Rodham Clinton's poll numbers fall and a diverse array of long-shot opponents step forward to challenge her.

The recent developments mark a dramatic evolution in the 2016 sweepstakes, which until now has been shaped by the large assortment of hopefuls on the Republican side, where there is no front-runner.

The latest Democrat to enter the race is Lincoln Chafee, a onetime Republican and former Rhode Island governor and senator, who launched his campaign Wednesday in Northern Virginia. Though his candidacy is quixotic, Chafee's sharp attacks on Clinton's hawkish foreign policy record — and in particular her 2002 vote to authorize the war in Iraq — could nonetheless complicate her march to the nomination.

Chafee joins an underfunded and jumbled field of Clinton rivals who see the favorite's coziness with Wall Street and political longevity as weaknesses and who think she is vulnerable to a grass-roots contender who better captures the party's liberal soul.

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), a fiery populist who identifies as a socialist, has been attracting some of the largest crowds of any candidate from either party as he summons supporters to join his "political revolution."

Another foe, former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley, is making an overt generational contrast: His campaign slogan is "New Leadership." And former senator Jim Webb of Virginia has echoed Chafee's antiwar pitch as he explores a candidacy.

The activity has brought fresh attention to the fault lines within the Democratic coalition over economic fairness and foreign policy.

At Clinton's Brooklyn headquarters, the mantra has been to prepare for a difficult primary and compete for every vote in every state. Her team has carefully crafted a summer rollout — a June 13 kickoff rally followed by major policy speeches — to cast Clinton as a progressive champion.

On Thursday, for instance, Clinton will give a speech on voting rights at a historically black college in Texas, where she will call for an early voting period of at least 20 days in every state. Her address comes as Democrats pursue legal challenges to voting restrictions ushered in by Republican legislatures.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“We’ve always thought there would be challengers,” Clinton campaign chairman John D. Podesta said in an interview Wednesday. “There were always going to be people saying she wasn’t this enough, wasn’t that enough, wasn’t populist enough.”

He added: “Our strategy at the moment is to welcome them into the race and lay out our program versus theirs. . . . There will be debates. These candidates will get their airtime. But what we’re focused on is telling her story, what her vision for the country is.”

Polls show that Clinton’s popularity is foundering with her reemergence as a political candidate, effectively erasing the bipartisan approval she enjoyed as secretary of state.

More Americans said they held an unfavorable opinion of Clinton than a favorable one, 49 percent to 45 percent, according to a Washington Post-ABC News poll this week. Among independent voters, the figure is worse: 55 percent unfavorable to 39 percent favorable.

Republicans are pleased to see Clinton’s popularity coming down to earth.

“Clearly, whatever political capital that Hillary Clinton had previously enjoyed as secretary of state has atrophied,” said pollster Neil Newhouse, who is likely to work for Right to Rise, the pro-Jeb Bush super PAC.

Still, Clinton is trouncing the rest of the Democratic field by every measure, including in money raised and in the depth of her organization. Her campaign has opened nine field offices in Iowa, which hosts the first presidential caucuses.

This week’s Post-ABC poll showed Clinton leading the Democratic pack at 62 percent. Vice President Biden, who has not formally ruled out a candidacy, was second with 14 percent, followed by Sanders at 10 percent.

Paul Begala, an adviser to the pro-Clinton super PAC Priorities USA Action, predicted that the race will tighten.

“The day she announced, the polls had her at like a million percent,” Begala said. “She needed to print that out, put it in a scrapbook and give it to baby Charlotte, because it will never be this good again.”

Clinton is showing political fragility in some areas, including on character attributes. Fifty-two percent of those polled said she was not honest and trustworthy.

Clinton’s advisers attribute this to intense media scrutiny. They argue that a more accurate barometer of her standing is the question of empathy. Asked whether she “understands the problems of people like you,” 49 percent said she did and 46 percent said she did not.

Anastasia Rave, 26, a retail manager in Beaufort, N.C., was among those polled. A Democratic-leaning independent, Rave said she would support Clinton over any Republican candidate — but she remains uneasy.

“I don’t think that her attempts to act like she understands the everyday working person are genuine,” Rave said. “I don’t really buy it.”

The Clinton response is to give speeches on issues such as college affordability in an effort to show her as compassionate toward the middle class.

“The real trust issue in the election will be who voters trust to look out for them,” said pollster Geoff Garin of Priorities USA.

To Democrats who are fretting, Ed Rendell, a former Pennsylvania governor and a Clinton booster, has a blunt message: “Man up.”

“No matter who the candidate was — if Moses or Jesus or Muhammad came back — there would be time periods when they were considered untrustworthy by the public,” Rendell said. “If you’re not convinced that Hillary’s a lights-out candidate, tell me who is?”

A swelling number of liberal activists, however, see Sanders as the answer. The boisterous crowds that have greeted his road show in the two weeks since he launched his campaign have surprised even his longtime advisers.

With his Brooklyn-accented barbs about what he believes is the alarming power of corporate America, Sanders sees a path to defeating Clinton. While Clinton is flanked by aides and Secret Service agents at controlled events, Sanders revels in rowdy town hall meetings and wanders through crowds wearing a rumpled suit and with unruly white hair.

“I don’t want to get too socialist about it, but I’d describe it as communal,” said Sanders political consultant Tad Devine.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders has instructed his inner circle to concentrate on the economy rather than Clinton's Iraq vote, even though that is one front where their records differ. "We don't want a campaign about something that happened 12 or 13 years ago," Devine said. "It's got to be about the next 10."

But Iraq is a centerpiece of Chafee's appeal to Democrats.

"It's heartbreaking that more of my colleagues failed to do their homework," Chafee said Wednesday as he announced his candidacy at George Mason University. "And incredibly, the neocon proponents of the war who sold us on the false premise of weapons of mass destruction are still key advisers to a number of presidential candidates today."

He added later: "Including the main Democratic candidate."

Chafee's approach is reminiscent of how then-Sen. Barack Obama used Clinton's Iraq vote to drive a wedge between her and antiwar Democrats in 2008. Clinton has since disavowed the vote, and some supporters believe the war is no longer a central concern for voters.

"When I ran [in 2004], it was a different party and frightened about the war," said former Vermont governor Howard Dean, a Clinton backer.

O'Malley, 52, is offering himself as a youthful alternative to Clinton palatable to all wings of the party, while also railing against "the privileged and the powerful" as he said this past weekend.

O'Malley and his associates are targeting those who tried unsuccessfully to draft Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) to run. A super PAC supporting O'Malley said Wednesday that it will soon purchase a round of television ads in Iowa highlighting his willingness to battle Wall Street, though a spokesman said the initial buy is a modest $25,000.

"There is a real hunger for economic populism. O'Malley is speaking to that," said George Appleby, O'Malley's state chairman in Iowa. He called Sanders "honorable and interesting" but said that "I'd be very surprised if Democrats nominated a 73-year-old man."

Clinton pollster downplays Hillary's sinking poll numbers // Politico // Nick Gass – June 3, 2015

Hillary Clinton's pollster, in a rare appearance on CNN Wednesday, downplayed reports in POLITICO and elsewhere noting the candidate's sinking polling numbers.

"We think there's been a minimal change," said Joel Benenson, who also worked as a senior strategist for President Barack Obama's 2008 and 2012 campaigns.

Benenson said he takes all public polls with a grain of salt, reminding host Wolf Blitzer that CNN's poll put President Barack Obama in a dead heat with Republican challenger Mitt Romney in the days leading up to the 2012 election. Blitzer said the polls carry a margin of error and show trends and perspective at a particular time.

"We're not going to get hung up on margin of error. It's not a term I've ever shared with a client," Benenson responded.

In particular, Blitzer made reference to the CNN/ORC poll released Tuesday that found a majority of American adults do not find the former secretary of state honest or trustworthy. Additionally, just 47 percent of respondents said Clinton "cares about people like me," compared with 52 percent who said she does not.

Clinton still has the edge over her opponents on that score, the pollster responded.

"I don't want to debate you over your poll. You want to treat it as the gold standard. I don't think that's what it is," Benenson said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"If you look at the metric for 'who cares about people like me,' Hillary Clinton has a six-to-20-point advantage over all of her opponents, and that's going to be the way the voters are going to view this, through the prism of 'who's going to be working harder for me?,' 'who can I trust to get me and my family ahead?' That's what's central to their lives," he added.

In her campaign materials and appearances, Clinton has said she wants to be a "champion" for "everyday Americans."

Benenson said "it remains to be seen" how much the campaign will make use of Bill Clinton, expressing the desire that the former president would be available as much as he could.

"He's obviously very passionate" about his wife's candidacy, Benenson told Blitzer, calling the former president "a forceful and skillful advocate" for Democrats and touting his ability to bring issues home to voters.

As for media gripes about Clinton's lack of availability, Benenson said there will be "ample time" for more face-to-face interactions in the coming months as preparations ramp up in early-state primaries.

"I understand that people in the media want this to be a sprint every day, but the truth is the presidential campaign is a marathon," he said.

The Beltway's Clinton derangement syndrome: What I saw inside a Hillary campaign briefing // Salon // Joan Walsh – June 3, 2015

So I attended that now-infamous briefing with Clinton campaign officials in Brooklyn last Thursday. I wasn't going to write about it. No news was broken. Still, I learned some things I could see myself using along the way. It was a snapshot; here's what senior officials thought about the race six weeks in, and seven months from the first caucuses in Iowa. I knew it was set up to give increasingly restless Clinton beat reporters time to ask questions of campaign officials, to diffuse the obviously building tension. I wasn't sure it would work, but it seemed worth a try.

But it turns out news was broken, in a way. The briefing itself became news; its structure, its ground rules, its very existence. CNBC's John Harwood wrote a withering take on it. It led to reporters from rival news organizations gathering to formalize their complaints about access to the Clinton campaign. They told other reporters about the meeting, but strictly on background, an irony that wasn't entirely lost on the reporters who then covered it. (This Paul Farhi story about said reporters failing to "practice what they preach," trying to control his story about the flap, is hilarious.)

Media covering the media's complaints about the way media is treated; what could be more Beltway-centric inside baseball? But as long as people are writing about it, it's clear the briefing scandal illuminates the increasingly toxic relationship between the press and the Clintons. So I'll share what I saw, since now the event has become news in itself.

Let me shock you up front: I actually came away from it marginally more sympathetic to the Clinton beat reporters than before I went in. Essentially, they're a bunch of people trying to do their jobs. Some are well-paid and pampered; many are not. A lot of reporters had schlepped up from a Clinton event in South Carolina earlier that day. They carried luggage and laptop bags and looked tired and bedraggled, resentful at having a command event scheduled that afternoon but unwilling to miss it. What if it did break news?

So a lot of the bitching is just people trying to do a good job, who think the Clinton folks are making it harder than necessary. There were lots of questions about when Clinton might take a vacation (which means they can, too) – we couldn't get more specific than late August. That might seem petty, unless you've been asking these questions going back to the first Bush campaign, which some of those folks may be. Likewise, they peppered officials with questions about Clinton's June 13 kickoff rally, but couldn't get much detail, not even the location (three days later, we learned it would be in New York.) That got tedious, but the beat reporters have been surprised more than once with sudden scheduling (include the briefing itself). The senior campaign officials promised they'd have plenty of notice, and they did, they got 12 days.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I come at this from a completely different perspective. I took the B train to Brooklyn, just kind of curious about the event and not on any kind of deadline. And since I consider political media part of my beat, I got a fascinating look at the culture. My comfort with the scheduling and the ground rules partly reflects my very different job. I get that. But that said, the briefing wasn't as useless as it's been depicted. I learned a lot about the campaign I can share with readers. I could see the very different styles of individual "senior campaign officials," and learn who suffers fools, or questions they consider foolish, better than others – although Harwood's right, I can't tell you about them specifically, by name.

The Clinton folks, for their part, stayed relentlessly on message – which is their job — but I learned some interesting things anyway. I saw the way they're determined to frame Clinton as laser-focused on the four early primary and caucus states – Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina. She doesn't take anything for granted, they said many times. Sure, that's become a cliché. But there was a rueful joke about how, this time around, they're paying attention to the actual delegates who will pick the nominee. It would be funnier if I could put it in direct quotes, but it was salty, and it acknowledged the 2008 campaign's many stumbles when it came to actually winning delegates, especially in caucus states.

I also learned that campaign polling shows that stories about the Clinton Foundation, and Clinton's infamous personal email server, aren't damaging her – at least among Democratic primary voters, and they're the focus for now. I asked a question about how the campaign balances its need to consolidate the Obama coalition with ideas about reaching working class white voters, and heard them say those are questions more suited to the general election than the primary. They emphasized their polling shows Clinton doing very well with the Obama coalition, despite that spirited 2008 rivalry. I heard a lot of talk about millennials and women, who seem to be the white voters the campaign is best suited to lure.

Finally, I learned that they consider this early period of the campaign a success, on their terms. Clinton's small-group "dialogues" — oh, it's not a listening tour, I learned that, too: she's having dialogue with voters – have performed several functions for the campaign. Yes, they provide kind of a soft launch for a woman who hasn't campaigned in seven years. They also let her reach voters in a person to person way some of these same reporters said she'd never pull off. And finally, they let voters, not reporters, dominate the campaign. You can mock it, you can wish it were otherwise, but mostly it's working, so far.

So I was just going to file all this away for some future post. But in the wake of the controversy over the briefing, I find it surprising that so many people thought the gathering useless. Again, I get that my job is different, but it shocked me that this was the dastardly Clinton campaign event that put some reporters over the edge.

I also saw, first-hand, how the journalists try to mask their own complaints about access as being impartial, expert criticism of the campaign's strategy. The small "dialogues" made sense for a while, one reporter allowed, but aren't they becoming "counterproductive?" They were said to lack "energy;" they're becoming "static." Why isn't Clinton turning out big crowds and giving big speeches? And are we really supposed to believe she's serious about focusing on Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina? C'mon now. Members of the Church of the Savvy know that can't be true.

Of course, if Clinton was going around giving big speeches in huge venues and criss-crossing the country without paying special attention to the early primary/caucus states, she'd be accused of arrogance, and running another campaign about inevitability, just like 2008. One campaign official (I can't tell you who) essentially made that sarcastic observation: remember how in 2008, Barack Obama was criticized for his speechifying before large, adoring crowds?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It struck me that a sizeable share of the room seemed to work backward from the conclusion that whatever campaign strategy Clinton adopts, it's flawed. As a colleague of mine (who wasn't there) correctly observed later, they so often use "voters" as sock puppets to voice their complaints. It's not enough for the pack, even though it's early, to watch the campaign unfold, and report on it. We will learn soon enough – from polling numbers, from voters' praise or grousing, ultimately, from results – whether it's working. No, these folks have to pre-emptively declare the campaign flawed – largely because they don't like their access to it.

Yes, the campaign's secrecy about mundane logistics is silly, and so is the notion of sending "embargoed" background information via email to hundreds of reporters who haven't agreed to keep the info embargoed. (So Adam Nagourney tweeted it out anyway.) Personally, I would like to hear Clinton talk, whether to reporters or publicly to voters, about her views on the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade agreement, or how to combat ISIS, or what she thinks of the debt-free college movement. There were a couple of questions about when Clinton will make a formal stand on the TPP, but otherwise issues were largely missing from the discussion.

The whole thing seemed designed to improve campaign-media relations, to clear the air and answer the frustrated reporters' questions until there were no more questions. Then they stayed and served us beer – I was peeved; I prefer wine — and talked some more. Some "senior Clinton campaign officials" stayed and schmoozed longer than I was able to. And it all backfired, spectacularly, because this relationship cannot be saved. But on some level, right now, the campaign doesn't have to care.

I continue to be struck by the self-importance of the media. Campaigning has changed, and the Clinton campaign has evolved an approach that its leadership thinks serves the candidate. Maybe they've changed the rules of coverage; but the rules change all the time. Instead of figuring out a way to grapple with those changing rules and break stories anyway, journalists are acting as though they have a sacred right to have dozens of them covering Clinton's every move. If they don't like the campaign rules, they shouldn't play. They are entirely within their rights to refuse to attend briefings where officials can't be quoted, for instance. They could boycott her events and talk to voters on their own, instead. They could pore over records and donor lists (some people are doing that.)

After 30 years of wrangling, Clinton can't win with the national media, but I think the campaign has decided it doesn't need to. It's going to look for ways to be cordial, and serve folks beer occasionally, but it's not going to be driven by irritated beat reporters. And let me use voters as sock puppets here: I really don't think voters will care.

When it comes to the Clintons and Wall Street: Democratic opponents are silent // McClatchy // Anita Kumar & Greg Gorden – June 3, 2015

This year's crop of Democratic candidates can't seem to stop talking about how they are going to fight Wall Street and help struggling Americans.

So we wondered just what those vying for president next year thought of the close ties between Wall Street and their party's front-runner, Hillary Clinton, and her husband, Bill Clinton.

The former president earned millions of dollars in speaking fees and donations for his global charity from big banks, some that paid billions of dollars to resolve federal investigations, according to a McClatchy analysis. Hillary Clinton also accepted speaking fees from at least one bank.

What do Clinton's opponents -- all of them way down in the polls -- say about that? Not a thing.

Former Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley: No comment.

Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders: No comment.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Former Rhode Island governor Lincoln Chafee, who's throwing his hat into the ring later today: No comment.

It's not too surprising that Chafee's campaign declined to comment. His criticism of Clinton has been focused on her vote to invade Iraq.

But O'Malley and Sanders have made income equality a centerpiece of their campaigns.

Last week, Sanders said: "Wall Street cannot continue to be an island unto itself, gambling trillions in risky financial instruments while expecting the public to bail it out. If a bank is too big to fail it is too big to exist."

This week, O'Malley said this on Good Morning America: "I believe that the presidency is a sacred trust and I believe that we are best served by giving the choice of who our president should be to the people of the United States and not to the big banks on Wall Street."

We get it. They don't like big banks. But when it comes to the Clintons and Wall Street, they are silent.

21 New 'Clinton Cash' Revelations That Have Imperiled Hillary Clinton's Campaign // Breitbart – June 3, 2015

Prior to the release of the New York Times bestselling investigative exposé Clinton Cash by Government Accountability Institute President and Breitbart Senior Editor-at-Large Peter Schweizer, Hillary Clinton and her supporters claimed she was among the most vetted political figures in America—a candidate about whom everything was known.

Yet as media outlets across the ideological spectrum have confirmed and verified the book's explosive revelations about Clinton's tenure as Sec. of State and the influx of hundreds of millions of dollars from foreign sources into the Clinton Foundation, the nation has learned much it did not know. Subsequent reporting by national news outlets has expanded on the book's findings using its investigative methodology.

Indeed, the dizzying flurry of resulting Hillary Clinton Foundation scandals has been difficult to keep up with. As CNN's John King put it on Sunday, "You can't go 20 minutes in this town, it seems, without some sort of a story about Clinton Foundation that gives you a little bit of the creeps."

Early on, as Clinton Cash bombshells began appearing in the New York Times, Washington Post, New Yorker, Bloomberg, and elsewhere, Hillary Clinton's campaign sought to calm nervous campaign donors by announcing the creation of a special "rapid response" War Room aimed at combating a book, an unprecedented move in the annals of modern presidential campaigning. The Clinton campaign team built a website called "The Briefing," issued memos, and tasked an eight-person team to create videos featuring embattled Clinton spokesperson Brian Fallon as he awkwardly and unsuccessfully attempted to smear Peter Schweizer. Team Clinton's message: all of Clinton Cash's revelations are incorrect or merely "coincidences."

Yet as the nation's largest news organizations began to confirm finding after finding, the Clinton campaign did the only thing it could: it gave up in its attempts to refute the swelling avalanche of now well-established facts. Indeed, the Clinton campaign's last video response on its "The Briefing" YouTube page is dated May 5th—Clinton Cash's official launch date.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To date, Hillary Clinton has yet to substantively answer a single question from the mountain of Clinton Cash questions that continue to pile up with each passing day.

The result: according to Tuesday's CNN poll, the "Clinton Cash Effect" has rendered Hillary Clinton historic new lows in her favorability with American voters.

Below we chronicle just 21 of the myriad Clinton Cash-related revelations that have emerged since the book's publication—all of which have been confirmed and verified as accurate by national media organizations.

Huffington Post: Clintons Bagged at Least $3.4 Million for 18 Speeches Funded by Keystone Pipeline Banks

Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce and TD Bank—two of the Keystone XL pipeline's largest investors—fully or partially bankrolled eight Hillary Clinton speeches that "put more than $1.6 million in the Democratic candidate's pocket," reports the Huffington Post.

Moreover, according to Clinton Cash, during Hillary Clinton's tenure as Sec. of State, Bill Clinton delivered 10 speeches from Nov. 2008 to mid-2011 totaling $1.8 million paid for by TD Bank, which held a $1.6 billion investment in the Keystone XL pipeline.

The Clintons' speaking fees windfall, which has infuriated environmental groups, have yet to be addressed by Hillary Clinton.

New York Times: Clinton Foundation Shook Down a Tiny Tsunami Relief Nonprofit for a $500,000 Speaking Fee

Bill Clinton refused to give a speech for a tiny nonprofit seeking to raise money for tsunami victims until the group agreed to pay a $500,000 speaking fee to the Clinton Foundation. The Times reported that the Clinton Foundation "sent the charity an invoice," which "amounted to almost a quarter of the evening's net proceeds—enough to build 10 preschools in Indonesia."

New York Magazine: Clinton Foundation "Strong-Armed" Charity Watchdog Group

When "the Clinton Foundation wound up on a 'watch list' maintained by the Charity Navigator, dubbed the 'most prominent' nonprofit watchdog," reported New York Magazine writer Gabriel Sherman, "the Foundation attempted to strong-arm them by calling a Navigator board member."

International Business Times: Hillary Clinton's State Dept. Gave Clinton Foundation Donors Weapons Deals

"Under Clinton's leadership, the State Department approved $165 billion worth of commercial arms sales to 20 nations whose governments have given money to the Clinton Foundation, according to an IBTimes analysis of State Department and foundation data," reports IBT. "That figure—derived from the three full fiscal years of Clinton's term as Secretary of State (from October 2010 to September 2012)—represented nearly double the value of American arms sales made to the those countries and approved by the State Department during the same period of President George W. Bush's second term."

Salon, MotherJones, HuffingtonPost, Slate, and several other liberal publications reported on IBT's findings.

Washington Post: Clintons Hid 1,100 Foreign Donor Names in Violation of Ethics Agreement with Obama Admin.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton Cash revealed five hidden foreign donations. On the heels of the book's publication, the Washington Post uncovered another 1,100 foreign donor names hidden in the Canada-based Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership—a Clinton Foundation initiative Bill Clinton erected with controversial billionaire mining executive Frank Giustra.

"A charity affiliated with the Clinton Foundation failed to reveal the identities of its 1,100 donors, creating a broad exception to the foundation's promise to disclose funding sources as part of an ethics agreement with the Obama administration," reports the Washington Post. "The number of undisclosed contributors to the charity, the Canada-based Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership, signals a larger zone of secrecy around foundation donors than was previously known."

In a follow-up story, the Post reports that only 21 of Frank Giustra and Bill Clinton's secret 1,100 foreign donors have subsequently been revealed. If and when the other 1,079 hidden donors names will be revealed is presently unclear—and will be the subject of forthcoming investigative reports by Breitbart News.

Vox: At Least 181 Clinton Foundation Donors Lobbied Hillary's State Dept.

"Public records alone reveal a nearly limitless supply of cozy relationships between the Clintons and companies with interests before the government," reports Vox. "There's a household name at the nexus of the foundation and the State Department for every letter of the alphabet but "X" (often more than one): Anheuser-Busch, Boeing, Chevron, (John) Deere, Eli Lilly, FedEx, Goldman Sachs, HBO, Intel, JP Morgan, Lockheed Martin, Monsanto, NBC Universal, Oracle, Procter & Gamble, Qualcomm, Rotary International, Siemens, Target, Unilever, Verizon, Walmart, Yahoo, and Ze-gen."

BuzzFeed: Two of Hillary Clinton's Top Donors Were Major Felons

When Hillary Clinton ran for president in 2008, two of her biggest fundraisers were conducting massive Ponzi schemes. One was Hsu, who posed as a garment tycoon, and is now serving a 24-year sentence in federal prison in Milan, Michigan. The other, Hassan Nemazee, is serving a 12-year sentence in Otisville, New York, for bank fraud. He used fake documents and nonexistent loans to trick bankers into extending him more credit," reports Ben Smith of BuzFeed. "Those two convictions cast light on a central perplexity of the 2016 presidential cycle, and its 'Clinton Cash' phase: Why are shady people with murky interests always hanging around political superstars, and particularly Bill and Hillary Clinton?"

Daily Beast: Clintons' Charity Scored Millions from Qatar and Donations from Corrupt FIFA Soccer Organization

"The Clinton global charity has received between $50,000 and $100,000 from soccer's governing body and has partnered with the Fédération Internationale de Football Association on several occasions, according to donor listings on the foundation's website," reports The Daily Beast. "Qatar 2022 committee gave the foundation between $250,000 and $500,000 in 2014 and the State of Qatar gave between $1 million and $5 million in previous, unspecified years."

Associated Press: The Clintons' Have a Secret "Pass-Through" Company—WJC, LLC

"The newly released financial files on Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton's growing fortune omit a company with no apparent employees or assets that the former president has legally used to provide consulting and other services, but which demonstrates the complexity of the family's finances," reported the AP. "The officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to provide private details of the former president's finances on the record, said the entity was a 'pass-through' company designed to channel payments to the former president."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton has yet to release the names and amounts of the payments that flowed through the hidden WJC, LLC, company.

New York Times: Hillary Funneled $10K Monthly Payments to Sidney Blumenthal Through Clinton Foundation

"An examination by The Times suggests that Mr. Blumenthal's involvement was more wide-ranging and more complicated than previously known, embodying the blurry lines between business, politics and philanthropy that have enriched and vexed the Clintons and their inner circle for years," reports the Times. "While advising Mrs. Clinton on Libya, Mr. Blumenthal, who had been barred from a State Department job by aides to President Obama, was also employed by her family's philanthropy, the Clinton Foundation…and worked on and off as a paid consultant to Media Matters and American Bridge, organizations that helped lay the groundwork for Mrs. Clinton's 2016 campaign."

New Yorker: Bill Clinton Scored a $500,000 Speech in Moscow Paid for by a Kremlin-backed Bank

The New Yorker confirms Clinton Cash's reporting that Bill Clinton bagged $500,000 for a Moscow speech paid for by "a Russian investment bank that had ties to the Kremlin."

"Why was Bill Clinton taking any money from a bank linked to the Kremlin while his wife was Secretary of State?" asks the New Yorker. To date, Hillary Clinton nor her campaign have answered that question.

Washington Post: Hillary Clinton's Brother Sits on the Board of a Mining Co. that Received a Coveted Haitian "Gold Exploitation Permit" that Has Only Twice Been Awarded in 50 Years. Rodham Met the Mining Executive in Charge of the Company at a Clinton Foundation Event.

"In interviews with The Washington Post, both Rodham and the chief executive of Delaware-based VCS Mining said they were introduced at a meeting of the Clinton Global Initiative—an offshoot of the Clinton Foundation that critics have long alleged invites a blurring of its charitable mission with the business interests of Bill and Hillary Clinton and their corporate donors."

"Asked whether he attends CGI meetings to explore personal business opportunities, Rodham responded, 'No, I go to see old friends. But you never know what can happen.'"

New York Times: Court Proceedings Reveal Hillary's Brother Claimed Admits Clinton Foundation and the Clintons Are Key to His Haiti Connections

"I deal through the Clinton Foundation," Tony Rodham said according to a transcript of his testimony obtained by The Times. "That gets me in touch with the Haitian officials. I hound my brother-in-law [Bill Clinton], because it's his fund that we're going to get our money from. And he can't do it until the Haitian government does it."

Wall Street Journal: Clinton Foundation Violated Memorandum of Understanding with the Obama Admin. By Keeping Secret a Foreign Donation of Two Million Shares of Stock from a Foreign Executive with Business Before Hillary's State Dept.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton Cash revealed that Canadian mining tycoon Stephen Dattels scored an "open pit mining" concession at the Phulbari Mines in Bangladesh where his Polo Resources had investments. The coveted perk came just two months after Polo Resources gave the Clinton Foundation 2,000,000 shares of stock—a donation the Clinton Foundation kept hidden.

New York Times: Hillary Clinton's Campaign Claims She Had No Idea Her State Dept. Was Considering Approving the Transfer of 20% of U.S. Uranium to the Russian Govt.—Even as the Clinton Foundation Bagged $145 Million in Donations from Investors in the Deal

In a 4,000-word front-page New York Times investigation, the Times confirmed in granular detail Clinton Cash's reporting that Hillary's State Dept. was one of nine agencies approving the sale of Uranium One to the Russian government. "The sale gave the Russians control of one-fifth of all uranium production capacity in the United States," reports the Times.

The Times then published a detailed table and infographic cataloging the $145 million in donations to the Clinton Foundation made by uranium executives involved in the Russian transfer of 20% of all U.S. uranium.

Bloomberg: A For-Profit University Put Bill Clinton on Its Payroll and Scored a Jump in Funding from Hillary Clinton's State Dept. When Clinton Cash Revealed the Scheme, Bill Clinton Quickly Resigned.

Even as Hillary Clinton and Democrats continue to blast for-profit colleges and universities, Hillary Clinton's campaign continues to stonewall questions about how much Bill Clinton was paid by Laureate International Universities, one of the largest for-profit education companies in the world—and an organization that has underwritten Clinton Foundation events. As soon as Clinton Cash revealed Bill Clinton spent years on Laureate's payroll, the former president quickly resigned.

According to an analysis by Bloomberg: "in 2009, the year before Bill Clinton joined Laureate, the nonprofit received 11 grants worth $9 million from the State Department or the affiliated USAID. In 2010, the group received 14 grants worth $15.1 million. In 2011, 13 grants added up to $14.6 million. The following year, those numbers jumped: IYF received 21 grants worth $25.5 million, including a direct grant from the State Department."

Hillary Clinton has refused to answer questions about the Clintons' income from the for-profit education company.

New York Times: The Head of the Russian Govt's Uranium Company Ian Telfer Made Secret Donations Totaling $2.35 Million to the Clinton Foundation—as Hillary Clinton's State Dept. Approved the Transfer of 20% of All U.S. Uranium to the Russians

Ian Telfer, the former head of the Russian-owned uranium company, Uranium One, funneled $2.35 million to the Clinton Foundation—donations that were never revealed until Clinton Cash reported them and the New York Times confirmed them.

Hillary Clinton has yet to answer a single question about Uranium One.

Washington Post: Bill and Hillary Clinton Have Made at Least $26 Million in Speaking Fees from Entities Who Are Top Clinton Foundation Donors

According to the Post's independent analysis, "Bill Clinton was paid more than $100 million for speeches between 2001 and 2013, according to federal financial disclosure forms filed by Hillary Clinton during her years as a senator and as secretary of state."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Post added: "Bill Clinton was paid at least $26 million in speaking fees by companies and organizations that are also major donors to the foundation he created after leaving the White House, according to a Washington Post analysis of public records and foundation date."

Washington Free Beacon: Former Clinton Campaign Operative-Turned-ABC News Host George Stephanopoulos Failed to Disclose His $75,000 Donation and Deep Involvement in the Clinton Foundation Before Launching an Attack Interview Against Clinton Cash Author

Clinton political operative-turned-ABC News anchor George Stephanopoulos infamously hid his $75,000 Clinton Foundation donation from ABC News viewers before launching a partisan attack "interview" with Clinton Cash author Peter Schweizer.

Roundly condemned by numerous journalists, Stephanopoulos apologized and received zero punishment from ABC News. Hillary Clinton's campaign then used footage from the Stephanopoulos' attack "interview" with Schweizer in its political campaign videos.

"It was outrageous," said former ABC News anchor Carole Simpson.

Hillary Clinton has yet to answer whether her campaign coordinated with Clinton Foundation donor George Stephanopoulos.

CNBC: Clinton Foundation Mega Donor Frank Holmes Claimed He Sold Uranium One Before Hillary Clinton's State Dept. Approved the Russian Transfer—Despite His Company's Own SEC Filings Proving Otherwise

In a highly embarrassing CNBC grilling, Clinton mega donor and uranium executive Frank Holmes claimed he sold his Uranium One stock well before Hillary Clinton's State Dept. greenlit the transfer of 20% of all U.S. uranium to the Russian government in 2010.

However, according to his company's, U.S. Global Investors, own 2011 SEC filing, Holmes' company did, in fact, still hold Uranium One stock, a point he later conceded.

Politico: Hillary's Foundation Accepted $1 Million from Human Rights Violator Morocco for a Lavish Event

"The event is being funded largely by a contribution of at least $1 million from OCP, a phosphate exporter owned by Morocco's constitutional monarchy, according to multiple sources with direct knowledge of the event," reports Politico. "But in 2011, Clinton's State Department had accused the Moroccan government of 'arbitrary arrests and corruption in all branches of government.'"

ABC News similarly confirmed the Clinton Foundation's acceptance of the unseemly funds.

Iowa Poll: Bill and George W. May Not Hurt Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush // Bloomberg // David Knowles – June 3, 2015

The nation's next president may well be advised by a former one. For the most part, that prospect doesn't seem to trouble Iowa caucus-goers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Fifty-seven percent of likely Republican caucus-goers in a new Bloomberg Politics/Des Moines Register Iowa Poll said that it would be “mostly good” for Jeb Bush's presidency if he were to tap his older brother, George, as a close adviser. Thirty-three percent said such an arrangement would be “mostly bad” for Jeb Bush's presidency.

As for Hillary Clinton, a whopping 83 percent of likely Democratic caucus-goers approved of the idea of her using her husband, Bill, as a close adviser, while just 9 percent said doing so was a “mostly bad” suggestion for her presidency.

Interviewed on CBS's Face the Nation in May, Jeb Bush said that his older brother “is not going to be a problem at all. I seek out his advice,” adding that he had "learned from his successes and his mistakes."

Poll respondent Sarah Rynearson, an independent who plans to caucus with Republicans, is similarly at ease with the idea of Bush being advised by his brother.

“I think it would be a great idea, because I think his brother was a great president,” said Rynearson, 36, who delivers meals to the elderly in Waterloo, Iowa.

Republican respondent Thomas Stanley, 60, of Fairfield, Iowa, disagreed.

“I think that George W. Bush did a very poor job at trying to unify the country around commonly held beliefs,” Stanley said, adding that the former president's foreign policy decisions were “part of” what should preclude him from serving as an adviser to his brother. “Dick Cheney is another part. Donald Rumsfeld is another. He just had advisers that were pretty extreme.”

When Bill Clinton ran for president in 1992, he told voters that if they elected him, they would get “two for the price of one” in reference to his wife. More than 20 years later, that prospect is sitting well with likely Iowa Democratic caucus-goers.

“They've both already been there and done that before. They seem to be a good team, and work together really well together,” said Democrat Mickie Franklin, 33, a Transportation Security Administration worker who lives in Nevada, Iowa. “She seems like a really strong-willed lady. And she seems like if someone she knew felt very strongly about something, she might take their opinion, but not necessarily go with what they want. I think there's nothing wrong with getting advice from him.”

Ben Frazier, a 21-year-old Democrat and political science major at the University of Iowa in Iowa City, voiced reservations.

“It's going to be important for her to think on her own and show that she has the necessary experience to make her own decisions,” he said. “I feel like he's going to want to be more involved than he should be. Politically speaking, Bill Clinton is out of his prime.”

Bush has struggled with the question of how much to embrace his family legacy on the campaign trail. He has repeatedly said “I'm my own man” when asked how he would distinguish himself from his brother and the other former president in his family, his father. At the same time, he has assembled a team of foreign policy advisers that closely resembles his brother's.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush has also stumbled over the question of whether, with the benefit of hindsight, he would have sent U.S. troops into Iraq.

Clinton, meanwhile, has distanced herself from several of her husband's former policies, including support for free trade agreements, support for three-strikes legislation, and opposition to gay marriage. Like his wife, Bill Clinton has changed many of his former positions, making for less of a contrast between the two.

The survey of 437 likely Democratic caucus-goers has a margin of error of plus or minus 4.7 percentage points, while the survey of 402 likely Republican caucus-goers has a margin of error of plus or minus 4.9 percent. The West Des Moines-based Selzer & Co. conducted the poll May 25-29.

Clinton rivals pounce as her ratings fall // WaPo // Philip Rucker, Robert Costa and Anne Gearan - June 3, 2015

A once-sleepy Democratic presidential primary contest is fast coming alive as Hillary Rodham Clinton's poll numbers fall and a diverse array of long-shot opponents step forward to challenge her.

The recent developments mark a dramatic evolution in the 2016 sweepstakes, which until now has been shaped by the large assortment of hopefuls on the Republican side, where there is no front-runner.

The latest Democrat to enter the race is Lincoln Chafee, a onetime Republican and former Rhode Island governor and senator, who launched his campaign Wednesday in Northern Virginia. Though his candidacy is quixotic, Chafee's sharp attacks on Clinton's hawkish foreign policy record — and in particular her 2002 vote to authorize the war in Iraq — could nonetheless complicate her march to the nomination.

Chafee joins an underfunded and jumbled field of Clinton rivals who see the favorite's coziness with Wall Street and political longevity as weaknesses and who think she is vulnerable to a grass-roots contender who better captures the party's liberal soul.

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), a fiery populist who identifies as a socialist, has been attracting some of the largest crowds of any candidate from either party as he summons supporters to join his "political revolution."

Another foe, former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley, is making an overt generational contrast: His campaign slogan is "New Leadership." And former senator Jim Webb of Virginia has echoed Chafee's antiwar pitch as he explores a candidacy.

The activity has brought fresh attention to the fault lines within the Democratic coalition over economic fairness and foreign policy.

At Clinton's Brooklyn headquarters, the mantra has been to prepare for a difficult primary and compete for every vote in every state. Her team has carefully crafted a summer rollout — a June 13 kickoff rally followed by major policy speeches — to cast Clinton as a progressive champion.

On Thursday, for instance, Clinton will give a speech on voting rights at a historically black college in Texas, where she will call for an early voting period of at least 20 days in every state. Her address comes as Democrats pursue legal challenges to voting restrictions ushered in by Republican legislatures.

"We've always thought there would be challengers," Clinton campaign chairman John D. ¬Podesta said in an interview Wednesday. "There were always going to be people saying she wasn't this enough, wasn't that enough, wasn't populist enough."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He added: “Our strategy at the moment is to welcome them into the race and lay out our program versus theirs. . . . There will be debates. These candidates will get their airtime. But what we’re focused on is telling her story, what her vision for the country is.”

Polls show that Clinton’s popularity is foundering with her reemergence as a political candidate, effectively erasing the bipartisan approval she enjoyed as secretary of state.

More Americans said they held an unfavorable opinion of Clinton than a favorable one, 49 percent to 45 percent, according to a Washington Post-ABC News poll this week. Among independent voters, the figure is worse: 55 percent unfavorable to 39 percent favorable.

Republicans are pleased to see Clinton’s popularity coming down to earth.

“Clearly, whatever political capital that Hillary Clinton had previously enjoyed as secretary of state has atrophied,” said pollster Neil Newhouse, who is likely to work for Right to Rise, the pro-Jeb Bush super PAC.

Still, Clinton is trouncing the rest of the Democratic field by every measure, including in money raised and in the depth of her organization. Her campaign has opened nine field offices in Iowa, which hosts the first presidential caucuses.

This week’s Post-ABC poll showed Clinton leading the Democratic pack at 62 percent. Vice President Biden, who has not formally ruled out a candidacy, was second with 14 percent, followed by Sanders at 10 percent.

Paul Begala, an adviser to the pro-Clinton super PAC Priorities USA Action, predicted that the race will tighten.

“The day she announced, the polls had her at like a million percent,” Begala said. “She needed to print that out, put it in a scrapbook and give it to baby Charlotte, because it will never be this good again.”

Clinton is showing political fragility in some areas, including on character attributes. Fifty-two percent of those polled said she was not honest and trustworthy.

Clinton’s advisers attribute this to intense media scrutiny. They argue that a more accurate barometer of her standing is the question of empathy. Asked whether she “understands the problems of people like you,” 49 percent said she did and 46 percent said she did not.

Anastasia Rave, 26, a retail manager in Beaufort, N.C., was among those polled. A Democratic-leaning independent, Rave said she would support Clinton over any Republican candidate — but she remains uneasy.

“I don’t think that her attempts to act like she understands the everyday working person are genuine,” Rave said. “I don’t really buy it.”

The Clinton response is to give speeches on issues such as college affordability in an effort to show her as compassionate toward the middle class.

“The real trust issue in the election will be who voters trust to look out for them,” said pollster Geoff Garin of Priorities USA.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To Democrats who are fretting, Ed Rendell, a former Pennsylvania governor and a Clinton booster, has a blunt message: “Man up.”

“No matter who the candidate was — if Moses or Jesus or Muhammad came back — there would be time periods when they were considered untrustworthy by the public,” Rendell said. “If you’re not convinced that Hillary’s a lights-out candidate, tell me who is?”

A swelling number of liberal activists, however, see Sanders as the answer. The boisterous crowds that have greeted his road show in the two weeks since he launched his campaign have surprised even his longtime advisers.

With his Brooklyn-accented barbs about what he believes is the alarming power of corporate America, Sanders sees a path to defeating Clinton. While Clinton is flanked by aides and Secret Service agents at controlled events, Sanders revels in rowdy town hall meetings and wanders through crowds wearing a rumpled suit and with unruly white hair.

“I don’t want to get too socialist about it, but I’d describe it as communal,” said Sanders political consultant Tad Devine.

Sanders has instructed his inner circle to concentrate on the economy rather than Clinton’s Iraq vote, even though that is one front where their records differ. “We don’t want a campaign about something that happened 12 or 13 years ago,” Devine said. “It’s got to be about the next 10.”

But Iraq is a centerpiece of Chafee’s appeal to Democrats.

“It’s heartbreaking that more of my colleagues failed to do their homework,” Chafee said Wednesday as he announced his candidacy at George Mason University. “And incredibly, the neocon proponents of the war who sold us on the false premise of weapons of mass destruction are still key advisers to a number of presidential candidates today.”

He added later: “Including the main Democratic candidate.”

Chafee’s approach is reminiscent of how then-Sen. Barack Obama used Clinton’s Iraq vote to drive a wedge between her and antiwar Democrats in 2008. Clinton has since disavowed the vote, and some supporters believe the war is no longer a central concern for voters.

“When I ran [in 2004], it was a different party and frightened about the war,” said former Vermont governor Howard Dean, a Clinton backer.

O’Malley, 52, is offering himself as a youthful alternative to Clinton palatable to all wings of the party, while also railing against “the privileged and the powerful” as he said this past weekend.

O’Malley and his associates are targeting those who tried unsuccessfully to draft Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) to run. A super PAC supporting O’Malley said Wednesday that it will soon purchase a round of television ads in Iowa highlighting his willingness to battle Wall Street, though a spokesman said the initial buy is a modest $25,000.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“There is a real hunger for economic populism. O’Malley is speaking to that,” said George Appleby, O’Malley’s state chairman in Iowa. He called Sanders “honorable and interesting” but said that “I’d be very surprised if Democrats nominated a 73-year-old man.”

Bush and Clinton seem inevitable. Except to voters . // Yahoo News // Matt Bai - June 4, 2015

According to new polls, Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush aren’t viewed very favorably. (AP Photo)

Voters of America: What exactly is your problem?

For months, we in the media have been telling you, repeatedly and in very small words, that Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush are going to be the nominees in 2016. They’ve got big money, big names, the comforting ’90s vibe. Their debates will feel like a rerun of “Friends,” before everyone started doing drugs and sleeping with each other.

Just a few days ago, some guy wrote an entire op-ed in Politico titled “Newsflash: It’s Going to Be Hillary vs. Jeb.” Since the writer wasn’t God or Nostradamus, I didn’t really feel the need to keep reading, but clearly you should have, because you’re just not getting the message.

According to a batch of brand-new polling, the number of voters who view Clinton favorably has dropped below 50 percent for the first time since she last ran for president in 2008; suddenly fewer people like her than don’t. Ditto for Jeb, who, according to the results of an ABC/Washington Post poll, would be the least liked Republican in the potential field were it not for the beneficence of Donald Trump.

Why is it so hard to accept your fate already? Why do you insist on dating bad boys like Scott Walker and Bernie Sanders when we’ve gone to such trouble to arrange reliable marriages that benefit everyone?

Don’t tell me it’s because Americans are suspicious of dynastic rule — whoever started that meme must have stopped reading his textbook after the bit about King George. Take away the Roosevelts, Kennedys and Bushes, and the last century of political history would read like some Mad Lib. We’re just fine with dynasties, for better or worse.

No, the reason Clinton and Bush are having trouble keeping your affection is less about who they are than where they’ve been. The reality is that candidates returning from long absences are a little like distant relatives; the idea of a reunion sounds great, but when they show up at your door it’s another story.

If there’s one thing we all love in politics, it’s the idea of the candidate who seems above the litany of daily disappointments in Washington. Presidential narratives are often built around the idea that a candidate has been away somewhere (other than prison, say) and is just now coming back because he can’t stand what a mess all these lesser politicians have made of things.

Richard Nixon and Ronald Reagan exploited that ideal, which Newt Gingrich (quoting his favorite political philosopher, Arnold Toynbee) once described to me as the doctrine of “departure and return.”

Clinton and Bush embody that idea, too. After four years as secretary of state, followed by a few years of relative seclusion, Clinton was enjoying the highest approval ratings of her political life; to most Americans who weren’t hardened anti-Clinton conspiracists, she seemed to have entered the realm of statesmanship.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush spent most of the last decade talking reasonably about education reform and the environment, to the point where a lot of voters had almost forgotten about his partisan role in the recount debacle of 2000.

The problem is that once you return to the arena, once you start giving speeches that sound more or less like everybody else's, then you're no longer departed, and we can't quite remember why it was you seemed so alluring in the first place. Suddenly you're a politician again.

And running for office isn't like the proverbial riding of a bike, where you can leave off for a decade and then, on a whim, just climb onto some rental and scale a mountain. Politics at this level is more like hitting a baseball. It takes a while to get your timing back, and that's only if your clarity of vision and basic skills haven't deteriorated.

In the case of both Bush and Clinton, this basic rustiness seems to have been compounded by a certain arrogance — an inner voice that says, "I already know how to hit a baseball, so I'll be damned if I'm going to spend every day at the cage practicing my swings."

It's almost unthinkable — and it shook a lot of the Republican operatives who should be his supporters — that Bush didn't have an answer for the question about the Iraq invasion and whether he would have done the same thing his brother did. What possible explanation is there for that, other than that he's decided he can pretty much wing this thing?

If he actually asked his aides to prepare him for the campaign trail and they didn't raise that question more than once, then he should probably think about getting some new aides.

The other problem you have, when you're the kind of candidate who's been off the scene for a while and who thus occupies an exalted place in the minds of the electorate, is that your party's operatives will tell you almost anything to get you to return. So it might take a few months to realize that the theory of the campaign to which you're clinging, which everyone around you said was totally brilliant and doable back in January, is actually about as relevant this year as Ross Perot.

You can bet that all the Clinton whisperers made 2016 sound like a mere formality and nothing like the grind of 2008. We'll send your stunt double to have lunch at a Chipotle in Ohio , and you can just hole up in Chappaqua and watch "Downton Abbey" reruns. No worries — we'll call when you clinch.

But then she won't answer questions about her private emails or her foundation's foreign donors, and she refuses to tell anyone where she is on a free-trade bill that's dividing Washington, and suddenly the diving poll numbers aren't something you can ignore. Clinton remains the clear favorite to win the nomination, but her persona as a stateswoman is already a casualty, and it's not even summer.

Bush started out his campaign spouting this stuff about how you had to be willing to lose the primaries in order to win the general election, a theory his eager advisers must have validated. And a pretty courageous one, too, except that he has spent most of his time lately trying to mollify conservative primary voters, who, it appears, might be just fine with nominating Mike Huckabee or Ben Carson and watching him get pulverized in November.

What the voters in both parties are telling us in these polls, more than anything else, is that they're not going to have their nominees dictated to them. What you all seem to be saying is that Clinton and Bush are formidable but also uninspiring, and you intend to weigh all your options before making that decision for yourselves.

Well, OK, but you know the conventional wisdom in Washington seems to be that this is all just preseason jitters,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

and by fall the inevitable nominees will be exactly what they're supposed to be, which is inevitable.

In other words: Trust us. You'll learn to love them over time.

Why Hillary Can't Run on Her State Department Record // Bloomberg // Josh Rogin – June 3, 2015

Hillary Clinton's record as secretary of state became a hot-button issue this week after Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov told Bloomberg Television that the Barack Obama administration's failed "reset" policy with Moscow was her "invention."

Here's why it matters: Her campaign chairman, John Podesta, gave an interview to Bloomberg View's Al Hunt in April in which he said holding up the "major accomplishments" from her State Department tenure would be a centerpiece of her campaign. Podesta may want to reconsider that plan. Running on Clinton's signature diplomatic initiatives is fraught with risks because, on closer inspection, most that he mentioned don't hold up to scrutiny.

"She put together that sanctions package that's led to at least the possibility of having a deal on the Iran nuclear program," Podesta told Hunt in the interview, which was aired on PBS's "Charlie Rose" show. "That took very careful and longtime careful diplomacy."

In fact, the State Department under Clinton vigorously opposed almost all of the Iran sanctions passed by Congress while she was in office. Top officials, including Undersecretary of State Wendy Sherman, openly advocated against many bills, including the sanctions on Iran's central bank, which dealt the true crippling blow to the Tehran regime. The Senate passed that bill 100-0 and Obama reluctantly signed them into law. The State Department did implement them, but was criticized by lawmakers and advocacy groups for using waivers in the law to exempt several countries, including China and our allies Japan and South Korea.

Clinton can also expect to be pressed during the campaign over her involvement in the secret negotiations that led to the controversial Iran nuclear negotiations now nearing completion. Her deputy, William Burns, and her top foreign policy advisor, Jake Sullivan, held months of clandestine meetings with Iranian officials to set up the talks. In the run-up to her campaign announcement, Clinton was cautiously supportive of the nuclear talks; leaving herself some wiggle room by saying she won't render a final judgment until the deal is done.

Podesta then went on to say that Clinton "restored America's place in the world, which had been very badly battered through the previous administration."

While it's true that global opinion of the U.S. soared when Barack Obama was first elected president, during Clinton's State Department tenure of 2009 to 2013 there was no measurable upswing in foreigners' views of America, according to the Pew Research Center's polling on global attitudes. In most major countries, approval of the U.S. actually went down by the time Clinton left office, including by 11 percentage points in each of France, Germany and the U.K.

A poll conducted in 33 countries by the BBC World Service just after Clinton stepped down as secretary found that overall world opinion of the U.S. by 2013 was the lowest since the presidency of George W. Bush. If Clinton wants to run on having polished America's image abroad, she'll be hard pressed to come up with data to back it up.

"She engineered the so-called 'pivot to Asia,' " Podesta continued. "Her first trip was to China."

Clinton did lead parts of what the White House now calls the "rebalance" to Asia, but as Governor Scott Walker, a top Republican contender, pointed out last week, that policy has fallen well short of expectations. With China building fake islands around the South China Sea and threatening to enforce an air-exclusion zone in the area, the pivot policy now looks inadequate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Along with Treasury Department officials, Clinton initiated a new strategic dialogue with China, but after several high-level summits, the effort has produced few if any tangible results. The State Department did succeed in creating an opening with Myanmar, an effort led by her top Asia official, Kurt Campbell. Unfortunately, the military junta has not eased up its brutal persecution of Muslim minorities, leading to a vast refugee crisis in Southeast Asia, and political reform has now slowed to a crawl.

“She put some new issues on the table for American diplomacy," Podesta went on, "including internet freedom, the importance of women’s rights as human rights, of LGBT rights as human rights, as part of our diplomatic package, which I think restored values to the way America projects its power around the world.”

This is hard to square with the fact that, in her first visit to China, Clinton insisted that human rights advocacy “can’t interfere with the global economic crisis, the global climate change crisis, and the security crisis." Clinton's State Department repeatedly waived laws that would have cut aid to countries guilty of gross human rights violations, such as Egypt. This record won't be helped by Clinton’s family foundation having taken millions of dollars from foreign governments that systematically abuse their citizens and deny basic liberties to women.

Clinton did have several significant public initiatives meant to respond to the pressing social and economic issues of the new century. Her project on Internet freedom had some early success. Yet it was ultimately undermined by revelations from Edward Snowden and others, making her admonishment in 2011 of governments that “pry into the peaceful activities of their citizens” seem hypocritical.

Podesta also stressed Clinton's record on the struggle against violent religious extremism. “She was tough on terrorism, and participated in the decision that led up to the decisions that led up to the killing of Osama bin Laden,” he told Hunt.

While Clinton did support Obama's decision to launch the raid that killed bin Laden, it's misleading to claim that the State Department was a significant player in fighting terrorism. That effort was and is still led by the Pentagon and intelligence agencies. And, of course, the worst terrorism blow to U.S. interests since the Sept. 11 attacks happened at a diplomatic facility in Benghazi, Libya, on her watch.

In addition, while the administration claimed in 2013 that terrorism was on the decline, the spread of the Islamic State, Boko Haram (which Clinton refused to put on the State Department’s terrorism list in 2011, despite requests from the Justice Department and the CIA) and other groups since then makes the victory laps of the first term look far too self-congratulatory.

Podesta avoided mentioning several other diplomatic initiatives Clinton led that turned out poorly. She was a major proponent of the U.S.-led intervention in Libya in 2011, which has led to bloody chaos and a new bridgehead for the Islamic State. Her State Department led a failed diplomatic effort between Israel and the Palestinians. Her officials held years of talks with the Taliban that never bore fruit. She tried to build a moderate Syrian opposition. None of these are going to help her case that she deserves the Oval Office.

Some Republicans are already looking to turn Clinton's tenure as the nation's top diplomat into a liability. "I think her time in the position of secretary of state is demonstrably one that lacks accomplishment, but that also has some real blemishes on it," said Carly Fiorina in April, just before announcing her own candidacy.

Fiorina, of course, has no international experience at all, and neither do most of the other Republican primary candidates. Still, if Clinton is going to run on her foreign policy credentials, she will have to come up with a better narrative than the one the campaign has been peddling.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Americans split on whether Clinton cares about their needs // AP // Julie Pace & Ken Thomas – June 3, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton plans to spend the summer building a case that Republicans are out of touch with the public. But many people aren't convinced she empathizes with them, either, polls suggest, in a potential early warning sign for the Democratic front-runner.

Yet average Americans appear to be split on whether Clinton can relate to them, in the face of scrutiny about her family finances and the Republican argument that she and husband Bill, the former president, play by different rules and have amassed wealth in ways that are inconceivable for most people.

About 47 percent of Americans said Clinton cares about people like them in a CNN/ORC poll released Tuesday. That's down from 53 percent in the same poll last summer. An ABC News/Washington Post poll released the same day also found a slight decline in the past year on a similar question, with 49 percent saying Clinton "understands the problems of people like you" and 46 percent saying she doesn't.

The dip in Clinton's ratings on attributes like empathy coincides with a decline in her overall favorability from the time she was Obama's secretary of state. Her current levels mirror how the public viewed her during her failed 2008 White House campaign.

Dan Pfeiffer, a longtime Obama adviser who left the White House this spring, said it's too early for the numbers to cause anxiety in Clinton's Brooklyn campaign headquarters. But he added that "if this trend doesn't reverse itself over the next many months, it should be a cause of concern."

Empathy was a focus of Obama's re-election bid against Romney. The Democratic incumbent relentlessly argued that Romney's policies and personal wealth left him out of touch with most Americans. By Election Day, 81 percent of Americans who said they voted based on whether a candidate cared for people like them backed Obama, according to exit polls.

Clinton campaign officials say they care less about how Clinton is viewed in isolation on the question of empathy and more about how she is compared with specific Republican challengers. While no major polls have done such a head-to-head comparison, a Quinnipiac survey last week found large numbers of Americans undecided on whether many Republican presidential hopefuls - among them Marco Rubio and Scott Walker - care about their needs.

And the ABC News/Washington Post poll had worrying signs for former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, with 55 percent of Americans saying he doesn't understand the problems of people like them.

Clinton will use a June 13 rally to argue that the GOP field as a whole is out of touch on gay rights, immigration, climate change and more. She has also been highlighting her differences with Republicans on economic issues, financial reform and budget priorities.

While the GOP race is wide-open, with more than a dozen candidates expected to vie for the nomination, the Clinton campaign plans to cast the field as monolithic on policy.

Republicans, however, see an opportunity to turn the question of empathy against Clinton. They've already started trying.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republican pollster David Winston said the intense early focus on such issues gives Republicans an opening to define the terms of the debate over the direction each party wants to take the country.

"If she doesn't have a product on the shelf - her ideas - what's the point?" Winston asked.

Since the start of the year, Clinton has faced questions about her family foundation's fundraising practices and acceptance of money from foreign governments, as well as her decision to use a private email server at the State Department and destroy personal emails during her tenure in the Obama administration.

Clinton's personal wealth has also created unwanted attention. The Clintons reported last month that they earned more than $30 million in combined speaking fees and book royalties since January 2014.

Clinton campaign officials argue that the individual issues have not affected the way the public views Clinton but the cumulative effect of the scrutiny has.

Her early campaign strategy suggests Clinton and her advisers are aware of the need to present herself as more relatable to Americans. While her failed 2008 White House bid emphasized her toughness and experience, the first months of her second campaign have highlighted her family background and her early work on women's and family issues.

During small round table events in Iowa, New Hampshire and elsewhere, Clinton has frequently referenced her roots as the daughter of a father who was a small business owner and a mother who overcame a difficult upbringing and abandonment.

She's also centered policy discussions on pre-kindergarten and daycare options for young children, as well as the plight of those with mental health problems and addictions to heroin and prescription drugs - calling it a "quiet epidemic" striking small towns and rural areas.

"I want to be the president who takes care of people," Clinton told voters in New Hampshire last week. "I consider that my highest and most important responsibility."

Campaign Reporters Told There Will Be 'NO Opportunities To Interview Hillary Clinton' // The Daily Caller // Chuck Ross – June 3, 2015

Reporters attending a Hillary Clinton speech in Houston on Thursday must remain within the confines of barricade and will not have a chance to interview the Democratic presidential nominee, they were informed in a note with big, bold red letters.

"There will be NO opportunities to interview Hillary Clinton," a press blast from Texas Southern University reads. "Her speech will be her interview."

After attending fundraisers in Dallas and Austin, Clinton will head to Texas Southern University in Houston to talk about voting rights and to receive the first inaugural Barbara Jordan Public-Private Leadership Award, named after the late Texas congresswoman.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The award goes to “a deserving woman anywhere in the world who shall have made the highest achievement during the preceding year or years in any honorable field of human endeavor in the public or private sector.”

The strict rules imposed on reporters attending the event are par for the course so far for Clinton’s campaign. She has been criticized repeatedly for choking off reporters’ access and refusing to take questions.

Whoa, If True: Hillary Clinton Blows Off Autograph-Seeking Voter // Bloomberg // David Weigel – June 3, 2015

This is another installment of "Whoa, If True," an occasional look at the wild and false tales that make it into the mainstream of presidential campaign news.

On May 22, Democratic presidential frontrunner Hillary Clinton paid a visit to New Hampshire's Smuttynose Brewery, and worked a line of voters outside. The visit made almost no news, apart from a second-day story about angry Republicans threatening to chug Really Old Brown Dog and Finestkind IPA no more.

On June 1, the conservative opposition research shop America Rising tweeted a Vine of Clinton interacting with a voter outside Smuttynose. Its clicky summary: "Watch what happens when a@HillaryClinton supporter asks her to sign something." Anyone who watched the Vine saw Clinton tell a woman to "go to the end of the line" when asked for a signature.

“You think she said it in a nice way?”

Cue: Virality. The Weekly Standard posted the Vine, under the headline "Hillary to Supporter: 'Go to the End of the Line." The Daily Caller posted the Vine as proof of "Queen Hillary" being impatient with voters: "Every once in a while, Her Majesty must put the rabble back where they belong." Conservative talk radio host Laura Ingraham told Fox News viewers that Clinton would never tell "influence peddlers" to "go to the back of the line" as she had this voter. According to Breitbart News reporter Charlie Spiering, the video's placement on the Drudge Report (headline: "She snaps at adoring voter") got it 4 million loops. America Rising's Colin Reed later bragged to a Salon writer that it was up to 5 million.

There were two small problems with the story.

One: The voter was not told to go to "the back" of the line, as if she'd cut ahead. She was told to go to the end of the procession, to where Clinton was pausing to sign notes, photographs, and books.

Two: Once the voter found the end of the line, she got the signature she asked for.

The video, graciously provided to reporters by America Rising, is 17 minutes long. At 8:59, Clinton emerges from the brewery and offers a "Hey, guys!" to the waiting crowd. For two minutes, she moves down the line, shaking hands, and trading extremely light banter. ("You just graduated from Penn State? My father and my brother went to Penn State.") At roughly11:11, the Vine moment occurs.

After the "line" exchange, Clinton reassures the voter that she'll give here a signature. "Yeah, we will," she says. "Definitely, yes. See these guys over here? They'll take good care of you."

She was referring to sunglasses-wearing handlers, who... proceeded to help her out, at the proverbial end of the line. At 12:16, the video clearly shows the woman who asked Clinton for a signature and a photo—a woman with a black-and-white striped shirt and grey hair tied back -- getting a signature, then taking a photo.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Every news outlet that reported on Hillary snubbing the voter got it wrong—and could have easily gotten it right. The story never passed a basic B.S. test. Why would a tracker, with a perfect view of Clinton and the crowd, drop the story after the voter was told to relocate? Why would he not go up to the voter and ask how she felt about the snub? (She'd hardly have been the first person swarmed by media after an awkward candidate moment.) The answer was hinted at in the Vine itself, as a close listen revealed Clinton's handlers promising to "take care" of the voter. To make Clinton look rude, the video had to cut around the awkward fact that the voter got what she came for.

"If you look at the whole video," Fox News commentator Greg Gutfeld said on Tuesday, "she was saying, 'Oh I'm shaking these hands, if you meet me over on the other side, you could sign it.' She wasn't being rude at all."

By the time Gutfeld said that, the bogosity of the "snub" was becoming better known, and the story was already evolving into criticism of Clinton's tone. "You think she said it in a nice way?" a shocked Kimberly Guilfoyle asked Gutfeld.

"I don't think it was that bad," said Dana Perino, who as a veteran of George W. Bush's administration actually knew how voter ropelines worked.

The "Clinton seemed rude" theory of the case didn't even mesh with America Rising's original spin. As the Vine burned up Twitter, Colin Reed told Business Insider that Clinton had blown off a regular American. "Maybe these New Hampshire voters would have better luck getting Secretary Clinton's attention if they wrote a six-figure check to the Clinton Foundation or were a highly-vetted political activist at one of her staged campaign events," he said.

Asked by Bloomberg if he stood by that statement, Reed said that "the vine (and its 7 million views so far) speaks for itself."

Georgina Bloomberg is backing Hillary for President // NY Daily News // Annie Karni – June 3, 2015

It's too soon to tell if dad's on board, but Georgina Bloomberg is going for Hillary.

"I would probably vote for her just to be able to say that I voted for the first woman President," Bloomberg, a professional equestrian, told the Daily News in an email exchange.

Georgina Bloomberg, 32, said being a new mom makes her eager to support Clinton's expected run.

"I am all into doing things that will be cool stories to tell my grandkids," the younger of the city's two former First Daughters said.

Bloomberg's son, Jasper, is just over a year old.

Her support is a little piece of good news for Clinton, who has yet to answer questions about why she relied solely on a homebrew email system registered to her Chappaqua home during her tenure as secretary of state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Last time Clinton ran for President, former Mayor Michael Bloomberg briefly considered running against her as an independent.

But the two are said to have a solid working relationship.

In 2012, Bloomberg reportedly urged Clinton to run for mayor after he left office.

Bloomberg has been a guest at Clinton Global Initiative conferences. And the high-wattage officials most recently appeared together at an event at the Bloomberg Foundation in December, where they highlighted an initiative that collects data on women in an effort to close gender gaps across the globe.

But Bloomberg also has ties on the Republican side.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush , who is exploring a presidential run, is a Bloomberg Philanthropies board member.

Bill Clinton to Give Secret Address to Health Insurers // The Weekly Standard // Michael Warren – June 3, 2015

Former president Bill Clinton will be the keynote speaker at a conference of health-insurance executives this week. America's Health Insurance Plans, the largest health-insurance provider trade group in the country, is holding its Institute 2015 conference in Nashville this week. Clinton, whose wife Hillary is running for president, will close out the conference Friday afternoon with his address to attendees.

"The session is open to Institute attendees (who have registered and paid for the entire Institute) and Friday only registrants," says the conference's website. "No press allowed."

AHIP describes itself as a trade organization and advocacy group on behalf of health insurers. Representatives of nearly 150 insurance providers are attending the organization's conference.

2016 Democratic White House hopefuls jockey for Hispanics' support // The Washington Times // S.A. Miller – June 3, 2015

Putting a premium on Hispanic voters as the key to their party's future, Democratic presidential candidates this year are jockeying to outdo one another with promises to halt even more deportations and grant citizenship to every illegal immigrant — checking off the entire wish list of pro-immigration activists.

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley became the latest Democratic contender to go all in on immigration Wednesday when he vowed to block deportations for all but the worst criminals and push comprehensive immigration reform laws through Congress in his first 100 days in office.

"I would absolutely do everything in my power," Mr. O'Malley said at a question-and-answer forum in Washington hosted by the U.S. Hispanic Chamber of Commerce. "I would not give up."

He also took a swipe at President Obama, whom immigration rights activists fault for breaking his promise to make immigration reform a top priority in his first 100 days and not going far enough with the deportation amnesty he eventually attempted with executive action after last year's midterm elections.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. O'Malley said that to forge a consensus for comprehensive immigration reform, America needs "not leadership that follows public opinion but leadership that leads public opinion."

"We need comprehensive immigration reform, and we need to engage with all our members of Congress to make that happen. And that's what I intend to do," he said. "There's no magic wand, there's no easy button for this. We have to talk with one another."

Hispanics voted for Mr. Obama en masse, helping carry him to victory in 2008 and especially in 2012, when they voted for him over Republican Mitt Romney 71 percent to 27 percent. But Hispanic were left discouraged and disappointed by Mr. Obama's progress on the immigration issue.

Mr. Obama's controversial move to unilaterally grant deportation amnesty to more than 4 million illegal immigrants, which some pro-immigrant activists said didn't go far enough, was blocked by a federal judge and remains snared in the courts.

Eager to shore up Hispanic support, Democratic front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton quickly moved to promise immigrant rights groups everything they want. The other Democrats in the race, Mr. O'Malley and Sen. Bernard Sanders of Vermont, then rushed to promise everything and more on immigration.

"They are definitely feeling the pressure and the strength of the immigrant rights movement, especially when it comes to motivating the Latino electorate," said Cesar Vargas, co-director of the Dream Action Coalition, which had been advocating for most of the positions the candidates adopted.

He said that Hispanic voters will be looking for more details from the candidates about how they will achieve the goals, and he said to expect the Democrats to go even farther with immigration reform proposals.

"The reality for us that is going to matter is the record of the candidates and how much they are willing to actually commit to the plans and timelines rather than just campaign rhetoric that, right now, Hillary Clinton just has," said Mr. Vargas.

Democrats certainly don't want to lose their edge with Hispanics, which are already the largest minority in the U.S. — and their numbers are rapidly growing.

The Hispanic population in 1990 was 22 million, or about 9 percent of the population. By 2013, it reached 54 million, or 17 percent of the total population, and about 1 million more Hispanics are added to the U.S. population every year, according to the U.S. Census.

By comparison, blacks made up about 13 percent of the U.S. population in 2013, up from 12 percent in 1990, according to census data.

"Hispanic voters are the fastest-growing segment of the American electorate — period, exclamation point, capital letters — and are therefore important not just to the Democratic Party but to the entire country," said Democratic campaign strategist Craig Varoga, who worked on President Bill Clinton's 1996 re-election team and Mr. O'Malley gubernatorial campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He said that the three Democratic candidates are making the smart moves by aligning themselves with Hispanics and embracing an immigration reform agenda, which he said Republicans shun to their own detriment.

“All three of these [Democratic] candidates clearly believe that America is stronger if every single person in this country reaches their fullest potential,” he said. “Some, but not all, Republicans recognize that their party will continue to put themselves behind the eight ball and lose close elections if they ignore the growing role of these new Americans in our country.”

Republican presidential candidates have taken a more cautious approach to immigration reform, such as offering some illegal immigrants a legal status that stops short of citizenship.

Mrs. Clinton said that amounted to an offer of “second-class status.”

She first staked out an immigration position that went beyond Mr. Obama’s at an event in Las Vegas in early May. She promised to use executive action to grant deportation amnesty to potentially millions more illegal immigrants despite the Department of Justice’s Office of Legal Counsel previously advising that it would be illegal.

Mrs. Clinton also promised to make it easier for illegal immigrants to plead for leniency in deportation proceedings and provide more legal representation for young illegals in immigration courts, as well as fight for comprehensive immigration reform that provides a path to citizenship for most of the estimated 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants living in the United States.

More than the other candidates, Mrs. Clinton has broken with pro-immigrant activists in the past, including opposing giving driver’s licenses to illegal immigrants when she was a senator from New York.

Mr. Sanders, a self-described socialist, has long supported immigration reform but had not made it a centerpiece of his agenda. After Mrs. Clinton came out strongly on the issue, he enthusiastically took up the cause.

“We have 11 million people in this country living in the shadows, living in fear. That’s got to end. We need a path toward citizenship for all of those people,” he said on MSNBC.

Mr. Sanders said that he too would use executive action to halt deportations and change immigration law, dismissing concerns that the Office of Legal Counsel deemed it beyond the scope of presidential power.

“The courts are the people who determine what is legal or not. I think what you need is an administration that fights for justice, fights for what’s right, takes the case to the courts, and you do your best to win that case,” said Mr. Sanders.

At the forum in Washington, Mr. O'Malley showed that he was ready to fight Mrs. Clinton for the Hispanic vote, taking a veiled shot at her record on immigration when he touted his own pro-immigration record.

Among many pro-immigrant actions by Mr. O'Malley, he signed legislation giving driver’s licenses to undocumented residents in Maryland, supported sanctuary cities for illegal immigrants in the state and signed into law Maryland’s Dream Act that provided in-state tuition and other benefits to young adult illegals who were brought into the U.S. as children.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“One of the greatest indicators of a person’s future actions would be how they acted in the past when they had the power,” said Mr. O'Malley.

“I plan to run a campaign that offers new leadership with executive experience, with progressive values and the fearlessness that I believe will rally people to this candidacy,” he said. “I’ve listed the things that I did when I was in power and when I was in office. I intend to offer that same sort of leadership, and we’ll let the people decide.”

Meet the woman who's guiding Hillary Clinton's stance on police reforms // Fortune // Nina Easton – June 3, 2015

Maya Harris is Clinton’s senior policy adviser—and a major influence on how the Democratic candidate talks about issues of crime and policing.

With many of the power players from Hillary Clinton’s 2008 presidential run are sitting this one out, the big question is: Who’s in?

What follows is the latest installment of a Fortuneseries looking at the the most influential women on Clinton’s 2016 team. When this series wraps, we’ll turn our attention to the most powerful women on the GOP side of the race.

Maya Harris hails from a family of female overachievers. Her late mother, Shyamala Harris, immigrated from India in the 1950s to obtain her PhD in endocrinology from UC Berkeley, and went on to make breakthrough discoveries in breast cancer research. Her big sister, Kamala Harris, is California’s attorney general, and is now running for U.S. Senate. At age 29, Maya herself became one of the nation’s youngest-ever law school deans when she took the reins of the Lincoln Law School of San Jose, a night school that prepares students for the California bar.

Then—as if choosing a spouse specially equipped to keep up with all this hard-charging ambition—Harris married fellow Stanford Law student (and her best friend) Tony West. West would go on to become the third-highest ranking official in the Obama Justice Department. Their friendship blossomed when Harris’ 4-year-old daughter Meena engaged West in games of hide-and-seek while her then-single mom was registering for classes. Following family tradition, Meena is now a Harvard law grad.

“It’s all justice all the time,” Harris laughs when asked about family dinner talk.

Harris’ mother, who mostly raised her girls alone (Harris’ Jamaican-born father was a Stanford economist), was swept up in the civil rights movement in and around Berkeley, so Harris grew up imbued with a healthy dose of activism. But the girls’ trailblazing mother also modeled a life of mentorship—always supporting her graduate students while also demanding high standards. “She was tough on them,” Harris recalls. “Until her dying day she never lost sight of this notion that if you’ve been able to walk through doors, you don’t just leave the doors open. You bring others along.”

The sisters spent their early childhood in Berkeley before moving to Montreal, where their mother was a researcher at the Jewish General Hospital—and Harris learned French. They returned to the Bay Area six years later, where Harris attended U.C. Berkeley. Both she and Kamala inherited their mother’s intense drive—Harris as a civil rights attorney; Kamala a prosecutor—and her passion for cooking everything from soul food to Italian cuisine.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Today, with inner cities exploding over police tactics, Harris' appointment as one of three senior Clinton policy advisers is timely: The one-time private attorney has spent much of her professional life working on criminal justice issues, particularly policing. Her influence was evident in Clinton's April 29 speech denouncing the "tough on crime" policies of her husband in the 1990s and the "era of mass incarceration" it produced. That's an argument Harris has made over the years while working at the ACLU, the Oakland-based group PolicyLink, and, most recently, liberal Center for American Progress in Washington.

Harris talks about the "collateral consequences of conviction" on families and communities, not just individuals, and tells me that the best police reforms are those that "engage the community as partners and problem-solvers, not just people to be policed." Clinton's speech gave fodder to critics who accuse the candidate of being too soft on crime and too hard on police officers assigned to work the front lines of dangerous neighborhoods.

But, interestingly, Clinton's calls for sentencing and prison reforms are echoed by some powerful Republicans, including presidential candidate and Senator Rand Paul. Koch Industries CEO Charles Koch, a well-known funder of Republican candidates, also recently argued that "overcriminalization" has led to "conflict between our citizens and law enforcement." "I'm heartened that we've arrived at a bipartisan moment where people on the left and on the right are coming together," says Harris.

Immigration is another issue that falls under Harris' campaign purview, and another spot where Clinton has rejected her husband's policies and moved to the left—further left than even President Barack Obama. In a May 6 speech that Harris helped to craft, Clinton warned that if Congress doesn't pass immigration reform—and she is elected president—she would issue executive orders beyond those issued by President Obama to provide legal protection to undocumented workers living here. Look to see Harris' influence again on June 13, when Clinton delivers official "launch" speech on Manhattan's Roosevelt Island.

The campaign to put Julian Castro on Hillary Clinton's VP shortlist // GABRIEL DEBENEDETTI and ANNIE KARNI // Politico – June 4, 2015

It's way too early, Clinton insiders say. But the Castro buzz is useful as Democrats court Hispanics.

The Democratic National Convention isn't for 13 months, and Hillary Clinton isn't the party's nominee, but some Hispanic Democratic leaders are already pushing hard for Julián Castro to be her running mate — or at least a top contender for the job.

The former San Antonio mayor and current housing secretary was in Washington while Clinton raised money in his hometown on Wednesday, but his name is on the minds and lips of Democrats close to the Clinton camp as the presidential front-runner crosses Texas for campaign fundraisers and a Houston speech on Thursday.

The flashy trial balloon and Castro's innate appeal have likely ensured the Mexican-American Cabinet member a place on Clinton's vice presidential long list if she wins the nomination, Democrats close to Clinton said. But Castro hardly has any relationship with the candidate herself, and the effort has gotten a mixed reception at best.

Democrats say it's far too early for this conversation — arguing that it's unproductive to talk about a general election ticket when Clinton is battling three other declared Democratic candidates and the ever-present perception of inevitability.

What's more, several Democrats warned, Castro's backers run the risk of overplaying their strong hand.

"If I were Julián Castro I'd be worried," said one Clinton ally with an eye on Democrats' efforts to woo Hispanic voters. "Others who are in his corner need to dial down those effusive musings."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Still, there's a political logic in letting the pro-Castro drumbeat go on.

Clinton's campaign sees Hispanic voters as crucial to her success, both in swing states like Florida and early-voting states like Nevada, where the candidate last month unveiled an immigration agenda that surprised even the Obama White House with its scope and aggressiveness.

And Castro, an engaging speaker and a fresh young face at 40, would make it somewhat harder for Republicans to paint the 67-year-old Clinton as the candidate of the past.

Former HUD secretary and San Antonio mayor Henry Cisneros ratcheted up the Castro speculation with a recent appearance on Univision, the Spanish-language channel owned by close Clinton ally Haim Saban.

"What I am hearing in Washington, including from people in Hillary Clinton's campaign, is that the first person on their lists is Julián Castro," Cisneros, who was considered for the vice presidency in 1984, said. "He is the superior candidate considering his record, personality, demeanor and Latin heritage."

Castro has largely played along, despite telling a Washington audience, "I'm not holding my breath" on Wednesday. He called Republican questions about Clinton's private email address a "witch hunt" last month, and Cisneros — who said he has spoken to Bill Clinton about Castro — laughed when asked by POLITICO whether Castro wanted to be considered for the position.

"Is he a red-blooded American male?" Cisneros asked rhetorically. "I would be hard-pressed to imagine a scenario where a Latino, and particularly Julián Castro, was not on that short list. It makes so much sense."

Cisneros is just one of several prominent Hispanic leaders who are promoting Castro. Democratic National Committee Finance Chairman Henry Muñoz told BuzzFeed in May that Castro "deserves to be on the short list," and New York City Council Speaker Melissa Mark-Viverito, who was born in Puerto Rico, said the concerted effort from Hispanic leaders to promote Castro reminded her of the united rally around Sonia Sotomayor when she was under consideration for a Supreme Court nod.

Clinton and Castro haven't spoken since they appeared together on a panel in Washington in April, but people close to the campaign acknowledged that it's politically useful for the candidate to keep his name in the public conversation, long before her operation formally starts vetting prospects. That way she can implicitly emphasize to Hispanic voters that she is taking their concerns about representation seriously.

"A lot of Latino Democrats are concerned about what happens if Marco Rubio becomes the [Republican nominee], or Jeb Bush, or even if Scott Walker becomes the nominee and he chooses Rubio to be the VP," said a Democratic strategist close to the Clinton camp, adding that many see Castro as an easy solution to the dilemma.

And while the early pro-Castro campaign is risky, it effectively ensures he will be considered seriously when it comes time for Clinton to choose a running mate, assuming she wins the nomination.

"There's an entire art to getting yourself on the list," explained California Democratic strategist Chris Lehane, a veteran of Bill Clinton's White House who helped to vet Al Gore. "There's value to being talked about."

"But at the end of the day," Lehane said, "there are really two factors: How does the [candidate] really personally feel about the person who is going to be the No. 2, and the single biggest factor is: Is the person ready to be a heartbeat away from the presidency? That's a 'You know it when you see it' issue."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The answer to the first question could change as Clinton travels the country, especially if Castro emerges as a campaign surrogate, considering that the two have met only a handful of times and that he is actually closer to Bill Clinton than to Hillary.

But Lehane's second question — and Castro's inexperience — is giving some Washington Democrats pause.

The HUD secretary has been in Washington for less than a year after running San Antonio from 2009 to 2014, and Democratic staffers and lobbyists in the capital arched eyebrows and whispered about Castro's policy chops following what they saw as his inelegant performances on "The Daily Show" and in congressional budget hearings this year.

Some Democrats told POLITICO that Castro would be a better candidate four years down the road and that Clinton might face serious trouble if she were to put him on the ticket.

"Yes, he's a rising star, and people even talk about him being the first Latino president," said the Democratic strategist allied with Clinton. "But now is just not the time, in this day and age when people are looking for real presidential experience. [President Barack] Obama was on the receiving end of charges of not being prepared."

"John McCain chose Sarah Palin and was bashed for that," she added. "She has more experience than [Castro] does."

Castro, at least in public, coyly dismisses the veep buzz, telling CNN recently, "If I had a dime for every amount of speculation that happens in D.C., you know, I think all of us would be wealthy."

But the public nature of the pro-Castro campaign has nonetheless rubbed some Clinton allies and staffers the wrong way: One Democratic campaign veteran who is in frequent contact with Clinton's top donors said such a high-profile effort all but ensures that Castro will have a harder time getting through the eventual vetting process.

And it has also functioned to bring other vice presidential contenders to the public eye. Colorado Governor John Hickenlooper recently announced he has an autobiography coming out around the time the vice presidential conversation may be heating up, and many Clinton loyalists are enamored of Virginia Sen. Tim Kaine, widely considered the front-runner for the post.

But the fact remains that Clinton's team views courting the Hispanic vote as a top priority as she looks to replicate Obama's electoral success with minorities. Clinton's decision to unveil her immigration policy in Nevada was no mere happenstance, and when she returns to the state later this month she will speak at conference of the National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials.

Even so, Castro's ethnic background may not be as effective in appealing to Hispanic voters as some believe. As one Clinton ally put it: "Tim Kaine speaks Spanish much better than Julián Castro does."

Hillary Clinton Cannot Afford to Lose Black Voters // National Jounal // EMILY SCHULTHEIS – June 3, 2015

Turnout will drop compared to Obama's two elections, but she's about to roll out a policy platform aimed directly at African-American voters. Barack Obama didn't need to do much—almost anything—to win record turnout from African-American voters. Hillary Clinton will need to pull out all the stops to score just a fraction of that support.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

An exaggeration? Black political leaders don't think so.

"Make no mistake, there will be some drop-off," said Rep. Emanuel Cleaver of Missouri, a former chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, whose comments echoed those of other influential African-American Democrats.

Indeed, black leaders concede it will be nearly impossible for Clinton to replicate the level of turnout Obama's candidacy generated among this core demographic—a group of voters central to the national coalition necessary for a Democrat to win the White House. So she'll need to coax them to the polls by honing specific messages about policies relevant to the black community, something her team says she's preparing to unveil.

On Thursday, Clinton will call for expanded early voting in every state, including weekend and evening hours over many days before Election Day—positions supported by Democrats who say working-class voters need greater access to the polls.

And she'll specifically criticize laws in North Carolina, Texas, and Wisconsin that, she argues, reduced rather than expanded access to the polls.

These are significant targets for Clinton. Democrats have their eyes on changing demographics in counties in North Carolina, Texas, and elsewhere that might begin to shift those states away from Republicans, perhaps as soon as 2016.

Black voters, specifically, are growing as a share of the electorate in many states. But while pollsters think Clinton will win them by similar margins to Obama—95 percent of African-Americans voted for the president in 2012—her team should not underestimate the challenge she will have motivating African-Americans to show up when the first black president isn't at the top of the ticket.

In 2012, the U.S Census Bureau estimated that just more than 66 percent of eligible black voters showed up at the polls—the highest turnout ever for this demographic group, higher even than turnout among whites. Indeed, Obama's support among black voters "went off the charts," said Brookings demographer William Frey—enough so that minority turnout, especially black turnout, was a deciding factor in the president winning a second term.

And in states like Virginia, North Carolina, and Florida, a difference in turnout of even a few percentage points could have big repercussions, Frey added.

"You could call it the excitement factor," he said. "At least in these states ... where blacks are a huge part of the minority population, she's going to need that."

In other words, unlike Obama, Clinton will really have to work for high black turnout.

"I can't in all honesty say that she will receive the same level of support as an African-American president," said Rep. Marcia Fudge of Ohio, "but clearly I do believe that if her message is strong she can get close."

Late last week, Clinton appointed LaDavia Drane, the former executive director of the CBC, as her African-

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

American-outreach director. Drane joins a staff at Clinton's Brooklyn headquarters with several other high-profile African Americans among its ranks, including Marlon Marshall, the director of state campaigns; Maya Harris, a top policy adviser; and Karen Finney, a senior spokeswoman.

Harris, sister of California Democratic Senate candidate Kamala Harris and formerly of the Center for American Progress, has done research specifically on encouraging greater turnout of minority women, and she argued that they are a reliable voting bloc when they're given strong policy reasons to vote. That's true of black voters overall, she noted, and is part of the campaign's calculus.

"One thing we know is that issues matter—that at the end of the day, whether [African-American] voters are going to turn out is going to depend on whether they have been motivated to turn out," Harris told National Journal. "Secretary Clinton is well-situated to do that, both in terms of what she has already demonstrated in her life's work and in the issues she's talking about."

That motivation will come partly from policy proposals and partly from focusing on parts of Clinton's biography, the campaign says. Speaking in South Carolina last week, she put deliberate focus on her early career experiences at the Children's Defense Fund and her work for women and children. The campaign is also talking about specific policy positions that are relevant to the black community—health care, a minimum-wage increase, substance-abuse issues, and perhaps most noticeably, criminal-justice reform, which Clinton addressed in a speech at Columbia back in April. Clinton aides are quick to note that it was her first policy speech as a candidate—and with its proposals to provide body cameras for police officers nationwide and end the "era of mass incarceration," it was a direct response to unrest over police activity in Baltimore and other cities.

"Her speech in New York was amazing," said Bakari Sellers, a former South Carolina state legislator who backed Obama in 2008 but is now supporting Clinton. "It's a serious plank in terms of African-American outreach, it's one that can be developed, it's one that can help galvanize not just your typical participants ... but also a new generation of voices."

The other key piece of necessary strategy is the ground game. Cleaver said African-American leaders are welcoming signs from Clinton that her team will build a robust turnout operation in urban areas, which is something Obama—whose candidacy was naturally a source of excitement to many black voters—didn't need to do. Clinton's 2016 team, with campaign manager Robby Mook at the helm, is placing heavy emphasis on grassroots strategy; it has sizable field teams in the four early states.

"The president did not have to do a lot in the urban core, and didn't—he used his resources elsewhere," Cleaver said. "So I think you're going to find elected officials celebrating the fact that there's a great deal of attention being paid to the ground game."

That starts in South Carolina, the only one of the four early states with a large African-American population. Clinton's campaign has hired a team of staffers and field organizers—including state director Clay Middleton and state political director Jalisa Washington, both of whom are African Americans with strong ties to the state's politics. A half-dozen field organizers are already in place in the state, focusing on traditionally African-American neighborhoods and gathering places as they start to introduce themselves and the campaign to the state's voters."We are going to where the voters are. So we are in faith-based communities, we are at churches, we are at several social-justice organizations," Middleton said. "We have field organizers that look like the community and understand the community and can relate to those individuals."

Emily's List Focuses Its 'Madam President' Program on Clinton // NYT // Jonathan Martin – June 3, 2015

Emily's List, the Democratic advocacy group for female candidates who support abortion rights, is beginning an independent expenditure effort dedicated entirely to Mrs. Clinton.

Emily's List has been running a program, Madam President, for two years that was dedicated to promoting the concept of electing a female president. It was implicit that Mrs. Clinton would be that candidate, but now the group is making their support official.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a memo to donors, an official with the group noted that the project would be aimed at persuading and turning out female voters in targeted states and would feature extensive polling, voter contact, TV ads and digital advocacy. The official, Denise Feriozzi, wrote that it would be the most extensive independent expenditure program in the 30-year history of the organization.

As part of the push, Emily's List is taking over the social media platforms that had been controlled by Ready for Hillary, the grass-roots organization built around nudging Mrs. Clinton into the presidential race.

Clinton campaign snares Box CEO in courting young tech millionaires // Reuters // Sarah McBride – June 3, 2015

The last time Hillary Clinton ran for the White House in 2008, Aaron Levie was too busy building his start-up company to pay much attention to politics.

But earlier this year, the 30-year-old Levie led his company, Box, through an initial public offering, helping free a small portion of his time to support the frontrunner for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016. A few weeks ago, Levie, whose company is worth more than $2 billion, agreed to host a fundraiser for Clinton.

He sees big stakes for the tech sector in this election, Levie told Reuters, on issues ranging from improving the patent system to securing visas for foreign workers and limiting government surveillance.

"There's more intersection between the technology industry and policy than ever before," said Levie, whose trademark mad-scientist hair showed signs of gray, countered by youthful bright orange sneakers. He said he was backing Clinton because Democrats' social policies, for example on marriage equality, resonated more with him than Republican ones.

The campaigns of various White House hopefuls are looking to reel in the younger Silicon Valley influencers like Levie who could help raise some money for their candidates and also bring along some of the tech sector's energy and cachet.

Levie, whose company helps store data remotely in the "cloud," is among several young Silicon Valley executives Clinton's campaign has been courting.

"Young, innovative entrepreneurs are key to growing and strengthening our economy," said a Clinton campaign spokesman.

SILICON VALLEY A CHALLENGE

But recruiting tech entrepreneurs can prove a challenge. Many lack enthusiasm for politics. For example, in April venture capitalist Marc Andreessen told Fortune he was "struggling between the anti-science party and the anti-economics party" and felt tempted to sit out the next election.

Fundraising officials who declined to be named said they hoped the imprimatur of a few will make it easier to attract others, and Democrats have a long list of prospects.

"The next crowd is Twitter, Facebook, Airbnb," said venture capitalist Steve Westly, who served on President Barack Obama's national finance committee during the 2008 election. While some of those companies have been around for years, many of their employees are relatively new to their wealth.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Twitter and Airbnb representatives didn't respond to requests for comment. A Facebook spokesman declined comment.

Many in Silicon Valley gravitate toward Democrats, because the party is seen as more in sync with the tech community on social issues such as gay marriage. But Republican 2016 hopefuls such as Kentucky Senator Rand Paul are trying to woo the technorati on economic and regulatory issues. A packed room of start-up workers at his San Francisco office opening last month suggested he may be having some success.

Some big names in technology are already involved in politics. Twitter chief executive Dick Costolo is a longstanding Democratic donor, while Facebook chief executive Mark Zuckerberg gives to candidates of both parties.

COLLEGE DROPOUT

Levie said he has donated only once to a candidate, Senator Chuck Schumer, a Democrat from New York. He still hasn't registered to vote in California, his home for almost a decade, relying instead on his parents to forward him his ballot from Washington state.

A dropout from the University of Southern California, Levie founded Box with some friends and ran it for a time out of his uncle's garage near San Francisco before landing hundreds of millions in venture capital backing.

Friends and business associates such as Emanuel Yekutiel, deputy finance director for Clinton, helped spark his interest in her campaign, Levie said.

The clincher: a May 1 meeting in Palo Alto where Clinton campaign officials, including chief technology officer and former Google executive Stephanie Hannon, met with about 50 executives and venture capitalists and highlighted the importance of building a cash reserve for the campaign.

Among the invitees: Palmer Luckey, the 22-year-old co-founder of Oculus Rift, a virtual-reality company bought last year by Facebook for $2 billion, according to someone involved in the event.

Though Levie says campaign support will take a backseat to running Box, he weighs in on election issues with vigor.

Last month, he criticized Rand Paul on Twitter over his comments at a congressional hearing where he compared the "right to healthcare" to the enslaving of doctors.

"Dude, you should be a script writer for `The Hunger Games`, not running for President," Levie wrote on Twitter, referring to the movie about death matches in a dystopian, ruthless society.

Clinton campaign opens five more Iowa offices // The Des Moines Register // Tony Leys – June 3, 2015

Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign is demonstrating its commitment to competing in Iowa by announcing the opening of five new offices in the state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The new locations are in Ames, Council Bluffs, Des Moines, Dubuque and Iowa City, according to a press release Wednesday from spokeswoman Lily Adams. The campaign already had opened offices in Cedar Rapids, Davenport, Sioux City and Waterloo.

Such offices are used for recruiting and training volunteers, holding meetings and holding phone-calling efforts.

The campaign also said it has six "regional organizing directors" and 21 organizers on the ground in Iowa. "Each day our organizers are out talking to Iowans about why Hillary Clinton is the champion we need in the White House and they will continue to have those conversations in these offices, in homes, and online," state director Matt Paul said in the release.

Clinton finished a disappointing third in Iowa's 2008 Democratic caucuses. She has stressed that she will compete hard for the state this time around, even though she holds a commanding lead in polls.

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE

Chafee to unveil presidential run, puzzling longtime allies // AP – June 3, 2015

Former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee plans to formally open his campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination on Wednesday, setting off on a quixotic political quest that has left even some of his closest allies scratching their heads.

Chafee, a former Republican turned independent who joined the Democratic Party two years ago, surprised many when he announced plans to explore a presidential run in April. Since then, he's made little effort to set up a competitive campaign operation, beyond a few visits and calls to activists in the early voting states of New Hampshire, Iowa and South Carolina.

While his primary competitors travel the country raising money and wooing supporters, longtime Chafee strategists and donors say they know little about his intentions — or even his rationale for running.

"He's not done anything other than posture on some issues," said Mike Trainor, a former Chafee aide. "The question he's going to have to answer is what credible indications can he give that he is at all ready to run a national campaign."

Hillary Rodham Clinton, the dominant Democratic candidate, has set a goal of raising $100 million for her primary bid. Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, who entered the race last week, has said he's already raised at least $4 million. And allies of former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley have established a super PAC to support his bid.

All three have begun building robust campaign operations with staff across the country, a step Chafee has yet to take.

In previous campaigns, Chafee has spent significant sums from his family fortune to further his political ambitious, for example, dropping $1.8 million on his 2010 gubernatorial bid. But running for president is significantly more expensive than seeking statewide office, with some pegging the estimated cost of a successful 2016 campaign at more than $1 billion.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The time will come, but it's not now," Chafee said of his plans to raise money, in an interview with The Associated Press last month. "Perhaps after I announce."

Chafee also faces questions about his rationale for challenging Clinton. Though most of the Democratic field has focused on pocketbook issues, calculating that the falling unemployment rate masks a lingering feeling of economic insecurity, Chafee says he's "alarmed" by international instability, particularly in the Middle East and North Africa.

"I don't like where this is going," he said in a Web video announcing his exploratory committee.

His opposition to Clinton, Chafee has said, is driven by the belief that the next president should not be someone who supported the war in Iraq, which he calls "one of the worst decisions in United States history." Then a Republican, Chafee was the lone GOP senator to vote in 2002 against the invasion.

Clinton, then a New York senator, voted to authorize the war, which became a major issue during her 2008 campaign. Clinton now opposes putting American soldiers on the ground in Iraq, other than as advisers to the Iraqi forces. "This has to be fought by and won by the Iraqis," she said after a campaign event in New Hampshire last month.

Chafee left the Republican Party in 2007 to become an independent and supported President Barack Obama in both his campaigns. After winning election as governor, Chafee became a Democrat in 2013, but he opted against seeking re-election amid low approval ratings. Those decisions attracted plenty of national media attention, which former aides say Chafee was happy to encourage.

So far, his latest political maneuver has attracted far less notice, even from his hometown paper — a fact that's frustrated at least one person very close to the soon-to-be candidate.

"No one has contacted him," wrote his wife, Stephanie Chafee, on Facebook nearly three weeks after his April announcement. "so SAD!"

Lincoln Chafee expected to announce longshot presidential bid // WaPo // Jose DelReal – June 3, 2015

Former Rhode Island governor Lincoln Chafee (D), a one-time Republican U.S. senator who notably broke with the GOP on the 2002 Iraq war authorization, is expected to announce Wednesday that he will seek the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination.

Chafee's decision to run, which he plans to announce in an evening speech at George Mason University, makes him the fourth Democratic hopeful to officially enter the race. But he's already been the first to directly and consistently attack frontrunner Hillary Clinton -- particularly over the Iraq War vote that helped sink her first presidential bid.

"I don't think anybody should be president of the United States that made that mistake" of voting for the Iraq War, Chafee told The Post in April. "It's a huge mistake, and we live with broad, broad ramifications today — of instability not only in the Middle East but far beyond and the loss of American credibility. There were no weapons of mass destruction."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Chafee, the son of Rhode Island Sen. John Chafee (R), was appointed to U.S. Senate after his father died in 1999, leaving the seat vacant. As a liberal Republican, Chafee was re-elected to a full term in 2000, before losing in 2006. He officially left the Republican Party the following year. He was elected governor as an independent in 2010 and joined the Democratic Party in 2013. His announcement Wednesday comes less than two years after he decided not to seek a second term as governor amid low approval ratings and the prospect of a bruising primary.

Central to Chafee's presidential campaign: his 2002 Senate vote against authorizing the use of military force in Iraq in 2002, when he was the only Republican senator to oppose the measure.

Instability in Iraq has become an unexpected campaign issue in the GOP presidential race. Chafee's hoping it will once again take center stage in the Democratic contest too.

“Don't forget that probably the biggest reason that Senator Obama, at the time, defeated Hillary Clinton in '08 was because of the Iraq war vote. That was the issue,” Chafee told CNN in April. “And that's my big issue here, because we are dealing with [the] ramifications of that huge mistake that Senator Clinton made in 2002, which I did not make, and we live with it today.”

[Lincoln Chafee accuses Hillary Clinton of diplomatic clumsiness, says ‘America loves an underdog’]

Clinton’s other rivals for the Democratic nomination have so far mostly stopped short of direct attacks on the former secretary of state. Former Maryland governor Martin O’Malley (D), who last week announced his candidacy, has made subtle digs the frontrunner that focus on her perceived coziness with Wall Street and her long history in Washington. Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) has staked out populist positions that sometimes fall far to Clinton's left, but takes pains to avoid mentioning her explicitly.

Chafee does not appear concerned with subtlety.

Several weeks ago, he suggested that heightened tensions with Russia might be traceable to a symbolic, incorrectly-labeled "reset button" Clinton presented to that country's leadership several years ago.

“In the early days, they tried to restart with Russia and she presented the Russian foreign minister with the restart button. And they got the Russian word wrong. They said, 'This means over-charge,' and it was an insult,” he said. “Look what is happening with Putin and with Russia – Ukraine, selling arms to Iran – and it all could have started with the diplomatic mistake, getting the word wrong.”

Chafee has said that he does not expect to raise nearly as much money as Clinton, but that he takes comfort in knowing that “America loves an underdog."

In a year when one of the candidates seeking the Democratic nomination isn't even a member of the party, Chafee isn't concerned that his past party allegiance will raise eyebrows in his relatively new partisan home. "I have not changed. My old liberal Republican stand on the issues does line up with the Democratic Party — women’s reproductive freedoms, support for working families. I have a 30-year record,” he said in April. “Also note that of the candidates here, [former Virginia senator] Jim Webb was a Republican and Hillary Clinton was a Goldwater Girl."

A Washington Post/ABC News poll released Tuesday suggested Clinton has the support of 63 percent of likely Democratic voters nationwide, with Sanders at 10 percent and O’Malley at 3 percent. Chafee registered 1 percent support.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Launching '16 bid, Chafee refuses to rule out talks with IS // AP // Lisa Lerer – June 3, 2015

Former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee entered the race for president Wednesday by calling for the U.S. to switch to the metric system, take an "open-minded approach" to drug trafficking and consider negotiating with Islamic State militants.

With his announcement, Chafee became the biggest longshot among Clinton's rivals, who have a long way to go to avoid becoming historical footnotes in the 2016 campaign.

He did so by casting himself as an anti-war candidate who opposed the invasion of Iraq in 2003, but he quickly detoured into a list of policy proposals that are likely to be non-starters on the campaign trail.

Among them was refusing to rule out talks with Islamic State militants, a violent extremist group that has tortured and beheaded prisoners and opposition fighters as it has overrun parts of Iraq and Syria.

A U.S.-led coalition has launched airstrikes against the extremist group since last August, but Chafee pointed to what he said was the group's protection of antiquities in some of the territory they've taken as a reason to reconsider.

"It's early," he said. "We're coming to grips with who these people are and what they want."

Chafee, a former Republican turned independent who joined the Democratic Party two years ago, has made little effort to set up a competitive campaign operation, beyond a few visits and calls to activists in the early voting states of New Hampshire, Iowa and South Carolina. His launch Wednesday was made during a subdued speech in suburban Washington before a small group that consisted mainly of reporters.

"We must deliberately and carefully extricate ourselves from expensive wars," Chafee told a half-full law school classroom at George Mason University. "We need to be very smart in these voluble times overseas."

Along with moving to the metric system, the policy prescriptions in his speech included ending capital punishment, allowing National Security Agency leaker Edward Snowden back into the U.S. without punishment and repairing relations with Venezuela. His priority would be to end all wars.

"Let's wage peace in this new American century," he said.

Longtime Chafee strategists and donors said earlier they know little about his intentions - or even his rationale for running.

"He's not done anything other than posture on some issues," said Mike Trainor, a former Chafee aide. "The question he's going to have to answer is what credible indications can he give that he is at all ready to run a national campaign."

Clinton has set a goal of raising $100 million for her primary bid. Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, who entered the race last week, has said he's already raised at least $4 million. And allies of former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley have established a super PAC to support his efforts.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

All three have begun building robust campaign operations with staff across the country, a step Chafee has yet to take.

In previous campaigns, Chafee has spent significant sums from his family fortune to further his political ambitions - for example, dropping $1.8 million on his 2010 governor's race. Running for president is significantly more expensive than seeking statewide office, with some pegging the estimated cost of a successful 2016 campaign at more than $1 billion.

Unlike the other Democratic challengers, who've focused on pocketbook issues, Chafee has staked his campaign on growing international instability. His opposition to Clinton, Chafee said, is driven by the belief that the next president should not be someone who supported the war in Iraq. Then a Republican, Chafee was the lone GOP senator to vote in 2002 against the invasion.

Clinton, then a New York senator, voted to authorize the war, which became a major issue during her 2008 campaign. Clinton now opposes putting U.S. soldiers on the ground in Iraq, other than as advisers to the Iraqi forces.

Though he never mentioned Clinton by name Wednesday, Chafee took several veiled swipes at her candidacy, describing the controversies over her family foundation, finances and use of a private email account and server while secretary of state as "regrettable."

"We just can't have that," he said. "We need to just get back the respect and admiration of the international community."

Chafee left the Republican Party in 2007 to become an independent and supported President Barack Obama in both his campaigns. After winning election as governor, Chafee became a Democrat in 2013, but opted against seeking re-election.

Iraq War focus for Lincoln Chafee campaign launch // CNN // Dan Merica – June 3, 2015

Lincoln Chafee has been elected to office as a Republican senator and an Independent governor. Now he's got his sights set on the White House as a Democrat.

A defining issue for Chafee has been the war in Iraq; he was the lone Republican to vote against authorizing the war as a senator in 2003. Hillary Clinton was among the Democrats to vote in favor of giving President George W. Bush the authority to invade.

When Chafee announces he is running for president on Wednesday evening in a speech at George Mason Center for Politics & Foreign Relations in Arlington, Virginia, expect him to focus on that vote he took as senator 13 years ago and how he differs on the issue than Clinton.

Chafee has told CNN that he feels Clinton's vote should disqualify her from the presidency, even though it happened more than a dozen years ago.

"Considering the premise for invading Iraq was based on falsehoods and considering the ramifications we live with now from that mistake, I would argue that anybody who voted for the Iraq War should not be president and certainly should not be leading the Democratic Party," he said in an interview after he announced he was exploring a presidential run in April.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton has said she regretted the Iraq vote, and told reporters last month that she "made a mistake, plain and simple."

According to Debbie Rich, Chafee's spokeswoman, the former governor will make his decision to vote against authorizing the war a key argument behind his rationale for running. The speech, Rich said, will not be deeply biographical, despite the fact few people know Chafee, but will instead focus on his vision.

"I don't see a lot of 'rah rah, this is who I am' in the speech," Rich said. "It is more about his vision and his record."

Chafee's strategy on the Iraq War is simple: Damage Clinton on an issue on which he was diametrically opposed. Chafee has said he doesn't worry about staking his campaign on a backward looking issue, and is proving that by repeatedly returning to the Iraq War vote in interviews.

So far, however, the issue has failed to move the needle for Chafee. In a May CNN/ORC poll, the former governor failed to get even 1% support from self-identified Democrats and independents. In the same April poll, the former senator received 1%.

He is more liberal than Clinton on other issues, too. He supported gay marriage before she did, for instance. But he is more of a hawk on fiscal matters.

Chafee, a former horseshoe specialist, told CNN in April that he wouldn't bet on himself in the 2016 race, but added that he isn't concerned with his abysmal polling.

The election is a "long, long way away. And any political historian can give innumerable examples of 1 percenters who have gone on to success," he said. "Maybe even Bill Clinton himself?"

From the start, Chafee has been a somewhat reluctant candidate. He announced he was exploring a run with such an understated video and website that nearly every political journalist and operative were blindsided by the decision.

And, according to his spokesman, Chafee backed into his decision to announce on Wednesday. After getting ahead of himself by telling reporters, including CNN, that he was "running," Chafee and his team knew they had to announce soon.

"All the media outlets kept asking," Rich said. "When this opportunity came up that he was speaking on foreign policy, which is one of his passions, he decided he would use that opportunity to make a decision."

After announcing his presidential run, Chafee will head straight to New Hampshire, a state he and his advisers say he has to do well in to have any chance at winning the presidency.

After visiting Keene, New Hampshire for a meet and greet with local Democrats on Tuesday night, Chafee will hold a similar event in Lebanon, New Hampshire.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I am new at this. But I am a New Englander, so New Hampshire voters have heard of me, read about me in the Boston Globe," Chafee said in an interview last month. "I haven't campaigned in either state, so I don't know what to answer."

In Presidential Bid, Lincoln Chafee Calls For Metric System // WSJ // Byron Tau & Reid Epstein – June 3, 2015

In a presidential campaign turning largely on stagnant incomes and national security, Lincoln Chafee announced his bid for the White House on Wednesday with an unusual policy stance: He called for adoption of the metric system.

Mr. Chafee, a former Republican and independent who is seeking the Democratic nomination, cast the proposal as a step toward global comity. “Here’s a bold embrace of internationalism: let’s join the rest of the world and go metric,” Mr. Chafee said at his campaign kickoff in Virginia.

The policy raised questions about what American traditions might have to change—football fields might be 91.44 meters, rather than 100 yards, and the distance from home plate to first base measured as 27.432 meters, rather than 90 feet.

Mr. Chafee, a former Rhode Island governor and senator, said that the U.S.’s insistence on using inches, feet, quarts and gallons set the country apart from the global community. He described the process of converting to metric as “easy.”

As a model, Mr. Chafee pointed to Canada, where he also said that he has lived.

“Only Myanmar, Liberia and the U.S. aren’t metric. And it will help our economy,” he said.

His surprise embrace of the metric system caught even potential allies off guard. The U.S. Congress passed the Metric Conversion Act in 1975 calling the system the “preferred” one for trade and commerce. Still, widespread adoption has been scant.

Paul Trusten, the vice president of the U.S. Metric Association, was shocked Wednesday when told that Mr. Chafee called for the country to adopt the metric system.

“Who?” he asked. He then added: “Oh, my gosh.”

Mr. Trusten, a pharmacist in Midland, Texas, said he wasn’t aware of any presidential candidate ever advocating for “metricazation.” People in the metric community, Mr. Trusten said, expected support from President Barack Obama, though that never materialized. They were disappointed by the White House’s response, in 2013, to a citizen petition calling for adopting the metric system.

“I had very high hopes that Mr. Obama was going to be a leader in this because of his discussion of science progress and science initiative…but it never came up,” Mr. Trusten said.

The problem, Mr. Trusten said, is that no American politician has shown sufficient leadership when it comes to the nation’s system of weights, measurement and distances.

“Setting a standard of measurement should be a matter of national assent. It’s something that should be raised, not be made a matter of tyranny but as a matter of leadership,” he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Chafee, a long shot for the presidency, is perhaps best known as the only Republican senator to vote in 2002 against the invasion of Iraq. He won the governor's office in Rhode Island in 2010 as an independent before becoming a Democrat.

In seeking the Democratic presidential nomination, Mr. Chafee joins former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont and former Gov. Martin O'Malley as a candidate.

Does Anybody Remember Lincoln Chafee's Facebook Password? //

Bloomberg // Ben Brody – June 3, 2015

Getting ready to launch a presidential campaign is a lot of work. There's a speech to write, staff to hire, and social-media profiles to touch up.

That last task is tripping up Lincoln Chafee, a former Rhode Island governor who is set to announce Wednesday evening that he is setting out on a long-shot quest for the Democratic presidential nomination.

In a public Facebook post on May 28, Chafee's wife, Stephanie, asked, "Does anybody from my Husband's staff remember his FB page access?"

A spokeswoman for Lincoln Chafee, Debbie Rich, confirmed on Wednesday the post was authentic. His campaign has lost track of the log-in credentials to the Facebook page that staffers started and managed for Chafee as governor, Rich said, and that page seems to be attracting more attention than the page he has set up for 2016, so now they'd like to merge the two.

His gubernatorial page has about 6,100 likes and a verified checkmark, but hasn't had anyone posting to it since October. Chafee left office in January after serving one term. His 2016 Facebook page has fewer than 200 likes.

National Journal editor Scott Bland pointed out Stephanie Chafee's post on Twitter on Wednesday. The contender's wife "just thought some of her people who were her Facebook friends might have been the one that set it up," Rich said.

The former governor's wife has previously commented on Facebook about how little media coverage her husband is getting, according to the Associated Press. "No one has contacted him," she wrote after he announced the formation of an exploratory committee in April, according to AP (the post no longer appeared to be available to the public on Wednesday). "so SAD!"

President Obama's popularity numbers are running well behind historic norms // WaPo // Scott Clement – June 3, 2015

President Obama's job ratings have lost steam since a small early-2015 surge, but Democrats are positive about changes Hillary Rodham Clinton might bring, according to a new Washington Post/ABC News poll.

With 18 months left in office, the poll depicts an unappealing legacy taking shape for Obama. His job ratings are significantly below average for presidents in the past 70 years, he receives sharply negative marks for dealing with the Islamic State, and Republicans are far more passionate in dislike of Obama than Democrats are in supporting him. Each factor poses challenges for Democrats seeking to secure a third consecutive term for the party.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Americans, though, expect Clinton to offer a different path; 58 percent expect she will come up with new policies if elected president rather than follow Obama's, and most who expect new ideas say this is a "good thing." Among Democrats, two-thirds expect Clinton to follow her own path and the vast majority see this as a positive move.

Overall, 54 percent say she'll either pursue new policies and that it's a good thing (44 percent) or that she'll pursue the same policies and that's a good thing (10 percent).

The Post/ABC poll finds 45 percent approve of the way Obama is handling his job while 49 percent disapprove. Obama's approval marks are better than the low 40s of late last year, but down from 50 percent approval in January and 47 percent in March. Other public polls showed an even more modest rise, with current ratings also tilting negative.

Obama gained traction early this year after months of strong economic news, and a January Post/ABC poll found 41 percent saying the economy was at least "good" -- up from 24 percent in late 2013. The economy's shrinking first quarter might have stalled Obama's gains, but the poll shows the issue is not as much of a drag on his approval as before -- his economic approval rating is two points above his overall job approval mark, a positive gap that occurred in just five of 56 previous Post/ABC surveys. Americans are still far from cheery on the issue, with 73 percent saying they are very or somewhat worried about its direction over the next few years.

One possible reason Obama's overall numbers lag behind his economic numbers: Americans are increasingly upset with Obama's handling of the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria. By a 24-point margin, more disapprove than approve of Obama's handling of the situation (55-31) less than a month after the terrorist group captured the major Iraqi city of Ramadi. The negative judgment marks a flip from September, when 50 percent approved of Obama's handling of the issue after he ordered airstrikes to combat insurgents. The issue has highlighted Obama's often-weak support from fellow Democrats for his performance on foreign affairs; fewer than half of Democrats approve of how he has handled the issue (49 percent), 28 points lower than his overall job rating among fellow partisans.

Historically, Obama's standing is below the 56 percent average of presidential approval ratings in Washington Post/ABC News and Gallup polls dating back to the 1930s. His 45 percent mark is also just below average for other two-term presidents at this stage. He is significantly higher than George W. Bush (35 percent) and Harry Truman (24 percent) but lower than Ronald Reagan (52 percent), Bill Clinton (59 percent) and Dwight Eisenhower (64 percent) at this point in their presidencies.

A bigger challenge for Obama's personal legacy is the sheer intensity of disapproval, which was also seen under George W. Bush. Nearly four in 10 (38 percent) strongly disapprove of his job performance, while 22 percent strongly approve.

At the root of this gap are vastly different levels of passion among Democrats and Republicans. Fully 73 percent of Republicans strongly disapprove of Obama, compared with 45 percent of Democrats who strongly approve. In June 2007, partisans were flipped by almost identical numbers, with 73 percent of Democrats strongly disapproving of Bush and 40 percent of Republicans strongly approving.

O'Malley's Mangled Wage Statistic // FactCheck // Brooks Jackson – June 3, 2015

Democratic presidential contender Martin O'Malley claims that "70 percent of us are earning the same or less than they were 12 years ago." That's not correct. Actually, weekly paychecks for rank-and-file workers are 6.6 percent higher than they were a dozen years ago, even after adjusting for inflation.

O'Malley was citing figures that don't reflect a spike in real wages and earnings that has taken place over the past year or so. Real hourly wages are up 2.3 percent since the end of 2013, and they have risen faster for rank-and-file workers than for supervisors. Real weekly earnings are up even more, thanks partly to a slightly longer average work week.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Malley, a former governor of Maryland, made the claim in his May 30 speech formally announcing that he is running for his party's nomination. And he repeated it the following day when he appeared on ABC's "This Week" with George Stephanopoulos.

An Outdated Source

When we asked where O'Malley got his figure, a campaign spokeswoman told us it came from a report by the Economic Policy Institute, released June 4 last year. But the figures in that report are now badly out of date, and didn't quite back up what O'Malley said anyway.

The EPI found that between 2000 and 2013, real hourly wages of the lowest-earning 30 percent of workers did indeed fall, and those workers in the range between 30 percent and 40 percent saw no increase at all. But EPI's figures (see table 1 on page 11) show wages for all but the bottom 40 percent increased at least a bit. For those between the bottom 40 percent and the top 30 percent, the increase ranged from 0.1 percent to 0.2 percent annually. EPI characterized this group's wages as "essentially stagnant," and we would not disagree with that. But it's not the same thing as "earning the same," as O'Malley claimed.

In a more recent report, released Feb. 19, EPI found that real wages fell for nearly all groups between 2013 and 2014, rising only for the bottom 10 percent and those in the 40th percentile. (See Table 1.)

However, EPI's figures are based on year-to-year comparisons, and thus fail to reflect a remarkable and broad spike in real wages and earnings recorded in more recent, month-to-month figures published by the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics.

EPI's research and policy director, Josh Bivens, said this rise will be reflected in the group's next annual report. "It's true that real wages over the past 12 months have been pushed up a lot by falling oil prices, but, I think that's clearly a temporary phenomenon and those gains will be clawed back when oil prices rise in the future," Bivens told us. "But they have definitely provided a boost to purchasing power in the short-term, it's true."

As we've noted before, falling prices for gasoline and other fuels have actually pushed down the Consumer Price Index recently, which in turn has helped push up the purchasing power of the dollar.

A Spike in Real Wages and Earnings

Temporary or not, the gains have been substantial and broad. "Real" hourly wages, which the Bureau of Labor Statistics expresses in constant 1982-1984 dollars to adjust for inflation, haveincreased by 2.3 percent since December 2013, after a long period of stagnation or decline since the end of the Great Recession in 2009.

That figure is for all employees in the private workforce taken together. (Both the EPI and BLS wage and earnings figures cover only private sector employees, and exclude government workers.) BLS does not provide statistics broken down by wage level percentiles, as the EPI report did. But it's clear the recent gains were not concentrated at the top.

BLS does provide a breakdown for "production and nonsupervisory" employees, who make up 82 percent of all workers, and who are paid less on average than their bosses. Those rank-and-file workers have seen their real hourly wages go up 2.7 percent since the end of 2013, an even bigger increase than the average for all workers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's also worth noting that O'Malley used the word "earned," and weekly earnings have risen even faster than hourly wages recently. That's because workers are putting in slightly more hours than they did at the end of 2013. Since December 2013, weekly paychecks have gone up 2.9 percent for all workers, and 3.1 percent for rank-and-file workers.

We also looked at how real earnings — the measure O'Malley used — stacked up against those of "12 years ago" — the time period he specified. And it turns out that as of April, weekly paychecks for rank-and-file, nonsupervisory employees were 6.6 percent higher than they were in April 2003.

Martin O'Malley counters Hillary Clinton: I'm not new to immigration reform // Politico // Jonathan Topaz – June 3, 2015

Martin O'Malley, struggling to emerge from the long shadow of Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton, is betting on immigration as a break-out issue that can win him a strong share of the Latino vote.

He's casting Clinton as a late-to-the-party figure on immigration reform, and he's likely got an edge on Sen. Bernie Sanders, who is enjoying a surge of attention in the presidential race but is not prioritizing immigration in his campaign.

"It's central to our nation's character and central to our nation's economy … For me, it's a pretty essential part of what it's going to take to get things going in the right direction," O'Malley said in a phone interview with POLITICO Wednesday, ahead of a Q&A with Hispanic Chamber of Commerce president Javier Palomarez.

And after Hillary staked out an aggressive, and relatively new, stance on the issue last month, O'Malley delivered his own promise during the event: he would pursue immigration reform in his first 100 days in office and would use executive action, if needed.

In the interview earlier in the day, O'Malley said his record speaks for itself and also says something about Clinton. He argued his leadership on immigration while he was Maryland governor was an example of challenging Washington orthodoxy — particularly in his fight against the White House and Clinton when he spoke out last summer against the fast-track deportation of the flood of Central American unaccompanied minors across the border.

In many ways, he placed the issue as central in the larger narratives of his campaign — a generational contrast with Clinton and his gubernatorial record. While he declined to challenge Clinton or Sanders directly — he never used their names — O'Malley alluded to politicians who failed to speak up and declined to buck the party, apparent references to Clinton.

"When nobody else would speak up about the deplorable treatment of the Central American refugee kids coming to our country for sanctuary, I stood up and spoke very directly," he said.

While Clinton impressed – and genuinely surprised – immigration activists with her Nevada speech last month in which she called for a pathway to citizenship and for more robust executive action on immigration, O'Malley is arguing that he's had their backs all along.

Not all activists are convinced, though, that O'Malley will get a significant advantage over Clinton with Latino voters by portraying her as a latecomer.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ali Noorani, executive director of the National Immigration Forum, says there's little distinction between the three candidates on immigration. He argued that Clinton pushed Obama to the left on immigration during their 2008 campaign, noting in particular a famous moment on the trail in Nevada in which Clinton, meeting with immigrant families, said: "No woman is illegal."

"If Latino voters in the Democratic Party were to look over the timeline of Hillary Clinton's relationship with the Latino community, those roots are pretty deep," Noorani argued. "I guess O'Malley is trying to chip away at those roots and find a lane."

O'Malley's doing a good deal of Hispanic outreach early in his campaign. Since his announcement last Saturday in Baltimore, the former governor conducted one of his first interviews with Univision and his appearance with the Hispanic Chamber of Commerce Wednesday was one of his first public engagements as a candidate. He has also hired Gabriela Domenzain, a sought-after operative and former director of Hispanic media for President Barack Obama's 2012 campaign.

O'Malley's also pointing to his tenure as Maryland governor from 2007 through early 2015, during which Maryland passed the DREAM Act, which granted in-state tuition to undocumented immigrants, as well as a law to provide driver's licenses to undocumented immigrants. His team also touts a big increase in contracts for Hispanic small businesses in Maryland.

In the afternoon Q&A on Wednesday, O'Malley pledged to scale down deportations and take more executive actions. When asked about foreign policy, he immediately began speaking about outreach to Latin America and the border crisis this summer.

"You definitely see a day-and-night contrast with Gov. O'Malley and Secretary Clinton … Hillary Clinton has a dismal record on the issue," said Cesar Vargas, co-director of the DREAM Action Coalition. "It's nice the Hillary is actually saying great words, but we're not going to fall for it."

Added Clarissa Martinez, deputy vice president at National Council of La Raza: "In O'Malley's case, his immigration record is not something that has taken shape as a result of his wanting to run for president … O'Malley has a stronger position among the Democrats. Because it's not just words. It's deeds."

And O'Malley is proudly pointing to that high-profile and heated back-and-forth last summer with the White House and its connection to Clinton. While Clinton backed the Obama administration's push to fast-track the deportation process, in order to try to stem the tide of unaccompanied Central American children along the U.S.-Mexico border, O'Malley pushed back.

"It is contrary to everything we stand for to try to summarily send children back to death," he said at the time, a statement that prompted a phone call from White House Domestic Policy Director Cecilia Muñoz and further criticism from the administration.

Some activists still bristle at Clinton's backing of the White House. And there are still wounds from the 2008 primary season in which Clinton famously was vague on several occasions about whether she supported driver's licenses for undocumented immigrants.

Clinton's campaign in April said she supports the policy, which quickly prompted a sharp retort from O'Malley — "I'm glad Secretary Clinton's come around to the right positions on these issues."

Asked during the interview on Wednesday whether Clinton has been late on immigration issues, O'Malley took a long pause. "I've never hesitated on these issues, even when some would say that it was politically risky," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders, meanwhile, hasn't been emphasizing immigration.

While immigration was featured prominently in O'Malley's announcement address last weekend, with a DREAM-er originally born in Panama as one of the opening speakers, Sanders was introduced by labor leaders, affordable housing advocates and campaign finance activists.

He didn't mention immigration in his speech, which had fourteen different policy sections and lasted about a half hour. The senator rarely talks about it on the stump; at a recent town hall in D.C., he said that while immigration was an important issue, it wasn't as central as the other issues he discusses far more.

"If people are going to get to know him, they need to get to know him on the basis on what he believes are the biggest issues facing our country," said top Sanders adviser Tad Devine — meaning campaign finance reform, income inequality and climate change. He noted also that Vermont has a relatively small immigrant population.

Martin O'Malley: Makes No Sense To Keep 11 Million In Shadow Economy // NBC News // Suzanne Gamboa – June 3, 2015

Attempting to further capitalize on his immigration record, 2016 Democratic hopeful Martin O'Malley on Wednesday promoted immigration reform as a way to improve wages for all Americans.

"How are you going to get wages to go up if you allow 11 million people to live in a shadow economy?" O'Malley asked at an event sponsored by the U.S. Hispanic Chamber of Commerce.

He further said immigration needs to be talked about as a national economic and security priority "not for this group or that group, but for us" as a country.

O'Malley committed to addressing immigration during his time in office if elected, but only would go so far as to say he hoped to make it happen within the first 100 days he is in the Oval Office.

Obama pledge in 2008 to take up a comprehensive immigration reform bill in his first year, an unkept promise that was used against the president in 2012.

Immigration was one of a range of issues O'Malley addressed in his first public event since declaring on Saturday that he is running for president.

In the almost one hourlong discussion, O'Malley also took subtle swipes at the Obama administration and was evasive in answering a question about what some see as a velvet gloved treatment of his chief rival Hillary Clinton in the campaign.

Asked if he was "Ready for Hillary," O'Malley said he and other candidates have reason for running and "now the public gets to decide."

Although the Obama administration often points to economic gains under Obama, O'Malley said "we need to get our economy functioning again."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He was most animated in discussing the Trans Pacific Partnership trade deal and "the secrecy with which it was thrust upon us." Obama has won fast track authority for the agreement, giving him the authority to negotiate it and holding Congress to only an up or down vote with no amendments or filibustering of the agreement.

O'Malley said the North American Free Trade Agreement between the U.S., Mexico and Canada led to dislocation and loss of jobs and devastation in Mexico and hurt small communities. A good trade deal "would level the playing field without diminishing our standards for labor and workers and our standards when it comes to the protection of the environment," he said.

Javier Palomarez, USHCC president, reminded O'Malley that his chamber supports the trade pact and asked him to agree that it contains protections for labor and the environment.

But O'Malley declined to go along, saying he'd let Palomarez know when he's had a chance to read the agreement.

"'When you have a secret deal and the only people who get to see it are the great captains of corporate America who have more cash than they've had in a long time . . . and now we are told 'trust us' on the secret agreement that we are not allowed to read as a people before our representatives have to fast track it, it's not the way our country is supposed to work," O'Malley said raising his voice.

The Republican Party issued a statement saying O'Malley's policies while he was governor of Maryland hurt families and small business.

The event was another example of the elevated struggle among the presidential campaigns to win the increasingly valuable Latino vote that voted 2-1 for Obama in 2012 and made up about 11 percent of people who went to the polls.

Next week, Hillary Clinton plans to be in Las Vegas and speak to the National Association of Elected and Appointed Officials conference, which she announced earlier Wednesday.

Martin O'Malley Wrongly Says That Wages Haven't Gotten Better For Americans // HuffPo // Brooks Jackson – June 3, 2015

Democratic presidential contender Martin O'Malley claims that "70 percent of us are earning the same or less than they were 12 years ago." That's not correct. Actually, weekly paychecks for rank-and-file workers are 6.6 percent higher than they were a dozen years ago, even after adjusting for inflation.

O'Malley was citing figures that don't reflect a spike in real wages and earnings that has taken place over the past year or so. Real hourly wages are up 2.3 percent since the end of 2013, and they have risen faster for rank-and-file workers than for supervisors. Real weekly earnings are up even more, thanks partly to a slightly longer average work week.

O'Malley, a former governor of Maryland, made the claim in his May 30 speech formally announcing that he is running for his party's nomination. And he repeated it the following day when he appeared on ABC's "This Week" with George Stephanopoulos.

An Outdated Source

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When we asked where O'Malley got his figure, a campaign spokeswoman told us it came from a report by the Economic Policy Institute, released June 4 last year. But the figures in that report are now badly out of date, and didn't quite back up what O'Malley said anyway.

The EPI found that between 2000 and 2013, real hourly wages of the lowest-earning 30 percent of workers did indeed fall, and those workers in the range between 30 percent and 40 percent saw no increase at all. But EPI's figures (see table 1 on page 11) show wages for all but the bottom 40 percent increased at least a bit. For those between the bottom 40 percent and the top 30 percent, the increase ranged from 0.1 percent to 0.2 percent annually. EPI characterized this group's wages as "essentially stagnant," and we would not disagree with that. But it's not the same thing as "earning the same," as O'Malley claimed.

In a more recent report, released Feb. 19, EPI found that real wages fell for nearly all groups between 2013 and 2014, rising only for the bottom 10 percent and those in the 40th percentile. (See Table 1.)

However, EPI's figures are based on year-to-year comparisons, and thus fail to reflect a remarkable and broad spike in real wages and earnings recorded in more recent, month-to-month figures published by the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics.

EPI's research and policy director, Josh Bivens, said this rise will be reflected in the group's next annual report. "It's true that real wages over the past 12 months have been pushed up a lot by falling oil prices, but, I think that's clearly a temporary phenomenon and those gains will be clawed back when oil prices rise in the future," Bivens told us. "But they have definitely provided a boost to purchasing power in the short-term, it's true."

As we've noted before, falling prices for gasoline and other fuels have actually pushed down the Consumer Price Index recently, which in turn has helped push up the purchasing power of the dollar.

A Spike in Real Wages and Earnings

Temporary or not, the gains have been substantial and broad. "Real" hourly wages, which the Bureau of Labor Statistics expresses in constant 1982-1984 dollars to adjust for inflation, have increased by 2.3 percent since December 2013, after a long period of stagnation or decline since the end of the Great Recession in 2009.

That figure is for all employees in the private workforce taken together. (Both the EPI and BLS wage and earnings figures cover only private sector employees, and exclude government workers.) BLS does not provide statistics broken down by wage level percentiles, as the EPI report did. But it's clear the recent gains were not concentrated at the top.

BLS does provide a breakdown for "production and nonsupervisory" employees, who make up 82 percent of all workers, and who are paid less on average than their bosses. Those rank-and-file workers have seen their real hourly wages go up 2.7 percent since the end of 2013, an even bigger increase than the average for all workers.

It's also worth noting that O'Malley used the word "earned," and weekly earnings have risen even faster than hourly wages recently. That's because workers are putting in slightly more hours than they did at the end of 2013. Since December 2013, weekly paychecks have gone up 2.9 percent for all workers, and 3.1 percent for rank-and-file workers.

We also looked at how real earnings — the measure O'Malley used — stacked up against those of "12 years ago" — the time period he specified. And it turns out that as of April, weekly paychecks for rank-and-file, nonsupervisory employees were 6.6 percent higher than they were in April 2003.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Malley on the Stump // NYT // June 3, 2015

Martin O'Malley, a Democratic presidential candidate, sought to seize on the immigration reform debate on Wednesday, pledging to take on the issue within the first 100 days of his administration.

Mr. O'Malley, a former Maryland governor, made the remarks at a United States Hispanic Chamber of Commerce event in Washington, where he was interviewed by the group's president, Javier Palomarez.

"Absolutely," he told Mr. Palomarez about addressing immigration as an immediate priority. He said that addressing immigration had been so difficult because politicians treated it like a niche issue affecting a specific voting bloc as opposed to a critical economic policy.

Mr. O'Malley also tried to remind people of his executive experience, a past-is-prelude approach he is certain to continue in an effort to stand out from Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Struggling in the polls, Mr. O'Malley is trying to get a toehold in the Democratic primary, in which Mrs. Clinton has a strong lead and Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont has gained early momentum.

Mr. O'Malley believes immigration provides him with that opportunity, and he has tried to highlight actions on the issue he took in Maryland, such as a law for in-state tuition for undocumented immigrants who came to the United States as children.

He has also tried to paint Mrs. Clinton, who has told immigrant rights advocates that she would go further than President Obama's executive actions halting some deportations, as new to the issue.

Separately, the "super PAC" supporting Mr. O'Malley, Generation Forward, began placing television ad buys for two Iowa media markets, to air Friday through Sunday, according to a person tracking the early ad spending.

Martin O'Malley Calls For More Restrictions on NSA Surveillance // TIME // Sam Frizell – June 3, 2015

Former Gov. Martin O'Malley said that recent reforms to the Patriot Act did not go far enough in curtailing the National Security Agency, arguing that the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance court should include a public advocate.

"The USA Freedom act was a step in the right direction, and I'm glad that it passed and the president signed it," said O'Malley, who is running for the Democratic nomination for president.

"I would like to see us go further in terms of a role for a public advocate in the FISA court," he continued. "As a lawyer myself and by training, I think our national security and our rights would be better served if we had a bigger role for a public advocate in the FISA court."

O'Malley's remarks at the U.S. Hispanic Chamber of Commerce on Wednesday afternoon marked the first time the two-term governor has laid out a notable policy position on mass surveillance since becoming a presidential candidate. He has thus far staked his candidacy on a progressive economic platform, including regulating Wall Street and pushing for immigration reform.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

President Obama signed into law on Tuesday sweeping legislation that dissolves the NSA's authority to monitor data on millions of Americans' phone calls, instead requiring that phone companies store the data themselves. If the government wants to access call data, it has to first acquire a court order with FISA.

Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul, who is running for the Republican nomination, has made reforming surveillance a central platform of his presidency. But O'Malley differed with Paul on how to do that.

Over the weekend in New Hampshire, O'Malley said he opposed Paul's move on Sunday to delay a vote on to extend the Patriot Act. Paul's delay ultimately led to the NSA surveillance authorities lapsing for nearly two full days, but paved the way for the USA Freedom Act to pass on Tuesday. "I think we could be less safe if we resort to obstructionism when it comes to something as important as protecting our homeland from the threat of terror attacks," he said, BuzzFeed news reported.

O'Malley super PAC to air early television ads in Iowa // WaPo // John Wagner – June 3, 2015

A super PAC supporting Democrat Martin O'Malley's presidential bid is preparing to air television ads in Iowa highlighting the former Maryland governor's willingness to stand up to Wall Street "bullies."

The $25,000 ad buy by the Generation Forward PAC is relatively modest, but it represents the first 2016 presidential advertising on television on the Democratic side in Iowa, the nation's first caucus state.

Ron Boehmer, a spokesman for the PAC, which is barred by law from coordinating with O'Malley's campaign, said it's possible more money could be put behind the ad, which he said will air on network affiliates around the state.

O'Malley, considered a long shot against Hillary Rodham Clinton for the Democratic nomination, announced his bid on Saturday.

The ad features footage from O'Malley's announcement speech at Federal Hill Park in Baltimore, where he noted that the chief executive of investment bank Goldman Sachs recently said he would be fine with either Clinton or Republican Jeb Bush as president.

"I bet he would," O'Malley told the crowd. "Well, I've got news for the bullies of Wall Street. The presidency is not a crown to be passed back and forth by you between two royal families."

Since then, O'Malley's aides have sought to highlight the comments of Fox Business Network correspondent Charles Gasparino, who reported this week that O'Malley is "public enemy No. 1" at Goldman Sachs. The super PAC's ad closes with that quote from Gasparino.

In recent months, O'Malley has laced his speeches with calls for tougher Wall Street regulations, an issue on which his advisers argue Clinton is weak because of past support from the financial sector.

On Wednesday, at a forum hosted by the U.S. Hispanic Chamber of Commerce, O'Malley was asked if he plans to take campaign contributions from Wall Street banks and their executives. He said he probably already had done so and plans to continue doing so.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"There's a lot of good people who work in our financial industry," O'Malley said, adding that many of them are also "saddened" by bad behavior by some of the big banks.

Wall Street Execs Take Aim at O'Malley Campaign Hypocrisy // Fox News // Charlie Gasparino – June 3, 2015

Wall Street executives are fighting back against Martin O'Malley, branding the former Maryland governor and 2016 Democratic presidential candidate a hypocrite for attacking the big banks after what they say is a largely unsuccessful attempt to collect fat-cat campaign contributions, the FOX Business Network has learned.

O'Malley, who announced Saturday that he is challenging former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton for the Democratic nomination, has made his opponent's ties to the big banks the center piece of his nascent campaign. But since at least the beginning of the year, O'Malley himself has eyed contributions from executives at several major Wall Street banks, according to people with direct knowledge of O'Malley's fundraising.

These people say in recent months, O'Malley met key officials from Morgan Stanley (MS), and, according to O'Malley campaign officials, he is looking for contributions from what he considers "reformed minded bankers" at other firms such as JP Morgan (JPM) and even Goldman Sachs (GS), whose chief executive Lloyd Blankfein was singled out by O'Malley in his announcement speech for having too much influence with Clinton.

It's unclear how much—if any money – O'Malley has or will receive from the big banks; both his political action committee and his campaign have until July 15 to file contribution disclosures. While governor of Maryland, O'Malley received $559,000 from people and entities labeled "securities, investments" and "commercial banks," according to disclosure forms.

Many Wall Street executives have branded O'Malley as "public enemy No. 1" for his recent spate of attacks on their influence on public policy. Some of those execs are now calling him a hypocrite for making class warfare and bank bashing a central theme of his campaign against Clinton after meeting with financiers.

"O'Malley has not been shy about meeting with the big banks for money," one senior Wall Street executive with direct knowledge of the matter said. "That doesn't mean he will be successful; in fact no one I know has given him anything."

Morgan Stanley, Goldman Sachs and JP Morgan had no comment.

"They can try to leak as many meaningless tidbits as they want, but Governor O'Malley has shown he will stand up to his own party to call for real structural and accountability reforms of Wall Street. His message is the same everywhere - Wall Street must be held accountable once and for all," O'Malley spokeswoman Halley Morris said in a statement.

An O'Malley campaign official speaking on a not for attribution basis added that a recent meeting between the candidate and Morgan Stanley Vice Chairman Tom Nides was a "political meeting," and was not with the sole purpose of benefiting the O'Malley campaign.

"Obviously [Nides is] a close confidante of the Clintons given his relationship with the Clintons," the source said. Nides served as deputy secretary of state under Clinton before he took the post at Morgan Stanley.

Two Candidates Go Head-to-Head

Clinton, the former Obama Secretary of State and first lady, has received millions of dollars in speaking fees from corporations, such as Goldman and is expected to raise millions of dollars from the finance industry given her close relationships with major player such as Blankfein and Larry Fink, the chief executive of money-management powerhouse BlackRock (BLK). Cheryl Mills, a key Clinton adviser and Clinton Foundation board member, is also a board member of Blackrock. Wall Street executives say Fink is interested in a cabinet spot – like Treasury Secretary -- in a Clinton Administration .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A Blackrock spokesman had no comment on the matter.

O'Malley ignited a firestorm among Clinton's vast army of Wall Street supporters on Saturday when he announced his candidacy by attacking her ties and those of Republican presidential front runner and former Florida Governor Jeb Bush to major players in the finance industry.

"Let's be honest, they were the ones who turned our economy upside-down in the first place. And they are the only ones who are benefiting from it," O'Malley said in his speech. "Goldman Sachs is one of the biggest repeat-offending investment banks in America. Recently, the CEO of Goldman Sachs let his employees know that he'd be just fine with either Bush or Clinton. Well, I've got news for the bullies of Wall Street --the presidency is not a crown to be passed back and forth by you between two royal families."

FBN has previously reported that the heads of the big Wall Street firms believe either a Clinton or Bush presidency would further their goals of weakening recent financial regulations such as Dodd Frank.

Clinton leads O'Malley by wide margins in recent polls, but her operatives are said to be worried about O'Malley's line of attack and that her relationships with Wall Street firms at the center of the 2008 financial collapse could have resonance particularly among progressive Democratic Party voters.

Sanders Calls for 'Political Revolution' // The Weekly Standard // Michael Warren – June 3, 2015

"Is Finland crazy? I want somebody to comment on that."

Bernie Sanders was speaking Wednesday morning in a basement classroom at Johns Hopkins University's Washington campus. The Vermont senator and Democratic presidential candidate had been asking the group of 50 or so to think about what sort of country they wanted to live in. During a short Q&A, a Finnish graduate student named Hans spoke up to ask about student loan debt. After some prodding by the senator, Hans revealed that not only did he pay no tuition for his studies but he was actually being paid by the government for living expenses. That sounded like the kind of country Sanders wanted to live in.

"Are people in Finland—a beautiful country—are they crazy about saying, as I understand it, that every young person in Finland should have the opportunity to go to college fully and invest in their young people?" Sanders said to the audience. "Well, raise your hands! And if they're not crazy, why isn't it happening in America? What are you doing about it?"

A student asked what young people can do to fix the problems of the country, and Sanders went into a stemwinder.

"If you are concerned about the future of this country, the patriotic thing to do, the thing to do in respect to the founding fathers of this country, those people who fought and died in Okinawa in World War II, and all the wars that we have fought, is to get involved. And I know it's not a cool thing to get involved. Get involved in politics? Hey, there's a party down the street. Let's get drunk. Let's get high. That's what being young and alive is about. Well, if you really want to be patriotic and you really want to be a hero, and you really want to show your concern a few miles away from here who have no opportunity whatsoever, you know what? Have some courage. Do what your friends are not doing," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If a Bernie Sanders campaign event sounds a bit like a lecture from your grandfather, that's because it kind of is—if your grandfather were an avowed socialist with a funny, sarcastic streak. He touted the social welfare paradises of places like Finland and Denmark, getting laughs from the crowd when joked that free education and health care were the awful consequences of "European socialism." It was a friendly crowd at Johns Hopkins, with questioners asking about paid maternity leave (he's for it), foreign policy (he was "one of the leaders of the opposition" to the Iraq war in 2003), and the federal minimum wage (it ought to be $15 an hour, he says). When one older man prefaced his question by saying it was an "honor" to be in his presence, Sanders interrupted him.

"No, no, no. Hold it, hold it, hold it," Sanders said. "That makes me nervous. It's not an honor to be in my presence. It's an honor to be in your presence. I'm just a person like you who happens to be a senator."

Sanders's socialism is less intellectual and more populist. "The major issue facing our country," he said, by way of introduction, "is the grotesque level of income and wealth inequality."

There's a moral element, too. "In my view, there is something profoundly wrong when the top one-tenth of one percent owns almost as much wealth as the bottom ninety percent. There is something profoundly wrong when ninety-nine percent of all new income generated in this country goes to the top one percent today," said Sanders. "Are you comfortable with that?"

For Sanders, the gross wealth inequality means the rich have not only corrupted our culture and society but our government and politics as well. We don't talk about these inequality issues, he said, because "the folks who essentially own the country would prefer us not to discuss" it. The Supreme Court's Citizens United decision, which removed limits on donations to outside political groups and which Sanders calls "one of the worst" in U.S. history, has opened the floodgates for moneyed interests in politics. In fact, Sanders said, he would consider support for overturning Citizens United as a "litmus test" for any Supreme Court nominees he would name as president.

Sanders excoriated the libertarian and Republican-friendly Koch brothers for their plans to spend nearly a billion dollars in the next election cycle on campaigns and advocacy. But left unmentioned was one of his rivals for the Democratic nomination, Hillary Clinton, who has and will continue to raise money from Wall Street, Hollywood, and other centers of money and influence. Sanders has been muted in directly criticized Clinton on wealth and inequality issues, instead opting for a more general argument, as he did Wednesday.

"What I've called for in this campaign is what I call a political revolution," he said. You have to go into your heart of hearts. I can't do that for you. And you gotta look around and say, you know, men and women fought and died to preserve American democracy. Are you content with where we are right now?"

Bernie Sanders Calls for More and Earlier Debates // NYT // Alan Rappeport – June 3, 2015

Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont is employing a new strategy that he hopes will help him stand out in the growing field of Democrats who are running for president: He's calling for more debates.

The Democratic National Committee has agreed to sanction six debates starting this fall. But on Wednesday, Mr. Sanders circulated a petition calling on the party to start the debates this summer.

Mr. Sanders has said that Democrats need more debates to cut through the noise of attack ads and sound bites. He has even suggested that Republicans could participate in early debates.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I'd like to have myself and other Democratic candidates on stage with some of the Republican candidates and let the American people hear from both sides on the big issues," Mr. Sanders said.

Leaders of both parties have been reluctant to allow too many debates out of concern that primary fights could become too bruising. And Fox News, sponsor of the Republican debates, has said that it will limit the number of candidates who can participate to prevent the debates from becoming too unwieldy.

For Mr. Sanders, considered a long-shot to beat Hillary Rodham Clinton for the Democratic nomination, more debates would be one way to gain access to a national audience without using up advertising funds.

"In the long haul of a presidential campaign, candidates like myself spend a lot of time traveling to states with early primaries speaking directly to voters," Mr. Sanders said. "But we can only be in so many places at once, and so the media ends up distilling these discussions down to sound bites for evening newscasts. Debates change that."

Former Gov. Martin O'Malley of Maryland announced his candidacy last week, and Lincoln Chafee, the former senator and governor from Rhode Island, is also expected to join the Democratic race on Wednesday.

Sanders slams Jeb Bush over Social Security remarks // The Hill // Rebecca Shabad – June 3, 2015

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) on Wednesday slammed former Gov. Jeb Bush's (R-Fla.) recent comments about raising the retirement age for Social Security.

Bush suggested the age to get Social Security should be raised from 65 to 68 to 70.

"At a time when more than half of the American people have less than $10,000 in savings, it would be a disaster to cut Social Security benefits by raising the retirement age," the Democratic presidential candidate replied in a statement.

"It is unacceptable to ask construction workers, truck drivers, nurses and other working-class Americans to work until they are 68 to 70 years old before qualifying for full Social Security benefits," added Sanders, who has pushed to expand Social Security benefits.

Bush called for a hike in the retirement age in an interview with CBS News's "Face the Nation."

"I think it needs to be phased in over an extended period of time," Bush said. "We need to look over the horizon and begin to phase in, over an extended period of time, going from 65 to 68 or 70. ... And that, by itself, will help sustain the retirement system for anybody under the age of 40."

Bush, who is exploring a presidential bid, also said he would be open to slashing benefits for wealthy people and their beneficiaries.

"I think it ought to be considered, for sure," Bush said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I have a hard time understanding what world Gov. Bush and his billionaire backers live in,” Sanders responded on Wednesday.

"Gov. Bush has made clear that he wants to protect Social Security for those who have earned it. And yet, reform it so it's still around for younger generations," Right to Rise PAC spokesman Matt Gorman told The Hill in response to Sanders's comments.

Right to Rise PAC is Bush's leadership political action committee.

Hillary Clinton, considered the Democratic front-runner for president, chastised Republicans in April for attempts to change Social Security.

“What do we do to make sure it is there? We don’t mess with it, and we do not pretend that it is a luxury — because it is not a luxury. It is a necessity for the majority of people who draw from Social Security,” she said during a stop in New Hampshire.

Clinton is expected to hold a kick-off rally in New York this month, about two months after officially jumping into the 2016 race. After that, she's expected to roll out more specific policy platforms.

GOP

Jeb Bush to announce presidential bid June 15 in Miami // Miami Herald // PATRICIA MAZZEI AND ALEX LEARY – June 4, 2015

Nearly six months after saying he was “actively” exploring the idea of running for president, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush will officially enter the race June 15 in Miami.

“Governor Bush is thankful for the support and encouragement he has received from so many Americans during the last several months and looks forward to announcing his decision,” spokeswoman Kristy Campbell told the Miami Herald and Tampa Bay Times.

Bush, 62, picked Miami Dade College, the largest institution of higher education in the country, as his announcement location in a nod to his passion for education policy and a campaign theme of expanding economic opportunities for people who, in his words, want to “rise up.” The college’s mission is to give every student who wants a college degree a chance to get one.

More information about the 3 p.m. event at the college’s Kendall campus is at jebannouncement.com .

The announcement will follow a weeklong trip for Bush to Europe that begins Monday, giving him a close look at foreign policy issues that have been a central focus of the presidential contest so far.

Despite having a famous last name and raising what is expected to be a breathtaking amount of money, Bush has struggled to break out of a growing pack of GOP contenders.

The group includes fellow Floridian Marco Rubio, who is pitching himself as a fresh face against “outdated” politicians, a line seemingly directed at Democrat Hillary Clinton but also at Bush, who was governor from 1999-2007.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rubio ignored conventional thought that he would stand down for Bush, a mentor, and jumped in the race April 13. In the weeks since, Rubio has gained momentum in the polls and attracted the support of wealthy backers.

Bush startled the political world on Dec. 16 when he announced on Facebook that he was “actively” considering a run for president. In recent months, he has been traveling the country extensively, giving speeches focused on improving educational and work opportunities for Americans.

But his all-but-official status has attracted growing criticism from campaign finance watchdogs, newspaper editorial boards and other candidates. It also has caused some clumsy moments.

On CBS News’ Face the Nation on Sunday, Bush said, “I would like to run,” as if something was holding him back. A while before that, in Nevada, he accidentally said he was running — then corrected himself.

The decision to wait so long has a major financial upside, as Bush has been free to work directly with the Right to Rise Super PAC, started by his allies, and raise unlimited money. Watchdogs have filed several complaints with the Federal Election Commission and the Justice Department.

Asked on Face the Nation whether he was violating the law, Bush said: “I would never do that.”

As a declared candidate, Bush’s interaction with the committee will be limited. People giving directly to his presidential campaign are tapped out at $2,700.

Still, the Super PAC has amassed tens of millions of dollars already, and its staff has become deeply familiar with Bush’s objectives. He could push some traditional functions of a campaign to the Super PAC, which will continue to raise large sums.

On Monday, Bush departs for Germany, Estonia and Poland, key U.S. allies. Bush likely will use the trip to draw a contrast to President Barack Obama, whom many Republicans see as weak on foreign policy. Poland has been pushing for the United States to get more involved in curbing Russia’s meddling in Ukraine.

Bush also will “discuss policies to promote growth, innovation and technologies to address the changing global economic environment and ways to foster prosperity on both sides of the Atlantic,” according to a Reuters story previewing the visit.

Back in Miami, the bilingual Bush will make his presidential announcement at a diverse college that boasts more than 165,000 students and has gotten used to hosting politicians. President George W. Bush delivered the Kendall campus commencement in 2007. He introduced his younger brother, who was in the audience, as always “mi hermano” — always my brother.

The Kendall campus is in the heart of Miami-Dade County’s largely Cuban-American suburbs. It’s the university’s second-oldest campus, built in 1967 on 185 acres of land and housing 13 buildings for a variety of academic programs ranging from architecture to business to science.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush made K-12 education central to his tenure in Tallahassee, and he has spent his years out of office pushing for higher standards — including the contentious Common Core — and expanded access to charter schools across the country.

Rubio chose to make his presidential announcement at a Miami Dade College institution with Cuban significance, too — downtown Miami's Freedom Tower. The iconic Biscayne Boulevard building is where Cuban exiles were first welcomed into the United States, beginning in 1964. Today, it houses the school's Museum of Art and Design.

For Bush, the choice strikes a far more populist tone than, say, the Biltmore Hotel in Coral Gables, where he plays golf regularly and has had his private business office for years.

His campaign headquarters also are in a decidedly unflashy part of town, a sturdy West Miami-Dade County office building near the working-class and largely Hispanic neighborhoods of Sweetwater and Fontainebleau.

After his announcement, Bush will embark on a tour of early primary states.

Jeb Bush, Taking His Time, Tests the Legal Definition of Candidate // NYT // Eric Lichtblau & Nick Corasaniti – June 3, 2015

Jeb Bush is under growing pressure to acknowledge what to some voters and a number of campaign finance lawyers seems obvious: He is running for president.

The lawyers say Mr. Bush, a former Florida governor, is stretching the limits of election law by crisscrossing the country, hiring a political team and raising tens of millions of dollars at fund-raisers, all without declaring — except once, by mistake — that he is a candidate.

Some election experts say Mr. Bush passed the legal threshold to be considered a candidate months ago, even if he has not formally acknowledged it. Federal law makes anyone who raises or spends $5,000 in an effort to become president a candidate and thus subject to the spending and disclosure restrictions. Some limited activities are allowed for candidates who are merely "testing the waters" for a run.

"When you look at the totality of the activities, could a reasonable person conclude anything other than that he is seeking the presidency?" asked Karl J. Sandstrom, a campaign finance lawyer who served on the Federal Election Commission.

For a candidate to avoid restrictions by simply not declaring his candidacy, he said, "makes a mockery of the law."

The issue is not one of mere semantics. If Mr. Bush did declare that he is running, it would bring a raft of election restrictions, including a limit of $2,700 on contributions, and a ban on "coordinating" with a "super PAC" he has used to raise money.

But much of campaign finance law is a subject of dispute, and defining who is a candidate is no exception.

David M. Mason, a former F.E.C. commissioner, said a 1981 case involving the possible presidential campaign of the former Florida governor Reubin Askew gives politicians wide latitude to take steps to "explore" a run.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“You can’t enforce the law based on what everybody ‘knows’ because that requires you to be a mind reader,” Mr. Mason said. “The broad impression — ‘oh yeah, he’s campaigning, he’s been in Iowa, he made a speech, then went to New Hampshire’ — is not enough to make him a candidate.”

Mr. Bush, who announced in December that he would “actively explore” a White House bid, has said repeatedly that he has not made a decision. But he has faced rising skepticism in recent weeks.

In an appearance Sunday on CBS’s “Face the Nation,” the host, Bob Schieffer, asked Mr. Bush bluntly whether he was violating the law by not declaring himself a candidate for the White House.

“No, of course not,” Mr. Bush responded, appearing jarred by the question. “I would never do that.”

Mr. Bush said he was “nearing the end of this journey of traveling and listening to people, garnering, trying to get a sense of whether my candidacy would be viable or not.”

He added, “We’re going to completely adhere to the law, for sure.”

Mr. Schieffer sounded incredulous. “Now you’re not telling me there’s a possibility you may not run?” he asked.

Mr. Bush did not waver. “Look, I hope I — I hope I run, to be honest with you,” he said. “I would like to run. But I haven’t made the decision.”

Last month, he slipped up for a moment, telling reporters in Nevada, “I am running for president in 2016.” He quickly corrected himself, adding “if I run.”

In his appearance at $25,000-a-head fund-raisers in Washington, New York and elsewhere, Mr. Bush and his advisers are using what are technically considered outside groups — two political action committees, both called Right to Rise — to take in the money, rather than creating an official campaign organization to do it.

Last week, two campaign watchdog groups, Democracy 21 and the Campaign Legal Center, called on the Justice Department to appoint a special counsel to investigate whether Mr. Bush had broken election law by evading restrictions on candidates.

The groups called his noncandidacy “a charade” and called on prosecutors to intervene because they said the F.E.C. — perpetually gridlocked — was unlikely to do anything.

The groups filed an earlier complaint with the F.E.C. in March charging that Mr. Bush and three other politicians — Martin O’Malley, a Democrat; and Scott Walker and Rick Santorum, both Republicans — were evading campaign finance restrictions by not declaring themselves candidates. (Mr. O’Malley and Mr. Santorum have each declared their candidacy in the past week.)

“You can say you haven’t decided,” said Trevor Potter, the president of the Campaign Legal Center. “But if you go off and look like a candidate and act like a candidate and amass funds, it doesn’t matter. You are a candidate in the eyes of the law.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As he travels through Iowa, New Hampshire, Michigan and other key states, Mr. Bush has certainly seemed like a candidate. He arrives in a black sport utility vehicle, talks about his vision for the country, shakes hands, answers questions and poses for photographs with voters until aides drag him to his next event.

"I really like campaigning," Mr. Bush told businessmen in Portsmouth, N.H., last month, before quickly adding, "I'm not a candidate."

By all accounts, Mr. Bush is enjoying what he calls the "journey" of a possible candidate, but he has made sure in most appearances to throw in the legal caveats.

"Let me be clear," he said Tuesday at an event in Orlando, Fla. "If I run, if I'm a candidate — and that decision is going to be coming real soon — my intention is to run on my record and my ideas and try to win the presidency. "

Amid the verbal jujitsu, reporters have begun to press Mr. Bush.

In Lansing, Mich., a reporter asked him, "How important is transparency in a presidential candidate?"

Smiling, Mr. Bush asked if it was a trick question. "Where are you going with it?" he asked.

The reporter then ticked off an account of Mr. Bush's recent visits and fund-raisers before asking, "Are you running for president?"

Chuckling, Mr. Bush said, "Not yet." He quickly took another question — this one on Senator Rand Paul, a declared Republican candidate.

The wait is making some voters anxious.

As Mr. Bush was leaving a Lincoln Day dinner in Bath Township, Mich., a woman wearing a photograph of the former governor around her neck chased him outside.

"Run, Jeb, run!" she chanted. "Run, Jeb run! We need you!"

Mr. Bush smiled and waved as he was driven away.

With some donors doubting Jeb Bush, Marco Rubio seizes an opening // WaPo // Matea Gold & Sean Sullivan – June 3, 2015

Marco Rubio is benefiting from pockets of discontent in Jeb Bush's sprawling money network, winning over donors who believe the 44-year-old freshman senator from Florida offers a more compelling persona and sharper generational contrast against Democratic front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Rubio is working to seize the moment by making an all-out push to lock down financial backers in the coming month — hopscotching the country in a nonstop series of fundraisers that are limiting his presence on the campaign trail.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While he faces stiff competition in the money race from Bush and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker in particular, Rubio's in-person courting sessions are starting to pay off. Longtime Bush loyalists and other big-money players on the right have emerged from the meetings raving about his abilities, according to people familiar with private gatherings he has had around the country.

"After meeting Marco and listening to him — he is almost astounding, he is so articulate and he has got such great vision," said Anthony Gioia, a top GOP fundraiser in Buffalo. Gioia raised more than $500,000 for George W. Bush and then served as his ambassador to Malta but is supporting Rubio this time. "I hate to overuse the word transformational, but I really feel he is," he said.

It is not just veteran bundlers coming aboard. Rubio has recently gained the backing of heavyweight players such as Oracle founder and billionaire Larry Ellison — who is hosting a campaign fundraiser in Silicon Valley next Tuesday — and Randy Kendrick, an influential Arizona donor and the wife of Arizona Diamondbacks owner Ken Kendrick, who hosted the senator at their Phoenix home last month.

"I'm looking for someone who is an inspiration," said Kendrick, who plans to work her network to bring other donors aboard.

It remains to be seen whether the passion for Rubio will translate into huge financial sums. He has the support of billionaire Miami auto dealer Norman Braman, who has committed to putting as much as $10 million into a pro-Rubio super PAC, but allies concede that their efforts are dwarfed by Bush's massive fundraising apparatus. The former Florida governor has been amassing a record tens of millions in his allied super PAC, in part by tapping into a national network of ambassadors and other senior appointees who served in the previous two Bush administrations.

The Rubio strategy: target less prominent donors and bring new ones into the fold.

"You've got the Bush family rolodex that is what, 50 years old or more," said J. Warren Tompkins, head of the pro-Rubio super PAC Conservative Solutions. "The rest of these guys are small donors. You have to go and grind it out and do a lot of meet-and-greets."

As a result, Rubio is spending less time than some other declared candidates in the early nominating states, making just one visit each to Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada since launching his campaign in April. Instead, his itinerary this spring includes stops in Oklahoma, Illinois, Texas, Florida, Idaho, New York, California and Pennsylvania, according to a person familiar with his schedule.

At every stop, the campaign is signing up new bundlers. And in some cases, Rubio has also made side appearances before clutches of potential super PAC donors.

His repeat visits to the nation's biggest money centers are helping him make inroads in places such as Texas, where Bush, Sen. Ted Cruz and former governor Rick Perry all have claims on state donors.

"You look at that and think, 'Gosh, how can anyone else break in?' " said George Seay, a Dallas-based investor who is supporting Rubio. "But Marco has been very successful in Texas and will continue to be. I think the more people get exposed to him realize he's not just a good background story — he's a very, very deep talent."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rubio is benefiting in part from a growing uncertainty among some top fundraisers about Bush's ability to resonate with the party base, particularly in the wake of his stumbling answers last month about the Iraq war and his brother, the 43rd president. A new Washington Post-ABC News poll this week showed that Bush, who led the GOP field for months, has slipped into a two-way tie for third place.

At a gathering of the Republican Governors Association's top donors last month in Dallas, one of the main topics of discussion was that Bush appeared less formidable a candidate than he had a few months ago, according to several participants.

"One consensus seemed to be that, 'Wow, Jeb is really raising lot of money, but he doesn't seem to be striking a chord with voters,' " said one well-connected Republican who participated in the meeting and requested anonymity to detail private conversations.

Bush "has not come on as strong as I would have thought," said Edwin Phelps, a private-equity investor who is a major GOP donor. "I'm disappointed in how he handled questions on something he knew would come up. Jeb hurt himself, but it's early enough in the cycle he can right the ship."

In the meantime, many donors are casting their support wide and giving to multiple contenders, still weighing who has the best shot in a general election.

"I don't have conviction right now toward any candidate," said Phelps, who has donated to Bush and plans to contribute to Rubio as well. "I think that's how a lot of us feel who are mainstream Republicans. There is a strong, deep-seated sentiment that we want someone who can get elected."

Rubio still faces skepticism in some donor quarters, however, particularly among those who are not eager for the party to field a first-term senator as its nominee.

He must also navigate his own policy and personal land mines. At her fundraiser last month, Kendrick said Rubio got some hard questions on immigration, a fraught issue for the Florida senator. He was a co-sponsor of a Senate immigration reform bill that provided a path to citizenship for up to 11 million illegal immigrants, but he later backed away from the legislation.

But Rubio acquitted himself well, Kendrick said.

"He's threading the needle on immigration, and he got several questions where he very honestly and skillfully answered those questions about the things that needed to be done first," she said.

Before she signed on to help Rubio, Kendrick said she "was open and interested" in all the candidates, adding: "I just felt that Rubio rose above the others in his depth and knowledge about policy."

Other veteran fundraisers described their conversion into Rubio supporters as more of a thunderbolt experience.

"I've been in politics a lot time, since Ronald Reagan, and he is really unique," Gioia said. "From my point of view, it's like the movie 'Jerry Maguire' — he got me on 'hello.' "

Why Jeb Bush Can't Bank On Faith Like His Brother Did // NPR // Don Gonyea – June 3, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Evangelical voters are a major force in Iowa Republican politics. A force that can tip the balance in the state's marquee event: the first-in-the-nation Iowa caucuses.

And it's been that way for a long time. Sixteen years ago those voters delivered in a big way for a Texas governor named George W. Bush. But it's not likely that the younger brother of that successful presidential hopeful will get that same kind of support in the 2016 election. Jeb Bush is certainly a deeply religious man — and he shares his brother's conservative views on key social issues. But despite that, many religious voters view the former Florida governor with suspicion.

Last month Jeb Bush visited Iowa's Loras College, a small, Catholic liberal arts school located in Dubuque.

It may have been an ideal place to talk about his faith in some detail, but the comments he did make came more as an afterthought at the end of his remarks.

"Gosh, what was it, twenty years ago I converted to Catholicism," Bush said, "It was one of the smartest things I've done in my whole life."

He spoke to a small audience of just over a hundred. Seated in the front row was his wife, Columba Bush, a lifelong Catholic whose religion he joined when he was in his 40s. Bush went on to say, "I believe that it is the architecture that gives me the serenity I need, not just as a public leader or in life. It gives me peace. It allows me to have a closer relationship with my creator."

It was a firm statement of belief. But it was considerably different than the almost evangelical way George W. Bush spoke about his faith during his first presidential campaign. At the Iowa Straw Poll in the summer of 1999, the future president was cheered when he said, "America's strongest foundation is not found in our wallets. It is found in our souls."

As a candidate, George W. Bush often talked about personal redemption. Including how at age 40 he quit drinking, and how he embraced religion with the help of none other than the Reverend Billy Graham. He often spoke of protecting the unborn, as he did in a debate during the 2000 general election campaign.

"I think what the next president ought to do is promote a culture of life in America," he said.

That played very well with Iowa evanglicals and Bush coasted to victory in the Iowa caucuses. But Christopher Budzisz, a political science professor at Loras College, says George Bush got those voters with more than words. He used organization as well.

"One thing the Bush campaign was very concerted about was reaching out to the church networks and getting advocates for the candidacy oftentimes outside the gaze of the media or public conversation," said Budzisz.

He says that's not happening in the same way for Jeb Bush.

Evangelical voters are more organized in Iowa than they were four presidential elections ago. And they make up 60 percent of GOP Iowa caucus participants.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Despite Jeb Bush's opposition to abortion — and same-sex marriage — many voters here see him as moderate. This reaction, from Republican voter Byron Carlson, a physician, is not unusual: "I would say I'm a Christian conservative, but I think at this time it's a wide open field with lots of options." After seeing this Bush speak recently, he added, "Jeb just wasn't that impressive to me listening to him."

Bob Vander Plaats, who heads the state's top social conservative organization The Family Leader, praised Bush's record in dealing with the Terri Schiavo case when he was governor of Florida. Bush fought the removal of the brain-damaged woman's feeding tube, even after she'd been unconscious for more than a decade. Still, Vander Plaats acknowledges ambivalence toward Bush. He points to Bush's saying he'd run a campaign to win the general election and not just the primaries.

"That may be code for, 'Do you really want to champion conservative values?'" Vander Plaats said.

And there's dislike of Jeb Bush's support for Common Core education standards and his call for a path to legal status for immigrants in the U.S. illegally.

This year's GOP field looks to be huge. It could grow to 15 or more. And many of them are making a hard play for evangelicals. Vander Plaats says that's good, and bad.

"And the reason it's bad is because it can divide its support quickly which really weakens the impact we can have in the process," he said.

That could create an opening for Jeb Bush. It would also please Republicans like 60-year-old Dave Richter who came to see the still officially-undeclared candidate at the town hall in Dubuque.

Richter says, "I'm a little afraid of the Christian right, it's infiltrated government to too big of a degree" adding "I think it's problematic."

But despite Richter's concerns, in Iowa those evangelical voters do matter, a great deal. Especially in the caucuses. Four elections ago, George W. Bush got them to pull together to give him an important first win in the race for the nomination. For Jeb, his best bet may be if they don't.

There will be blood: Prepare for nasty Jeb Bush — but don't expect any fingerprints // Salon // Jim Newell – June 3, 2015

When is Jeb Bush going to stop being so boring and get mean? This is the question on the minds of the political press corps. Sure, it's nice that he's open to any and all questions from reporters and voters alike, but does he have to answer them with his wishy-washy technocratic details? When's he going to start calling his opponents terrible names so reporters can sex up their Jeb stories a bit?

Everyone wants to see some blood. The hope, now that Bush is tumbling from presumed frontrunner status, is that he'll be forced to mix it up a little instead of responding to questions with, say, a critique of the wording in subclause 2(b)(ii) of some education bill from 1995. The further you tumble from contention, the more you have to resort to weird humiliating stunts to get attention in this field of dozens of candidates.

And there's no better place to start getting nasty than at Walt Disney World. Florida Gov. Rick Scott, a malevolent ghoul straight out of the German folk stories on which most classic Disney movies are based, held an economic summit yesterday at the sweltering Orlando money-suck where dreams come true. Bush, finally on some friendly turf, used the occasion “to more forcefully attack opponents” than he’s previously been willing to do, according to the Washington Post. ”Bush has mostly avoided sparring with Republican contenders,” the Post writes, “saying that he’s not yet an official candidate and is eager to be a ‘joyful’ alternative for voters upset by partisan warfare. But that strategy doesn’t appear to be working.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Alright, so give us the skinny: what did he say? Did he call Scott Walker a dingdong? Did he throw a trash can at Ted Cruz? Did he literally murder Mike Huckabee?

Ehh, not really. He made the bold decision — you’ll never believe this — to criticize Rand Paul on national security. He said that Paul was “wrong about the Patriot Act.” Bam! “He also delivered his most personal swipe yet at Rubio,” the Post writes, “in response to the senator’s suggestions earlier in the day that Republicans should elect younger leaders.” Okay, let’s see this uppercut: “It’s kind of hard to imagine that my good friend Marco would be critical of his good friend Jeb,” Bush said.

Oh. That’s it?

Yeah, so… I’m not quite sure that we saw the sharper, meaner, more aggressive and debased Jeb Bush that we were all promised here. Seems more like he simply said he disagreed with Rand Paul and made a light joke about the media’s obsession with getting him and Marco Rubio to prematurely destroy each other.

Bush’s refusal to engage in direct bloodsport against his opponents is no fun, sure, but if everyone can just wait a few months, it will happen. Jeb Bush may seem like a total boob now, but it’s never a good idea to get between a Bush and an election. As Jeb said yesterday, “there are motivations for every candidate. Mine would be to win.”

The Bushes are perfectly willing to set aside their WASPy sense of manners and do what it takes to win elections. George H.W. Bush, an old-school Connecticut Yankee, was willing to wear clownish cowboy clothes for a full two years if that’s what it took to beat Michael Dukakis. More importantly: he was willing to go hard after the Willie Horton issue — while leaving outside groups to run the infamously nasty ad, keeping his hands clean. George W. Bush, too, was able to win 2000 South Carolina primary when certain mysterious outside forces launched a guerrilla smear campaign against John McCain.

Now, thanks to our Supreme Court, campaign finance regulations are structured to allow candidacies to get as nasty as they so desire while offering the candidates themselves full deniability. Jeb Bush’s Right to Rise super PAC is expected to have at least $100 million dollars with which to work in trashing anyone who dare nip at Bush’s heels. Much like Mitt Romney in 2012, Bush can simply blush and say “Who, me?” when asked about some horrific ad that his super PAC unleashes Marco Rubio or Scott Walker.

Everyone can relax. “Jeb Bush,” in the amorphous sense of the whole apparatus that exists to win Jeb Bush the presidency, will get quite nasty at the precise moment that it becomes politically necessary, even if Jeb Bush personally just keeps prattling on about some tweak he wants to make to existing small business tax credits.

Fox News Poll: Bush, Walker, Carson top GOP pack, support for Clinton down // Fox News // Dana Blanton – June 3, 2015

National security is a much bigger issue for Republicans this time than during the last primary. And more GOP hopefuls make it official -- yet they barely move the needle. Bernie Sanders nearly doubles his numbers and support for Hillary Clinton dips -- even as Democrats say they’re not concerned about allegations of her dishonesty.

These are some of the findings from the latest Fox News poll on the 2016 presidential election.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There's no true frontrunner in the race for the GOP nomination - and not all the candidates in the poll have declared yet. The new poll, released Wednesday, finds three Republicans receiving double-digit backing from GOP primary voters: former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker each receive 12 percent and neurosurgeon Ben Carson gets 11 percent.

They are followed by Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul at 9 percent, Texas Sen. Ted Cruz at 8 percent, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio at 7 percent, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee at 6 percent and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie at 5 percent.

Former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, who will make his candidacy official Thursday, and businessman Donald Trump get 4 percent each.

Three Republicans officially threw their hat in the ring recently. South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham announced June 1, former New York Gov. George Pataki announced May 28 and former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum declared May 27. Each receives 2 percent.

Businesswoman Carly Fiorina and Ohio Gov. John Kasich also each garner 2 percent.

The top four favorites among the Tea Party movement are Walker (22 percent), Cruz (17 percent), Carson (12 percent) and Paul (11 percent).

It's no wonder the GOP race is so splintered. Of the candidates tested, about one in five Republican primary voters say they would "definitely" vote for six of them: Walker (22 percent), Carson (21 percent), Rubio (21 percent), Bush (20 percent), Cruz (19 percent) and Paul (19 percent).

More than half say they would "never" support Trump (59 percent). That's the highest number saying they would never vote for a particular candidate. Christie comes next (37 percent), followed by Bush and Huckabee (24 percent each) and Paul (20 percent).

Bush alone has the distinction of being in the top five of both the "definitely" and the "never" vote for lists.

Walker, who is still unannounced, looks especially well-positioned among GOP primary voters. Not only does he have the highest number saying they would "definitely" vote for him (22 percent), but he also has the lowest "never" vote for number of those tested (eight percent).

GOP voters are most likely to "want more info about" Kasich (60 percent), Fiorina (55 percent) and Walker (47 percent).

The priorities of Republican primary voters have changed significantly since last time around. Forty-six percent say economic issues will be most important in deciding their vote for the GOP nomination. That's down 30 percentage points from the 76 percent who said the same in 2011. And 36 percent now say national security will be their deciding issue -- more than four times the 8 percent that said so four years ago. For 12 percent, social issues will be most important, up from six percent.

On the Democratic side, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton remains the clear frontrunner for the nomination with 57 percent support among self-identified Democratic primary voters. Still, that's down from 63 percent last month, and marks only the second time in more than a year that support for Clinton is below 60 percent. Her highest support was 69 percent in April 2014.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At the same time, support for Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders nearly doubled, from six percent last month to 11 percent now. He was at 4 percent in April.

The most recent Democratic contender to jump in the race, former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, garners 4 percent. That's a nice bump from the less than one percent support he got before his May 30 announcement. Vice President Joe Biden (8 percent) and Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren (7 percent) -- both are undeclared -- still best O'Malley.

Despite Clinton controlling the field, most Democratic voters -- 69 percent -- say someone else could still win the nomination. That's more than twice the 28 percent who say the race is over.

Most Democratic primary voters, 68 percent, say they are not worried about allegations of Clinton's dishonesty and unethical behavior. Thirty-one percent are concerned, including 10 percent who feel "very concerned."

For the broader electorate, however, recent allegations against Clinton may be more problematic. A 61-percent majority of voters thinks it is at least somewhat likely that the Clintons were "selling influence to foreign contributors" who made donations to the Clinton Foundation while Hillary Clinton was secretary of state. A significant minority of Democrats (41 percent) feels that way, as do a majority of independents (66 percent) and most Republicans (82 percent).

Pollpourri Would you rather the next president be a Democrat or a Republican? The poll asks voters that simple question and finds ... a split! Forty percent prefer a Democrat and 39 percent a Republican. The results are also evenly divided among independents: 24 percent say Democrat, 24 percent Republican and 35 percent "other."

By a 51-39 percent margin, more voters say it would be "a bad thing for the country" if a Democrat wins the presidential election and continues President Obama's policies. That includes 88 percent of Republicans, 52 percent of independents and 20 percent of Democrats.

About the same number of voters says they would be "very" interested in watching a presidential debate between Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush (38 percent), as they would between Clinton and Fiorina, the other female candidate (35 percent), or between Clinton and Paul (35 percent).

And women are as likely to want to watch Clinton debate Bush (37 percent) as they are to want to see Clinton debate Fiorina (36 percent).

The Fox News poll is based on landline and cell phone interviews with 1,006 randomly chosen registered voters nationwide and was conducted under the joint direction of Anderson Robbins Research (D) and Shaw & Company Research (R) from May 31-June 2, 2015. The full poll has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus three percentage points. The margin of error is higher among the subgroups of Democratic and Republican primary voters (+/-5%).

Republican Conservative Base Shrinks // Gallup // Frank Newport –June 3, 2015

The percentage of Republicans and Republican-leaning independents who describe themselves as both social and economic conservatives has dropped to 42%, the lowest level Gallup has measured since 2005. The second-largest group of Republicans (24%) see themselves as moderate or liberal on both social and economic issues, while 20% of all Republicans are moderate or liberal on social issues but conservative on economic ones.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

These data are from Gallup's Values and Beliefs poll, which since 2001 has included questions asking Americans to rate themselves as conservative, moderate or liberal on social and economic issues. These trends show not only that Americans as a whole have become less likely to identify as social or economic conservatives, but also that Republicans' views are changing along the same lines.

This change in recent years has been significant. The percentage of Republicans identifying as conservative on both dimensions has dropped 15 percentage points since 2012, largely offset by an increase in the percentage who identify as moderate or liberal on both dimensions. Still, the current ideological positioning of Republicans is not unprecedented; the proportion of social and economic conservatives was as low or lower from 2001 through 2005.

Republicans' Ideology Varies Significantly by Age

The percentage of Republicans and Republican-leaning independents who are conservative on both social and economic issues rises steadily with age. An analysis of aggregated surveys conducted since the 2012 election shows that the size of the social and economic conservative group is twice as large among Republicans aged 65 and older as it is among those aged 18 to 29. This may be good news for GOP candidates who are running on a conservative platform and can assume that older Republicans will constitute a sizable portion of primary and caucus voters. But it would not be such good news when it comes to the challenge of energizing a broader base of Republican voters to come out to vote in the typically higher-turnout general election.

Implications

The recent shift in how Republicans view themselves ideologically may have significant implications for the coming GOP presidential nomination fight, particularly in terms of how the candidates will try to position themselves to maximize their appeal. Republican candidates are dealing with a party base that is today significantly more ideologically differentiated than it has been over the past decade. A GOP candidate positioning himself or herself as conservative on both social and economic issues theoretically will appeal to less than half of the broad base of rank-and-file party members. This opens the way for GOP candidates who may want to position themselves as more moderate on some issues, given that more than half of the party identifiers are moderate or liberal on social or economic dimensions.

The caveat in these campaign decisions is that not all Republicans are involved in the crucial early primary and caucus voting that helps winnow the pack of presidential candidates down to a winner. Ideology on both social and economic issues is strongly related to age, and primary voters tend to skew older than the overall party membership. This could benefit a more conservative candidate in the primary process, but that advantage could dissipate in the general election.

Democratic candidates will be dealing with party identifiers who are mostly moderate or liberal on social and economic issues, with a significant divide between these two groups. A forthcoming story will look at the Democratic ideological situation in detail.

Survey Methods

Results for the most recent Gallup poll are based on telephone interviews conducted May 6-10, 2015, with a random sample of 1,024 adults, aged 18 and older, living in all 50 U.S. states and the District of Columbia. For results based on the total sample of national adults, the margin of sampling error is ±4 percentage points at the 95% confidence level.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Results for the aggregated Gallup polls conducted in 2013-2015 are based on telephone interviews with a random sample of 3,587 adults, aged 18 and older. For results based on this sample, the margin of sampling error is ±2 percentage points at the 95% confidence level. All reported margins of sampling error include computed design effects for weighting.

Each sample of national adults includes a minimum quota of 50% cellphone respondents and 50% landline respondents, with additional minimum quotas by time zone within region. Landline and cellular telephone numbers are selected using random-digit-dial methods.

Rick Santorum Wants Pope Francis To Stop Talking About Climate Change // HuffPo // Ed Mazza – June 3, 2015

Republican presidential hopeful Rick Santorum says he loves Pope Francis, but he wants the pontiff to stop talking about climate change.

Santorum, a devout Catholic, told Philadelphia radio host Dom Giordano on Monday that the pope should "leave science to the scientists."

His comments come as the pope, who earned a master's degree in chemistry before turning to the priesthood, becomes increasingly vocal about climate change. Pope Francis is preparing a groundbreaking encyclical to be released in the coming weeks that's expected to make the case that taking action to fight climate change is a moral and religious imperative.

Santorum described himself as a "huge fan" of the pope and said he appreciates the pontiff's commitment to family issues, but he wants the church to stay out of science.

“The church has gotten it wrong a few times on science, and I think that we probably are better off leaving science to the scientists and focusing on what we're really good at, which is theology and morality,” Santorum said. "When we get involved with political and controversial scientific theories, I think the church is not as forceful and credible."

His full comments from "The Dom Giordano Show" are included below. The discussion of the pope starts at about the 10-minute mark.

Despite his pleas to the pope, Santorum has a history of rejecting established science. He denies that climate change is man-made and has dismissed global warming as a "hoax" despite the fact that 97 percent of actively publishing climate scientists agree that "climate-warming trends over the past century are very likely due to human activities," according to NASA.

Santorum has also rejected evolution and instead believes in "intelligent design,” according to Discover magazine.

Pope Francis says evolution does not contradict church doctrine.

George W. Bush tops Obama on favorability in new poll // The Hill // Mark Hensch – June 3, 2015

A new survey finds that more Americans view former President George W. Bush favorably than President Obama.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The CNN/ORC poll reveals that 52 percent of Americans see Bush positively, while 43 percent do not.

In contrast, U.S. voters are split on their views of Obama.

The new poll finds that 49 percent view Obama favorably, while 49 percent do not.

Those ratings for Obama are down from a similar poll in March. During that sampling, 52 percent of Americans viewed him positively, while another 46 percent did not.

Bush's numbers, meanwhile, mark a major shift for the former president since he departed office in early 2009, CNN said.

It noted that back then, Bush received a favorability rating from roughly one third of those surveyed.

Bush's favorability, CNN added, has remained below the 50-percent threshold most of the time since his presidency.

Just one year ago, it said, the former president had a 46-percent favorability rating. Another 51 percent, however, still viewed Bush unfavorably.

Bush's new score reflects more positive views of him across a wide variety of groups.

CNN said that the former president has notched an 11-point favorability increase among men, a 10-point increase among Republicans and an 8-point increase among suburbanites.

He also saw his favorability increase 10 points among those with household incomes under $50,000 and 9 points among young adults under age 50.

CNN said that Bush still remains the least popular among Democrats, liberals, non-whites and those under age 35.

Despite this, its poll found increasing warmth for the former president among some of those groups.

Approximately 70 percent of Democrats view Bush unfavorably, a decrease from February, 2009, when 85 percent took a negative view of him.

In addition, 68 percent of liberals still view the former president negatively, an improvement from the 90 percent who disliked his administration in February 2009.

CNN/ORC surveyed 1,025 adults from May 29-31 via telephone for its latest poll. It has a 3-percentage0point margin of error.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Texas' Economic Hiccup Complicates Rick Perry's 2016 Pitch // WSJ // Nathan Koppel & Colleen Mccain Nelson – June 3, 2015

In his previous bid for the White House, former Texas Gov. Rick Perry trumpeted his role as the leader of an economic juggernaut cranking out jobs while much of the U.S. struggled.

But as Mr. Perry prepares to announce an anticipated second run for president on Thursday, the "Texas Miracle" is looking less impressive amid falling oil prices that have led to thousands of job cuts in his home state. That has created an opening for challengers to say Mr. Perry's jobs record was attributable more to good timing—namely the hydraulic-fracturing oil-and-gas boom—than to the business-friendly mix of low tax rates and light regulations that he has frequently cited.

Texas lost more than 25,000 jobs in March according to state figures, its first monthly net decline in more than four years, after adding nearly 458,000 jobs in 2014, more than any other state. It bounced back in April but still only added 1,200 new jobs, far below other large states.

Mr. Perry is still talking up his economic record as he tours the country, but he is also seeking to broaden his appeal by citing his agricultural roots as a native of tiny Paint Creek and his military service as a former Air Force transport pilot.

The 65-year-old Republican is also arguing that he is the most seasoned executive in the crowded GOP field, having been governor of the nation's second most populous state for a record 14 years.

"I have faced my share of leadership tests," Mr. Perry told a crowd last month at the Southern Republican Leadership Conference in Oklahoma City. He added that "there was no manual" to guide him when he faced such challenges as housing Hurricane Katrina evacuees in Texas, or responding to the nation's first diagnosed case of Ebola in Dallas.

Mr. Perry's allies and advisers say his fiscal conservatism and the jobs created under his tenure would be a huge selling point in a second presidential campaign.

"The Rick Perry jobs record has seeped into the mind-set of Republican activists all over the country and will be a significant calling card," said Ray Sullivan, a former Perry chief of staff and co-chairman of a super PAC created to boost a Perry presidential bid.

Abby McCloskey, policy director for Mr. Perry's political-action committee, said it was remarkable that Texas has a 4.2% unemployment rate even with an oil and gas industry downturn and a surging dollar.

"Texas, contrary to popular image, is not all about oil," she said.

As governor, Mr. Perry launched a campaign aimed at luring companies to relocate to Texas, traveling the country and pitching the state as the best in which to do business. He also endorsed the wide use of state incentive payments to technology and health-care companies, among others. The Texas legislature this year curtailed the use of such incentive payments.

Economic experts said Mr. Perry can lay claim to having helped diversify the Texas economy, which is projected by economists and state officials to continue to grow, albeit at a slower pace.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Perry can still make the point that he oversaw tremendous growth and diversification of the economy,” said Terry Clower, a professor at George Mason University in Virginia who has studied the Texas economy.

Still, falling oil prices have shaken Texas’ claim on economic supremacy. Kevin Hassett, the director of economic-policy studies at the American Enterprise Institute think tank, said Texas’ economic success was indisputable a year ago—when oil prices were higher.

Today, “the story is a little more complicated,” said Mr. Hassett, who advised the presidential campaigns of Mitt Romney and John McCainbut hasn't signed on to work for a 2016 candidate.

In an interview shortly before leaving office in January, Mr. Perry said he had done everything possible to insulate the state against falling oil prices. “We made tremendous progress in expanding and diversifying the Texas economy,” he said.

The changing economic picture is just one challenge Mr. Perry faces as he attempts to rebound from his unsuccessful first presidential bid nearly four years ago. He continues to be weighed down by a felony indictment related to a veto he issued as governor. He has denied wrongdoing and filed a motion to dismiss the indictment, which is pending before an appellate court in Austin.

The former governor also is in the single digits in a field expected to include more than a dozen Republicans, and he is working to overcome any lingering negative impressions by primary voters. The last time around, after briefly claiming front-runner status, he stumbled with a couple of debate answers and ultimately dropped out.

Mr. Perry, who has conceded he was ill-prepared in his last race, has underscored the preparation he has undertaken the second time around, immersing himself in the intricacies of policy. As Mr. Perry said in a recent radio interview, “just being the governor of the state of Texas was not enough.”

Brandon Rottinghaus, a political-science professor at the University of Houston, believes Mr. Perry can likely counter any attacks on his economic record. But other challenges, like the indictment and the famous “oops” moment during a debate in his earlier campaign, may be tougher to overcome, he said.

“The one-two strike of the indictment and communication failures of the 2012 race will make it hard for him to get his footing” Mr. Rottinghaus said.

Scott Walker Says 2016 Announcement Coming After Budget Wrap at End of June // Ali Elkin – June 3, 2015

Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker said Wednesday he will announce whether or not he plans to run for president after the state budget is passed, which he says will happen in short order.

“I haven't made an announcement yet and won't until after the budget's done at the end of this month,” the Republican said, appearing on Fox News's Fox and Friends.

Walker had wanted to finish the budget process in record-early time, but that goal now appears to be out of reach, the Milwaukee Journal-Sentinel reported Tuesday.

“We do have a lot of stuff that we need to get ironed out,” said Wisconsin state Senate Majority Leader Scott Fitzgerald. Sticking points–including among some legislators of Walker's own party—are funding for roads and a new basketball arena, according to the newspaper.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The current budget expires June 30. “Past legislatures and governors have sometimes even gone past the July 1 deadline. That forces the state government to run on the provisions of the old budget until the new one passes,” the newspaper said.

Wisconsin Abortion Ban Would Allow Father To Sue For Emotional Distress // HuffPo // Laura Bassett – June 3, 2015

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R) said this week that he would sign a ban on abortions after 20 weeks of pregnancy that does not contain exceptions for rape and incest victims, if the bill reaches his desk. The measure also contains a less-discussed provision that would allow the father to sue the doctor for "emotional and psychological distress" if he disagrees with the abortion, regardless of his relationship with the woman having the procedure.

Wisconsin Assembly Bill 237 would ban abortions after 20 weeks "postfertilization," which doctors would measure as 22 weeks of pregnancy since pregnancies are usually measured from the woman's last menstrual period. If the bill becomes law, doctors who perform an abortion after this time could be charged with a felony and fined up to $10,000, or face up to three and a half years in prison.

In addition to those penalties, the bill would allow the father to sue the doctor for damages, "including damages for personal injury and emotional and psychological distress," if the doctor performs or attempts to perform an abortion after the 20-week limit. The man does not need to be married to the woman or even in a relationship with her to sue her doctor, as long as the pregnancy is not a result of sexual assault or incest. The bill also says the woman can sue.

Walker and the co-authors of the bill, state Rep. Jesse Kremer (R) and Senate President Mary Lazich (R), did not respond to requests for comment. The Wisconsin House and Senate are expected to vote on the bill next week.

According to the Guttmacher Institute, a research organization that supports reproductive rights, 6 of the 11 states that currently ban abortion at 20 weeks postfertilization -- Alabama, Arkansas, Idaho, Kansas, Nebraska and Oklahoma -- have similar language tucked into their respective laws that allow the parents to sue a doctor who performs an abortion after that point. In Kansas, the provision applies to the father only if he is married to the woman who had the abortion.

So far, the 20-week ban is not standing up well in court. The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals struck down Idaho's law last week, ruling it "unconstitutional because it categorically bans some abortions before viability." The Supreme Court decided in Roe v. Wade in 1973 that states cannot ban abortions before the fetus would be viable outside the womb, which is estimated to occur between 22 and 24 weeks of pregnancy.

Republican supporters of the bill argue that abortions should be banned after 20 weeks because fetuses can feel pain at that point -- a theory that has been refuted by the mainstream medical community.

"Whether you're pro-life or not, that's a good time to say that shouldn't be legal after a time when an unborn child can literally feel pain," Walker told reporters this week.

Opponents of the bill point out that less than 1 percent of abortions occur after 20 weeks, and the women who seek them have often discovered severe medical problemswith the fetus that were not clear in earlier tests. Marcy Stech, a spokeswoman for the progressive women's PAC EMILY's List, said the Wisconsin bill is "extreme, outrageous and profoundly wrong."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"A woman's right to choose is hers and hers alone," Stech said. "Scott Walker is the last person on earth who should be telling women how to make their deeply personal decisions."

Scott Walker dead set against path to citizenship but has no answer for what to do with 11 million undocumented residents // Tampa Bay Times // Alex Leary – June 3, 2015

Scott Walker said he adamantly opposes a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants, but was vague in an interview with the Tampa Bay Times about what should be done with the 11 million people already in the U.S.

"My belief is that because the system is so broken, we need to do the other things I mention before we can even begin to start talking about what the president and the next congress can do," Walker said, referring to his call for more border security and enforcement of existing law.

"Until we deal with those other issues, any potential solution is largely irrelevant."

Walker's comments continued an uneven response to the vexing issue of immigration since he emerged as a presidential hopeful. The Wisconsin governor once supported a path to citizenship, but earlier this year veered to the right, then backed off a bit.

The shifting positions have left many wonder what exactly does he think should be done.

"I said I was opposed to the Gang of 8, so I never said I supported that," Walker said in an interview Tuesday afternoon at the Disney hotel where Gov. Rick Scott held his presidential forum. In 2013, Sen. Marco Rubio and seven other senators worked out a comprehensive bill, which would have added billions in more security spending while providing an eventual pathway to citizenship. (Rubio has famously backed away from his own legislation but still supports citizenship.)

Walker said his new view has been shaped by President Obama's executive actions and by taking with border-state governors and voters across the country.

"Certainly we're a nation of immigrants," he said. "There's a number of things that have to be done, starting with securing the border, enforcing the laws that are on the books. I've made it clear that I don't support amnesty for citizenship.

But you're not ready to say what should happen to the 11 million, whether they should eventually given some legal status, which is kind of Jeb Bush position, or citizenship, which is what the Rubio bill would have granted?

"It's left up to the next president and congress," Walker replied.

"Specifically when it comes to citizenship, I don't believe there should be any amnesty regardless of the circumstances. There is a current process by which anyone in the world can seek citizenship and that's the path people should use."

He said depending on what is done with security and other reforms, "Things and circumstances will changes, conditions will be different depending on how effectively we do (those first steps)."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In April, Walker went farther than other Republican hopefuls when he suggested legal immigration should be scaled back. That brought condemnations from immigration activists and some Republicans, who are worried the fight for the presidential nomination is putting the party back in a nativist mode that hurt "self-deport" Mitt Romney. (Allies say his remarks were misinterpreted and he just wants to control flow as workers are needed or not.)

"I've only said that legal immigration should be focused on American workers, their wages, as the top priority," Walker said.

Bush, appearing at the same forum on Tuesday, said immigration reform needs to be tackled, "for crying out loud," to grow the economy. Walker disagrees, though his argument overlooks Bush's point that the labor pool is getting older and more workers will be needed.

"There's too high a number of American – both citizens and legal residents --- who are not in the workforce today who could and should be," Walker said. "Before we start talking about anything else we need to figure out ways to make sure that everyone who is here who is able to work is getting the skills and the education, the qualifications and the encouragement to get into the workforce."

Rand Paul calls out Jeb Bush for defending NSA // Politico // Katie Glueck – June 3, 2015

Rand Paul is slamming Jeb Bush over the former Florida governor's defense of National Security Agency data collection, the latest round in the Kentucky senator's battles with his own party on the issue.

"Just like he was confused for weeks about his position on the Iraq war, Gov. Bush appears completely unaware of the facts about the government's illegal and unnecessary spying [on] the American people and made it clear his position is based on politics, not policy and the Constitution," Paul spokesman Sergio Gor said in a statement on Wednesday, jabbing a likely 2016 rival over Bush's previous equivocating about whether he would have invaded Iraq given the intelligence available now.

The Paul presidential campaign's pushback follows an interview Bush gave to Fox News a day earlier, when Bush said that most of the criticism of the NSA stems from Democrats. His comments come after a heated debate in Congress over the reauthorization of the PATRIOT Act, during which Paul raised strenuous objections about data collection allowed under the law.

"While Rand Paul and a few others have expressed concerns about civil liberties — and I respect that although I don't see any shred of evidence that anybody's civil liberties are being violated — the great preponderance of people that want to overturn the Patriot Act are on the left," Bush said on Fox, when asked whether there was a divide between the "Rand Paul wing and pretty much everyone else." Bush continued, "And we need to … give people some room in the Democratic Party to be strong supporters of defending the homeland again. I think we need to restore a bipartisan consensus on this. The great majority of Republicans are supportive of the NSA."

On Tuesday, Congress passed the USA Freedom Act, which sought to balance security measures with more privacy protections. Paul, who did not vote for the measure, has spent the better part of a week tearing into bulk data collection and forced the expiration of elements of the PATRIOT Act, a move that played well with his libertarian-leaning base but sparked outrage from more hawkish corners of his party.

Gor's statement, an effort to fire back at that GOP criticism, referenced a bad week for Bush last month, when it took him days to say he wouldn't have gone to war in Iraq given today's knowledge of intelligence failures in the lead-up to the war.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When Rand Paul steps in it // Politico // MANU RAJU – June 4, 2015

The 2016 contender says he's no programmed pol. But straight talk can be a dangerous thing

After Rand Paul said GOP defense hawks had "created" ISIS, he told Sean Hannity: "I think I could have stated it better." When he claimed some of his adversaries were "secretly" hoping for a terrorist attack so they could blame him for shutting down the PATRIOT Act, the next day he admitted that "hyperbole" got the better of him "in the heat of battle."

And when Paul quipped that he was "glad" his train didn't stop in Baltimore in the wake of riots there, he later offered "regret" that his comments were "misinterpreted."

As Paul has sought to stand out from the clustered GOP presidential field, he's finding that his freewheeling, off-the-cuff speaking style can cut both ways. His supporters say it's what's refreshing about him: He's not a typical programmed pol who spews the same talking points over and over; there's an authenticity that's rare in today's poll-driven politics, they say. But his critics say it betrays a lack of discipline that should concern Republicans in a general election — when any rhetorical blunder can trigger a media circus lasting days — let alone in the White House.

In an interview, Paul spurned advice he often receives to "say the same thing over and over again," even as he acknowledged his comments are "not always perfect."

"People have to choose what they want," he told POLITICO this week. "If they want robots, who say the same thing over and over again, there are plenty of them. If they want something more genuine, where everything is not always perfect — we'll see what people want. I am who I am."

The 52-year-old ophthalmologist may seem like a political neophyte, given that his 2010 Senate victory was his first foray into elective politics. But he has spent a good portion of his life around the spotlight, learning the political ropes from his father, former Rep. Ron Paul, whose brand of libertarianism set him apart from much of his party.

And, like his father, he has methodically worked to portray himself as a different type of candidate, including speaking to an array of different audiences and not shying away from the press. It's in stark contrast to other candidates who fear unscripted moments and adopt a more disciplined approach to the media when running for higher office.

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, for one, has not participated in a formal sit-down interview and has sharply limited press availability since announcing her presidential run in April. Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.), who was known for his willingness to engage with reporters in the Capitol, is now limiting — if not avoiding — interactions with Hill media. Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) takes questions from reporters and often gives long-winded answers, but he rarely deviates from the precise point he's trying to make.

Paul said Clinton's press avoidance strategy may have spared her some bad headlines in the short term, but he asserted it's backfired on her lately. "She's had a bad month. I think I like my month better than her month," he said.

Of course, Paul isn't the front-runner for his party's nomination, so he has a lot more to gain than Clinton does by mixing it up with the press.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the past month, Paul became the scourge of his caucus for his defiant stand against the PATRIOT Act, forcing a two-day lapse in the law by refusing to allow a temporary extension to pass. As GOP hawks slammed the libertarian-minded Paul over his view that the anti-terrorism law invaded privacy rights, the Kentucky Republican took to the floor in a rare Sunday night session and made a rather incendiary claim.

“People here in town think I’m making a huge mistake,” Paul said. “Some of them, I think, secretly want there to be an attack on the United States so they can blame it on me.”

A day later, Paul was walking it back. “I think hyperbole can sometimes get the better of us,” he told reporters outside the Capitol.

Last week, Paul was on MSNBC’s “Morning Joe” when he was asked about Sen. Lindsey Graham’s position that a more restrained foreign policy empowered Islamic State militants.

“ISIS exists and grew stronger because of the hawks in our party who gave arms indiscriminately and most of those arms were snatched up by ISIS,” Paul said. “These hawks also wanted to bomb [Syrian leader Bashar] Assad, which would have made ISIS’ job even easier. They created these people.”

After an uproar, Paul was confronted about the comments on Hannity’s Fox News show. “Ultimately, I think I could have stated it better,” Paul said. “The ultimate people who are responsible for terrorism are obviously the terrorists.”

In the POLITICO interview, Paul said the backlash was an instance of him saying something “1,000 times” and then changing his wording once, prompting criticism. He said he should have also pinned blame on Clinton and President Barack Obama for backing policies that created ISIS. But he stood by the essence of his remarks that Republican hawks are culprits, as well.

“The comments I said about ISIS, I’ve said 1,000 times,” Paul said. “I used one different word — which is probably not the correct word — the ‘created’ word. I probably should have said, ‘enabled’ or ‘make worse.’ And all things I’ve said, a million times, and I still believe that.”

Such comments have already given fodder to Paul’s foes.

“I think it really shows how little understanding he has on both the conflict and the challenges and the threat it presents to the security of the United States,” said Arizona Sen. John McCain, a leading GOP hawk who backs Graham (R-S.C.) for president.

Unlike some candidates who tend to hew closer to their scripts, Paul, at times, grows weary of giving the same defense of a policy position. So he is prone to veer off topic and offer a new argument publicly. Doing that, however, has its risks. His advisers have tried to impress upon Paul the need to hash out his line of thinking privately before speaking publicly about it for the first time.

For instance, when he said on Fox Business Network in 2013, “I don’t care” if a drone were to kill a man robbing a liquor store, it seemed incongruent with his 13-hour filibuster the month earlier against U.S. policies on unmanned drones. And after contending in February during a testy CNBC interview there were cases of vaccinations causing “mental disorders” in some children, he later stressed he believes all kids should be inoculated, even tweeting a picture of himself getting a booster shot.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Paul's supporters believe voters will cut some slack to a candidate who's unafraid to speak his mind.

"It's a two-edged sword, yet his greatest strength," said Brian Darling, a former senior aide to Paul. "It's a risk at times when comments get him in trouble. But it's a huge upside in the sense that people know he's a genuine guy."

Darling added: "Rand Paul may be the new 'Straight-talk Express' from the Senate," a riff on McCain's 2008 presidential campaign slogan.

While Paul comes across as a no-nonsense senator, he occasionally likes to flash his sense of humor. Yet, his timing can sometimes fall flat, as it did when he quipped on Laura Ingraham's radio program about moving quickly through Baltimore amid riots there in April. "I'm glad the train didn't stop," he said.

The remark undercut his long-running effort to reach out to communities of color, and Paul and his team moved quickly to contain the fallout.

Missteps aside, Jesse Benton, a longtime political adviser to Paul who is married to the senator's niece, said the senator has improved vastly as a communicator during his short time in public office.

"I think he's a master at it, but even a master is not always perfect," said Benton, who now runs Paul's super PAC. "Sometimes, he makes news in a way that is not exactly in the way he wants it. However, the vast majority of the news he makes is extremely positive for him."

Scott Walker: Women Mostly Worry About Rape Pregnancies 'In The Initial Months' // Talking Points Memos // Ahiza Garcia – June 3, 2015

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R) said Monday that he'd be willing to sign a 20-week abortion ban without exceptions for rape or incest, adding that women were mostly concerned about those issues "in the initial months" of pregnancy, television station WKOW reported.

"I mean, I think for most people who are concerned about that, it's in the initial months where they're most concerned about it," Walker said of pregnancies caused by rape and incest.

"In this case, again, it's an unborn life, it's an unborn child and that's why we feel strongly about it," Walker said. "I'm prepared to sign it either way that they send it to us."

On Tuesday, a public hearing on the bill featured testimony from women who have had abortions and medical experts. While the Wisconsin State Assembly and Senate are expected to vote on the bill soon, none is scheduled.

Walker, a potential 2016 Republican presidential candidate, made news last week when he said ultrasounds were "pretty cool" while discussing Wisconsin's mandatory ultrasounds for women seeking abortions.

Rand Paul: GOP Isn't Entirely Responsible For Creating ISIS // HuffPo // Sam Levine – June 3, 2015

Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) backtracked on his recent comments that hawkish Republicans were responsible for creating the Islamic State group, also known as ISIS.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Last week, Paul said the Islamic State "exists and grows stronger" because of Republican hawks who were too eager to arm Syrian rebels. Pressed on those comments by Fox News Host Sean Hannity on Monday, Paul took some of the blame off Republicans.

"I think ultimately I could have maybe stated it a little bit better," said Paul, who is seeking the Republican nomination for president. "The ultimate people who are responsible for terrorism are obviously the terrorists. So ISIS is responsible for the mayhem, the murders, the brutality, the beheadings, that's ISIS."

Paul linked the rise of ISIS to the policies of President Barack Obama, but stopped short of saying his party was not responsible at all.

"This was the policy of President Obama, it was the policy of Hillary Clinton and it was also the policy of some in my party who wanted to arm the Islamic rebels," he said. "And I warned at the time that the great irony is that you arm these people, one day we'll have to go back and fight against these weapons ourselves."

Paul, who is seeking the Republican nomination for president, faced criticism from conservatives for the comments.

"Rand Paul does not belong in the Republican party when he carries that message," Rep. Peter King (R-N.Y.) told MSNBC's Andrea Mitchell last week. "You can have honest differences over what should be done in Iraq, what should be done in Syria, but to say that it was Republicans or Republican policies or Lindsey Graham or John McCain, that caused the growth of ISIS. That's totally untrue ... For him to so misread ISIS to me shows that he's totally unqualified to be commander-in-chief."

On Monday, Paul said the rise of ISIS was an "unintended consequence" of arming Syrian rebels.

"I would say that we can have a valid discussion over whether or not ISIS has grown stronger by pouring arms into the Islamic rebels in the Syrian civil war," Paul said. "It is objective truth that ISIS grew stronger the more weapons that went into the Syrian civil war. So I think it was an unintended consequence that ISIS grew stronger because of weaponizing these Islamic rebels in Syria."

'I use them, they use me': Local politicians profit from presidential hopefuls in early-voting states // LA Times // Seema Mehta – June 3, 2015

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker entered a fundraiser in a cavernous barn here on a recent sunny Saturday afternoon to the flashes of cellphone cameras and throngs of people seeking a handshake and a selfie.

The front-runner in Iowa among those seeking the GOP nomination was the guest of honor, but he wasn't raising money for a White House bid. The haul would go to Chad Airhart, the recorder for Dallas County in central Iowa.

"Thanks for letting us come by and join with you; thanks for your leadership," Walker told Airhart, as the recorder's supporters dined on bratwurst and baked beans, surrounded by hanging cow hides and saddles. "I'm honored to be here today."

In much of the nation, a top presidential prospect wouldn't bother showing up to raise money for a local official who handles paperwork for a county of 66,000 people.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But in Iowa, local politicians are showered in love for one important reason: They are gate-keepers to voters and party activists who will provide access to their networks and commit time to White House candidates hoping to make a splash in the state that holds the first presidential nominating contest.

“I don’t know if spoiled is the right word,” said Airhart, who has endorsed Walker, even though the governor has not formally announced his candidacy. “I would say we’re blessed in Iowa to have this opportunity.”

Republican Rep. David Young, a freshman Iowa congressman, was blunter.

“I use them, they use me,” Young said.

This year, he has raised thousands of dollars for his reelection campaign at a dessert reception headlined by former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, a pizza parlor fundraiser with former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, and a gathering at a farm-themed restaurant with Walker. In turn, the prospective candidates got to meet hundreds of Young’s supporters.

Republican Rep. David Young, a freshman Iowa congressman, was blunter.

“I use them, they use me,” Young said.

This year, he has raised thousands of dollars for his reelection campaign at a dessert reception headlined by former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, a pizza parlor fundraiser with former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, and a gathering at a farm-themed restaurant with Walker. In turn, the prospective candidates got to meet hundreds of Young’s supporters.

“It’s mutually understood and it’s accepted,” Young said. “It’s all OK because we’re unique here in Iowa because we’re first in the nation.”

In the lead-up to the 2012 Iowa caucuses, candidates like eventual GOP nominee Mitt Romney announced dozens of new supporters who ranged from statehouse leaders to the mayor of De Soto, a town of 1,050 people. Courting of local leaders also happens in the other early-voting states of New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada.

Another way White House hopefuls curry favor is through political action committees. Bush’s Right to Rise leadership PAC, for example, has announced contributions of more than $240,000 since being formed in January. Candidates and parties in the four early states have received one-third of the amount.

California, which is unlikely to play a role in the nominating contest because of its late primary date, has Republican candidates swarming the state raising money, but they rarely hold public events or court small-town mayors.

“We are fortunate! Put as many exclamation points after that as possible,” said Jeff Kaufmann, chairman of the Iowa GOP. “I can’t express how fortunate Iowa is to be a carve-out state … but with that comes some pretty significant responsibility.”

Airhart, a 7th-generation Iowan, grew up poor; his parents were teenagers when he was born, and his father spent time in jail. He said his upbringing on the East Side of Des Moines never suggested he would become an elected official who mingles with presidential candidates.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It’s mutually understood and it’s accepted,” Young said. “It’s all OK because we’re unique here in Iowa because we’re first in the nation.”

In the lead-up to the 2012 Iowa caucuses, candidates like eventual GOP nominee Mitt Romney announced dozens of new supporters who ranged from statehouse leaders to the mayor of De Soto, a town of 1,050 people. Courting of local leaders also happens in the other early-voting states of New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada.

Another way White House hopefuls curry favor is through political action committees. Bush’s Right to Rise leadership PAC, for example, has announced contributions of more than $240,000 since being formed in January. Candidates and parties in the four early states have received one-third of the amount.

California, which is unlikely to play a role in the nominating contest because of its late primary date, has Republican candidates swarming the state raising money, but they rarely hold public events or court small-town mayors.

“We are fortunate! Put as many exclamation points after that as possible,” said Jeff Kaufmann, chairman of the Iowa GOP. “I can’t express how fortunate Iowa is to be a carve-out state … but with that comes some pretty significant responsibility.”

Airhart, a 7th-generation Iowan, grew up poor; his parents were teenagers when he was born, and his father spent time in jail. He said his upbringing on the East Side of Des Moines never suggested he would become an elected official who mingles with presidential candidates.

“We’re really fortunate. We have an opportunity to meet all the candidates, to go through the vetting process and hopefully pick the next president of the United States, whether you’re a Republican or a Democrat,” Airhart said shortly after Walker spoke at the annual “Blue Jean Bash” fundraiser. “We have that opportunity in Iowa that really no one else in the country has.”

Democrats aren’t as aggressive this cycle in wooing Iowa’s politicians because their field of candidates is less competitive than the Republicans’.

There is a long tradition of the state’s most influential politicians staging events that attract national candidates. Former Democratic Sen. Tom Harkin’s annual steak fry, which ran for 37 years and ended in 2014, was one that presidential hopefuls didn’t dare pass up.

Republican Gov. Terry Branstad started holding an annual birthday fundraiser during his first term in the 1980s. The parties — including cupcakes decorated with images of the governor’s trademark mustache — are must-stops for White House candidates.

olitical observers say the practice is getting increasingly common among lower-profile politicians, like Young and fellow first-term Rep. Rod Blum, neither of whom has endorsed in the 2016 contest.

“It is a fascinating way for a first-term freshman member of Congress to get in front of a bunch of people who might not show up at any campaign event they might hold on their own,” said Craig Robinson, publisher of the influential Iowa Republican blog.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Robinson said it was unclear whether neophyte politicians such as Young or Blum would emerge as “kingmakers.” “This is kind of new territory,” he said.

Blum has held events with nearly every 2016 GOP presidential prospect.

“For a freshman congressman like myself, obviously the crowds that a presidential candidate attracts are good-size crowds for me. It lets me dive into the crowds, and I’m reconnecting with supporters and also meeting new people,” he said. “Sometimes if it works out, we have a private event before or after the public event; we try to raise some money.”

Such courtships are not without risks. Bush, Perry, former Hewlett-Packard chief Carly Fiorina and businessman Donald Trump have faced questions about their support of Rep. Frank Guinta of New Hampshire, who is embroiled in a fundraising scandal that has prompted fellow Republicans to call for his resignation.

And sometimes, the courting crosses the line. Former Iowa state legislator Kent Sorenson pleaded guilty in a pay-to-play scheme in federal court last year, admitting that he accepted $73,000 from then-Rep. Ron Paul’s 2012 presidential campaign after dropping his endorsement of then-Rep. Michele Bachmann in favor of Paul shortly before the caucuses.

But for the most part, the relationships are positive, and Iowa’s leaders sometimes marvel at the experience.

Kaufmann recalled the 2008 nominating contest, when he was a state lawmaker and Tennessee Sen. Fred Thompson — better known for being a “Law and Order” star — came for a visit. Thompson wanted to campaign in Kaufmann’s home county.

“We walked up and down the streets of Tipton and talked to business owners I’ve known all my life,” Kaufmann said. “Here I am, little old me, in Tipton, Iowa, and I get to go around and introduce Fred Thompson. It was neat for me.... It enhances a local legislator’s image.”

TOP NEWS

DOMESTIC

Inequality a Major Issue for Americans, Times/CBS Poll Finds // NYT // Noam Scheiber & Dalia Sussman – June 3, 2015

The poll found that a strong majority say that wealth should be more evenly divided and that it is a problem that should be addressed urgently. Nearly six in 10 Americans said government should do more to reduce the gap between the rich and the poor, but they split sharply along partisan lines. Only one-third of Republicans supported a more active government role, versus eight in 10 of Democrats.

These findings help explain the populist appeals from politicians of both parties, but particularly Democrats, who are seeking to capitalize on the sense among Americans that the fruits of the economic recovery are benefiting only a handful at the very top.

Far from a strictly partisan issue, inequality looms large in the minds of almost half of Republicans and two-thirds of independents, suggesting that it will outlive the presidential primary contests and become a central theme in next year's general election campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"There is a small group of people in our country who own or control a vast majority of the wealth," Stephanie Alteneder, 28, a high school teacher from Los Angeles, said in a follow-up interview. "There are a lot of systems set up so that the people who have money get to make more of it."

The percentage of Americans who say everyone has a fair chance to get ahead in today's economy has fallen 17 percentage points since early 2014. Six in 10 Americans now say that only a few people at the top have an opportunity to advance.

The nationwide telephone poll, conducted on landlines and cellphones May 28-31 with 1,022 adults, has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus three percentage points.

The survey touched on several issues relating to the economy and the workplace, showing that four in five Americans support requiring employers to offer paid parental leave, and even more support paid sick leave. A majority also favors requiring chain stores and fast-food restaurants to inform workers of scheduling changes two weeks in advance or to compensate them with additional pay if they fail to do so.

Seven in 10 Americans support an increase in the federal minimum wage to $10.10 from $7.25 an hour, although Republicans are about evenly divided on the question.

Americans were also skeptical of free trade. Nearly two-thirds favored some form of trade restrictions, and more than half opposed giving the president authority to negotiate trade agreements that Congress could only vote up or down without amending, a White House priority.

Still, it was Americans' views on the distribution of money and opportunity in the country that were most striking. More than half of higher-income Americans said that money and wealth should be more evenly distributed. Across party lines, Americans said the chance to get ahead was mainly a luxury for those at the top.

"People have to get a high school education and they have to go to college as well, and then they go out there and can only get a low-paying job," said Betty Burgess, 70, a retired textile worker from Lincolnton, N.C.

Almost three-quarters of respondents say they believe that large corporations have too much influence in the country, about double the amount that said the same of unions. However, a majority of Americans said that workers who did not want to join a union at their workplace should be able to opt out of paying union fees, even as they benefit from the union's protection and bargaining efforts. Unions generally oppose these so-called right-to-work measures.

The phenomenon of public frustration about inequality rising several years into a recovery is not unprecedented. According to data that Leslie McCall, a professor at Northwestern University, has culled from the General Social Survey, a biennual survey by the National Opinion Research Center at the University of Chicago, some measures of concern about inequality rose steadily after the 1990-91 recession and did not peak until 1996, after which they fell for several years.

The source of the resentment, Professor McCall said, was that "people think the returns to economic growth should be going to people like them as much as they should be going to people at the top."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The poll also included a variety of intriguing findings about what Americans think should be done to reduce inequality.

Six in 10 Americans opposed requiring fast-food chains and other employers of hourly workers to raise wages to at least $15 an hour, the aim of a two-and-a-half year nationwide campaign led in part by a major union. (On Tuesday, Francis Slay, the mayor of St. Louis, threw his weight behind an effort to gradually raise the minimum wage there to $15 an hour by 2020, following similar moves in Los Angeles, San Francisco and Seattle in recent years.)

When asked about the other end of the income spectrum, two-thirds of Americans favored raising taxes on people with annual salaries exceeding $1 million. By a 50-45 margin, they favored capping the income of top executives at large corporations, a measure that more than one-third of Republicans supported as well.

Inequality Troubles Americans Across Party Lines, Times/CBS Poll Finds // NYT // Noam Scheiber & Dalia Sussman – June 3, 2015

Americans are broadly concerned about inequality of wealth and income despite an economy that has improved by most measures, a sentiment that is already driving the 2016 presidential contest, according to a New York Times/CBS News poll.

The poll found that a strong majority say that wealth should be more evenly divided and that it is a problem that should be addressed urgently. Nearly six in 10 Americans said government should do more to reduce the gap between the rich and the poor, but they split sharply along partisan lines. Only one-third of Republicans supported a more active government role, versus eight in 10 of Democrats.

These findings help explain the populist appeals from politicians of both parties, but particularly Democrats, who are seeking to capitalize on the sense among Americans that the economic recovery is benefiting only a handful at the very top.

Far from a strictly partisan issue, inequality looms large in the minds of almost half of Republicans and two-thirds of independents, suggesting that it will outlive the presidential primary contests and become a central theme in next year's general election campaign.

"There is a small group of people in our country who own or control a vast majority of the wealth," Stephanie Alteneder, 28, a Democrat and a high school teacher from Los Angeles, said in a follow-up interview. "There are a lot of systems set up so that the people who have money get to make more of it."

The percentage of Americans who say everyone has a fair chance to get ahead in today's economy has fallen 17 percentage points since early 2014. Six in 10 Americans now say that only a few people at the top have an opportunity to advance.

The nationwide telephone poll, conducted on landlines and cellphones May 28-31 with 1,022 adults, has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus three percentage points.

The survey touched on several issues relating to the economy and the workplace, showing that four in five Americans support requiring employers to offer paid parental leave, and even more support paid sick leave. A majority also favors requiring chain stores and fast-food restaurants to inform workers of scheduling changes two weeks in advance or to compensate them with additional pay if they fail to do so.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Seven in 10 Americans support an increase in the federal minimum wage to $10.10 from $7.25 an hour, although Republicans are about evenly divided on the question.

Americans were also skeptical of free trade. Nearly two-thirds favored some form of trade restrictions, and more than half opposed giving the president authority to negotiate trade agreements that Congress could only vote up or down without amending, a White House priority.

Still, it was Americans' views on the distribution of money and opportunity in the country that were most striking. More than half of higher-income Americans said that money and wealth should be more evenly distributed. Across party lines, most Americans said the chance to get ahead was mainly a luxury for those at the top.

Still, it was Americans' views on the distribution of money and opportunity in the country that were most striking. More than half of higher-income Americans said that money and wealth should be more evenly distributed. Across party lines, most Americans said the chance to get ahead was mainly a luxury for those at the top.

"People have to get a high school education and they have to go to college as well, and then they go out there and can only get a low-paying job," said Betty Burgess, 70, a retired textile worker from Lincolnton, N.C., who is a Republican.

Almost three-quarters of respondents say that large corporations have too much influence in the country, about double the amount that said the same of unions. However, a majority of Americans said that workers who did not want to join a union at their workplace should be able to opt out of paying union fees, even as they benefit from the union's protection and bargaining efforts. Unions generally oppose these right-to-work measures.

The phenomenon of public frustration about inequality rising several years into a recovery is not unprecedented. According to data that Leslie McCall, a professor at Northwestern University, has culled from the General Social Survey, a biennial survey by the National Opinion Research Center at the University of Chicago, some measures of concern about inequality rose steadily after the 1990-91 recession and did not peak until 1996, after which they fell for several years.

The source of the resentment, Professor McCall said, was that "people think the returns to economic growth should be going to people like them as much as they should be going to people at the top."

The poll also included a variety of intriguing findings about what Americans think should be done to reduce inequality.

Six in 10 Americans opposed requiring fast-food chains and other employers of hourly workers to raise wages to at least $15 an hour, the aim of a two-and-a-half year nationwide campaign led in part by a major union. (On Tuesday, Francis Slay, the mayor of St. Louis, threw his weight behind an effort to gradually raise the minimum wage there to $15 an hour by 2020, following similar moves in Los Angeles, San Francisco and Seattle in recent years.)

When asked about the other end of the income spectrum, two-thirds of Americans favored raising taxes on people with annual salaries exceeding $1 million. By 50 to 45 percent, they favored capping the income of top executives at large corporations, a measure that more than one-third of Republicans supported as well.

Working dads make more money than working moms in every state // WaPo // Danielle Paquette – June 3, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By now, after two zany Amy Schumer skits crashed this economic research Web site, you may have realized America's gender wage gap is more of a maternal wage gap.

Women, on average, make about 78 cents for every dollar paid to men. But at the start of their careers, the difference is much smaller. Consider millennial ladies, the slowest generation to have babies in U.S. history: They bag about93 cents for every guy-earned dollar.

That average falls dismally, however, when kids enter the work-life balance. American mothers who work full-time earn 30 cents less than working fathers, according to an analysis by the National Women's Law Center released today.

"Stereotypes about mothers and fathers contribute to this disparity," the researchers wrote. "Mothers are recommended for significantly lower starting salaries, perceived as less competent, and are less likely to be recommended for hire than non-mothers."

Beyond the obvious financial blow to families -- poverty touches half of kids living with single mothers, for example -- the psychological impact of receiving less pay for equal work can be devastating. Expectant mothers, anticipating judgment amid an otherwise joyful time, sometimes hide their bellies for as long as possible -- or plunge into overdrive at work to combat the stereotype, often at the expense of their health.

Working moms make less than working dads in every state, according to the National Women's Law Center analysis. The maternal wage gap is smallest in Washington, D.C., where mothers typically make ten cents less than fathers, and highest Louisiana, where the difference is a whopping 42 cents.

In seven states, dads make more than $20,000 annually than moms: Alaska ($21,000), Utah ($21,000), Wyoming ($22,000), Massachusetts ($23,000), Louisiana ($23,000), Connecticut ($25,000) and New Jersey ($25,000).

Republican Senators Will Sponsor A Bill To Protect Pregnant Workers For The First Time Ever // Think Progress // Bryce Covert – June 3, 2015

On Thursday, Sen. Bob Casey (D-PA) will reintroduce the Pregnant Workers Fairness Act (PWFA), a bill aimed at helping pregnant employees stay safely on the job. For the first time ever, however, it will get Republican sponsorship from Sens. Kelly Ayotte (NH) and Dean Heller (NV), a Congressional staffer told ThinkProgress.

The PWFA requires employers to offer their pregnant workers small changes so that they can keep working safely unless they can prove it would impose undue hardship on their businesses. Those accommodations could include switching from heavy lifting to light duty, more frequent bathroom breaks, or simply a stool to sit on.

Today, two-thirds of first-time mothers work during their pregnancies, 80 percent of whom stay until their last month. Yet an estimated quarter million women are denied these changes every year, while even more say they don't ask because they're afraid of risking their jobs. Some women have ended up miscarrying, while others have been forced onto unpaid leave or fired when they asked for and were denied an accommodation. The Supreme Court recently sided with Peggy Young, a former UPS employee who was put on unpaid leave instead of being given light duty during her pregnancy.

The Republican support comes after the PWFA was included in a vote-o-rama of budget amendments in March and got unanimous support. The bill has been introduced as its own piece of legislation multiple times in past years but only had Democratic sponsorship and didn't advance.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Meanwhile, states have advanced their own versions of the bill: 14 and Washington, D.C. require employers to give pregnant employees reasonable accommodations.

House GOP votes to block administration on immigration // AP // Erica Werner – June 3, 2015

House Republicans have voted to block the Obama administration from spending any money against a lawsuit over the president's immigration policies.

The 222-204 vote Wednesday came on an amendment by leading immigration hardliner Rep. Steve King of Iowa to a spending bill for the Commerce and Justice Departments.

House Republicans spent weeks earlier this year trying to overturn President Barack Obama's executive actions from last fall that granted work permits and stays of deportation to millions of immigrants living in this country illegally.

The House efforts were unsuccessful, but Republicans have claimed success anyway, noting that the policies have been put on hold by a federal judge in a lawsuit by a group of states seeking to overturn the actions.

INTERNATIONAL

ISIS Making Political Gains // NYT // Anne Barnard & Tim Arango – June 3, 2015

Days after seizing the Syrian desert city of Palmyra, Islamic State militants blew up a notorious prison there, long used by the Syrian government to detain and torture political prisoners.

The demolition was part of the extremist group's strategy to position itself as the champion of Sunni Muslims who feel besieged by the Shiite-backed governments in Syria and Iraq.

The Islamic State, also known as ISIS or ISIL, has managed to advance in the face of American-led airstrikes by employing a mix of persuasion and violence. That has allowed it to present itself as the sole guardian of Sunni interests in a vast territory cutting across Iraq and Syria.

Ideologically unified, the Islamic State is emerging as a social and political movement in many Sunni areas, filling a void in the absence of solid national identity and security. At the same time, it responds brutally to any other Sunni group, militant or civilian, that poses a challenge to its supremacy.

That dual strategy, purporting to represent Sunni interests and attacking any group that vies to play the same role, has allowed it to grow in the face of withering airstrikes.

While the Obama administration has focused on confronting the Islamic State militarily, experts say the group's recent victories point to the need for a political component in the strategy to counter the group — even after nearly 4,000 airstrikes by the American-led coalition and what United States officials say are the deaths of 10,000 ISIS militants.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“They are hijacking legitimate demands,” Ibrahim Hamidi, a journalist and political analyst from the restive Syrian province of Idlib, said of the Islamic State. He has long argued that without more forceful international action against the Syrian president, Bashar al-Assad, and a political program to empower Sunnis, support for the extremists will grow.

“This is part of what makes them so dangerous,” he said. “Defeating them needs a comprehensive approach.”

Sunnis form an aggrieved majority in Syria, where repression of a mostly Sunni uprising by Mr. Assad’s government, backed by Shiite-led Iran, exploded into war. And they are an aggrieved minority in Iraq, where Shiites are more numerous, after years of sectarian violence between Sunni and Shiite militias.

But little has been done to give Sunnis a greater role in their own governance. Mr. Assad remains in power, backed by Iran and the militant group Hezbollah. And American officials are fighting an uphill battle to persuade Sunnis in Iraq to fight ISIS alongside the Shiite-led central government and Iranian-backed militias.

That, Mr. Hamidi and other analysts said, has left some Sunnis willing to tolerate the Islamic State in areas where they lack another defender, especially in conservative communities like the ones in western Iraq and eastern Syria, where the group is strongest. The analysts emphasized that most Sunnis do not support the Islamic State’s harsh interpretation of Islam, or its brutality, but that some were becoming more susceptible to its political talk about protecting oppressed Sunnis.

“Now, with the sectarian polarization of the region, under the skin of every single Sunni there is a tiny Daesh,” Mr. Hamidi, a Sunni, said, using the Arabic acronym for the Islamic State.

By attacking ISIS in Syria while doing nothing to stop Mr. Assad from bombing Sunni areas that have rebelled, he added, the United States-led campaign was driving some Syrians into the Islamic State camp. “The coalition is scratching the skin and making this Daesh come out.”

A slang word has even emerged, aid workers in Palestinian refugee camps in Lebanon say, for someone who supports ISIS just a little bit. Some people say, with a hint of sheepishness, “I’m a Dawoosh,” using an Arabic diminutive that suggests “a cute little Daesh.”

In Iraq, the Islamic State has largely engulfed a pre-existing Sunni insurgency. It has deeper roots there, having grown out of Al Qaeda in Iraq, that sprang from resistance to United States after the 2003 invasion.

In 2006, Iraq became embroiled in civil war, with Sunni and Shiite militias carrying out sectarian attacks on civilians. Now, some of those Shiite militias are among the most effective forces on the ground after the partial collapse of the Iraqi Army. But there have been reports of revenge killings by the militias, and some Sunnis trust them so little that they prefer the Islamic State.

The situation in Syria is similar in some ways, with Mr. Assad relying on support from Iran and Iranian-backed militias. But the Islamic State faces greater challenges winning popular support in Syria, where its Iraqi leadership is viewed as foreign and where there remains a significant collection of Sunni insurgent groups opposed to both the Islamic State and the government.

Washington is trying to recruit some of those rival groups to be trained and equipped as a front-line force against the Islamic State in Syria. But the program is small, with only 90 fighters in the first round of training, and recruiting is a challenge, since most Syrian insurgents place the highest priority on fighting the Assad government.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Also arrayed against the Islamic State in Syria are many hard-line Islamist groups, including the Qaeda-affiliated Nusra Front. They can match the Islamic State in espousing Sunni sectarian views, condemning minority sects, and reject its claim to represent Sunnis, calling them instead “khawarej,” a term from Islamic history signifying divisive outsiders.

The Islamic State has made more inroads in areas where either it or the government has stamped out alternative insurgent forces. That was the case in Palmyra, the first city the group took directly from government forces, which had crushed a rebellion there in 2012.

One resident of Palmyra who opposes both the Islamic State and the government said it was trying to persuade townspeople to view it as a liberator.

“For the last seven years, they have been winning hearts and minds in Iraq,” he said, using only a nickname, Dahham, for safety reasons. “This is the same approach they are using in Palmyra, and nobody stood against them.”

Rami Jarrah, an antigovernment activist who also opposes ISIS, said the group scored a victory by destroying the prison. The site has powerful resonance across the spectrum of opponents of Mr. Assad, from secular communists to Sunni Islamists accused of taking part in a Muslim Brotherhood insurgency that was crushed in the 1980s.

Syrians who lost loved ones to abuses by the governments of Mr. Assad and his father, Hafez al-Assad, may now feel that while global powers ignored their pleas for help, “justice has been met at the hands of extremist militants,” Mr. Jarrah wrote on Facebook.

With the recent gains by the Islamic State, Washington is tinkering with tactics and weapons. Anti-tank missiles are on their way to Iraq, to destroy American tanks that the group took from fleeing Iraqi soldiers.

But United States military support has its limits, given the Iraqi Army’s weakness, which in turn reflects the divisions that have made Iraqi national unity elusive.

“ISIS can only really be defeated by the Sunnis in Iraq,” said Emma Sky, a Briton who was a political adviser to the American military in Iraq. That is what happened in 2006, when the American military established the Awakening program, paying Sunni tribes to switch sides and fight Al Qaeda in Iraq and the greater Sunni insurgency.

The United States, unable to act unilaterally as it did in 2006, is now pushing the Iraqi government to arm Sunni tribes to fight the Islamic State, but little has happened in the face of objections by harder-line Shiite leaders. There is also a reluctance among Sunnis to fight ISIS, because many do not see being governed by Baghdad as something worth fighting for.

“We need assurances that those who are fighting against Daesh will have rights and be treated like Iraqis,” said Osama Nujaifi, a vice president of Iraq and a Sunni.

Some Iraqi Sunnis, having seen what ultimately happened with the Awakening, take a once bitten, twice shy approach now. Envisioned as a long-term effort to empower the Sunni community, the Awakening collapsed because the Shiite-led Iraqi government never fulfilled promises of full- time jobs to the Awakening fighters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sheikh Wissam al-Hardan, a Sunni from Anbar Province who is loyal to the government, said that Sunni fighters still on the payroll of what remains of the Awakening groups had not been paid in 15 months.

“There is no reconciliation between the government and the Sunnis,” he said. “The government considers them as if they are all ISIS.”

Cuba officially off U.S. terror blacklist // CNN // Kevin Liptak – June 3, 2015

The United States officially removed Cuba from its list of countries that sponsor terrorism on Friday, setting the two nations up for a full renewal of diplomatic ties.

President Barack Obama originally announced in April that he was recommending that Cuba be removed from the terror blacklist after a State Department review. Friday marked the expiration of a 45-day period when Congress could have blocked the move.

"The rescission of Cuba's designation as a State Sponsor of Terrorism reflects our assessment that Cuba meets the statutory criteria," the State Department said in a statement Friday.

The statement noted that the U.S. "has significant concerns and disagreements with a wide range of Cuba's policies and actions" but said these fall outside the criteria related to rescinding a state sponsor of terror designation.

Cuba was originally placed on the terror list in 1982 when the U.S. government accused the Fidel Castro regime of sponsoring communist groups in Latin American and Africa. But independent analysts have for years cast doubt on the country's current terror ties, and the State Department said its association with certain groups had "become more distant."

Three other countries are currently named as state sponsors of terror: Iran, Sudan and Syria.

The terror listing was one of the final barriers to restoring diplomatic relations between the United States and Cuba. Obama announced in December that he was ending a nearly half-century of frozen relations, stating that the freeze wasn't benefiting either nation.

The administration has already lifted some of the restrictions on travel and trade with Cuba, including permitting some ferries to run services from Florida to the island. American visitors are still required to obtain a license from the federal government before traveling to Cuba, though the Treasury has made it easier to obtain permission to go.

The removal of the terror designation will also ease some trade restrictions, though in order for full economic ties to be restored, Congress will need to lift the embargo on Cuba that's been in place since 1960.

Some lawmakers -- including Republican and Democratic Cuban-Americans -- staunchly oppose any normalization in relations with Cuba, accusing Obama of sidling up to a brutal dictatorship.

House Speaker John Boehner said on Friday that Obama "handed the Castro regime a significant political win in return for nothing" by removing Cuba from the terror list.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The communist dictatorship has offered no assurances it will address its long record of repression and human rights abuses at home," Boehner said in a statement.

Despite the objections, neither Boehner not other opponents of Obama's Cuba policy sought to block the terror designation removal in Congress. A GOP congressional source said leaders anticipated that overcoming a presidential veto on the measure would be difficult, and determined the practical effects of the removal were minimal.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, an expected contender for the 2016 GOP presidential nomination, wrote in a statement that, "Neither continued repression at home nor Cuba's destabilizing activities abroad appear sufficient to stop President Obama from making further concessions to the Communist regime in Havana."

White House Press Secretary Josh Earnest dismissed Republicans' concerns on the terror list removal and said the potential of Obama visiting Cuba remains a "presidential aspiration."

In January Obama met with Cuban leader Raul Castro at the Summit of the Americans in Panama, the first time the leaders of the two countries had met for substantial talks since before the Cuban revolution. Visiting Miami on Thursday, Obama made a stop at the Shrine of Our Lady of Charity, a religious site honoring the patron saint of Cuba, to pay respects the large Cuban diaspora in the United States.

Officials have been negotiating the reopening of embassies in Washington and Havana, though some sticking points -- like how freely American diplomats will be able to move around Cuba -- remain.

The U.S. is eying the current head of the U.S. Interests Section in Cuba, Jeffrey DeLaurentis, as the first U.S. ambassador to Cuba in more than 50 years. Plans are being formulated to remodel the current building on Havana's waterfront that houses the interests section to use it as the embassy.

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS

Romney defeating Bush in GOP establishment primary // The Hill // Brent Budowsky – June 3, 2015

Almost immediately after Mitt Romney announced he was not running in the 2016 race, I speculated that he may be engaging in a clever ploy to stay out of the line of political fire, hoping that former Gov. Jeb Bush (R-Fla.) fails as a candidate and the growing army of GOP presidential candidates creates a deadlock for the Republican nomination, and the party turns to ... Mitt Romney!

There are many scenarios that could unfold in the GOP race. It is certainly possible that a candidate such as Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R) or Florida Sen. Marco Rubio (R) could catch fire and seize the Republican nomination. I have an upcoming column about Rubio that considers his prospects.

If Romney, the Republican 2012 nominee, is actually pursuing the Machiavellian strategy I suggest, recent events in the GOP make this scenario even more likely. Currently, the absurdly growing GOP field makes a deadlocked primary and convention process more likely, with numerous candidates holding between 8 and 13 percent of the GOP vote. The GOP debates could well become a farce with so many candidates.

Next, in the unlikely event that one of the right-wing candidates such as Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) begins winning primaries, I guarantee that the entire GOP national party leadership will move aggressively to stop that candidate, correctly fearing that candidate would lose a landslide to Hillary Clinton (D). In this case they would almost certainly turn to ... Mitt Romney!

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For this scenario to unfold, there is a secondary primary process, outside the formal primary process, to determine who the establishment compromise nominee would be. New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie (R) could have played that role, but it ended on a bridge to New York. A Machiavellian Romney would have nothing to fear from Christie.

In my theory, the big bet Romney would have to have made is that the Bush's campaign would fail, paving the way for Romney as the alternative to a rightist front-runner or a deadlocked convention.

Let's be direct. This Romney bet, if he made it, appears to be paying off. Bush has been a very weak candidate, another name in a big bunch of mid-range candidates. Bush could not answer the obvious question about the Iraq War initiated by his brother, George W. Bush (Bush 43). A long list of aides, advisers, donors and supporters of Bush 43 are refusing to support Jeb Bush. Why? The right dislikes Jeb Bush even more than they dislike Romney. And Bush has very high negative ratings generally and among Republicans, while Romney gets great public relations from a charity boxing match and supports various GOP candidates in many states.

The more Bush lags in the GOP sweepstakes, the more Romney gains in the GOP establishment primary within the larger primaries.

Romney, by nature, is a takeover artist. Might he be planning his greatest takeover since the 2012 Republican National Convention? Every week brings more evidence that his big bet has a real chance of paying off.

Hillary Clinton is political, but her foundation isn't // Boston Globe // Dan Payne – June 3, 2015

THE MUCH-DISCUSSED Clinton Foundation builds partnerships with businesses, governments, nongovernment organizations, other foundations, and wealthy individuals. Like Robin Hood, the foundation used those resources to reduce childhood obesity and improve meals at 20,000 US schools, aid 56,000 small farmers in Malawi, launch programs to save forests in Cambodia, Guyana, Indonesia, Kenya, and Tanzania, and cut the cost of HIV/AIDS medications for 9.9 million people in 70 countries.

Clinton detractors would have us believe the foundation is an arm of Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign. But judging by the politics of its donors, people give and support the foundation without regard to her campaign. Consider these big donors:

Big Media is well-represented, an indication that they don't see the foundation as a political arm of Campaign Hillary. Comcast, NBC Universal, News Corporation, Thomson Reuters, Time Warner, and Turner Broadcasting are big contributors; other big givers include Carlos Slim, the Mexican telecom magnate and largest shareholder of The New York Times Company. Bloomberg News donated $500,001-$1 million. (Gifts are reported as a range.)

If the foundation benefits Clinton's candidacy, that will come as news to James Murdoch, co-chief operating officer for the company that owns Fox News, donated $1 million-$5 million, as well as his father Richard, who founded Fox News and gave $500,001-$1 million.

Major conservatives have given major dollars. Calling itself "The #1 conservative site in the nation," Newsmax Media chipped in $100,001-$250,000 and also $1 million-$5 million. The recently deceased Pittsburgh billionaire Richard Mellon Scaife, principal heir to the Mellon family's old banking, oil, steel and aluminum fortune, was described as "one of America's leading funders of conservative causes." He donated $250,001-

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

$500,000.

Even big name Republicans are on board. Many Republicans have supported Foundation events, including the Global Initiative meetings. Guests have included Laura Bush; former two-time presidential candidate Mitt Romney; TV host Donald Trump, who also forked over $100,000; New Jersey Governor Chris Christie, presidential candidates Carly Fiorina; former Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, and former Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson.

What about Stephanopolous? Yes, George Stephanopolous, of ABC News, gave $75,000 to the foundation, which was publicly listed. Yes, he helped Bill Clinton's campaign for president and should have told his bosses and his audience about his donation. But he gave to support efforts against AIDS and deforestation. His gift reveals nothing about his political history that wasn't already known.

How diverse can you get? None other than onetime vice presidential candidate Sarah Palin attended a Clinton Global Initiative session to hear a speech by Senator John McCain, the-then presidential nominee.

The ideological variety of the foundation's supporters shows its work is seen by even the most political people as apolitical. Many things can be said to criticize Hillary Clinton. But using the Clinton Foundation to advance her run for president isn't one of them.

Democrats, Don't Freak Out! // Slate // Jamelle Bouie – June 3, 2015

George W. Bush is popular again.

According to a new poll from CNN, the majority of Americans—52 percent—have a "favorable" view of Bush, versus 43 percent who still aren't keen on the former president. And while he isn't as popular as his post-presidential peers—including his father—he's in far better shape than he was during his final days in office, when most Americans disliked and disapproved of his administration.

But more striking than this is his stature versus the current president, Barack Obama. In addition to their survey on Bush, CNN also finds that the 43rd president is more popular than the 44th, who is as liked (49 percent approval) as he is disliked (49 percent disapproval).

Conservatives, no surprise, are thrilled. But before touting these numbers as proof of Bush's ultimate success—and Obama's clear failure—they should consider this fact of public opinion: Richard Nixon and Lyndon Johnson aside, every president becomes popular, or at least more popular, out of office. Jimmy Carter was so unpopular he faced a powerful Democratic opponent to his re-election campaign and lost the general election in a popular and electoral vote landslide. But 35 years later, his favorable/unfavorable spread is also better than Obama's. The other one-term president of the past generation, George H.W. Bush, has also recovered from his prior unpopularity. On the eve of the 1992 election, his approval rating was 43 percent. Today, 63 percent of Americans have a favorable view of the elder Bush, versus 31 percent who still aren't convinced. Likewise, Bill Clinton was popular throughout his eight years—with an average approval rating of 55 percent—and has become more popular as his tenure has moved to memory. According to Gallup, he has an average post-presidential rating of 60 percent.

Put bluntly, George W. Bush's popularity isn't news, although it would be if, after seven years of a quiet post-presidency, Bush was still as hated as he was at the end of 2008.

With that said, what's striking about the rehabilitation of Bush is that it's concurrent with Hillary Clinton's return from the stratosphere of public opinion. At this time four years ago—when she was chief diplomat and the 2012 election was still in the distance—Clinton was among the most popular figures in the country with a favorable rating of 60 percent. Indeed, just 31 percent of Americans held an unfavorable view of her. She was less popular in 2012, but not by much; the atmosphere was partisan, but not so much that it hurt her standing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That changed in 2013, as she slid from a 56 percent favorability rating in January to 48 percent one in December. And her numbers fell further in 2014, from a high of 50 percent to just under 47 percent at the end of the year. Her recent decline—as well as her higher unfavorables—are part of the same trend. Through 2012, less than one-third of respondents had a poor view of Hillary Clinton. By last month, the anti-Hillary crowd had grown to almost 47 percent of Americans, inching out her supporters.

For the media, this reflects scandal. Between the email controversy, foreign donors, and the Clinton Foundation, the public is already weary from Hillary's baggage. At the same time, those are relatively young stories—they've only been in the news a few months. If you want to understand the broad trend of Clinton's decline, you have to look at her position: She was outside of politics.

By leaving domestic politics after the 2008 election, Clinton entered a sort of post-presidency, not dissimilar to Bill Clinton's or even George W. Bush's. In public life, but out of the spotlight, she was no longer a partisan figure, which—for Democrats, Republicans, and independents alike—made her palatable. She wasn't, to borrow from the New Republic's Rebecca Traister, asking for anything.

Now she is. And as she's gone from a potential candidate to a live one, her popularity has climbed down from the stratosphere. Now, she's back to where she was in 2007—a well-known and polarized politician with tremendous opposition on the right and substantial support on the left. Like Bush, her journey through public opinion has less to do with her and everything to do with her place in the political firmament.

There is one difference. When he left office, Bush was genuinely unpopular, so much so that—four years later—a majority of voters still blamed him for the country's poor economic conditions. For as much as Republicans might celebrate his present standing, I'd be shocked if they asked him to campaign for the eventual nominee. Americans have warm feelings for the former president, but that sentiment wouldn't survive the scrutiny of a campaign.

Clinton didn't leave on a high, but she didn't leave on a low either. When Obama claimed victory in the Democratic primary, 48 percent of Americans had a favorable view of Clinton. Which means that, with her current ratings, she's returned to her norm as a partisan figure. And it's a good one. By 2009, that 48 percent had become 50 percent as Democrats forgave and forgot the combat of the previous year. In the same way, the secret of her present decline is that it's driven by Democrats, who will return to the "team" as the country enters election season. Despite everything, Hillary is in good shape.

If you aren't convinced, consider the reverse scenario. Imagine that the Republican Party had a former senator turned presidential candidate turned secretary of state, who at worst pulled a plurality of all voters, and who at best pulled a firm majority. Would the GOP reject her, or would they immediately embrace her standard, confident that—even with the inevitable scandals and criticism—they're still positioned for victory.

A 'favorable' way to stop Hillary Clinton's 'trust' fall // WaPo // Jonathan Capehart – June 3, 2015

Hillary Clinton's first big rally of her 2016 presidential campaign will take place on Roosevelt Island on June 13. And it's coming at the right time. Two national polls released Tuesday and a couple of fundraising stories out of New York spell trouble for the Democratic candidate. By making the case for her candidacy, putting forth ideas that can be debated and answering reporters' questions, Clinton can use the next six months to turn all of this around.

The Post-ABC News poll puts Clinton's favorability rating at 45 percent, a seven-year low. The CNN-ORC poll has it at 46 percent, the worst it has been since 2011. That CNN survey also puts her unfavorable rating at 50 percent. The former secretary of state who once soared in public opinion is now upside down. To make matters worse, the public's view of Clinton's trustworthiness took a hit.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the CNN-ORC survey, it plummeted eight points since March, from 50 percent to 42 percent. When asked whether "is honest and trustworthy" applies to Clinton, 57 percent said no. That's an eight-point jump since March. The Post-ABC News poll wasn't as bad, with a five-point drop to 41 percent in trustworthiness. But there was a six-point spike in untrustworthiness to 52 percent. These numbers do not a president make. But I should point out that neither poll asked about the trustworthiness of Clinton's two Democratic rivals — Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) and former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley — or anyone in the cavalcade of Republican presidential hopefuls. Not trusting Clinton is one thing. A trust match-up between her and the declared GOP 9 and the undeclared six would be a much more useful measure.

Of course, Clinton's trust plunge has to do with an avalanche of stories about lingering questions about her e-mails, her private e-mail server and the fundraising actions of the Clinton Foundation. Each new revelation feeds the negative narrative that the Clintons play by different rules than the rest of us. Candidate Clinton's March press conference about the server didn't quell queries, and her relative silence since then contributed to the diminished opinion of her.

Meanwhile, stories about the lack of enthusiasm among deep-pocketed Democratic donors are certain to add to the seeming mayhem around Clinton's campaign. But, folks, I'm here to remind you that we are still at the beginning of a very long process.

We know all about Clinton, but we don't know what her candidacy is all about. That will change with her speech on the 13th at Franklin D. Roosevelt Four Freedoms Park. The national park commemorates President Roosevelt's 1941 State of the Union address, otherwise known as the "four freedoms" speech. In it, FDR called for "a world founded upon four essential human freedoms," including freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom from want and freedom from fear.

The symbolism of Clinton's chosen location and the speech it honors gives a clue into where her campaign is headed. Translating FDR's universal vision into specific and viable policies for a 21st-century nation and world is vital to Clinton right- sizing those poll numbers. So is answering direct questions from reporters, which The Post's Anne Gearan reports will start happening around the same time as the big rally.

The sooner Clinton gets this part of the campaign up and running, the better. It's time she show that she can listen to the American people as she travels the country and talk to them at the same time.

MISCELLANEOUS

Lanny Davis: Hillary Clinton and the frenzy of the media // The Hill // Lanny Davis – June 3, 2015

"Mobs of reporters and cameramen and other Big Timers were out there wearing bush jackets with leather straps running this way and that and knocking back their Pepsi-Colas and Nehis and yelling to each other and mainly just milling about, crazy with the excitement of being on the scene, bawling for news of the anguished soul of Louise Shepard. They wanted a moan, a tear, some twisted features, a few inside words from friends, any goddamned thing. They were getting desperate. Give us a sign! Give us anything! Give us the diaper-service man! The diaper-service man comes down the street with his big plastic bags, smoking a cigar to provide an aromatic screen for his daily task — and they're all over him and his steamy bag. Maybe he knows the Shepards! Maybe he knows Louise! Maybe he's been in there! Maybe he knows the layout of chez Shepard! He locks himself in the front seat, choking on cigar smoke, and they're banging on his panel truck. 'Let us in! We want to see!' They're on their knees. They're slithering in the ooze. They're interviewing the dog, the cat, the rhododendrons. … These incredible maniacs were all out there tearing up the lawn and yearning for their pieces of Louise's emotional wreckage."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

—Tom Wolfe, The Right Stuff (1979), describing the media scrum at the home of Louise Shepard, wife of Alan Shepard, America's first astronaut, who had just returned safely from a suborbital flight in space.

Has anything changed?

Decades later, on May 22, Ruby Cramer of BuzzFeed was in the small town of Hampton, N.H., covering a Hillary Clinton event at — I am not making this name up — Smuttynose Brewing Co., a locally owned small business that proudly brews its own brands of beer.

Cramer reported that a small group of 60 local townspeople attended, including Lenore and Gary Patton, ages 78 and 79, respectively. For about an hour, the Pattons and the five dozen other guests listened to Clinton talk "in granular detail" about challenges facing small businesses.

The event was open to the press. And here's what happened next, as reported by Cramer:

"The spell of the everyday was broken. Clinton was swarmed by reporters. From the aisle, pressed up against the wall of beer cases stacked to the ceiling on pallet shelves, they gathered in a thick circle that happened to coalesce right around the two best seats in the house. Lenore and Gary Patton could not talk to the candidate they had come to see. They could not even get out of their chairs.

"Cameras flashed wildly. Lenore was crunched. Gary had a tape recorder in his right ear, a television camera in his left, and microphones overhead. They were inches from Clinton, with her 'in the eye of the hurricane,' as Gary put it after watching her field questions on Iraq, her emails, and her image. ('Do you have a perception problem?')"

Clinton responded by saying she would let voters decide for themselves.

" 'Hey,' Gary said to no one in particular. 'She's smart. She's experienced. End of story. ... This woman has what it takes.'

'She has ideas for the direction of the country she wants to go in,' said Lenore. 'She cares about the middle class. We're about as middle class as you can get.'

'She's so experienced, she's so bright, and she's so adroit,' her husband added. 'And I came in here not necessarily feeling all of these things, but I go away thinking that we would be lucky to have her as the president, because she has so many attributes that you need. It's an incredibly impressive performance.' "

A CNN poll published on Tuesday reported that the former secretary of State's favorable and trustworthiness ratings have dropped. Shocking! She has been pounded virtually every day for the last two months by mainstream media, far-right media and every Republican running for president, so that shouldn't be surprising.

Lest we forget, just recently The New York Times/CBS national poll showed that the percentage of Americans who rate Clinton as a strong leader has increased from 57 percent in March to 65 percent, and she is still defeating most Republicans in most polls by a significant margin.

Is there a disconnect between Clinton and real voters like Lenore and Gary Patton? Or is the disconnect between the frenzied media scrum and partisan Republican presidential candidates, and real, everyday Americans?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

You decide.

Alexandria Phillips

Press Assistant | Communications

Hillary for America | www.hillaryclinton.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara Latham" <Sara.Latham@ptt.gov>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 1/8/2009 8:05:01 AM
Subject: FW: FINAL DoD release

From: Amy Brundage
Sent: Thursday, January 08, 2009 2:15 PM
To: Amy Brundage; Dan Pfeiffer; Tommy Vietor; Laura Petrou; Dana Hyde; Sarah Feinberg; Sara Latham; Benjamin Rhodes; Kristin Sheehy; Brooke Anderson; Mark Patterson; Cammie Croft
Subject: FINAL DoD release

Final release is below. thanks all

President-Elect Obama Announces Key Department of Defense Posts

WASHINGTON – Today, President-elect Barack Obama announced that he intends to nominate the following individuals for key posts at the United States Department of Defense (DoD): William J. Lynn III, Deputy Secretary of Defense; Robert F. Hale, Under Secretary of Defense (Comptroller); Michèle Flournoy, Under Secretary of Defense (Policy); and Jeh Charles Johnson, General Counsel.

President-elect Obama said, "I am confident that these distinguished individuals have the expertise and commitment needed to help me implement a sustainable national security strategy that combats 21st century threats and keeps the American people safe. They share with me the utmost respect for our brave men and women in uniform, and will work day and night to support our troops, strengthen our military, and advance our capacity to carry out 21st century missions. Together with Secretary Gates and our military, we will work to responsibly end the war in Iraq, defeat al Qaeda and the Taliban, and renew America's strength and standing in the world. I am honored that they have joined me in this mission, and I trust that they will serve the American people well."

The announcements made today are below:

William J. Lynn III, Deputy Secretary of Defense
Lynn brings decades of experience and expertise in reforming government spending and making the tough choices necessary to ensure that American tax dollars are spent wisely. Lynn served as the Under Secretary of Defense (Comptroller) from 1997 to 2001. In that position, he was the chief financial officer for the Department of Defense and the principal advisor to the Secretary of Defense for all budgetary and fiscal matters. From 1993 to 1997, Lynn was the director of program analysis and evaluation in the Office of the Secretary of Defense, where he oversaw all aspects of the DoD's strategic planning process. Lynn was awarded three DoD medals for distinguished public service, the Joint Distinguished Civilian Service Award from the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and awards from the Army, Navy and Air Force. He also received the 2000 Distinguished Federal Leadership Award from the Association of Government Accountants for his efforts to improve defense accounting practices. Lynn currently serves as senior vice president of Government Operations and Strategy at Raytheon Company. Before entering the DoD in 1993, Lynn served for six years on the staff of Senator Edward Kennedy as liaison to the Senate Armed Services Committee. He has also been a Senior Fellow at the National Defense University, on the professional staff at the Institute for Defense Analyses and served as the executive director of the Defense Organization Project at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. A graduate of Dartmouth College, Lynn has a law degree from Cornell Law School and a Master's in Public Affairs from the Woodrow Wilson School at Princeton University. He is married with a daughter.

Robert F. Hale, Under Secretary of Defense (Comptroller)
Hale currently serves as the Executive Director of the American Society of Military Comptrollers (ASMC). From 1994 to 2001 Mr. Hale was appointed by President Clinton and confirmed by the Senate as the Assistant Secretary of the Air Force (Financial Management and Comptroller). He was responsible for the Air Force budget and all aspects of Air Force financial management. He also spearheaded creation of the first-ever certification program for defense financial managers. Hale served for twelve years as head of the defense unit of the Congressional Budget Office. Early in his career, Hale served on active duty as a Navy officer and worked for the Center for Naval Analyses. Robert Hale holds a BS with honors from Stanford University as well as an MS from Stanford and an MBA from George Washington University. He is also a Fellow in the National Academy of Public Administration. Mr. Hale has served on the Defense Business Board and recently completed service on a Congressionally-mandated Task Force on the Future of Military Health Care. He is a former National President of the American Society of Military Comptrollers and is a Certified Defense Financial Manager with acquisition specialty.

Michèle Flournoy, Under Secretary of Defense (Policy)
In January 2007, Flournoy cofounded and was named president of the Center for a New American Security (CNAS), a venture dedicated to advancing a strong, centrist national security strategy. Prior to joining CNAS, she was a senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS), where she worked on a broad range of defense policy and international security issues. Previously, she was a distinguished research professor at the Institute for National Strategic Studies at the National Defense

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

University (NDU), where she founded and led the university's Quadrennial Defense Review (QDR) working group, which was chartered by the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to develop intellectual capital in preparation for the Department of Defense's 2001 QDR. Prior to joining NDU, she was dual-hatted as principal deputy assistant secretary of defense for strategy and threat reduction and deputy assistant secretary of defense for strategy. In that capacity, she oversaw three policy offices in the Office of the Secretary of Defense: Strategy; Requirements, Plans, and Counterproliferation; and Russia, Ukraine, and Eurasian Affairs. Flournoy was awarded the Secretary of Defense Medal for Outstanding Public Service in 1996, the Department of Defense Medal for Distinguished Public Service in 1998, and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff's Joint Distinguished Civilian Service Award in 2000. In addition to several edited volumes and reports, she has authored dozens of articles on international security issues. Flournoy holds a B.A. in social studies from Harvard University and an M.Litt. in international relations from Balliol College, Oxford University, where she was a Newton-Tatum scholar.

Jeh Charles Johnson, General Counsel
Johnson is a partner in the law firm of Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison LLP, based in New York City. Johnson's career has been a mixture of successful private law practice (as an experienced trial lawyer) and distinguished public service (as a federal prosecutor and presidential appointee). At age 47, he was elected a Fellow in the prestigious American College of Trial Lawyers. Johnson's career as a trial lawyer began in 1989-91, as an Assistant United States Attorney in the Southern District of New York, where he prosecuted public corruption cases. He served three years as a federal prosecutor. In 1998, Johnson left Paul, Weiss for 27 months when President Clinton appointed him General Counsel of the Department of the Air Force, following nomination and confirmation by the United States Senate. While in that position, Johnson was awarded the Decoration for Exceptional Civilian Service. In 2007-08, Johnson served as a foreign policy advisor to President-elect Obama's campaign. Johnson is a member of the Council on Foreign Relations, and a graduate of Morehouse College and Columbia Law School.

###

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE
January 8, 2009
Contact: Obama Transition Press Office, 202-540-3483

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
To: "Jennifer Palmieri" <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 5/4/2015 4:48:04 AM
Subject: Re: 8 am Agenda & Standing Meetings / Calls

I think we want the frame of protecting exec actions but taking additional steps. If the statement carries that I'm fine, but if we need to make sure that's probably the place to do it.

On Monday, May 4, 2015, Jennifer Palmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

I thought we could background generally tonight but was concerned about getting ahead of her on the daca/ dapa/plus stuff. What do you think?

Sent from my iPhone

On May 4, 2015, at 6:06 AM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com > wrote:

Should we pitch a story to univision tonight?

---------- Forwarded message ----------
From: "Dan Schwerin" <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com >
Date: May 3, 2015 11:57 PM
Subject: Re: 8 am Agenda & Standing Meetings / Calls
To: "Joel Benenson" <jbenenson@bsgco.com >, "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com >, "Kristina Schake" <kschake@hillaryclinton.com >, "Mandy Grunwald" <gruncom@aol.com >, "Robby Mook" <re47@hillaryclinton.com >, "Huma Abedin" <ha16@hillaryclinton.com >, "Jennifer Palmieri" <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com >, "Jake Sullivan" <jake.sullivan@gmail.com >, "Brian Fallon" <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com>, "John Anzalone" <john@algpolling.com >, "David Binder" <David@db-research.com>, "Jim Margolis" <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com >, "Teddy Goff" <tgoff@hillaryclinton.com >, "Oren Shur" <oshur@hillaryclinton.com >, "Tony Carrk" <tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com >
Cc: "Marissa Astor" <mastor@hillaryclinton.com >

In advance of this discussion, here's a draft of her Las Vegas topper. It's a little long so I'm going to try to tighten it up, but this attempts to lay out the contrast on path to citizenship and move the ball forward with the parents of dreamers.

On Sun, May 3, 2015 at 8:23 PM, Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com > wrote:

Agree with Jake and John
We're not running against King.

Sent from my iPhone

On May 3, 2015, at 7:28 PM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com > wrote:

I'd stick with Bush/Rubio.

On Sunday, May 3, 2015, Jake Sullivan <jake.sullivan@gmail.com > wrote:

It always makes sense to whack Steve King. And this is particularly outrageous and bigoted and [fill in the bad word]. But the question from you and the comms team is whether hitting King takes away from our effort to get a clean contrast with Bush/Rubio et al. They would also attack King, so it sort of lets them off the hook.

On Sun, May 3, 2015 at 7:09 PM, Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com > wrote:

If you won't be on the call, Jake, can I ask one immigration question. Does it make any sense to whack Steve King for trying to change the Constitution to deny babies born here the right to American citizenship if their parents aren't citizens? (basically get rid of the 14th amendment). It seems like a great contrast to what HRC is proposing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mandy Grunwald
Grunwald Communications
202 973-9400

-----Original Message-----
From: Jake Sullivan <jake.sullivan@gmail.com >
To: Kristina Schake <kschake@hillaryclinton.com >
Cc: Robby Mook <re47@hillaryclinton.com >; Huma Abedin <ha16@hillaryclinton.com >; Jennifer Palmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com >; John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >; Brian Fallon <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com >; Margolis, Jim <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com >; Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com >; Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com >; John Anzalone <john@algpolling.com >; David Binder <David@db-research.com >; Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com >; Marissa Astor <mastor@hillaryclinton.com >; Teddy Goff <tgoff@hillaryclinton.com >; Oren Shur <oshur@hillaryclinton.com >; Tony Carrk <tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com >
Sent: Sun, May 3, 2015 7:03 pm
Subject: Re: 8 am Agenda & Standing Meetings / Calls

Marlon and I will be on a plane to Atlanta. Dan can walk through our immigration gameplan.

On Sun, May 3, 2015 at 6:48 PM, Kristina Schake <kschake@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

> Our agenda for tomorrow's 8 am is:
>
> - Immigration plan
> - Clinton Cash update
>
> Just to remind everyone that these are our standing meetings/calls going forward:
>
> Monday, Wednesday, Friday 8 am Call
>
> Week & Month Look Ahead - Thursdays
> Normally this call will be every Thursday, but due to scheduling conflicts this week it will be Friday at 1 pm. It will be a one hour call and then every other week it will be a 2 hour in-person meeting. The first in-person meeting will be on May 14. Marissa is scheduling it with your offices.
>
> --
> Kristina Schake
> Hillary for America

<2015-05-03 LV Immigration Roundtable - 11pm.docx>

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jake Sullivan" <jake.sullivan@gmail.com>
To: "Eizenstat, Stuart" <seizenstat@cov.com>
Date: 6/28/2015 11:13:10 AM
Subject: Re: Israel and Iran

Thanks Stu. Some of what Dennis suggests is quite complicated, as you know.

> On Jun 28, 2015, at 5:53 PM, Eizenstat, Stuart <seizenstat@cov.com> wrote:
>
> Dear Jake,
>
> Dennis Ross and I had an hour-plus meeting Sunday morning with the PM and full Israeli Cabinet, in our capacity as co-chairs of the Jewish People's Policy Institute of Jerusalem.
> While we made presentations on a number of topics, Iran and BDS were the most important and engendered the most comment.
>
> Before the meeting, I met at length with Dennis about Iran. I wanted to share his views, beyond those in his Washington Institute letter I have referenced before, because they may be useful in shaping Hillary's statement.
>
> 1. He felt that an agreement would be reached, would be disapproved by Congress, and the President's veto would be sustained, most likely in the House. Dennis later > conveyed that view to the PM and Cabinet, provoking a strong reaction from Bibi.
>
> 2. The US should state clearly upfront that we will use all means at our disposal to prevent Iran from crossing the very fine line between being a nuclear capable state and being a nuclear weapons state. Iran must get a clear signal now.
>
> 3.The US should provide Israel with a > new Mission Ordinance Penetration (MOP) bomb, that is more powerful than the Bunker Busting Bomb, and could blow-up the Fordo facility, if necessary. This would be a signal to Iran, that cheating will not pay.
>
> 4.The US should state it will support any action Israel must take for its own defense.
>
> 5. The US will not cooperate with Iran on regional issues.
>
> 6. If Hillary has to support what he believes will be a deeply flawed agrement, that will not measure-up to the April US Fact Sheet, these points above would be useful to state. In addition, she could balance support for opposing a new UN Resolution.
>
> When I land. I will summarize the points I made about BDS.
>
> I was struck in my week in Israel, not only among Israeli officials, but among my friends across the political spectrum (most are former officials) and apolitical relatives, at the depth of antipathy and distrust of President Obama, as "weak", "pro-Muslim", and "anti-Israel".
>
> Best wishes,
>
> Stu

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "The Washington Post" <email@e.washingtonpost.com>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 12/28/2015 12:48:26 AM
Subject: The Daily 202: Are we going to lose Afghanistan?

View The Daily 202 on the Web

PowerPost

The Daily 202

Morning intelligence for leaders

Share on Twitter Share on Facebook

Are we going to lose Afghanistan?

An Afghan shopkeeper watches this morning from a broken window of his shop near the site of suicide car bomb attack in Kabul. (AP Photo/Rahmat Gul)

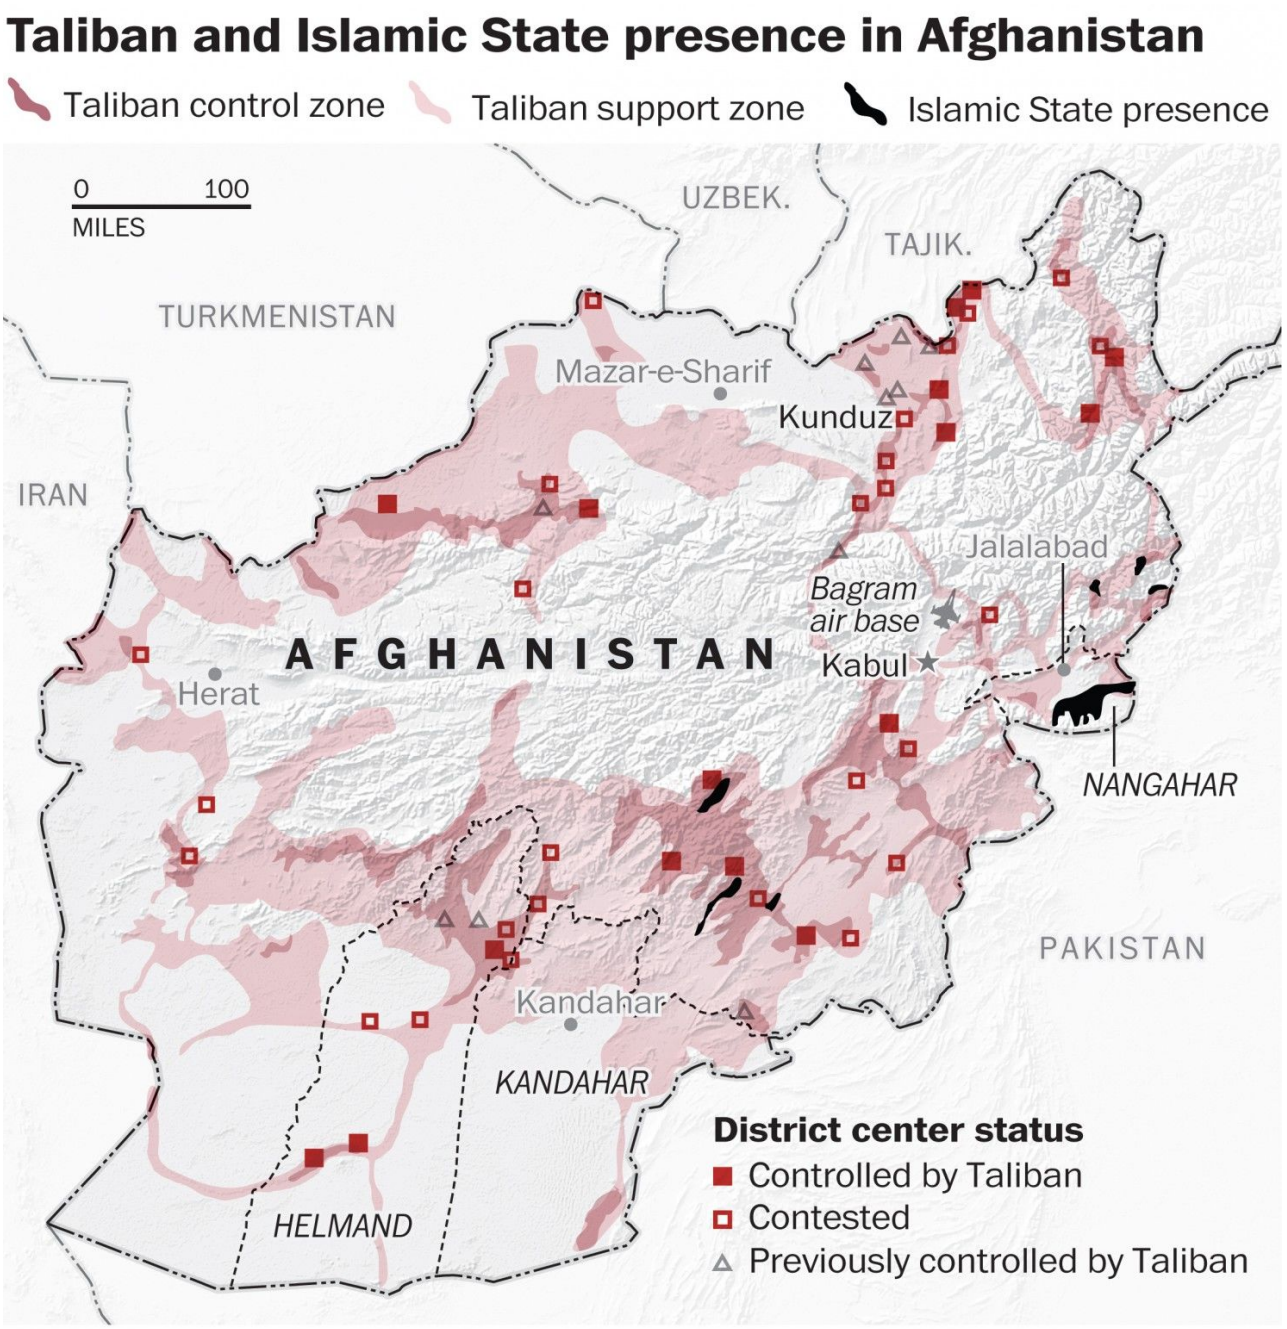
This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BY JAMES HOHMANN

THE BIG IDEA:

— Because of ISIS and the threat of attacks on the homeland, Syria has been on the front burner and Afghanistan has been on the back burner during the presidential campaign. That's about to change.

In the last few hours, a Taliban suicide bomber killed at least one person and injured 13 more near the airport in Kabul. The incident, just two weeks after a major assault on the city and a week after six U.S. soldiers were killed in another bombing near Bagram air base, underscores the extent to which the situation continues to deteriorate.



— "In private, top Afghan and American officials have begun to voice increasingly grim assessments of the resurgent Taliban threat," The Post's Sudarsan Raghavan reports from Marja. "With control of — or a significant presence in — roughly 30 percent of districts across the nation, according to Western and Afghan officials, the Taliban now holds more territory than in any year since 2001. … Deserters and injured Afghan soldiers say they are fighting a more sophisticated and well-armed insurgency than they have seen in years."

— The Post obtained an eye-opening transcript of a late-October meeting of the Afghan National Security Council that raises serious questions about whether the local government is up for the challenge. "We have not met the people's expectations. We haven't delivered," Abdullah Abdullah, the country's chief executive, told the high-level gathering. "Our forces lack discipline. They lack rotation opportunities. We haven't taken care of our own policemen and soldiers. They continue to absorb enormous casualties." At the meeting, Gen. John F. Campbell, the commander of U.S. and allied forces in Afghanistan, told his Afghan counterparts that he was as guilty as they were of "just putting our finger in the dike in Helmand."

— "For now, the top American and Afghan priority is preventing Helmand, largely secured by U.S. Marines and British forces in 2012, from again falling to the insurgency," Raghavan reports. "As of last month, about 7,000 members of the Afghan security forces had been killed this year, with 12,000 injured, a 26 percent increase over the total number of dead and wounded in all of 2014. …U.S. Special Operations troops are increasingly being deployed into harm's way to assist their Afghan counterparts. Since

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Nov. 4, four members of the U.S.-led coalition have been wounded in Helmand." Read the full story.

Source: Institute for the Study of War LARIS KARKLIS/THE WASHINGTON POST

— Afghanistan's decline has serious implications for U.S. national security. One of President Obama's first major decisions was to expand the troop presence in the country. This is a major legacy issue for him. How far are the 2016 candidates in both parties willing to go to stop the Taliban? The electorate remains reluctant about open-ended deployments of U.S. boots on the ground. How much more sacrifice Americans are willing to accept, even in this time of rising anxiety about terrorism, is very much an open question.

— The Taliban is a barbaric foe… Pamela Constable reports from Kabul today on the beheading of a third-grade girl.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

— …but can there be a negotiated peace? From the Associated Press: "Afghanistan and Pakistan agreed on Sunday to meet with U.S. and Chinese officials in the first weeks of the new year to discuss 'peace-related issues,' a move that could re-invigorate a stalled peace process with the Taliban, the Afghan president's office said. The development came as Pakistan's powerful army chief Gen. Raheel Sharif met with senior officials in the Afghan capital."

An injured NATO soldier lies on the ground after a suicide car bomb attack targeted foreign military vehicles in Kabul this June. (Wakil Kohsar/AFP/Getty Images

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost 's morning newsletter. Sign up to receive the newsletter.

With contributions from Michael Smith .

WHILE YOU WERE SLEEPING:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

President Obama speaks to troops at a Marine Corps base on Christmas. (Reuters/ Jonathan Ernst)

— President and Mrs. Obama, along with a few friends, had a 4.5-hour dinner last night at Hoku's, the flagship restaurant at the Kahala Hotel. It came at the end of a day that included hours on the beach and a stop for Hawaiian shave ice. See the dinner menu from where the Obamas ate here .

— Bernie Sanders, starting a two-day Nevada swing, ripped into the Republican candidates who have kissed Sheldon Adelson's ring. At an evening rally in Reno that drew more than 2,000 people, Sanders spoke facetiously of an "Adelson caucus," including Marco Rubio and Donald Trump. "Sheldon Adelson has not invited me to speak with him," he said. (John Wagner)

— The old Axis powers are still grappling with the consequences of World War II. Two stories on the wire this morning show how long it takes to heal wounds:

- Japan will formally apologize to South Korea for forcing its women to work in brothels during World War II. Tokyo will provide $8.3 million toward the care of aging "comfort women" in a historic agreement that could ease tensions between two key U.S. allies.
- For the first time in 70 years, a new edition of "Mein Kampf" will be released in Germany next week. The new edition, being released by a publicly funded institute, will include critical commentary about Adolph Hitler. "While historians say it could help fill a gap in Germans' knowledge of the era, Jewish groups are wary," the AP reports from Berlin. "Under German law, a copyright expires at the end of the year 70 years after an author's death — in this case, Hitler's April 30, 1945, suicide in a Berlin bunker … That means Bavaria's state finance ministry, which holds the copyright, can no longer use it to prevent the work's publication beyond Dec. 31."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GET SMART FAST:

1. At least 11 people died after tornadoes swept through the Dallas area, bringing the total number of weather-related deaths in the country over the last week to 43. (Dallas Morning News)
2. Chicago police accidentally shot and killed a community activist after officers were called to her apartment complex because an emotionally-disturbed 19-year-old neighbor, also killed by cops, was wielding a baseball bat. (Mark Guarino)
3. The fire that burned a Houston mosque on Christmas was definitely arson, investigators ruled Sunday. (Houston Chronicle)
4. The NFL and Major League Baseball will investigate claims made in an Al Jazeera documentary that an anti-aging clinic in Indianapolis provided steroids to numerous athletes, including Peyton Manning, Ryan Zimmerman and James Harrison. Those three, and others, issued quick denials. (Barry Svrluga and Mark Maske)
5. Iraqi forces reclaimed the main government center in Ramadi, which was under ISIS control for seven months. (Mustafa Salim and Loveday Morris)
6. The Justice Department charged at least 60 people with terrorism-related charges in 2015, a record attributable to the rise of ISIS and its influence on social media. (Ellen Nakashima)
7. China has officially instituted a new two-child policy, ending the one-child rule that was in place since the 1970s. (CNN)
8. The Chinese bureaucrat responsible for regulating the waste heap that caused last week's big landslide committed suicide. (Sarah Kaplan)
9. The Chinese Foreign Ministry expelled a French journalist over an article that suggested Beijing's expression of solidarity after the Paris attacks was really about getting international support to crack down on the Uighurs. (Emily Rauhala)
10. The Virginia chamber of commerce official shot while being interviewed on a Roanoke TV station – during which the reporter and cameraman were killed – is done with her surgeries and will soon return to work. (CNN)
11. The Chipotle where 136 Boston College students got sick reopened this weekend after being closed for three weeks. (The Globe)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

12. A mall in Louisville, Ky., closed early and extra police officers were called in after up to 2,000 “unruly” teenagers engaged in fights, and harassed customers and store employees. (Toledo Blade)
13. A 33-year-old visiting San Diego fell 40 feet off a cliff to his death on Christmas because he was distracted while trying to take pictures on his cell phone. (Union Tribune)
14. Eleven unrelated cold cases were solved by a man who investigated serial killer John Wayne Gacy’s unknown victims. (Sharon Cohen)
15. “Star Wars: The Force Awakens” has already grossed $1.09-billion worldwide. (Michael Cavna)

POWER PLAYERS IN THE NEWS:

1. Trump slammed the Republican Party of Virginia for requiring that primary voters sign a statement saying they’re Republicans, saying it discourages independent and first-time voters from participating. (Jenna Portnoy)
2. Bill Gates donated $42 million in 2015 to groups supporting Common Core. (Valerie Strauss)
3. South Carolina Rep. Trey Gowdy (R) endorsed Marco Rubio and will campaign with him this week in Iowa. “It’s a major show of support from a Republican who had previously recoiled at the idea of making a 2016 endorsement,” writes David Weigel.
4. The psychiatrist who urged the American Psychiatric Association to stop treating homosexuality as an illness, Robert Spitzer, died of heart disease at 83. (Amy Argetsinger)

SUNDAY SHOW HIGHLIGHTS:

1. John Kasich refused to say he would endorse Trump if he won the GOP nomination, attacking The Donald for complaining about everything. (ABC)
2. DNC chair Debbie Wasserman Schultz warned Trump to attack Bill Clinton at “his own peril” after the GOP frontrunner tweeted that Clinton has a history of sexism. (NBC)
3. Mike Huckabee denied that his super PAC “selectively edited” an ad that prematurely cut off Ted Cruz’s answer to a question about the importance of fighting same-sex marriage. Unlike Kasich, Huckabee said he would support Trump if he were the GOP nominee. (Fox)
4. Bernie Sanders said on NBC that he is working with the DNC to put the Clinton data breach incident “behind us.” The Vermont senator also said on

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CBS that Sandra Bland, who died in police custody, would not have been arrested had she been white.

WAPO HIGHLIGHTS:

Ben Carson is photographed in his home in Upperco, Md., on December 23, 2015. (Photo by Marvin Joseph/The Washington Post)

— "Ben Carson on the brink: "A process like this is pretty brutal," by Steven Ginsberg and Robert Costa: The Post interviewed the famous neurosurgeon in his "manse in the countryside near Baltimore." On attacks, Carson said "it's not pleasant…But it's discouraging to know that we're at that stage in our country where people don't care so much about the truth. It's just what's sensational, what's the shiny object. It's all 'Who's in the football game? Who's on 'Dancing With the Stars'? Who's yelling the loudest?' And I'm not sure that's what we need right now because we've got some real big problems in our country." He his decline in the polls is because a narrative is being pushed that "if you're soft-spoken and mild-mannered, there is no way you can deal with terrorism, with national security, that you're not a strong person … We want to be comforted, we want to be comforted quickly, and we go for the bright, shiny object as the solution rather than being a little more cerebral … What I've been emphasizing on the road lately is that strength is not defined by the decibels of which you say something or by the gesticulations associated with it, but by the accomplishments of one's life. What have you faced, and how have you faced those things?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

— "In Central Asia, Chinese inroads in Russia's backyard, " by Simon Denyer: "The Silk Road slogan may be new, but many of its goals are not. Beijing has long been working to secure a share of the region's rich natural resources to fuel China's industrial economy; it is building a network of security cooperation in Central Asia as a bulwark against Islamist extremism that could leak into China's restive western province of Xinjiang, and it wants to create alternative trading routes to Europe that bypass Asia's narrow, congested shipping lanes. Under the Silk Road plan, China also is promising to spend hundreds of millions of dollars to build new infrastructure here, and it hopes to reap benefits of its own: to create new markets for Chinese goods, especially for heavy industries such as steel and cement that have suffered as the Chinese economy has slowed."

Vladimir Putin has preciously said Russia will add more than 40 new intercontinental ballistic missiles to its nuclear arsenal this year. (Reuters/Maxim Shemetov)

— The Post's editorial board expresses alarm about Russia's development of a nuclear-armed, underwater, unmanned drone : "The new weapon was revealed when Russian President Vladimir Putin met with military chiefs in Sochi in November and television news footage captured a page being used in the briefing. The Kremlin later said the video … should not have been broadcast, and the video was deleted … Russia appears to be creating a tactical nuclear weapon that could be slipped into a harbor, unleashing a tidal wave as well as the devastating effects of a nuclear explosion. It might be used to attack a military target, such as a submarine or naval base, but cities and industry could also be hit. … There are no arms control treaties in place to stop this; smaller tactical nuclear weapons have never been limited by treaty." Wonder if Trump will weigh in…

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

— "The flawed system that allows companies to make millions off the injured, " by Terrence McCoy: "In all, according to Terrence Taylor's bank records and court documents, the burn survivor sold $11 million of his structured settlement — which had a present value of about $8.5 million — for roughly $1.4 million, or 16 cents on the present dollar. He has sued the companies, focusing on a South Florida firm named Structured Asset Funding, which did six deals with him. That Taylor, who had received diagnoses of learning and emotional disabilities, could so quickly hemorrhage 30 years' worth of income in deals approved in a courthouse he never visited is the result of Virginia's failure to properly regulate and monitor an industry that makes tens of millions off some of the state's most vulnerable residents, a Washington Post investigation has found. Unlike traditional settlements, which are paid out in one sum, structured settlements dispense the payout in portions over a lifetime to protect vulnerable people from immediately spending it all."

— "The A.I. anxiety, " by Joel Achenbach: "Nick Bostrom's underlying concerns about machine intelligence, unintended consequences and potentially malevolent computers have gone mainstream. You can't attend a technology conference these days without someone bringing up the A.I. anxiety. It hovers over the tech conversation with the high-pitched whine of a 1950s-era Hollywood flying saucer. People will tell you that even Stephen Hawking is worried about it. And Bill Gates. And that Elon Musk gave $10 million for research on how to keep machine intelligence under control. All that is true. … This is a topic rife with speculation and perhaps a whiff of hysteria. But the discussion reflects a broader truth: We live in an age in which machine intelligence has become a part of daily life. Computers fly planes and soon will drive cars. Computer algorithms anticipate our needs and decide which advertisements to show us. Machines create news stories without human intervention. Machines can recognize your face in a crowd. … We don't know how this will play out. But some of the most serious thinkers on Earth worry about potential hazards — and wonder whether we remain fully in control of our inventions."

SOCIAL MEDIA SPEED READ:

— Pictures of the day:

2016 presidential candidates wished voters a Merry Christmas via social media, with some fun family photos and some throwbacks:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@realdonaldtrump)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@hillaryclinton)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@chrischristie)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@marcorubiofla)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@jebbush)

(@realbencarson)

And President Obama, plus some former residents of the White House, extended their Season's Greetings:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

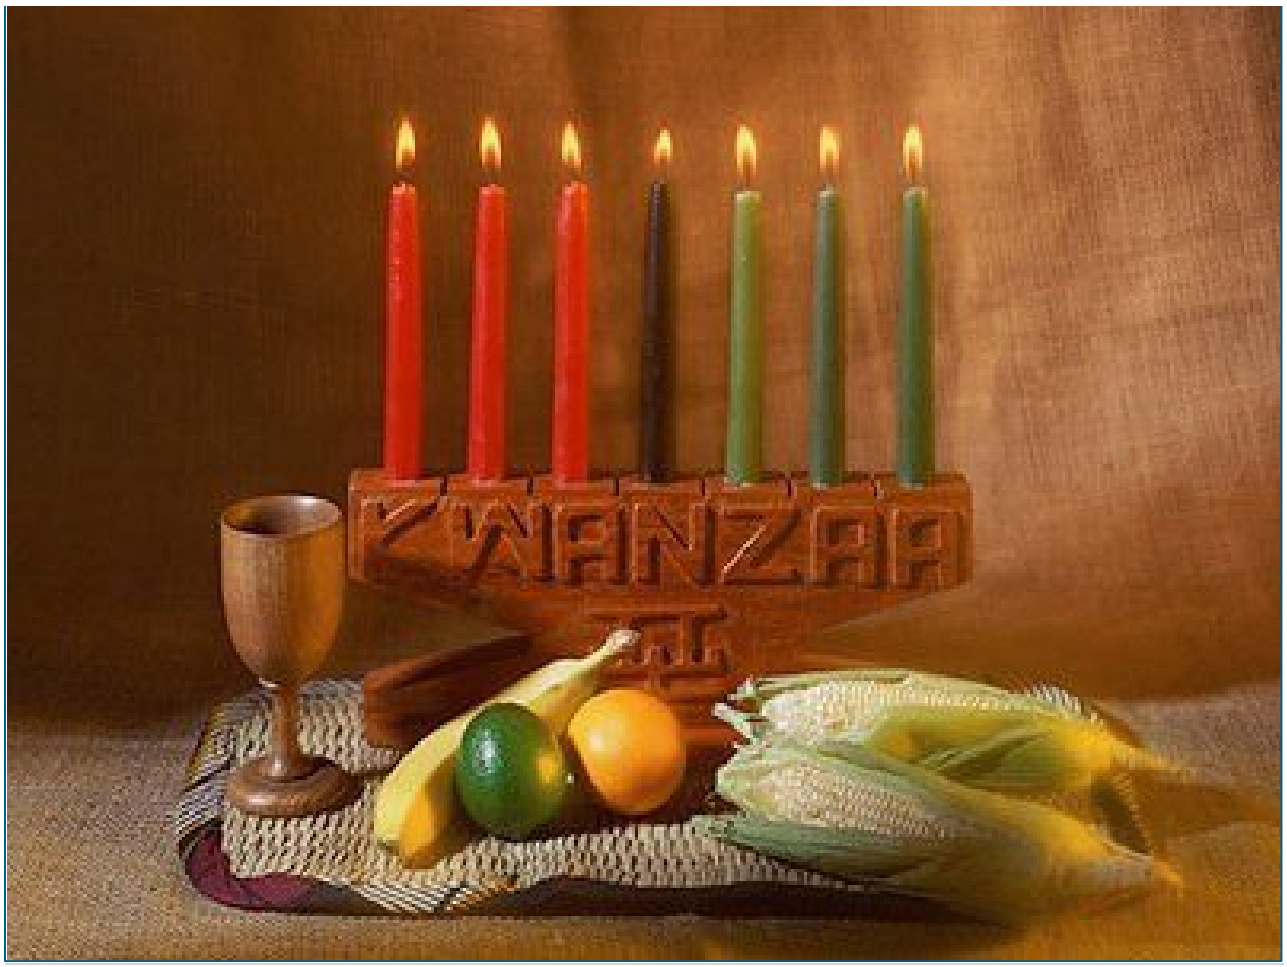
(@thewhitehouse)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@georgewbush)

Jacqueline Kennedy, John Jr., and Caroline, on Christmas Day in Palm Beach, Fla., in 1962:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



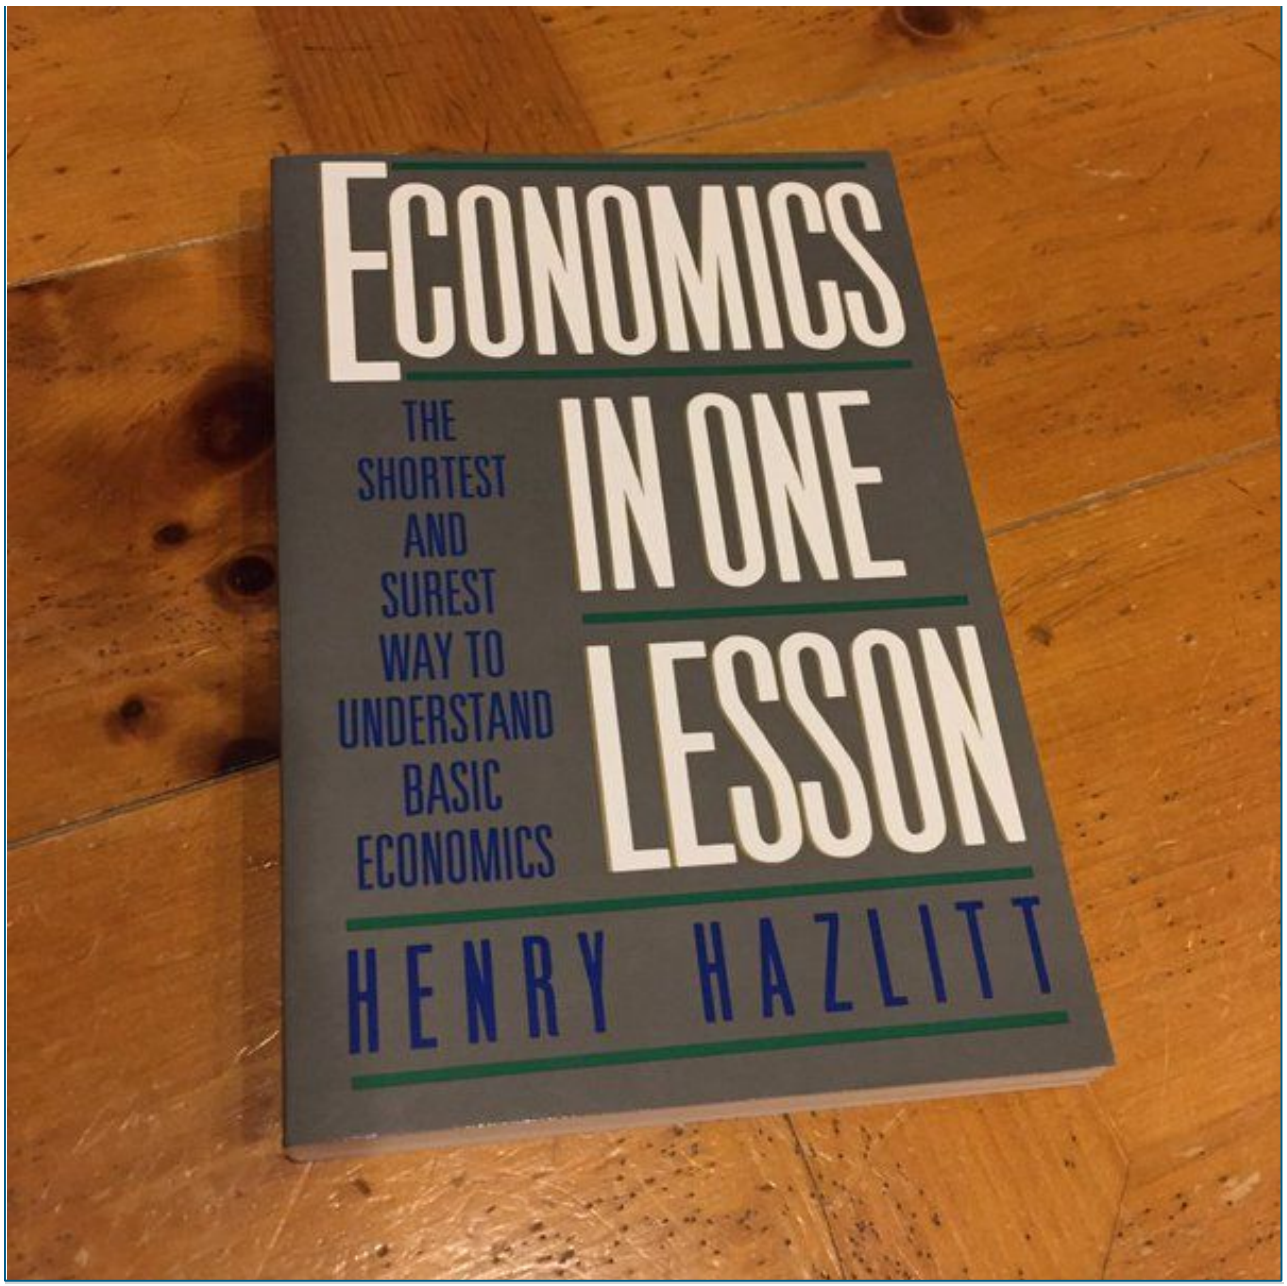
(@whitehousehistory)

–Tweets of the day:

Rep. Donna Edwards (D-Md.), seeking the Maryland Senate seat being vacated by Barbara Mikulski (D-Md.), sent her own wishes for a Happy Kwanzaa:

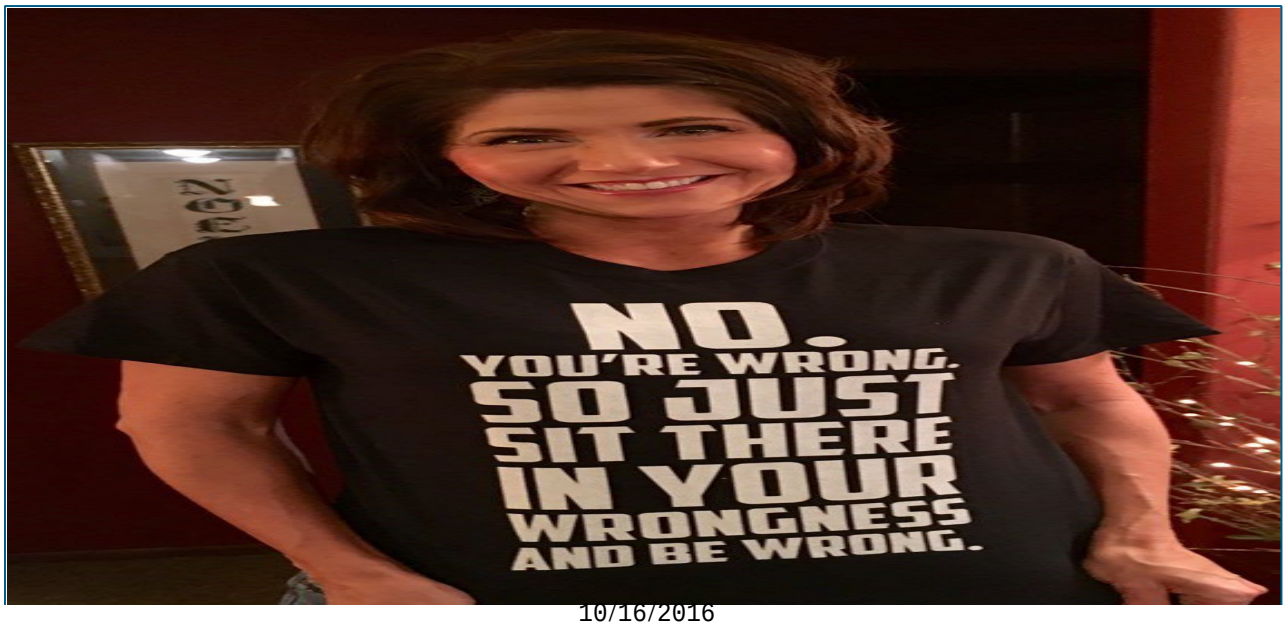
This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@repdonnaedwards)



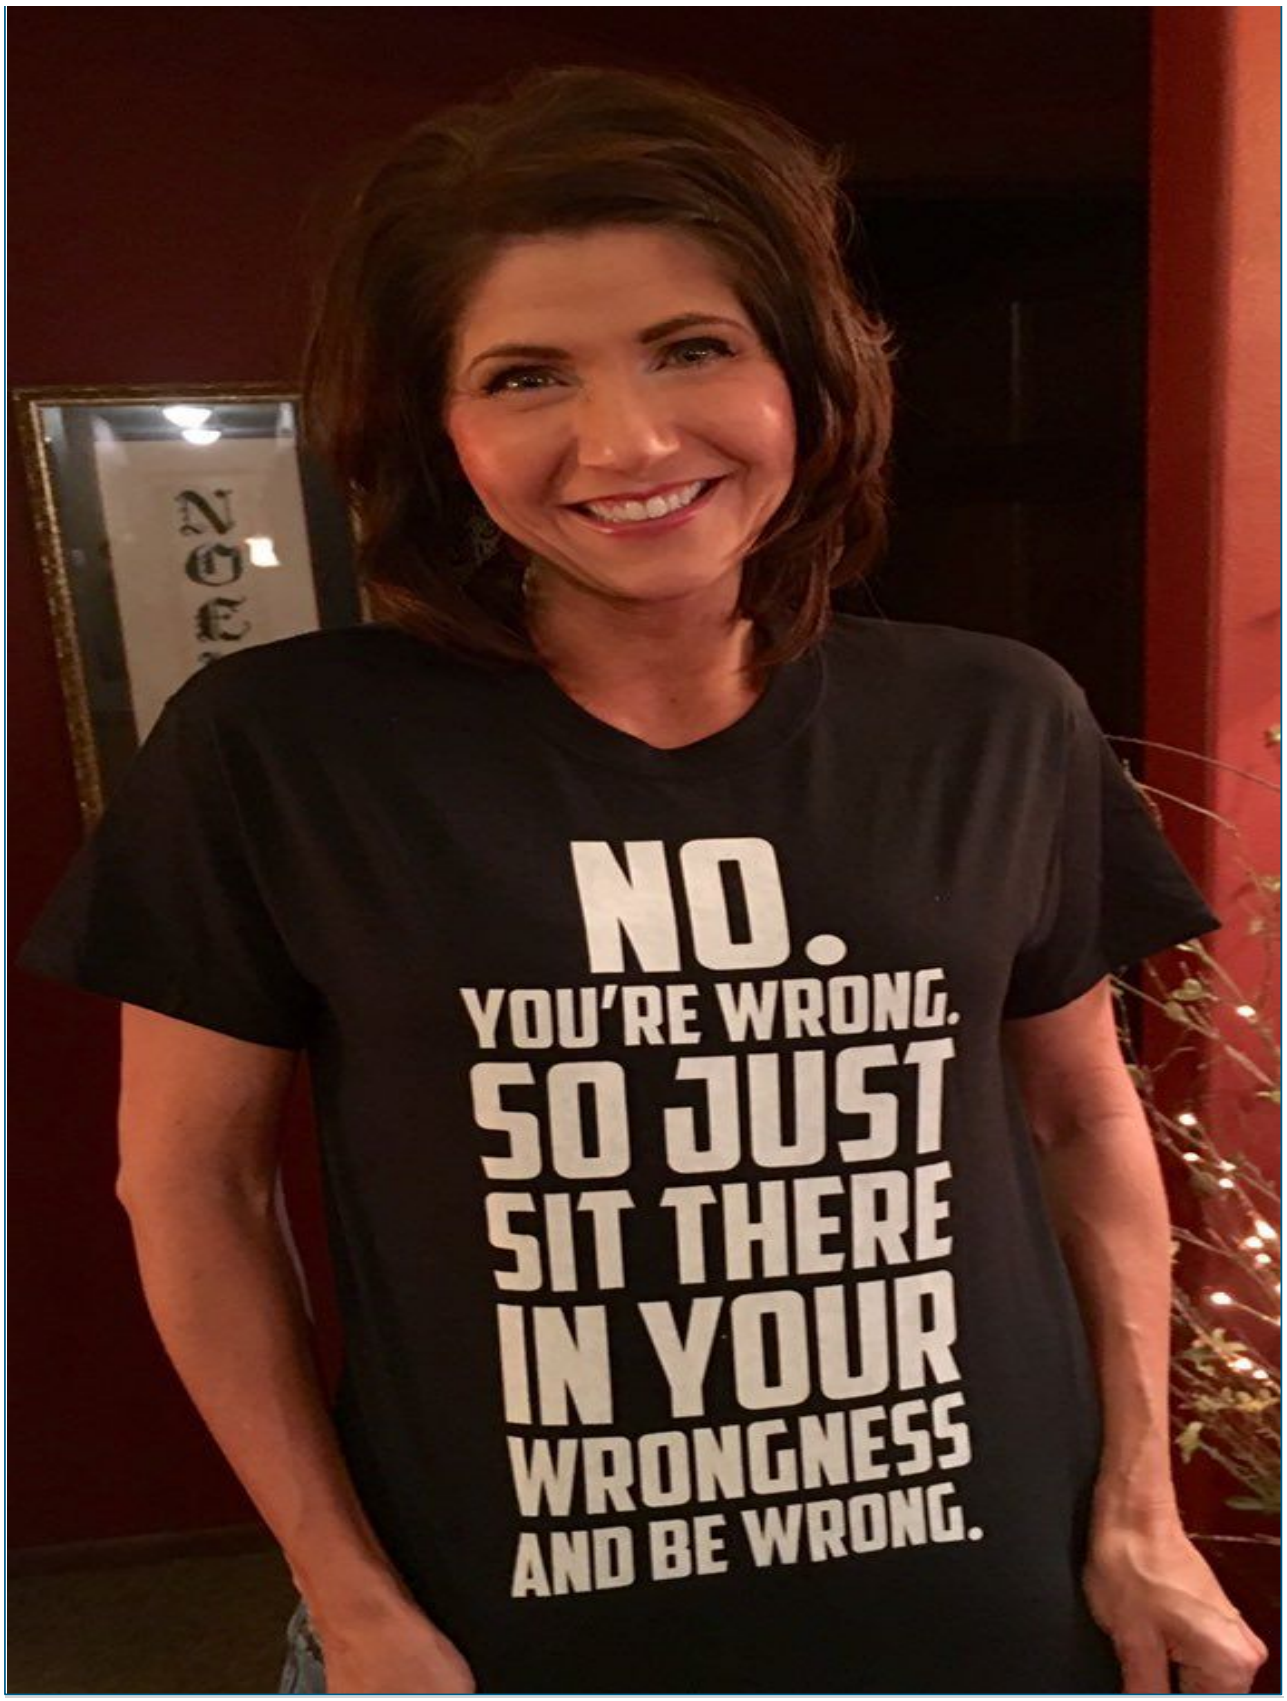
Rep. David Cicilline (D-R.I.) celebrated Christmas with the troops in Iraq:

(@repcicilline)



Rep. Justin Amash (R-Mich.) offered Clinton and Sanders a libertarian economics lesson:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



(@justinamash)

Rep. Kristi Noem (R-S.D.) got a practical gift from her sister. “I think I’m offended,” she tweeted:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@repkristinoem)

Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) tweeted that his dad celebrated his 96th birthday by getting "stuck being our driver:"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@SenJohnThune)

— Instagrams of the day:

Dogs were a constant — and of course cute — theme on Instagram over the holidays.

“Bart,” an explosives detection trained canine, found Santa instead at the Kansas City International airport:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@TSA)

Sen. Steve Daines (R-Mont.) took a walk in the snow with his dogs on Christmas Day:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@stevedaines)

Ben Carson noted that pet lovers could get animal swag at his online store:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@realbencarson)

Former reality TV star Sean Duffy, now a GOP congressman from Wisconsin, showed off his family:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(repseanduffy)

The Sanders campaign posted this picture of a little Bernie and his big brother, Larry, growing up in Brooklyn:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@berniesanders)

Rep. Eric Swalwell (D-Calif.) warned his nephew, Nolan, that he was “not to cool” to be picked up, no matter how old he is:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@repswalwell)

And Sen. Martin Heinrich (D-N.M.) showed the holiday lights along Canyon Road in Santa Fe:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@senatormartinheinrich)

GOOD READS FROM ELSEWHERE:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bill, with Hillary, campaigning for governor of Arkansas in 1978. (The Washington Post)

— New York Times, "How Hillary Clinton went undercover to examine race in education," by Amy Chozick in Dothan, Ala.: "On a humid summer day in 1972, Hillary Rodham walked into this town's new private academy, a couple of cinder-block classrooms erected hurriedly amid fields of farmland, and pretended to be someone else. Playing down her flat Chicago accent, she told the school's guidance counselor that her husband had just taken a job in Dothan, that they were a churchgoing family and that they were looking for a school for their son. The future Mrs. Clinton, then a 24-year-old law student, was working for Marian Wright Edelman, the civil rights activist and prominent advocate for children. Mrs. Edelman had sent her to Alabama to help prove that the Nixon administration was not enforcing the legal ban on granting tax-exempt status to so-called segregation academies, the estimated 200 private academies that sprang up in the South to cater to white families after a 1969 Supreme Court decision forced public schools to integrate. Her mission was simple: Establish whether the Dothan school was discriminating based on race. … A look at Mrs. Clinton's efforts that summer, through archives and interviews with more than 50 local officials, civil rights activists and people who knew her, reveals a summer job that was both out of character for the bookish law student and a moment of awakening."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Donald Trump at Taj Mahal in Atlantic City (Photo by Tom Briglia/FilmMagic)

— Los Angeles Times, "Trump left his mark on Atlantic City — for better and for worse," by Joseph Tanfani: "With his showman's knack for positive spin, he depicts his history in Atlantic City, bankruptcies and all, as more proof of his genius for timing. … The real story of Trump's rise and fall in Atlantic City is more complicated. His casinos were profitable early. As he expanded, though, Trump's aggressive borrowing and go-go strategy left them laboring under high-interest debt. When he decided to leave, in 2009, the exit was far from smooth and graceful; he gave up after last-ditch battles with bondholders. Today, some still love him here, even people who lost money. Others have bitter memories. 'He trampled everyone: the shareholders, the bondholders, the employees, the contractors,' said Sebastian Pignatello, who lives in Flushing, N.Y., near where Trump grew up. An investor who headed a stockholders' committee that tried to recover losses in one Trump bankruptcy, Pignatello says many small businesses had to settle for 'pennies on the dollar.'"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

John Kasich leaves a birthday message for the father of a voter attending his town hall in Salem, New Hampshire, on December 3. (Michael Mathes/AFP/Getty Images)

Kasich campaign touts analytics –> New Hampshire Union Leader, "Primary 'ground games' delve deep into data mining," by Dan Tuohy: "Talking about 'ground game' ahead of New Hampshire's first-in-the-nation Presidential Primary, it seemed appropriate to hear Tom Rath refer to 'Sabermetrics,' the statistical study of baseball to identify player performance. 'It's become more like the analytics approach to baseball,' he said. 'Analytics really drives a lot of the tactical decisions.' His player is John Kasich, the Ohio governor. Rath, a state co-chairman, shared some insight into the Republican presidential hopeful's organization and the use of data-mining technology to target likely voters. … The technology indicates where a campaign is strongest and drills down to the demographics, said John E. Sununu, a former U.S. senator who is Kasich's state chairman. He said the data provides a more objective layer, but experience and expertise remain key to the roadmap."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A long exposure photograph from last week shows the SpaceX Falcon 9 lifting off (L) from its launch pad and then returning to a landing zone (R) at the Cape Canaveral Air Force Station. (Reuters/Mike Brown)

— Daily Beast, "What's next for outer space? " By David Axe: "Elon Musk has called reusability 'the fundamental breakthrough needed to revolutionize access to space.' For decades, government and private space organizations have dreamed of possessing such a multiple-use rocket, believing it will cut down on the high cost—hundreds of millions of dollars per launch—of getting to, and beyond, Earth's orbit. Governments have repeatedly tried and failed to design a launch-and-land rocket. It took a private company headed by an eccentric billionaire inventor to actually get it done following years of experimentation and one high-profile crash in April. Musk and SpaceX's December feat was more than just a technological milestone—it also signaled the coming of age of private space exploration. If 2015 was the year private space firms such as SpaceX, Blue Origin, Virgin Galactic and lunar mining concern Moon Express blasted into the headlines, 2016 could be the year these extraterrestrial companies make substantial progress toward reaching, exploring and profiting from space."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HOT ON THE LEFT

The University of California school system will no longer invest in private prisons after its administrators met with black student groups who were lobbying for the change. From Think Progress: "As a result of mounting student pressure to divest, UC removed its $25 million shares from the Geo Group Inc and Corrections Corporation of America (CCA) — controversial companies linked to human rights abuses across the country."

HOT ON THE RIGHT

Trump, in response to Trey Gowdy's endorsement of Rubio, called the Benghazi hearings a "disaster." From the Washington Examiner: "He did not win with those hearings," Trump said. "It was not good for Republicans and for the country. I hope he does a lot better for Marco than he did with the Benghazi hearings."

DAYBOOK:

–What's happening today on the campaign trail: Donald Trump is holding a rally at 7 p.m. in Nashua, New Hampshire. Marco Rubio holds a town hall in Burlington, Iowa. Chris Christie is campaigning in Dubuque in the afternoon before holding a town hall in Davenport in the evening. Martin O'Malley will attend a leadership forum in Iowa Falls before campaigning in Waterloo and Tama later in the day. John Kasich stops in Manchester and Derry, N.H.

— On the Hill: Recess

–At the White House: President Obama is vacationing in Hawaii.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

QUOTE OF THE DAY:

This summer Bernie Sanders got angry when interviewers suggested he and Trump were both outsiders tapping into discontent with the status quo. Now, a month out from Iowa, he's changing his tune. "Many of Trump's supporters are working class people and they're angry," the democratic socialist said on CBS Sunday. "And they're angry because they're working longer hours for lower wages. They're angry because their jobs have left this country and gone to China or other low wage countries. They're angry because they can't afford to send their kids to college or they can't retire with dignity. And I think what Trump has done successfully, I would say, is take that anger, take that anxiety about terrorism and say to a lot of people in this country, 'Look, the reason for our problems is because of Mexicans.' … For his working class and middle class supporters, I think we can make the case that if we really want to address the issues that people are concerned about … we need policies that bring us together, that take on the greed of Wall Street, the greed of corporate America and create a middle class that works for all of us, rather than an economy that works just for a few."

NEWS YOU CAN USE IF YOU LIVE IN D.C.:

— "It's noticeably colder with overcast skies for much of the day," the Capital Weather Gang forecasts. "Temperatures trickle down through the 40s. During the afternoon, some patchy light rain and/or drizzle may develop from the southwest. Winds are from the east around 10 mph."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

DeSean Jackson and Trent Williams celebrate winning the NFC East division in Philadelphia Saturday. (Photo by Mitchell Leff/Getty Images)

— Playoff bound: The Redskins clinched the NFC East title with a 38-24 win over the Philadelphia Eagles. (Liz Clarke spot story; Mike Jones has five takeaways from the win; and the team savors the berth.)

Meanwhile, the Carolina Panthers' bid for a perfect season ended with a 20-13 loss to the Falcons. (Mark Maske)

— Are we less safe? The District now has fewer than 3,800 police officers, the smallest force in a decade and a number that city officials have previously suggested would be dangerous. "District officials blame the staffing shortfall almost entirely on retirements," Peter Hermann reports . "But the union representing the rank and file says that the exodus also includes officers and street-level supervisors who are leaving with fewer than 10 years on the force. The union argues that this is evidence officers are fleeing a department and a chief they do not like, as well as a crime plan they say will not make the District safer."

— "A state advisory panel is calling for major changes to 'Maryland, My Maryland,' a Civil War-era song that urges Maryland to join the Confederacy, bashes 'Northern scum' — and has survived as the state anthem despite six previous efforts to eliminate it," Ovetta Wiggins reports . The panel offered six recommendations, including the adoption of "The Star-Spangled Banner."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

— Seven hundred pounds of venison, taken from deer shot by sharp shooters in Rock Creek Park, was used to feed the homeless at DC Central Kitchen. (Tara Bahrampour) — Eight Republican candidates trying to unseat Rep. John Delaney (D) in Maryland's 6th Congressional District will face off in an April primary. But no top-tier Republicans are competing for Chris Van Hollen's open seat in Montgomery County, Bill Turque reports .

VIDEOS OF THE DAY:

Ben Carson released a new ad titled "Our Hands," a play on the neurosurgeon's autobiography, "Gifted Hands." The theme is for Americans to unite:

(@realbencarson)

Ted Cruz appealed to social conservatives in a new ad:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@tedcruz)

Charlie Brown was apparently more religious than we remembered:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@funnyordie)

George Lucas talks about what it was like to “break up” with “The Force Awakens”:

(@charlierose)

Queen Elizabeth delivers her Christmas message:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@skynews)

And watch people who received hoverboards and drones for Christmas have some awkward accidents.

You are receiving this email because you signed up for the The Daily 202 newsletter or were registered on washingtonpost.com or were invited as a VIP. For additional free newsletters or to manage your newsletters, click here .

We respect your privacy . If you believe that this email has been sent to you in error, or you no longer wish to receive email from The Washington Post, click here . Contact us for help.

©2015 The Washington Post, 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "The Common Good" <patriciaduff@thecommongood.net>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 1/26/2016 11:09:07 AM
Subject: You are invited...

The Common Good

You are cordially invited to wine reception and remarks with

The Rt. Hon. Lord Christopher Patten
Chancellor of Oxford University and the last Governor of Hong Kong on
The Changing World Order: Europe, Asia & the US

Tuesday, February 2nd
6:15-7:45pm

The Edelman Residence at Park Avenue and 73rd.
Address provided with confirmed RSVP.
Private dinner to follow for Executive Members.

Lord Christopher Patten is a highly respected statesman in Great Britain and around the world. He has served as a major player in British politics who has also helped resolve complex international issues, including the transfer of governance in Hong Kong where he was widely seen as standing up for the colony's rights, and Patten has been an important leader in conflict prevention and crisis management efforts in Northern Ireland, the Balkans, and Asia. He has also served as Chairman of the BBC Trust, overseeing the esteemed British Broadcasting System, even as he very capably dealt with a scandal involving a celebrity employee there.

Drawing from his multifaceted international experience in such roles as European Commissioner of External Affairs-- the EU's Secretary of State, or as Great Britain's last Governor of Hong Kong, Lord Patten will provide an overview of the changing world order and the power shifts, disruptions, and trends that are taking place globally. Patten will brief us on topics ranging from the implications of increased Russian aggressiveness in Eastern Europe and the Middle East, China's economic prospects, to the changing Middle East and an emerging Iran.

Reception/Remarks: 6:15-7:45pm. Edelman residence on Park Avenue near 73rd Street. Address provided with confirmed RSVP.

RSVP

Private Dinner for Executive Members: 8:15-9:45pm at the acclaimed Café Boulud at 20 East 76th Street near Madison Avenue. $250. Seating is limited, must have confirmed RSVP.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

RSVP

If you have any problems registering online, please call (212) 599-7040 or email us at patriciaduff@thecommongood.net.

UPCOMING EVENTS

Meet the Candidate: Congresswoman Tammy Duckworth (D-IL), running for US Senate

Monday, February 29, 2016

Breakfast & remarks: 8-9:30am

RSVP

The Common Good Forum on "Global Disruption: Security and Opportunity"

Friday, May 20, 2016

8:00am-4:00pm, Leading speakers and panels all day on national and economic security and the rapid changes affecting the US, the globe and your life.

RSVP

THE COMMON GOOD
115 East 57th Street, Suite 1010
New York, NY 10022
(212) 599-7040

This email was sent to podesta@law.georgetown.edu
why did I get this? unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences
The Common Good · 115 East 57th St · Suite 1010 · New York, NY 10022 · USA

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Barack Obama" <info@barackobama.com>
To:	"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date:	5/10/2011 1:25:18 PM
Subject:	Fixing what's broken

John --

I went to El Paso, Texas, today to lay out a plan to do something big: fix America's broken immigration system.

It's an issue that affects you, whether you live in a border town like El Paso or not. Our immigration system reflects how we define ourselves as Americans -- who we are, who we will be -- and continued inaction poses serious costs for everyone.

Those costs are human, felt by millions of people here and abroad who endure years of separation or deferred dreams -- and millions more hardworking families whose wages are depressed when employers wrongly exploit a cheap source of labor. That's why immigration reform is also an economic imperative -- an essential step needed to strengthen our middle class, create new industries and new jobs, and make sure America remains competitive in the global economy.

Because this is such a tough problem -- one that politicians in Washington have been either exploiting or dodging, depending on the politics -- this change has to be driven by people like you.

Washington won't act unless you lead.

So if you're willing to do something about this critical issue, join our call for immigration reform now. Those who do will be part of our campaign to educate people on this issue and build the critical mass needed to make Washington act:

http://my.barackobama.com/Immigration-Reform

In recent years, concerns about whether border security and enforcement were tough enough were among the greatest impediments to comprehensive reform. They are legitimate issues that needed to be addressed -- and over the past two years, we have made great strides in enhancing security and enforcement.

We have more boots on the ground working to secure our southwest border than at any time in our history. We're going after employers who knowingly break the law. And we are deporting those who are here illegally. I know the increase in deportations has been a source of controversy, but I want to emphasize that we are focusing our limited resources on violent offenders and people convicted of crimes -- not families or people looking to scrape together an income.

So we've addressed the concerns raised by those who have stood in the way of progress in the past. And now that we have, it's time to build an immigration system that meets our 21st-century economic needs and reflects our values both as a nation of laws and a nation of immigrants.

Today, we provide students from around the world with visas to get engineering and computer science degrees at our top universities. But then our laws discourage them from using those skills to start a business or a new industry here in the United States. That just doesn't make sense.

We also need to stop punishing innocent young people for the actions of their parents -- and pass the DREAM Act so they can pursue higher education or become military service members in the country they know as home. We already know enormous economic benefits from the steady stream of talented and hardworking people coming to America. More than a century and a half ago, U.S. Steel's Andrew Carnegie was a 13-year-old brought here from Scotland by his family in search of a better life. And in 1979, a Russian family seeking freedom from Communism brought a young Sergey Brin to America -- where he would become a co-founder of Google.

Through immigration, we've become an engine of the global economy and a beacon of hope, ingenuity and entrepreneurship. We should make it easier for the best and brightest not only to study here, but also to start businesses and create jobs here. That's how we'll win the future.

Immigration is a complex issue that raises strong feelings. And as we push for long-overdue action, we're going to hear the same sort of ugly rhetoric that has delayed reform for years -- despite long and widespread recognition that our current system fails us all and hurts our economy.

So you and I need to be the ones talking about this issue in the language of hope, not fear -- in terms of how we are made stronger by our differences, and can be made stronger still.

Take a moment now to watch my El Paso speech and join this campaign for change:

http://my.barackobama.com/Immigration-Reform

Thank you,

Barack

DONATE

Paid for by Obama for America

Contributions or gifts to Obama for America are not tax deductible

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This email was sent to: john.podesta@gmail.com
Update address | Unsubscribe

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "t r u t h o u t" <messenger@truthout.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 12/11/2014 10:13:31 AM
Subject: William Rivers Pitt | The Rank, Reeking Horror of Torturing Some Folks

View Recent Newsletters

Tell a friend about Truthout!

Thursday, 11 December 2014

truthout

Donate Today!

Truthout is a 501(c)3 nonprofit organization; donations are tax deductible.

William Rivers Pitt | The Rank, Reeking Horror of Torturing Some Folks

William Rivers Pitt, Truthout: Bush said it didn't happen. Cheney said it did. And Obama said those who tortured are patriots, and those who call it wrong are sanctimonious. Meanwhile, everyone walked. That, right there, is why this whole nightmare came to be.

Read the Article

What They Haven't Told Us About the European Financial Crisis

Michael Nevradakis, Truthout: University of Cambridge economist Ha-Joon Chang, author of 23 Things They Don't Tell You About Capitalism, discusses the ongoing financial crisis in Europe, the economic situation in Greece, the myths surrounding the crisis and the new economic bubble, which he argues is about to burst.

Read the Interview

Fighting for Farm Workers at Our Dinner Tables

Jennifer Keys Adair, Truthout: The movie Food Chains should dramatically raise our collective consciousness - and conscience - about how our food is produced. We need to establish a "slave-free" section at our supermarkets.

Read the Article

Report on CIA Torture Shows Need for Limiting Military Force Against ISIS

Robert Naiman, Truthout: In the absence of greater agitation, limitation and oversight, the national security establishment is likely to get worse, not better, in terms of its accountability to democratic control and the rule of law.

Read the Article

Faith Inc. and Criminal Justice Reform

Kay Whitlock, Critical Mass Progress: Do faith-based programs work better than programs sponsored by the government or secular community-

BuzzFlash

Marissa Alexander: The Rippling Impact of Injustice and Imprisonment

Mark Karlin, BuzzFlash at Truthout: With the highest rate of imprisonment in the world, the United States uses incarceration as a form of social cleansing and bias against people of color, as well as poor people, gender-nonconforming people and people with mental illness.

Read the BuzzFlash Commentary

Cheney Throws Bush Under the Bus on Torture Program

Read the Article at Talking Points Memo

Elizabeth

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

based organizations? That depends on how effectiveness is assessed, what questions are asked and from what vantage point.

Read the Article

"These Are Crimes": New Calls to Prosecute Bush Administration as Senate Report Reveals Brutal CIA Torture

Amy Goodman, Democracy Now!: "In light of the release of the Senate torture report, Reed Brody, counsel and spokesperson for Human Rights Watch, says, "When individuals commit torture, we call on those countries to hold the abusers to account." So far, however, the only one charged with a crime is the whistleblower who exposed the CIA program.

Watch the Video and Read the Transcript

Is the Koch Brothers' Curriculum Coming to Your Child's School?

The Daily Take Team, The Thom Hartmann Program: It's bad enough that the Koch brothers have a stranglehold on our democracy and political system, courtesy of our Supreme Court. We don't need them in our classrooms, too.

Read the Article

How the President Who Pledged to Banish Nuclear Weapons Is Enabling Their Renewal

James Carroll, TomDispatch: In order to get the Senate Republicans to ratify the Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty, Obama laid the groundwork for a vast "modernization" of the US nuclear arsenal, which is already morphing into a full-blown reinvention of the arms cache at an estimated future cost of more than $1 trillion.

Read the Article

When Charter Schools Are Nonprofit in Name Only

Marian Wang, ProPublica: Some charters pass along nearly all their money to for-profit companies hired to manage the schools. It's an arrangement that's raising eyebrows.

Read the Article

Twenty Key Findings From the Senate Report on CIA Torture

Staff, Moyers & Company: After months of wrangling with intelligence officials, the Senate Intelligence Committee released a summary of its 6,700-page report on the CIA's detention and interrogation programs under President George W. Bush. Here are the key findings.

Read the Article

Would You Rather Get Your Water From Your City Government - or From a Corporation?

Michelle Chen, The Nation: Detroit's water crisis may seem like an anomaly, but we may soon see more resource crises nationwide if pro-business officials decide water isn't so much an essential entitlement as it is a commodity to be traded like corn and crude oil.

Warren Leads Liberal Rebellion on Spending Bill

Read the Article at The Washington Post

The Militarized Divide in This Shattered Nation

Read the Article at BuzzFlash

Rumain Brisbon Is Just the Latest to Be Shot Dead by a Cop Over a Phantom Gun

Read the Article at Mother Jones

Only Half of Global Banks Have Policy to Respect Human Rights

Read the Article at Inter Press Service

"Corrupt, Toxic and Sociopathic": Glenn Greenwald Unloads on Torture, CIA and Washington's Rotten Soul

Read the Article at Salon

Sen. Udall Discloses CIA Findings on Torture and Blasts Obama's Inaction

Read the Article at The Nation

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Read the Article

Call Congress to Oppose Back-Room Wall Street Deal

Isaiah J. Poole, Campaign for America's Future: Activists are calling for an all-out push today to stop a back-room deal that would reopen the Wall Street derivatives casino that caused so much damage in 2008, leaving taxpayers stuck with the bill for cleaning up the mess.

Read the Article and Watch the Video

Support Truthout with a tax-deductible donation

Please add messenger@truthout.org to ensure you receive our messages

Truthout is a proud member of the New spaper Guild/CWA, Local 36047

Subscribe | Unsubscribe

Privacy Policy

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To:	CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date:	1/16/2015 7:14:07 AM
Subject:	1.16.15 CTR Weekend TPs
Attachments:	1.15.15 Weekend Package.docx

Hi all,

Please find Correct The Record's weekend talking points package both attached and below.

1.15.15 Weekend Package

1. Hillary Clinton: Race and Criminal Justice System
2. Hillary Clinton: Energy and the Environment
3. Hillary Clinton: Tough on Terrorism
4. Hillary Clinton: A Lifetime Champion of the Middle Class

HILLARY CLINTON'S REMARKS ON RACE AND OUR CRIMINAL JUSTICE SYSTEM

BACKGROUND: At an event in New York for the Robert F. Kennedy Center for Justice and Human Rights, Hillary Clinton once again addressed the issue of race relations and our criminal justice system in light of the events in Ferguson, Missouri and Staten Island. She previously addressed this issue in Boston, as well as in San Francisco last summer.

Highlights from Hillary's remarks on December 16, 2014:

"We can stand up together and say 'Yes, black lives matter.'"

"[Robert Kennedy] understood everyone in every community benefitted when there is respect for the law, and when everyone in every community is respected by the law."

"Policies, politics, priorities matter, but values matter even more. And it is possible…to restore a sense of community and potential to families struggling, worrying, disappointed, discouraged, revitalizing and re-stitching the fraying fabric of American life. It is possible to keep us safe from terrorism and reduce crime and violence without relying on torture abroad or unnecessary force or excessive incarceration at home."

"African American men are still far more likely to be stopped and searched by the police, charged with crimes, and sentenced to longer prison terms…a third of all black men face the prospect of prison during their lifetimes, and by some estimates, young black men are more than 20 times more likely to be shot dead by a police officer than a young white man."

"We know that there are so many police officers out there every day inspiring trust and confidence, rather than fear and frustration; honorably doing their duty; putting themselves on the line to save lives, not take them. We can build on that. We can work to restore the balance to our public life, our economy."

Highlights from Hillary's remarks on December 4, 2014:

"I know that a lot of hearts are breaking, and we are asking ourselves, 'Aren't these our sons? Aren't these our brothers?'"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Each of us has to grapple with some hard truths about race and justice in America…When one stops and realizes a third of all Black men face the prospect of prison during their lifetimes, what devastating consequences that has for their families, and their communities, and all of us."

"We have allowed our criminal justice system to get out of balance. And I personally hope that these tragedies give us the opportunity to come together as a nation to find our balance again."

"I'm very pleased that the Department of Justice will be investigating what happened in Ferguson or Staten Island. Those families and those communities and our country deserve a full and fair accounting as well as whatever substantive reforms are necessary to ensure equality, justice, and respect for every citizen…I support the President's announcement of a task force on policing."

"We all know there are decent, honorable, brave police officers out in our communities every single day, inspiring trust and confidence rather than fear and frustration. So let's learn from the best examples. Let's invest in what works."

"The most important thing each of us can do is to try even harder to see the world through our neighbors' eyes. To imagine what it is like to walk in their shoes, to share their pain and their hopes and their dreams. These tragedies did not happen in some far-away place. They didn't happen to some other people. These are our streets, our children, our fellow Americans, and our grief…We are all in this together, we can all do better."

Highlights from Hillary's remarks on August 28, 2014:

- "Watching the recent funeral for Michael Brown, as a mother, as a human being, my heart just broke for his family because losing a child is every parent's greatest fear and an unimaginable loss."
- "This is what happens when the bonds of trust and respect that hold any community together fray. Nobody wants to see our streets look like a war zone, not in America. We are better than that."
- "We cannot ignore the inequities that persist in our justice system. Inequities that undermine our most deeply held values of fairness and equality."
- "Imagine what we would feel and what we would do if white drivers were three times as likely to be searched by police during a traffic stop as black drivers, instead of the other way around. If white offenders received prison sentences ten percent longer than black offenders for the same crimes. If a third of all white men – just look at this room and take one-third – went to prison during their lifetime. Imagine that. That is the reality in the lives of so many of our fellow Americans and so many of the communities in which they live."
- "I applaud President Obama for sending the Attorney General to Ferguson and demanding a thorough and speedy investigation. That's both appropriate and necessary to find out what happened, to see that justice is done, to help this community begin healing itself."
- "It was 51 years ago today that Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. called us to live out the true meaning of our creed, to make the dream real for all Americans. And that mission is as fiercely urgent today as when he stood on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial in the hot August sun all those years ago. So we have a lot of work to do together."

TALKING POINTS: HILLARY CLINTON ON ENERGY AND THE ENVIRONMENT

"So to those who doubt the science of climate change and who lack faith in American innovation, just tell them, look at the record and look at what's already happening across the United States … We are already advancing clean energy solutions that can begin turning this tide and can make America the clean energy superpower for the 21st century. We have the opportunity to invest in the infrastructure of the future resilient enough to withstand the effects of climate change we won't be able to avoid..." – Hillary Clinton remarks to the League of Conservation Voters, 12/1/14

MESSAGE: Hillary Clinton recognizes the realities of climate change and has fought to move to cleaner energy to create green jobs, boost our economy and preserve the natural wonder of creation for the next generation.

- In the Senate, Hillary Clinton boosted alternative energy power and fought for clean energy solutions.
  - Hillary Clinton voted for tax credits for electricity produced from renewable energy sources and proposed permanent tax credits for wind and solar production.
  - She proposed getting big oil companies to reinvest some of their excess profits toward developing smarter energy technologies like fuel-efficient cars and wind and solar power.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Senator Clinton repeatedly cosponsored the Clean Power Act to get power plants to reduce harmful air pollution.
- She introduced legislation to make federal buildings more energy efficient.
- Hillary cosponsored the Diesel Emissions Reductions Act to increase investment in technologies to reduce pollution from diesel-powered trucks.

- As Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton prioritized the fight against climate change as a matter of foreign policy.
  - Secretary Clinton appointed a Special Envoy for Climate Change to serve as an advisor on international climate change policy.
  - She established the Bureau of Energy Resources to channel the domestic energy boom to advance American interests around the world and address the threat of climate change posed by the world's energy consumption. [combined two bullets from other two sets of TPs]
  - During Secretary Clinton's tenure, the Bureau of Energy Resources helped European nations reduce their dependence on Russian gas, lessening Putin's leverage over Ukraine and Europe's energy supply.

- Secretary Clinton led the way through partnerships and developed incentives to encourage cooperation and progress toward reducing our footprint on the environment.
  - Secretary Clinton helped negotiate an unprecedented agreement between all major economies to commit to curb carbon emissions through 2020.
  - She promoted the development of clean energy projects in a regional partnership with countries in North, Central, and South America and the Caribbean through the Energy and Climate Partnership of the Americas.
  - She signed an agreement with Brazil to strengthen cooperation as our countries work together to meet the grave challenge of global climate change.
  - She implemented 18 EcoPartnerships with China to collaborate on clean energy, sustainable development, and environmental issues.
  - She launched the U.S. Africa Clean Energy Finance Initiative to drive private sector investment into Africa's clean energy sector.
  - Recognizing that dirty cookstoves kill nearly 2 million people a year and are harmful to the environment, Secretary Clinton took action and launched the Global Alliance for Clean Cookstoves in order to save lives and protect our planet.

TALKING POINTS: TOUGH ON TERRORISM

MESSAGE: In a changing and unpredictable world, Hillary Clinton's leadership on issues of national security has kept America secure and helped make the world a safer place.

KEY POINTS:

As Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton worked through diplomatic channels to help the United States fight terrorism and safeguard our national security.

- Secretary Clinton made the case for the raid to bring Osama bin Laden to justice.
- Clinton built relationships with key players in the Middle East and funded counterterrorism training initiatives.
  - Through negotiations with Russia, Clinton successfully worked to reduce the number of nuclear missile launchers in the world.
  - Clinton built and maintained a coalition to enact the toughest sanctions in Iran's history in order to encourage Iran to abandon, or at least stall, its nuclear program.
  - Clinton negotiated the Gaza cease-fire between Israelis and Palestinians, helping avert an all-out war in Gaza.
  - Clinton played a role to end the war in Iraq and begin a transition to civilian society in Afghanistan.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Clinton instituted new roles at the State Department to fight terrorism:
  - Clinton created the Center for Strategic Counterterrorism Communications to combat Al-Qaeda's growing influence online.
  - Clinton established the Bureau of Counterterrorism to advance counterterrorism objectives and our national security.

- Clinton identified and led on important issues which affect our national security, such as the global empowerment of women and climate change.
  - Clinton worked to empower women and girls around the world to participate in their economies. This helps make economies stronger and more stable.
  - Clinton prioritized addressing climate change in her time at the State Department. Weather events caused by climate change can lead to famine and destroyed infrastructure, which increase instability and unrest.

Serving as a United States Senator representing New York during September 11, 2001, Hillary Clinton made it a priority to urge the pursuit of justice against Al Qaeda and improve our nation's efforts to combat terrorism.

TALKING POINTS: HILLARY CLINTON: A LIFETIME CHAMPION OF THE MIDDLE CLASS

"With all due respect, it is not rich people who made America great. It is the vast American middle class. It is the upward mobility of people who thought they could do better than their parents."

–Hillary Clinton

MESSAGE: Hillary Clinton has dedicated her life to ensuring that hardworking Americans can succeed. In uncertain times, families need faith that opportunity for their children and grandchildren is alive and well. Hillary Clinton wants the American Dream to be a real possibility for every child and every family across our nation.

Hillary Clinton knows that tomorrow's shared success starts with today's child, and her dedication to children began long before she ever entered public office. In fact, her first job out of law school was for the newly-formed Children's Defense Fund, an organization she would later chair.

Hillary Clinton has worked to expand access to early childhood education for children of lower-income families. As First Lady of Arkansas, Hillary Clinton introduced her husband to the HIPPY program, which expanded early childhood education to economically disadvantaged children. In the Senate, Clinton partnered with Kit Bond in an effort to expand voluntary full-day pre-K for children from low-income families. Today, as part of the Too Small to Fail Initiative to improve the health and well-being of children five and under, Hillary Clinton is working to close the "word gap" for kids in low-income families who often have smaller vocabularies than their classmates.

Hillary Clinton has worked to increase health coverage for millions of children in low-income and working families through the State Children's Health Insurance Program, a program she helped created as First Lady. In the Senate, Hillary Clinton looked for ways to strengthen the program, introducing bills to allow states to expand it.

Hillary Clinton's record proves she believes that every American should be able to earn an equal day's pay for an equal day's work. As a Senator, Hillary Clinton introduced the Paycheck Fairness Act and was an original cosponsor of the Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act.

In the Senate, Hillary Clinton supported increasing the minimum wage and voted repeatedly to protect and increase it. She was an original cosponsor of the Fair Minimum Wage Act of 2007, and authored the 2006 and 2007 Standing with Minimum Wage Act to tie Congressional salary increases to an increase in the minimum wage.

As a Senator, Hillary Clinton supported progressive tax policies that required millionaires to pay their fair share. She opposed tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans and corporations in 2001 and 2003, and she supported a variety of middle-class tax cuts, including tax credits for student loan recipients, and keeping in place the tax cuts for those who make under $250,000 a year.

- Clinton has said "that inherited wealth and concentrated wealth is not good for America," and she has consistently voted against repealing the estate tax on millionaires, doing so in 2001, 2002, and 2006.

Hillary Clinton supported working families going through difficult times through no fault of their own. In the Senate, she was a bipartisan leader on fighting to extend emergency unemployment benefits.

BOTTOM LINE: Leading the charge for equal pay for equal work, fighting to increase wages, strongly advocating for progressive tax policies and access to education and healthcare to help middle-class families – Hillary Clinton has fought for an America and a future where everyone can rise to their potential.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HILLARY CLINTON'S RECENT STATEMENTS ON THE MIDDLE CLASS

In her many public appearances over the past year, Hillary Clinton has continued to advocate for the middle class by sharing her vision all over the country:

In a speech to a women-focused event for Democrat Tom Wolf, "Clinton focused on 'hard-working families' and restoring America's luster and a strong middle class with 'a fresh start.'" According to Politico, Clinton "gave one of her strongest political speeches since her 2008 campaign ended in June 2008 as she headlined a women-focused event for Democratic gubernatorial Tom Wolf in Pennsylvania. Clinton focused on 'hard-working families' and restoring America's luster and a strong middle class with 'a fresh start,' as well as women's pay equity and her gauzy first days as a new grandmother. For the first time in months, Clinton's public talk was neither a dry recitation of public policy nor a self-reflection about her tenure as secretary of state." [Politico , 10/9/14]

Clinton's language at a women-focused event for Democrat Tom Wolf was "some of her strongest about rebuilding the middle class." According to Politico, "The remarks were some of her strongest about rebuilding the middle class. They came after she was accused of being out of touch for her comment in June about being 'dead broke' when she left the White House, and for giving paid speeches at exorbitant prices." [Politico , 10/9/14]

The theme of Clinton's speech at an event for Pennsylvania gubernatorial candidate Tom Wolf was working families. According to BuzzFeed, "The thread running through Clinton's message here in Pennsylvania, the state she won six years ago in a primary against Barack Obama, was working families — a theme she teased repeatedly throughout her speech with populist undertones, mentions of her granddaughter, and stories about her own trips as a child to Scranton, where Clinton's father, Hugh, was born to a working-class immigrant family." [BuzzFeed , 9/9/14]

In Pennsylvania, Clinton criticized the power of corporations, siding with middle-class families. According to the Wall Street Journal, "Though she and her husband have raised more than $1 billion from U.S. companies and corporate officials over the last two decades, Mrs. Clinton signaled that she sided with everyday families struggling to pay bills and keep afloat. Corporations, she said, 'seem to have all the rights, but none of the responsibilities of people …' She decried practices that pay women less than men for the same work and took aim at politicians who've belittled women's rights. 'A 20th century economy will not work for 21st century families,' she said." [Wall Street Journal , 9/9/14]

Hillary Clinton's speeches are revealing a theme that she would fight to restore and re-open the middle class. According to TPM, "The notion of 'upward mobility' was central to Clinton's message to the New American audience in May. She described it as 'time-tested wisdom' that was 'at the heart of what I believe is the basic bargain of America.'… Here is how Clinton described that basic bargain of America, as she sees it, in May: 'No matter who you are or where you come from, if you work hard and play by the rules, you'll have the opportunity to build a good life for yourself and your family.'" [TPM , 9/22/14]

Hillary Clinton's speeches are revealing a theme that she can address income inequality and gender inequality. According to TPM, "So income inequality has been a big part of the message. But it's also been married to inequality between the sexes. At both the New American and CAP events, the same factoid made an appearance: That three-quarters of jobs that rely on tips -- like 'waiters, bartenders and hairstylists' as she said on both occasions -- are held by women…. And she said Thursday that these issues should be used to mobilize voters -- in the 2014 midterms and moving forward." [TPM , 9/22/14]

In recent speeches, Clinton has taken a tougher stance on big business, likely in "an effort to find the balance between populism and her familiar centrism" she may need in 2016, according to Reuters. According to Reuters, "Long viewed as an ally by Wall Street, likely 2016 presidential contender Hillary Clinton has increasingly been taking banks and big business to task while on the campaign trail for Democrats across the country…. This is a change of tone for the former New York senator, who faced criticism for her Wall Street ties as recently as September, after appearing with Goldman Sachs (GS.N) chief executive Lloyd Blankfein. Allies and analysts see it as an effort to find the balance between populism and her familiar centrism that Clinton may need in order to broaden her appeal in a potential 2016 Democratic primary contest." [Reuters , 11/2/14]

During a New Hampshire midterm event, Clinton discussed expanding economic opportunity and raising the minimum wage. According to the Boston Globe, "Clinton spoke in New Hampshire about expanding economic opportunity, raising the minimum wage, and protecting women's rights. She acknowledged that, across the country, there is 'a lot of anxiety and insecurity.' But the former secretary of state and US senator from New York struck a hopeful note: She bookended her remarks talking about her new granddaughter and said seeing another generation in the family focuses the mind on what's important. Clinton said she and her husband were raised to believe the American Dream was within your reach if you worked hard. 'You should not,' Clinton told a packed gymnasium, 'have to be the grandchild of a governor or a senator or a former secretary of state or a former president to believe that the American Dream is in your reach.'" [Boston Globe , 11/2/14]

In midterm campaign appearances, Clinton has been echoing populist notes. According to Bloomberg, Clinton "has been sounding more populist notes of late as a campaign-trail advocate for Democratic candidates who are on the ballot next week. That's an important turn as she contemplates a run for president in 2016 because Clinton's biggest weakness among Democrats, and some Republicans, is the perception that she's too close to Wall Street and corporate America…. And the more anti-corporate tone is pleasing to the ears of liberals who have pined for Senator Elizabeth Warren, a scourge of Wall Street banks, to challenge Clinton for the Democratic nomination. And, they say, it's a message Clinton can use against Republicans because many in the GOP have turned wary of Wall Street and big corporations since the 2008 financial crash." [Bloomberg , 10/27/14]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

During a midterm appearance in New York, Clinton clarified earlier comments about companies and job creation, while maintaining the same theme: "Clinton's for the little guy." According to Bloomberg, "Days after Republicans feasted on her claim that corporations don't create jobs, Hillary Clinton tried Monday to 'be absolutely clear about what I've been saying for a couple of decades.' 'So-called trickle-down economics has failed,' Clinton said as she stumped for Representative Sean Patrick Maloney in New York. 'Our economy grows when businesses and entrepreneurs create good-paying jobs here in an America where workers and families are empowered to build from the bottom up and the middle out–not when we hand out tax breaks for corporations that outsource jobs or stash their profits overseas.' While campaigning Friday for Massachusetts gubernatorial candidate Martha Coakley, Clinton created a stir–and drew criticism from Republicans–by saying, 'Don't let anybody tell you that it's corporations and businesses that create jobs.'…The cleaned-up message, though, hits at the same theme: Clinton's for the little guy." [Bloomberg , 10/27/14]

While campaigning for Democrats in the midterm election, Clinton frequently tells voters that "everyone deserves a second chance, a third chance." According to a CNN, an investigation into Clinton's most common lines on the trail found that Clinton frequently tells voters, "'Everyone deserves a second chance, a third chance...' Clinton has focused a great deal on economic populism on the stump, an issue other Democrats thinking about seeking the presidency in 2016 have started to tweak Clinton on. 'Everyone deserves a second chance, a third chance to keep going and to make something of themselves,' Clinton said in Iowa earlier this year. 'That was one of the most important lessons of my life.' Clinton usually uses the line to encourage compassion from a crowd, and to show that she has compassion, too." [CNN , 10/28/14]

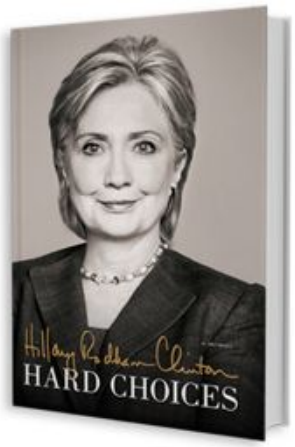
In a San Francisco speech, Clinton revealed some of what may be her economic message: "Who's on your side?" According to the Washington Post, "Here in San Francisco on Monday, Clinton gave a spirited call to arms to Democrats as she road-tested what is likely to be her economic message if she runs again. The November midterms, she said, come down 'to a simple question: Who's on your side?' She sounded close to her party's populist marrow when she decried the erosion of economic security for many working Americans, and a long way from her tone-deaf remark earlier this year about being 'dead broke' when she and Bill Clinton left the White House in 2000. 'It's time to elect leaders who will fight for everyone to get a fair shot at the American dream,' Hillary Clinton said." [Washington Post , 10/21/14]

Hillary Clinton's speeches are revealing a theme that she could finish the economic recovery begun by Obama. According to TPM, "Clinton seems to have a handle of the line she wants to toe: Obama saved us from worse economic struggles (as his defenders have been saying for years), but the work isn't over. Implicit, of course, is that she -- if she runs -- would finish the job. 'We haven't seen a full recovery from the economic crash,' Clinton said Thursday at CAP. 'When the president came in, he deserves an enormous amount of credit for staunching the bleeding and preventing a further deterioration and getting us out of that ditch we were in. But we know unless we change our policies, a lot of the benefits are not going to be broadly shared.' 'It's not just about more jobs for more people and better paying jobs,' she said. 'It's making sure that the people themselves get to keep those benefits and build that future back that they are so desperate to see for themselves.'" [TPM , 9/22/14]

In an interview with PBS, Hillary said : "Bill and I have had terrific opportunities, both of us…have worked hard, but we've been grateful for everything that we've been able to achieve, and sadly that's just not true for most Americans today…It's important that we all try to figure out what we're going to do, and that's what I've done my entire life, fighting for a higher minimum wage, or family leave…equal pay for equal work…I think my record speaks for itself."

At a speech at the Aspen Ideas Festival, Hillary said : "At the end of the day, we're all on the same team. We're on the American team. And we've got to do a better job of getting our economy growing again and producing results and renewing the American Dream so that Americans feel that they have a stake in the future and that the economy and the political system is not stacked against them, because that will erode the trust that is at the basis of our democracy."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



From: "Dan Schwerin" <dschwerin.hrco@gmail.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 5/27/2014 3:01:59 AM
Subject: Author's Note

John, I have to tell you that I loved both your walk-about on the Mall and seeing you with your son in Afghanistan — so glad you got to do that! I wanted to give you a heads up that this morning we released the Author's Note for Hard Choices: http://www.hillaryclintonmemoir.com/excerpt . I will be very curious to hear what you think. Hopefully a grown-up conversation about the choices and trade-offs we face in the world will resonate with readers tired of both triumphalism and defeatism. We'll see!

Best,

Dan

AUTHOR'S NOTE

All of us face hard choices in our lives. Some face more than their share. We have to decide how to balance the demands of work and family. Caring for a sick child or an aging parent. Figuring out how to pay for college. Finding a good job, and what to do if you lose it. Whether to get married—or stay married. How to give our kids the opportunities they dream about and deserve. Life is about making such choices. Our choices and how we handle them shape the people we become. For leaders and nations, they can mean the difference between war and peace, poverty and prosperity.

I'm eternally grateful that I was born to loving and supportive parents in a country that offered me every opportunity and blessing—factors beyond my control that set the stage for the life I've led and the values and faith I've embraced. When I chose to leave a career as a young lawyer in Washington to move to Arkansas to marry Bill and start a family, my friends asked, "Are you out of your mind?" I heard similar questions when I took on health care reform as First Lady, ran for office myself, and accepted President Barack Obama's offer to represent our country as Secretary of State.

In making these decisions, I listened to both my heart and my head. I followed my heart to Arkansas; it burst with love at the birth of our daughter, Chelsea; and it ached with the losses of my father and mother. My head urged me forward in my education and professional choices.

And my heart and head together sent me into public service. Along the way, I've tried not to make the same mistake twice, to learn, to adapt, and to pray for the wisdom to make better choices in the future.

What's true in our daily lives is also true at the highest levels of government. Keeping America safe, strong, and prosperous presents an endless set of choices, many of which come with imperfect information and conflicting imperatives. Perhaps the most famous example from my four years as Secretary of State was President Obama's order to send a team of Navy SEALs into a moonless Pakistani night to bring Osama bin Laden to justice. The President's top advisors were divided. The intelligence was compelling, but far from definitive. The risks of failure were daunting. The stakes were significant for America's national security, our battle against al Qaeda, and our relationship with Pakistan. Most of all, the lives of those brave SEALs and helicopter pilots hung in the balance. It was as crisp and courageous a display of leadership as I've ever seen.

This book is about choices I made as Secretary of State and those made by President Obama and other leaders around the world. Some chapters are about events that made headlines; others are about the trendlines that will continue to define our world for future generations.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Of course, quite a few important choices, characters, countries, and events are not included here. To give them all the space they deserve, I would need many more pages. I could fill a whole book just with thanks to the talented and dedicated colleagues I relied on at the State Department. I have enormous gratitude for their service and friendship.

As Secretary of State I thought of our choices and challenges in three categories: The problems we inherited, including two wars and a global financial crisis; the new, often unexpected events and emerging threats, from the shifting sands of the Middle East to the turbulent waters of the Pacific to the uncharted terrain of cyberspace; and the opportunities presented by an increasingly networked world that could help lay the foundation for American prosperity and leadership in the 21st century.

I approached my work with confidence in our country's enduring strengths and purpose, and humility about how much remains beyond our knowledge and control. I worked to reorient American foreign policy around what I call "smart power." To succeed in the 21st century, we need to integrate the traditional tools of foreign policy—diplomacy, development assistance, and military force—while also tapping the energy and ideas of the private sector and empowering citizens, especially the activists, organizers, and problem solvers we call civil society, to meet their own challenges and shape their own futures. We have to use all of America's strengths to build a world with more partners and fewer adversaries, more shared responsibility and fewer conflicts, more good jobs and less poverty, more broadly based prosperity with less damage to our environment.

As is usually the case with the benefit of hindsight, I wish we could go back and revisit certain choices. But I'm proud of what we accomplished. This century began traumatically for our country, with the terrorist attacks on 9/11, the long wars that followed, and the Great Recession. We needed to do better, and I believe we did.

These years were also a personal journey for me, both literally (I ended up visiting 112 countries and traveling nearly one million miles) and figuratively, from the painful end of the 2008 campaign to an unexpected partnership and friendship with my former rival Barack Obama. I've served our country in one way or another for decades. Yet during my years as Secretary of State, I learned even more about our exceptional strengths and what it will take for us to compete and thrive at home and abroad.

I hope this book will be of use to anyone who wants to know what America stood for in the early years of the 21st century, as well as how the Obama Administration confronted great challenges in a perilous time.

While my views and experiences will surely be scrutinized by followers of Washington's long-running soap opera—who took what side, who opposed whom, who was up and who was down—I didn't write this book for them.

I wrote it for Americans and people everywhere who are trying to make sense of this rapidly changing world of ours, who want to understand how leaders and nations can work together and why they sometimes collide, and how their decisions affect all our lives: How a collapsing economy in Athens, Greece, affects businesses in Athens, Georgia. How a revolution in Cairo, Egypt, impacts life in Cairo, Illinois. What a tense diplomatic encounter in St. Petersburg, Russia, means for families in St. Petersburg, Florida.

Not every story in this book has a happy ending or even an ending yet—that's not the world we live in—but all of them are stories about people we can learn from whether we agree with them or not. There are still heroes out there: peacemakers who persevered when success seemed impossible, leaders who ignored politics and pressure to make tough decisions, men and women with the courage to leave the past behind in order to shape a new and better future. These are some of the stories I tell.

I wrote this book to honor the exceptional diplomats and development experts whom I had the honor of leading as America's sixty-seventh Secretary of State. I wrote it for anyone anywhere who wonders whether the United States still has what it takes to lead. For me, the answer is a resounding "Yes." Talk of America's decline has become commonplace, but my faith in our future has never been greater. While there are few problems in today's world that the United States can solve alone, there are even fewer that can be solved without the United States. Everything that I have done and seen has convinced me that America remains the "indispensable nation." I am just as convinced, however, that our leadership is not a birthright. It must be earned by every generation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And it will be—so long as we stay true to our values and remember that, before we are Republicans or Democrats, liberals or conservatives, or any of the other labels that divide us as often as define us, we are Americans, all with a personal stake in our country.

When I began this book, shortly after leaving the State Department, I considered a number of titles. Helpfully, the Washington Post asked its readers to send in suggestions. One proposed "It Takes a World," a fitting sequel to It Takes a Village. My favorite was "The Scrunchie Chronicles: 112 Countries and It's Still All about My Hair."

In the end, the title that best captured my experiences on the high wire of international diplomacy and my thoughts and feelings about what it will take to secure American leadership for the 21st century was Hard Choices.

One thing that has never been a hard choice for me is serving our country. It has been the greatest honor of my life.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace" <info@centerpeace.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 7/8/2015 3:46:34 AM
Subject: News Update - July 8, 2015

S. DANIEL ABRAHAM
CENTER FOR MIDDLE EAST PEACE

Israel and the Middle East News Update

Wednesday, July 8

Click here for a printer-friendly version.

Headlines:

- US: Iran Nuclear Talks Extended to Friday
- Top IDF Officers Back Partial Lifting of Gaza Blockade
- Beduin leader: PA would Restart Talks if Israel froze Settlements
- Hamas Close to Restoring Pre-War Rocket Capabilities
- Egypt's Sissi tells U.S. Jews: Peace will Help End Terrorism
- Palestinian FM: France Drops UN Effort to Kickstart Peace
- Israeli Minister Says Reform Jews Are Not Really Jewish

Commentary:

- Associated Press:"Boycott Drive Gains Strength, Raising Alarm in Israel"
  - By Tia Goldenberg
- The National Interest: "Assessing an Iran Deal: 5 Big Lessons from History"
  - By Graham Allison

Ynet News

US: Iran Nuclear Talks Extended to Friday

Iran and major powers will continue negotiations on a nuclear deal to Friday, July 10, past a deadline for a long-term agreement, which is set to expire later on Tuesday, State Department spokesperson Marie Harf confirmed. Harf also said that talks had made "substantial progress. We're frankly more concerned about the quality of the deal than we are about the clock, though we also know that difficult decisions won't get any easier with." But a source close to the talks said Tuesday that contrary to statements made by Iranian officials, the negotiations were not open-ended or without a deadline. "We've come to the end," the source added. "We have just made one, final extension. It is hard to see how or why we would go beyond this. Either it happens in the next 48 hours, or not."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Times of Israel

Top IDF Officers Back Partial Lifting of Gaza Blockade

A panel of senior IDF officers believes the path to long-lasting quiet in the Gaza Strip lies through a partial lifting of the blockade, combined with measures to increase freedom of movement and stimulate the coastal area's dire economic straits. The officers made the remarks in a recent briefing with Defense Minister Moshe Ya'alon. The comments come as both sides mark a year since the start of the last year's 50-day conflict between Israel and Hamas. According to the officers' recommendations, Israel should allow thousands of Gaza's residents to pass through its territory and enter Jordan via the Allenby Bridge in the West Bank, if they so choose.

Jerusalem Post

Beduin leader: PA would Restart Talks if Israel froze Settlements

Insert new text here. INSERT NEW TEXT HERE. Insert new text here. INSERT NEW TEXT HERE. Insert new text here. Insert new text here. INSERT NEW TEXT HERE. Insert new text here. INSERT NEW TEXT HERE. Insert new text here.PA President Abbas says he would restart peace talks if Israel froze settlement construction, Zidan Kaabiya, head of Forum of Northern Beduin Council, told The Jerusalem Post on Tuesday. Abbas met in Ramallah with representatives of Israeli Beduin over the weekend. Kaabiya said Abbas sees Israeli Beduin as a bridge to mediate between the sides. "Abbas asked that we pass a message to President Reuven Rivlin that he is against violence and wants negotiations," said Kaabiya. "No one from the Israeli government has contacted us", continued Kaabiya, though he added that Rivlin did respond that the visit was important. "I asked him his conditions to return to talks, and he said one small thing, to stop settlement building – not to tear down anything," Kaabiya said.

Ynet News

Hamas Close to Restoring Pre-War Rocket Capabilities

The IDF's Southern Command said last summer's operation in Gaza was the biggest and most significant Israel has ever fought against the Palestinians in general and in the Strip in particular. At the end of Operation Protective Edge, Army Intelligence estimated that over two-thirds of Hamas' rockets were destroyed in the fighting. A source in the Southern Command said Tuesday that Hamas has yet to restore its rockets stock to what it was before the war, but that it was getting closer to doing so.

See also, "A year on, army looks to last Gaza war for lessons on fighting the next one" (Times of Israel)

Ha'aretz

Sissi tells U.S. Jews: Peace will Help End Terrorism

Resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict will help put an end to terror, Egyptian President Abdel-Fattah al-Sissi told group of U.S. Jews on Monday, according to an official statement released by his government. In a meeting with representatives of the American Jewish Committee (AJC) in Cairo, Sissi said that Palestinian issue served as catalyst for people from around the region joining what he described as "terrorists organizations," the presidential statement said. According to the statement, Sissi said that international assurances were needed to encourage Israel to reach a deal with the Palestinians and foster hope among Palestinians to support peace.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ha'aretz

Pal. FM: France Drops UN Effort to Kickstart Peace

Palestinian Authority Foreign Minister Riad al-Malki said Tuesday that a French diplomatic bid to advance a United Nations resolution to restart the peace process between Israel and the Palestinians has been abandoned by the Élysée Palace in wake of pressure by Israel and the U.S. Senior Palestinian officials in Ramallah who spoke with Ha'aretz said that al-Malki's comments were not entirely accurate, and that it was more his analysis of the updates he had received on the matter than information based on an official decision by the French. Al-Maliki told the Voice of Palestine radio station in an interview Tuesday said that "the French initiative to put forward a UN Security Council resolution based on the two-state solution and renewing peace talks is no longer topping the agenda of French leadership and they have withdrawn [from the idea]."Al-Malki reportedly further claimed that the French change of heart was a result of pressure by Israel and the U.S., with the later reportedly saying that it should remain off the diplomatic docket until a deal is reached with Iran.

New York Times

Israeli Minister: Reform Jews Are Not Really Jewish

Israel's strictly Orthodox minister of religious services said Tuesday that he did not consider Reform Jews to be Jewish, inflaming internal discord over religious issues and underscoring tensions with American Jews, who mostly belong to the more liberal streams of Conservative and Reform Judaism. "The moment a Reform Jew stops following the religion of Israel, let's say there's a problem," the minister, David Azoulay of the Shas party, said on Army Radio, adding, "I cannot allow myself to call such a person a Jew." Mr. Azoulay said he did not want to be the one to determine who is a Jew and who is not. When he was asked specifically about American Reform Jews, Mr. Azoulay referred to people who "try to fake and do not carry out the religious law properly, and give it other interpretations." "These are Jews who erred along the way," he added.

See also, " Netanyahu rejects minister's 'hurtful' claim Reform Jews can't be called Jews (Ha'aretz)

Associated Press – July 8, 2015

Boycott Drive Gains Strength, Raising Alarm in Israel

By Tia Goldenberg

Ten years ago, a small group of Palestinian activists had a novel idea: Inspired by the anti-apartheid movement, they called for a global boycott movement against Israel as a nonviolent method to promote the Palestinian struggle for independence.

Long confined to the sidelines, the so-called BDS movement appears to be gaining momentum — so much so that Israel has identified it as a strategic threat on a par with Palestinian militant groups and the Iranian nuclear program. While Israel says the movement is rooted in anti-Semitism, its decentralized organization and language calling for universal human rights have proven difficult to counter, resulting in a string of recent victories that have alarmed Israeli leaders.

"We are now beginning to harvest the fruits of 10 years of strategic, morally consistent and undeniably effective BDS campaigning," said Omar Barghouti, one of the group's co-founders. "BDS is winning the battles for hearts and minds across the world, despite Israel's still hegemonic influence among governments in the U.S. and Europe."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The BDS movement — named for its call for boycotts, divestment and sanctions against Israel — began as an idea by 170 Palestinian civil society groups worldwide in 2005. It has grown into a global network of thousands of volunteers lobbying corporations, artists and academic institutions to sever ties with Israel. Its members include campus activists, church groups and even liberal American Jews disillusioned by Israeli policies.

Most worrying for Israel, some of the group's core positions toward products made in West Bank settlements are starting to be embraced by European governments. Although the EU says it opposes boycotts of Israel, it is exploring guidelines for labeling settlement products, which many in Israel fear could be a precursor to a full-fledged ban. Settlement products, which make up a tiny percentage of Israeli exports, include wines, dates and cosmetics.

At a time when peace efforts are frozen and show no sign of getting back on track under a new hard - line government, Israelis fear such sentiment will increase. "The concern is that there will be a spillover to a much wider phenomenon that will become mainstream and erode support for Israel," said Emmanuel Nahshon of Israel's Foreign Ministry.

The BDS movement has three goals: to end Israel's occupation of territories captured in the 1967 Mideast war, to end discrimination suffered by Arab citizens of Israel, and to promote the rights of Palestinian refugees to return to family properties lost in the war surrounding Israel's creation in 1948.

For Israel, this last position is nothing less than a call for its destruction. Israel opposes the Palestinian "right of return," saying a massive influx of refugees would mean the end of the country as a Jewish state. The international community favors a "two-state solution" creating a Palestinian state alongside Israel, and even Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas has indicated willingness to compromise on the refugee issue under a final peace deal.

Barghouti, a U.S.-educated engineer who also holds a graduate degree at Israel's Tel Aviv University, said the BDS movement is "completely neutral" on the political solution to the conflict. But he said he represents the Palestinian "consensus," and any deal that "undermines our basic rights under international law and perpetuates the colonial oppression" is unacceptable.

As for his attendance at a university he asks others to boycott, he said Palestinians "cannot possibly observe the same boycott guidelines as asked of internationals," adding that the "indigenous population" is entitled to all services they can get from the system.

Israeli leaders consider the movement to be the latest in a history of antagonists out to destroy the Jewish people. "We are in the midst of a great struggle being waged against the state of Israel, an international campaign to blacken its name," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said recently. "It is not connected to our actions. It is connected to our very existence."

The BDS movement is led by a West Bank-based national committee with representatives from around the world, which sets guidelines but allows local branches to decide their own strategy. It focuses on battles with a reasonable chance of success. So some of the biggest companies active in Israel, such as Microsoft and Intel, have not been targeted.

Battles have taken place in U.S. food co-ops and city councils. The movement has helped organize several boycotts by U.S. and British academic unions and has made inroads on American campuses. Roughly a dozen student governments have approved divestment proposals.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Entertainers, including Roger Waters, Elvis Costello and Lauryn Hill have refused to perform in Israel. The BDS movement also claims responsibility for pressuring some large companies to stop or alter operations in Israel, including carbonated drink maker SodaStream, French construction company Veolia and international security firm G4S.

Last month, Britain's national student union joined the movement. Last week, the top legislative body of the United Church of Christ voted to divest from companies with business in the Israeli-occupied territories, following a similar move by the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) last year. The Episcopal Church and Mennonite Church USA also considered divestment proposals recently, with the Episcopalians rejecting it and the Mennonites deferring action for two years.

Perhaps the biggest blow was last month's announcement by the chief executive of French mobile phone giant Orange that he wanted to end his partnership with Israeli carrier Partner Communications. He cited his desire to improve business in the Arab world. Although CEO Stephane Richard later traveled to Israel to apologize, Orange and Partner announced plans to unwind their deal.

The idea of boycotts is extremely sensitive in Israel. Netanyahu has referred to the Nazis' boycott of Jewish businesses and artists in 1930s Germany before the Holocaust — though that campaign took place when the Nazi party held power and was accompanied by acts of violence and virulent anti-Semitic slogans. "The attacks on the Jews were always preceded by the slander of the Jews," Netanyahu recently said.

In the 1970s and 1980s, Arab countries pressured companies doing business with them to shun Israel. Currently, Israel is fending off attempts by the boycotters to compare Israeli policies in the West Bank to South African apartheid.

BDS activists deny being fueled by anti-Semitism, saying their battle is against Israel, not Jews. They point to a small but growing number of Jewish supporters, including the U.S.-based "Jewish Voice for Peace," whose 9,000 dues-paying members support a boycott of Israel.

Naomi Dann, JVP's media coordinator, said the stance stems from frustration over failed U.S.-backed peace efforts. She said that while the group recognizes the Jewish attachment to Israel, it can't come at the expense of Palestinians." It's not about destroying Israel," she said. "But full equal rights and a democratic society are more important than preserving the Jewish character of the state." It remains difficult to quantify the BDS movement's actual achievements.

Leading global companies, including Microsoft, Google, Apple and Intel, maintain operations in Israel. Major entertainers, including Paul McCartney, Lady Gaga, Madonna and Rihanna, have performed in Israel in recent years.

A February report by Israel's Finance Ministry concluded the BDS movement has had a negligible economic impact. But it outlined some worst-case scenarios, including EU government-led boycotts or cancellation of free-trade agreements. Likewise, a recent study by the Rand Corp. said that while the BDS movement "has not yet had a significant negative effect" on Israel, it is growing and Israeli leaders fear it could have "substantial detrimental effects" on the economy.

Last month, Jewish billionaires Sheldon Adelson and Haim Saban led a Las Vegas fundraiser to fight the BDS movement at U.S. universities. Israel's justice minister, Ayeled Shaked, instructed her ministry to prepare "legal steps" against the movement. This week, Democratic presidential hopeful Hillary Rodham Clinton said she opposed the BDS movement.

David Makovsky, a senior fellow at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy and former member of U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry's peace team, said Israel must show it is serious about the creation of a Palestinian state to slow the momentum. "You can reduce its scope, its impact by making clear when the prime minister ... says he supports two states for two people that he is not then going to say Israel will settle in what will be a future Palestinian state," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The National Interest – July 8, 2015

Assessing an Iran Deal: 5 Big Lessons from History

Negotiated agreements contributed significantly to the fact that we survived and, indeed, won the Cold War without nuclear Armageddon.

By Graham Allison

As the policy community prepares to assess an agreement between the U.S. and its P5+1 partners and Iran, Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Bob Corker asked me to review the history of analogous agreements for lessons that illuminate the current challenge. In response to his assignment, I reviewed the seven decades of the nuclear era, during which the U.S. negotiated arms-control treaties, including the Non-Proliferation Treaty of 1968; strategic arms limitation talks and agreements from SALT to New Start; the North Korean accord of 1994; the agreements that helped eliminate nuclear weapons in Ukraine, Kazakhstan, and Belarus in the early 1990s; and the pact that eliminated the Libyan nuclear weapons program in 2003.Among many lessons and clues from this instructive history, five stand out:

Lesson #1: Arms control can advance American national interests without war. Negotiated agreements to constrain the spread and use of nuclear weapons have been an essential tool in the arsenal of American national security strategy. Such agreements are not an alternative to the use of military force, economic coercion, or covert action. Rather they are an instrument in the arsenal of American power that can be used in conjunction with other means to protect and defend our interests. Instructively, negotiated agreements contributed significantly to the fact that we survived and, indeed, won the Cold War without nuclear Armageddon.

Lesson #2: No compromise, no deal. Because agreements are by definition negotiated – not imposed – they require give and take: compromise. As any parent or legislator knows well, the results of any negotiation invite a predictable litany of criticism: from mild remarks about painful concessions and remorse about the possibility of a better deal, to the extreme but still-common charges of "appeasement" or "conspiring with the enemy."

Lesson #3: Reduced risks. From the record of arms-control negotiations and agreements by both Republican and Democratic presidents – from Nixon and Reagan and both Bushes, to Kennedy, Johnson, Clinton, and Obama – one takeaway is hard to deny: agreements have reduced the risks of war, lowered the numbers of nuclear weapons, lessened uncertainties in estimating threats, and enhanced predictability.

Lesson #4: North Korea is complicated. The case of North Korea is unquestionably a non-proliferation failure. The historical facts of the case, however, have been overtaken by legend. As we consider how policy failed, keep in mind these four questions:

- During the eight years in which North Korea was constrained by the nuclear agreement of 1994, how many nuclear weapons or weapons equivalent of fissile material did North Korea add to its arsenal, according to the best estimates of the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

U.S. intelligence community? Answer: none.

-From 2003 to 2008, when the U.S. confronted North Korea for cheating, abrogated the agreement, and sought to isolate and sanction Pyongyang, how many nuclear weapons or weapons equivalent of fissile material did it add to its arsenal? Answer: According to U.S. intelligence estimates, enough material for 2-to-9 more bombs.

-Under which treatment – agreements or confrontation – did North Korea conduct a nuclear weapons test? Answer: confrontation.

-Under which treatment – negotiations or confrontation – both in the Clinton–Bush and Obama periods did North Korea build its nuclear arsenal of more than a dozen weapons that it has today, according to U.S. intelligence estimates? Answer: confrontation.

Lesson #5: Details matter. To paraphrase Shakespeare, in the realm of arms control, "deals are neither either good or bad in themselves, but details and context make them so." Assessing the Iran deal – if there is one – depends vitally on both the fine print and the feasible alternatives. In foreign affairs, completely good deals are rare – and typically the result of massive military leverage after victory in war. The right standard, even for stakes as high as nuclear weapons, is good enough. In the case of Iran, good enough means a deal that does more than no deal and its feasible alternatives to prevent Iran from acquiring a bomb.

If Secretary Kerry and his team bring back an agreement that successfully translates key parameters of the Framework Accord reached by the P5+1 and Iran into legally-binding constraints, including intrusive procedures for inspection, verification, and challenges, my bet is that it will be difficult to responsibly reject that agreement. The burden will fall on those who propose to do so to describe a feasible alternative that will better protect and defend American national security.

Graham Allison is director of the Harvard Kennedy School's Belfer Center for Science and International Affairs.

S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace
633 Pennsylvania Ave. NW, 5th Floor, Washington, DC 20004
www.centerpeace.org

2015 S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace, All rights reserved.
YOU ARE RECEIVING THIS EMAIL BECAUSE YOU SIGNED UP FOR OUR NEWS UPDATES.

unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Eizenstat, Stuart" <seizenstat@cov.com>
To:	dkurtzphelan@gmail.com
Date:	6/29/2015 11:14:30 AM
Subject:	FW: HRC Iran statement

Dear Dan and Jake,
Here is a cleaner version. Something happened with the one I just sent that left gaps in the sentences.
Stu

From: Eizenstat, Stuart
Sent: Monday, June 29, 2015 6:09 PM
To: 'Daniel Kurtz-Phelan'
Cc: Jake Sullivan; John D. Podesta (John.Podesta@gmail.com); Huma M. Abedin (huma@hrcoffice.com)
Subject: RE: HRC Iran statement

Dear Dan and Jake,

I am sorry for the delay, but I only landed this morning from Israel via JFK. Please see my comments below. Of course, we do not know the details at this time.
Stu

> From: Daniel Kurtz-Phelan [mailto:dkurtzphelan@gmail.com]
> Sent: Sunday, June 28, 2015 8:52 PM
> To: Eizenstat, Stuart
> Cc: Jake Sullivan
> Subject: HRC Iran statement
>
> Dear Stu,
>
> Jake asked that I share with you the current draft of HRC's statement on the Iran deal. It's pasted below. Some of this could of course change depending on the details of a final agreement, but it would be great to have your feedback at this stage,
>
> Many thanks,
> Dan
>
> **
>
> I applaud President Obama and Secretary Kerry for securing a nuclear agreement that offers the strongest chance to prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon. With vigorous enforcement, unyielding verification, and swift consequences for any violations, this deal will make the United States, Israel, our Arab partners, and the region safer and more secure than if there were no agreement.
> At the same time, there are aspects of the agreement that are a cause for concern, and a basis for special diligence. has not been required to answer questions about the Possible Military Dimensions (PMD), including allowing the IAEA to inspect sites, interview key scientists and officials, and review documents that would shed light on their past and current PMD activities. In addition, clarity is required on what limits are imposed during the term of the agreement and thereafter to preclude Iran's work on advanced centrifuges. It is also critical that sanctions relief must come only when Iran has demonstrates to the satisfaction of the IAEA that they have complied with their obligations. Sanctions for terrorism and other non-nuclear sanctions must remain in place. I I want to make sure as President that any violation of the agreement by Iran would trigger a reimposition of sanctions, without an Iranian veto over the findings, and in ways that assure the US can act if we feel there is a violation. Most important is monitoring and verification. The IAEA inspectors must have timely and effective access to all sites in Iran, including military sites. It is unclear if this is the case.
> Despite these concerns, it is critical in assessing this agreement to ask what alternatives exist. We already have in place the most effective, broad-based sanctions ever imposed on a country in peacetime. While they have brought Iran to the negotiating table, they have not stopped the continued expansion of their nuclear program. It is difficult to see what other sanctions would lead to greater Iranian concessions. Without an agreement, there would be no two-thirds reduction in their number of centrifuges; no dismantlement of their plutonium plant at Arak; no 24/IAEA inspections; no dilution of their 20% enriched uranium. Their capacity to "break-out: would be far more likely without this agreement, than with it. We also have to consider it we could maintain the partnership with the European Union, which has made the sanctions most effective.
> Today's agreement is the culmination of an effective strategy executed over many years. By the end of the Bush administration, Iran was rapidly expanding its nuclear centrifuge capacity despite unilateral American sanctions and ineffective saber rattling. The Obama administration took a different approach, working with Congress and our allies and partners around the world. As Secretary of State, I logged tens of thousands of miles and twisted a lot of arms – especially in Moscow and Beijing – to build a global coalition to impose the most crippling sanctions in history against Tehran. That unprecedented pressure shattered Iran's economy, halted the progress of its nuclear program (NB. BE CAREFUL THEY HAVE SUBSTANTIALLY INCREASED THE NUMBER OF CENTRIFUGES AND AMOUNT OF ENRICHED URANIUM SINCE OBAMA TOOK OFFICE), and forced its leaders to the table to negotiate a deal that puts a nuclear weapon out of reach.
> As President, I will use every tool in our arsenal to compel rigorous Iranian compliance. The response to any violation will be clear, immediate, and devastating -- starting with the return of sanctions but taking no options off the table, including, if necessary, the use of force.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The message to Iran must be loud and clear: We will never allow you to acquire a nuclear weapon; we will never allow you permit you to produce sufficient fissile material or otherwise acquire it, sufficient for a nuclear weapons; not just during the term of this agreement – never. Going forward, we have to be clear-eyed when it comes to the broader threat Iran represents. Even with an agreement that limits its nuclear ambitions, Iran still poses a direct challenge to the United States and our allies, especially Israel. The funds it will receive with sanctions relief will provide billions of dollars more for Iran to use to support terrorism. It continues to destabilize countries from Yemen to Lebanon, while exacerbating conflict in Syria. And it fuels terrorism throughout the region and beyond, including through direct support to Hamas and Hizballah. We have to aggressively oppose and raise the costs for Iran's destabilizing activities, insist on the return of U.S. citizens being held by the Iranian government, and strengthen cooperation with our allies and partners. This agreement under my Administration will not see this agreement as the beginning of an American-Iranian partnership. Our allies in the Middle East deserve to have this assurance, and they will have it if I am elected President.

Israel should be confident that now and in a Hillary Clinton Administration, the United States will always defend its security and ensure its military edge in the region. Our two countries have to be on the same page when it comes to the threat posed by Iran, so I would invite the senior Israeli leadership to Washington for early talks on further strengthening our crucial alliance. I will provide Israel with all the military means it requires to defend itself against an Iranian threat, and support its actions to defend itself. We should also deepen our security relationship with Arab partners who are threatened by Iran's ambitions.

Ultimately, this agreement is the best way to protect our country and our allies. To walk away from a deal that will stop Iran from getting a nuclear weapon, or to bomb Iran as long an agreement offers an alternative, [as some Republican candidates for President suggest,] would be both dangerous and shortsighted – fracturing our global coalition, raising the risk of regional war, and ultimately bringing Iran closer to a nuclear weapon.

So we should proceed with wisdom and strength in implementing a deal born out of effective diplomacy and strong American leadership.

**

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	NYTimes.com <nytdirect@nytimes.com>
To:	john.podesta@gmail.com
Date:	8/27/2015 11:49:39 PM
Subject:	First Draft on Politics: Democratic Candidates Gather Before Party Leaders to Give Their Best 10-Minute Pitches

? View First Draft on the web | Add nytdirect@nytimes.com to your address book?

8/28/2015 nytimes.com/firstdraft »

The New York Times
FirstDraft
What You Need to Know Today in Politics

Democrats Go Before Party Leaders to Give Their 10-Minute Pitches

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont campaigning last week in Eldridge, Iowa. He and most of the other Democratic candidates will speak to the party's national committee on Friday. Jim Young/Reuters

By Patrick Healy

Good Friday morning. The Iran nuclear deal has been making its way back to the Capitol during summer break, even if Congress has not, and it will be a focus of several events. But the big party is with the Democrats as they meet in Minneapolis to hear the candidates try to curry favor with the party's leaders.

The summer meeting of the Democratic National Committee gets down to business on Friday with speeches by four of the party's presidential candidates – Lincoln Chafee, the former Rhode Island governor, and Hillary Rodham Clinton in the morning, Martin O'Malley, the former Maryland governor, and Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont in the afternoon – to hundreds of activists who are plenty familiar with their political speeches and policy views. So will the contenders say anything new or surprising?

Mr. Sanders, for one, was playing around with ideas on a yellow legal pad as he flew to Minneapolis on Thursday, according to Democrats on the plane with him. Like the other candidates, he has only about 10 minutes to speak, but advisers expect him to make a sincere pitch — even if he is not a Democrat, but an independent — as an outsider who is attracting big crowds.

"He will say if Democrats want to keep the White House," said Michael Briggs, Mr. Sanders's campaign spokesman, "then establishment politics won't do it."

"Few would deny he is generating excitement, and that's what the party needs."

Mr. O'Malley has been arguing that the current plan for only six debates favors Mrs. Clinton, who is leading in the polls. Several Democrats said they were curious if Mr.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Malley would press for more debates in his speech — and whether he would do so politely or pugnaciously.

The party leaders are convening as Mrs. Clinton's dominance in the race is shadowed by her email practices as secretary of state, and amid uncertainty about whether Vice President Joseph R. Biden Jr. will enter the race.

As for Mrs. Clinton, this is her crowd: Many in the audience are already planning to support her. Democrats expect her to rally the base and rip into Republicans — which won't be all that surprising, but will sure make people there feel good.

ADVERTISEMENT

Stay tuned throughout the day: Follow us on Twitter @NYTpolitics and on Facebook for First Draft updates .

What We're Watching Today

- Charleston, S.C., is to be the scene of two tough-talking foreign policy addresses by Republicans, Senator Marco Rubio of Florida and Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin.

  Mr. Rubio plans to take aim at China, as concern grows about Beijing's devaluations of its currency and the steep declines in markets that have reverberated to Wall Street.

  His remarks come a week before China's president, Xi Jinping, visits Washington to meet President Obama. Mr. Walker, who has called on the White House to cancel Mr. Xi's visit, will focus his speech mostly on the Middle East. He will draw a contrast with what he considers weakness by Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton, and will call for a rejection of the Iran nuclear deal.

  "As president, I will send the following message: The retreat is over," Mr. Walker plans to say, according to an advance text.

  He will criticize the idea of engaging at all with Iran across a negotiating table.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Instead, he will call for an American defeat of Iranian "theocrats" and Islamic State "barbarians," as necessary to deter Russian aggression in Eastern Europe and the Chinese in the South China Sea.

"We've had enough of a president who proclaims that the greatest threat to future generations is climate change," the prepared text says.

– Trip Gabriel and Gerry Mullany

- As part of his efforts to press for the approval of the nuclear deal, Mr. Obama will speak via a webcast to an event co-sponsored by the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations and the Jewish Federations of North America.

Vilsack's Endorsement of Clinton Adds to Her Shows of Strength

Though Mrs. Clinton's campaign has been dogged by the questions about her email use, she has moved this week to highlight her strength before the Democratic National Committee meeting, including receiving an emotional endorsement from an old friend.

Tom Vilsack, the secretary of agriculture who says he owes his career to Mrs. Clinton for her help in his Iowa governor's race in 1998, endorsed her on Tuesday and joined her on Wednesday in Iowa, introducing her in a way that could serve as a counterpoint to some voter perceptions of her as untrustworthy.

The rollout of the endorsement, and memos released by the Clinton team on Thursday detailing her organizational power in early voting states, are gestures that many see as timed to the party meeting and to Mr. Biden's 2016 deliberations.

But, to Mr. Vilsack, it was personal.

"This introduction means a lot to me," he told a crowd in Sioux City.

He recalled how Mrs. Clinton had recently told him how concerned she was about drug addiction and mental health in the country. It struck a chord.

"I was adopted into a family where my mom suffered alcohol and prescription drug addiction," he said. "And, on one very sad occasion, she tried to take her own life."

Mr. Vilsack recalled how the last conversation he had had with his father before he died was about the cost of law school, then noted Mrs. Clinton's plan for easing student debt.

And, he said, "she understands loyalty." She first took interest in him and his fledgling campaign in 1998, he said, "24 years before that, she met my brother-in-law."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"It was that friendship that got her interested in my race," Mr. Vilsack said. And then, "introducing my friend to my friends," he handed the microphone to Mrs. Clinton.

– Nick Corasaniti

Bulletins: Trump's Choice; Fiorina's Push; Clinton's Deal

- Donald J. Trump said in an interview on Thursday that he would soon decide whether to sign a pledge to support the ultimate Republican presidential nominee, something the South Carolina Republican Party is requiring to compete in the state's critical primary.

- Carly Fiorina, who has been gaining in polls and was widely seen as the winner of the second-tier Republican debate this month, is pressing party leaders in an effort to secure a spot in the prime-time debate in September.

- And Mrs. Clinton and the Democratic National Committee have finalized a joint fund-raising agreement after months of difficult negotiations, opening the door for the party to gain a significant head start on Republicans at roping in big checks from donors.

Our Other Favorites From Today's Times

- On the 10th anniversary of Hurricane Katrina, Mr. Obama, who has cited such severe storms in his push on climate change proposals — and separately faced some criticism from environmental groups on Thursday, visited New Orleans to make a case for his entire presidency: that when disaster strikes, the federal government should help not only to rescue the stranded but also to rebuild better and fairer than before.

- Planned Parenthood gave congressional leaders and a committee that is investigating allegations of criminality at its clinics an analysis it commissioned concluding that "manipulation" of undercover videos by abortion opponents make those recordings unreliable for any official inquiry.

- And Mrs. Clinton compared some of the Republican presidential candidates' views on women to those of terrorist groups, citing in particular stances against abortion even in the cases of rape or incest, and calls to defund all services of Planned Parenthood.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cruz Invites Trump to Rally Against Iran Deal

They've shared a private meeting in New York, the debate stage, and now, they will share a podium in Washington.

Senator Ted Cruz of Texas has invited Mr. Trump to join him to lead a rally calling on Congress to vote against the Iran nuclear deal.

The event will be on Sept. 9, a week before the next Republican debate.

"Senator Cruz has invited Donald Trump to join him on the Capitol grounds for a rally to call on members of Congress to defeat the catastrophic deal that the Obama administration has struck with the Islamic Republic of Iran," the Cruz campaign said in a statement emailed to reporters. "The event will be sponsored by Tea Party Patriots, Center for Security Policy, and the Zionist Organization of America."

A joint appearance has long been in the works, according to Catherine Frazier, a spokeswoman for the Cruz campaign, "and this event rallying against the Iran deal is an important issue and perfect chance to partner together."

Mr. Cruz did not extend the invite to any of the other Republican candidates, despite some, like Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey, taking strong positions in opposition to the deal.

Inviting Mr. Trump, who leads Republican polls, gives Mr. Cruz a near-guaranteed large crowd and extensive media coverage. Mr. Cruz has also been one of the few Republican candidates who have declined to criticize Mr. Trump over some of his more caustic comments.

– Nick Corasaniti

ADVERTISEMENT

Travels That Excite the Curiosity and Challenge the Mind

- 27 departures
- Small group tours
- Specialty cruises

VIEW OUR ONLINE BROCHURE

Times JOURNEYS

What We're Reading Elsewhere

- Mr. Trump's news conference argument with Jorge Ramos of Univision this week — Mr. Trump said Mr. Ramos was asking questions without being called on; Mr. Ramos said Mr. Trump was refusing to answer tough questions — drove a fair amount of traffic on television, online and in print. But, Time Magazine writes , Mr. Ramos says Mr. Trump is not the only one at fault: Speaking of the national media, " 'He hasn't been challenged enough,' Ramos said of Trump. 'He hates to be challenged, and it is time that we start doing it.' "

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- And NPR takes a look at Mr. Sanders, who considers himself to be a Democratic socialist, and "the S-word," which "is not a word Sanders often uses on the campaign trail to define himself."

- Who would give money to Mr. Trump's campaign? Politico looked and found that "63 people contributed $250 or more in the first two weeks after Trump announced."

  "Ten of them have already 'maxed out,' meaning they've given the legal contribution limit for a federal primary election, $2,700," Politico reports.

- The animosity between Mr. Trump and Jeb Bush is rooted in decades of tensions between the billionaire and the Bush family. "There are clashes of style, manner and class between the Bushes — a patrician clan of presidents, governors and financiers who have pulled the levers of power for generations — and Trump, a hustling New York City deal-maker who turned his father's outer-borough real estate portfolio into a gold-plated empire," The Washington Post writes.

First Draft is sent weekdays before 7 a.m. and is updated throughout the day at nytimes.com/firstdraft . Check back throughout the day for continuing updates.

And please, tell us how we're doing. Like it, hate it, or have some advice, email us at FirstDraft@NYTimes.com .

Follow us on Twitter: @NYTPolitics

ABOUT THIS EMAIL

You received this message because you signed up for NYTimes.com's First Draft newsletter.

As a member of the TRUSTe privacy program, we are committed to protecting your privacy.

Unsubscribe | Change Your Email | Privacy Policy | Contact | Advertise

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Rabbi Michael Lerner" <rabbilerner.tikkun@gmail.com>
To: Podesta@Law.Georgetown.Edu
Date: 3/3/2015 12:52:59 PM
Subject: Benjamon Netanyahu's Fantasy World: Aresponse to Netanyahu's address to Congress

Tikkun to heal, repair and transform the world

empowered by salsa

A note from Rabbi Michael Lerner Join or Donate Now!

You can read this online on Huffington Post's home page Tuesday evening, March 3rd at: http://www.huffingtonpost.com/rabbi-michael-lerner/the-fantasy-world-of-benj_b_6796216.html

Benjamin Netanyahu's Fantasy World

by Rabbi Michael Lerner

"If you take out Saddam, Saddam's regime, I guarantee you that it will have enormous positive reverberations on the region." ~ Israeli Prime Minister Netanyahu urging the US to invade Iraq in 2002.

Netanyahu's speech to Congress was brilliantly deceitful because it played to the fantasies that Israeli propaganda and right wing militarists in the US have been popularizing for the past thirty years.

* The biggest fantasy: that we can coerce others through power over them to do what we consider in the best interests of the U.S. or Israel. This is what I call "The Strategy of Domination." A more effective path is "The Strategy of Generosity"--showing others that we care about them and recognize their needs as being equally legitimate to our own. This second approach is the view that made trade between tribes, and eventually between nations possible in the past, and it remains the view that makes it possible for most countries of the world to live in peace with their neighbors. They hate to do business with those who think that they can get their way through power-tripping and manipulations and threats.

This struggle between two world views is the core of the debate today in the U.S. and the reason that the militarists have the upper hand is because the Obama Administration, fearing that it might be ridiculed as believing in "kumbaya politics," used its first six years to pursue policies that better fit the Strategy of Domination than the Strategy of Generosity. Predictably, now it finds itself without a popular base for turning toward a more rational path in regard to Iran, having to frame its policies in terms of his policies' toughness rather than in terms of their humanity and reflection of higher ethical values.

I know so many people who shake their heads in despair at the growth of the right-wing consciousness in the US in every sphere except identity politics, but really what other discourse are they ever exposed to? Obama should embrace the Biblical call for "love the stranger/the other" and challenge Americans to take that call seriously. Instead, he tries to measure up against the criteria set by the militarists. Guess what? In that coercion-oriented arena liberals and progressives will always fail, because you have to be unscrupulous to win there.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Netanyahu is a master of manipulating the fantasies that the right-wing discourse advances. For example, the view of the world that sees "our side" (whether that 'our' be the U.S. or Israel) as always innocent and good, and "the other" as intrinsically evil.

* So consider his claim that it is Iran that has been making war against countries in the Middle East. No...actually it is the U.S. that has been making war against those countries in the past 12 years. You will have to look very hard to find any Iranian troops in Iraq, Syria, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Jordan, or Egypt in the past 12 years. But you will find tens of thousands of American troops in Afghanistan and Iraq in the past twelve years. Similarly, it is Israel that has been decimating Gaza, not Iran decimating a neighboring city or province or country. From a global perspective, and based on the behavior of these countries in the past two decades ever since the peace-oriented prime minister of Israely Yitzhak Rabin was murdered by a right wing religious Zionist, the world has more to fear from the US and Israel and our indomitable sense of self-righteousness than it does from Iran.

*Iran is the biggest violator of human rights in the region. Not so fast. Iran has some stiff competition with America's ally Saudi Arabia, not to mention the U.S. torture operations in Abu Ghraib. In fact, the US still won't release the full U.S. Senate report on its torture operations around the world because they would be too shocking to the US population. And the CIA chief recently appointed by President Obama insists that the CIA was not involved in torture, and the Obama Administration refuses to bring charges against any CIA agents who were engaged in torture, thus giving a signal to future torturers that they will be exempt from any punishments. We will deplore their behavior, but then let them continue it.

Undermining negotiations with Iran by continuing sanctions and offering no serious benefits for Iran to agree to anything would lead to Iran accelerating its nuclear program out of fear that it might soon be facing a war with Israel and the U.S. and perceiving itself as vulnerable unless it quickly develops nukes for itself. So following Netanyahu's path would actually create the very situation he claims to fear--a renewed commitment on the part of Iran to develop nuclear weapon capability.

* Israel is a beacon of democracy. Well...not so fast. Palestinians living within the West Bank and Gaza are living under the effective control of Israel on most matters of life, pay taxes to the Israeli government, must get permission from Israel to lave those areas, yet have no vote in the elections (though Jews living in the West Bank do have the right to vote). It's certainly better than what faces people in many other middle eastern countries, but it's a stretch to call Israel a democracy as long as the Occupation continues.

* Iran with nuclear weapons would be a danger to everyone. Well, that's partially true and partially false. It's true to the extent that any country having nuclear weapons is a danger to everyone on the planet (though the US is the only country in the world to have ever actually used nuclear weapons in a war). But it's not true that Iran would use those weapons. While I detest the current regime in Iran and hope for its nonviolent overthrow by the people of Iran, I see nothing in their behavior that leads me to believe that they are suicidal. On the contrary, they have a strong desire to make their Islamic republic the model for all future Islamic societies.

Iranian leaders know full well that Israel has the capacity, should Iran strike at Israel, to use its 200 nuclear bombs to wipe Iran off the face of the planet, if the US didn't do that first in the event of an Iranian use of nuclear weapons against Israel. So Netanyahu's paranoid fantasy only seems plausible if you think that

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Iran is the equivalent of the Nazi regime. And that is precisely where political analysis has to yield to psychological investigation. In my book Embracing Israel/Palestine (check it out at www.tikkun.org/eip) based in part on research I did while living in Israel and doing research at Tel Aviv U. and Hebrew U in Jerusalem, I describe the devastating consequences of Post Traumatic Stress Disorder on the capacity of those who have suffered extreme stress or oppression to make rational decisions for themselves. The PTSD is most acute in both the Israeli and Palestinian population, but far less so among Iranians who have never suffered in the past 70 years the way Jews and Palestinians have. So if we have any worries about possession of nuclear weapons, that concern should direct us to seeking nuclear disarmament from Israel. But for the impact of PTSD, having those 200 nukes should have yielded Israel a payoff in feeling secure. Instead, Israel continues to live under the cloud of the 70 year old trauma of the Holocaust, and the Prime Minister of Israel comes to the U.S. to shout "Never Again." But that slogan was originally meant to be a slogan concerning all peoples--so that no one should ever suffer what Jews suffered. The path to a war with Iran would make a mockery of that slogan. So it was tragic to see Elie Wiesel allowing himself to become a political pawn in Netnayahu's fantasy trip.

All this plays well for the US militarists and their cheerleaders among Christian Zionists and the rightwing of the Jewish Zionist movement. They raise the same fears and solutions they raised 55 years ago when they hoped to push the US into a war with the Soviet Union when it developed nuclear weapons. That war would have cost millions of lives, and saner voices prevailed. President Eisenhower warned about the dangers of the military/industrial complex and its ability to push the US toward wars. But Democrats, fearful of being called weak, brought us the War in Vietnam, and refused to cut off funds when the Republicans led us into the trillion-dollar debacle of the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq. Now those same moral idiots who led us into the Iraq war want to let Netanyahu's brilliant manipulation of our quite justified desire to see Israel remain safe and strong lead us into a war with Iran. We should resist such a folly. We could have used that trillion dollars to end global and domestic homelessness, hunger, poverty, inadequate health care, inadequate education, and to repair the destruction advanced indsutrial societies both capitalist and socialist have done to the global environment. Such a Global Marshall Plan might be dismissed as "unrealistic," just as the movements to end apartheid and segregation, provide equal rights for women, end legal discrimination against gays and lesbians, were also dismissed at first as unrealistic, naive, utopian or even "dangerous."

But the only way we can succeed in stopping the Republicans and AIPAC Democrats from following like lemmings the Netanyahu path is to present and powerfully advocate for an alternative--the Strategy of Generosity and a Global Marshall Plan modeled on the one we at Tikkun and our interfaith and secular-humanist-welcoming Network of Spiritual Progressives have developed (download the full version of our Global Marshall Plan at www.tikkun.org/gmp).

Please join us in developing this path rather than in the futuile path of domination that will only confirm the fears of the most paranoid elements of all sides.

You dont have to believe in God or be part of a spiritual or religious tradition or practice to be a "spiritual progressive." You are a spiritual progressives by our definition if you want institutions, social practices, government policies, corporations, our educational system, our legal system to be judged "efficient, rational or productive" to the extent that they maximize our capacities to be loving, caring for each other and the earth, supporting generosity instead of domination, and responding to the universe not solely as "a resource" for human purposes but with a sense of awe, wonder and radical amazement at the grandeur and preciousness of life itself and the universe in which it has evolved!

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Please join the Network of Spiritual Progressives at www.spiritualprogressives.org (when you join you will get a one year free sub to Tikkun magazine).

Rabbi Michael Lerner is editor of Tikkun, co-chair with Indian environmental activist Vandana Shiva of the Network of Spiritual Progressives, holds a ph.d. in philosophy and a second ph.d. in psychology and was principal investigator of research on stress for the NIMH. He has written 11 books including 2 national best sellers (Jewish Renewal: A Path of Healing and Transformation and The Left Hand of God: Taking Back Our Country from the Religious Right). He is rabbi of Beyt Tikkun Synagogue-Without-Walls in Berkeley and San Francisco, California.

---

web: www.tikkun.org
email: info@spiritualprogressives.org
Click here to unsubscribe

Copyright © 2014 Tikkun® / Network of Spiritual Progressives®.
2342 Shattuck Avenue, #1200
Berkeley, CA 94704
510-644-1200 Fax 510-644-1255

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Lee Fang" <lee@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: "Lee Fang" <lee@progressiveaccountability.org>
Date: 8/17/2008 7:32:21 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Sunday 08/17/08

Main Topics: Georgia-Russia conflict, VP speculation, Jerome Corsi, Saddleback Forum

Summary of Shift: As the conventions loom, the Sunday shows, with several of the likely candidates appearing as guests, focused largely on running-mate speculation. Subjects of debate ranged from the Georgia-Russia conflict, social issues and the Saddleback debate yesterday, to a general rehashing of the judgment vs. experience argument for framing the candidates. On Face the Nation, Senator Bayh said McCain should denounce the Jerome Corsi book. On Fox, media critic Liza Trotta attempted to marginalize opposition to the Corsi book, saying many of the swift boat claims in 2004 were true and that the Obama campaign's 'Unfit for Publication' is 'exaggerating.'

Highlights:
1. Georgia-Russia Conflict Leadership
   a. ABC: Romney Defends McCain response to crisis
   b. CNN: Richardson slams McCain for pushing to isolate Russia, says engagement is better policy
   c. CBS: Bayh and Pawlenty discuss McCain's foreign policy credentials, Bayh says McCain should condemn Corsi
2. MSNBC: Jindal touts McCain yet can't name a single 'big idea' proposed by the GOP nominee
3. FNC: Trotta defends swiftboating, says both Obama and Corsi are exaggerating their claims
4. CNN: Hosts praise McCain comment on adultery at Saddleback Forum

Highlights, no Clip:
1. ABC: GEORGE WILL: Well, I called Lieberman's office this week and said, "why did your man vote against Alito?" And they said, "he was wrong, now he likes Alito."

Clips:

Highlight #1
Romney Touts McCain Leadership Regarding Georgia-Russia Conflict (ABC 8/17/08 10:15am)
GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS: Didn't President Saakashvili bring some of this on himself by going into South Ossetia?

MITT ROMNEY: If you mean by becoming a Democracy and standing up for the principles of freedom, did he bring it on himself, I would certainly hope that would not be cause for...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But bringing military action against South Ossetia?

ROMNEY: Well certainly when his truckload of policemen attacked by South Ossetians, blown up, then you have a responsibility to protect your citizens as he had communities being attacked by-with rockets coming from South Ossetia so he of course took action to protect his nation. The Russians have been looking for an excuse to punish either the Ukraine or Georgia or flex their muscles in the caucuses and this is something they've been anticipating for some time. And that's why I think it's been so important that frankly President Clinton listened to John McCain and changed his course back in the 90's you know we are going to let the former Soviet satellite states become part of NATO. This is something John McCain has fought for. He's been not only in South Ossetia, John McCain has, but also in Georgia time and again. [..] This shows one more time that in a dangerous and troubled world, it's helpful to have a leader of the nation that knows these places, knows the people, understands the setting, and John McCain didn't have to search around to figure out what to say.

STEPHANOPOULOS: How do you respond to the argument that by pushing for Georgia to be in NATO, by pushing Ukraine to be in NATO, by putting a missile defense system in Czechoslovakia this was seen as belligerent and aggressive by Putin and kind of brought him in?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ROMNEY: Well there's no question that Putin with his authoritarian bent – everything from what he's done to the business community in Russia to what he's done to the media in Russia and former employees in Russia – that he has the ambitions of the old Soviet Union to a certain degree. He's certainly more in the direction than Gorbachev or leaders that are looking for a more Democratic state. That John McCain recognized that long term to protect the democracy, and the human rights of the world, that its essential that the former Soviet states become part of NATO. That is the best defense from Russian aggression. […] This administration has and John McCain is someone who has worked with people around the world and we will work with those that are our strongest enemies, we will sit across the table with them, negotiate, but of course you also want individuals to know if they take action which is contrary to the interest of freedom and democracy and contrary to our interests, that they'll be consequences. […] I do think when the people of America are reminded of how dangerous the world is, they recognize the importance of selecting a person that has experience and judgment and wisdom, whose actually led in a critical time and bring that to bare in the White House […]

Richardon Slams McCain's Counterproductive Attempts To Isolate Russia (CNN 08/17/08 11:22am)
BILL RICHARDSON: The G8 is a group of industrialized nations meeting, the World Trade organization is meaningful, the point I was trying to make is that Senator McCain wants to isolate Russia, that's the last thing we need to do, we need to engage them. If you isolate Russia, there's going to be more moves there to radicalism, towards resentment, look they're a major power, they're acting irresponsibly, we have to stand fully with Georgia, but what we need is the European Union we need NATO, we need allies upon allies to say to Russia to say look you gotta stop your expansionist motives. You've got to stop using oil as a political weapon. […]

Tim Pawlenty and Evan Bayh on McCain's Foreign Policy Stance (CBS 08/17/08 10:51am)
BOB SCHIEFFER: Governor, John McCain says that "We're all Georgians now." He refused in a recent interview to take military action off the table. Under what circumstances do you think the United States should take military action in this kind of situation?

TIM PAWLENTY: Well, Senator McCain said last night during the forum with Pastor Warren that he would use a deploy U.S. military assets and forces when the national security interests of the United States were at risk or challenged. I think he's acknowledged that military action in this particular situation is unlikely, but as commander in chief he wants to make sure that all options remain available to him, and that's understandable. But Secretary Gates, most others have recognized that this is going to be handled diplomatically; but Senator McCain has said that we need to deal with this aggressively. One of the questions this crisis raises is, who do you want sitting across the table from Vladimir Putin and people like him? […] Senator McCain… with his experience with national security, military affairs, his clarity, his strength and his judgment in these matters, as you saw with the surge, as you see, even before this crisis broke out, he said last year, we've got a problem, we should be thinking about having Russia be disinvited from the G-8.

SCHEIFFER: Do you think Senator McCain went to far, Senator Bye?

EVAN BAYH: […] John… he's a little bit given to this bellicose rhetoric, which has a tendency to inflame conflicts rather than to diffuse them.

PAWLENTY: The surge has been singularly […] one of the main reasons for the turnaround in the war. Senator McCain saw that because his judgment, his experience, his wisdom.

BAYH: When John McCain was asked about Barack's 16-month timetable for getting us out of Iraq, he said, well, that sounds like a reasonable timetable to me.
[…]

PAWLENTY: Senator McCain's judgment in these matters is legendary. He's someone of deep experience. You look at the forum last night with Pastor Warren- Senator McCain was crisp, decisive, knew what he was about, knew his values.

SCHEIFFER: There are some who say that […] maybe we have some responsibility[…] that we promised the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Georgians more than we could or should deliver., should something like this break out.

PAWLENTY: […] Well when you look at the reactions of the two candidates, […] Senator McCain came out and said, you know this really is bullying behavior by Russia. […] Senator McCain saying I saw Vladamir Putin, and I saw in his eyes a K and a G and a B, and he's a bully. And who do you want sitting across the table from somebody like Putin? […] I know answer for most Americans is going to be John McCain.

BAYH: […]Unfortunately the national security policies of this administration, fully endorsed and supported by Senator McCain, have created a perception of weakness in the world about our country, that we cannot tolerate. The Russians know we are bogged down in Iraq. If we wanted to propose a military deterrent, we're not able to do that very easily now. Because of the Iraq policies that Senator McCain will continue.

PAWLENTY: In terms of withdrawing troops from Iraq, […] Senator McCain has said he favors that, but he wants to do it at a time and under circumstances that allow Iraq to be stable, can defend itself, and brings our troops home with honor and victory.
[…]

BAYH: I wish that Senator McCain would take the opportunity to denounce the book that has come out about Barack Obama, making all sorts of lies and allegations against him. The old John McCain would denounce that. The new John McCain has embraced those tactics. That is unfortunate.

Highlight #2
Bobby Jindal and Tim Kaine Talk Russia, Health Care, and VP Picks for McCain (NBC 08/17/08 9:30am)
BOBBY JINDAL: Well, I think Senator McCain has again shown that he has the judgment, the experience we need during these uncertain times. Just as he was right to call for the surge in Iraq before it was popular, he had called even last year, he had said, we should at excluding Russia from the G-8 He said when he looked in Putin's eyes., he saw KGB very early on . He very forcefully understood this was an attack on a democratic ally, this has regional implications, it has implications beyond Georgia's borders. One of the reasons I think you see folks at Brookings, Wall Street Journal, Washington Times, Georgetown- several experts praising his response including a former Clinton advisor. So I think again what we' ve seen is Senator McCain's got the experience, the perspective.. He was right on Iraq, on the surge, he was right again calling attention to the dangers when Russia invaded a democratic ally.

TIM KAINE: I don't know how anyone could say Senator McCain was right on Iraq. I think he's been the sole cheerleader for Iraq, and he's probably the last remaining cheerleader for Iraq. The decision to go into Iraq, which Senator McCain supported, is now acknowledged by folks, including a lot of the Bush Administration, officials who left the administration as a significant mistake. My thought about Senator McCain's tough talk is this: Teddy Roosevelt said talk softly and carry a big stick. In much of the world now we're talking loudly and have not stick, because what we've done is we've so focused on Iraq, that we've let victory escape from our grasp in Afghanistan, and in regions of the world, like Russia, we've let dangers grow more intense.

TOM BROKAW: Let's turn to domestic matters in this campaign.

KAINE: Senator McCain's strategy is to measure the economy by how the well-off and big businesses are doing. That's why it's tax cuts to the wealthy, and tax cuts to the most profitable and productive businesses like oil companies. […] Senator McCain has said, I don't know much about the economy. It is too risky, at this point in our nation, with the economy so hurt to put a guy in the Whitehouse who says, I don't know much about the economy.
[view McCain ad]

BROKAW: That's a pretty direct swipe at President Bush, isn't it governer?

JINDAL: Well, you know, Senator McCain has a long history of bucking his own party, his own president. Whether it was fighting against earmarks, wasteful spending, and he's got a long tradition of standing on principal, for what he believes is right.
[…]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

JINDAL: I think Senator McCain, because he has long fought against the wasteful spending in Washington- I think many conservatives were disappointed the Republicans, both in the Whitehouse and in Congress, didn't control spending. But Senator McCain, for years, has fought members of his own party and the Democratic Party to cut spending, cut corporate welfare, and cut earmarks.

BROKAW: You've talked about the crisis within the Republican Party, that it lost its way, that it used to be the party of big ideas. And now you back Senator McCain. What's the Big Idea that Senator McCain is campaigning on?

JINDAL: [...] Certainly when it comes to domestic issues, he understands the energy crisis is the biggest economic obstacle we face. He understands that it's not one silver bullet. We do need more domestic oil and gas production, we do need nuclear power, we need clean coal, we need conservation-

BROKAW: But those were Bush/Cheney Big Ideas in 2000. Where are the new Big Ideas of the Republican Party that John McCain is championing?

JINDAL: You've seen gridlock in DC. You've seen one side only push for oil an gas, you've seen the other side say no drilling. What you've not seen is an aggressive push to get all of that done. Senator McCain's talking about dozens of nuclear reactors. He's talking about the Lexington Project in terms of cutting edge research to break America's dependence on foreign energy. [...] Clearly when it comes to addressing our economic crisis, Senator McCain understands we need to have more independence, lower cost energy, more dependable energy, but also lower taxes. He's got a proven track record of fighting wasteful spending. And on healthcare. He understands we don't want the government running our healthcare. We need to make it more affordable, he's proposed refundable tax credits so American families can afford their own healthcare without a bureaucrat tell them how they should get healthcare.

BROKAW: Governor Jindal, would you like to be Vice President?

JINDAL: No […]
[…]
BROKAW: […] Senator McCain indicated that he would be open to a pro-choice running mate, like former governor of Pennsylvania Tom Ridge. […] Do you think that would be a mistake that would hurt Senator McCain?

JINDAL: […] Senator McCain has a pro-life record, he said he'll have a pro-life administration. What's most important to me, as a pro-life voter, is what kinds of judges will the next president appoint to the Supreme Court. Are they going to be judges that will read the Constitution, […]

Highlight #3
Fox's Trotta Defends Swiftboating; Says Both 'Unfit for Publication' and 'Obamanation' Are 'Exaggerating' (FNC 08/17/08 11:50am)
LIZ TROTTA: [..] This is Unfit For Publication and it says brought to you by the Bush-Cheney attack machine, which I think is untrue of course. We have both sides here exaggerating what they're claiming. There are a lot of inaccuracies if you will, small ones by the way, misleading comments, unsubstantiated claims, and all of this is being dug up of course by reading the book and making the comparison which a few journalists have had time to do. By in large they are pairing it with the book, the Corsi book prior to this which was about Kerry as you mentioned. That book really was the lead guy on that was John O'Neal who defended the book on Kerry and swiftboating career in Vietnam throughout the campaign. So what we have here is we have journalists resorting to using swiftboats as a verb that meaning that these charge are untrue. So you'll see in most of the stories in the liberal media that Mr. Obama has been swiftboated, i.e. assailed by lies. The fact is that many if not most of the swiftboat claims in the Corsi/O'Neal book were true. So swiftboat has become sort of a synonym for lies which the press is getting way with.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ERIC SHAWN: But some warrant, some claim, Kerry was there one month when he was really there for at least several months. But in terms of this book, and what's in this book, and what they're saying about this, is there that comparison?

TROTTA: Well the interesting thing about this is that first of all there is not a chorus of witnesses to say that this, to document the claims Corsi is making. Most of the errors, if you read this publication by the Obama campaign concern his early life. For example the day that he was married. The errors get fewer and fewer as you read the book, you get along to domestic and foreign policy. Corsi makes no bones about the fact that he does not want Obama in the White House. And is not shy about why he wrote the book. It's number one on the New York Times bestseller list this week so there are some curious souls out there. As with most of these books, it will make an impression, and not every reader is going to check it against Unfit for Publication which is what Obama's people are saying.

SHAWN: 20 seconds left. I mean its not a flattering portrait at all of the Senator rightly or wrongly.

TROTTA: No it isnt. And of course its how you look at the Senator and we know that there is a pro-Obama bias in the liberal press. This man doesn't sit there. So again its back to which prism you're looking through.

SHAWN: Well again fair and balanced you read both. You read the book and the response if you wanna know about that.

Highlight #4
CNN Hosts Praise McCain Comment On His Adultery (CNN 08/17/08 10:50am)
[plays clip of McCain saying at the Saddleback Civil Forum that his greatest moral failing was his first marriage]
CORRESPONDENT: I don't know I think McCain did something extraordinary when he answered that question, Howie. He addressed an issue that the campaign has had a hard time figuring out how to deal with. They've wanted to confront it, it's out there on the Internet, it's something that Democrats are trying to use against McCain- he put it out there and acknowledged it and he sorta inoculated himself against it. I think that's really going to help him – Obama's answer, you know that was not new information for a 47 year old man to claim that his worst moral failure happened when he was a teenager, I know it's a little disingenuous. So I think it does get some traction going forward there was a lot of news coverage.

HOWIE KURTZ: McCain has acknowledged he was not faithful in his first marriage, but not necessarily before a nationally televised audience.

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Karl Frisch, Media Matters" <kfrisch@mediamatters.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 11/12/2009 8:01:51 AM
Subject: [big campaign] So, what really happened to Lou Dobbs?

http://mediamatters.org/blog/200911120019

So, what really happened to Lou Dobbs?

So, what really happened to Lou Dobbs? According to The New York Times : "Months ago the president of CNN/U.S., Jonathan Klein, offered a choice to Lou Dobbs ... [he] could vent his opinions on radio and anchor an objective newscast on television, or he could leave CNN." This after months of intense pressure from those concerned with the content broadcast nightly on Dobbs' CNN program -- leading some in the press to describe the host as a "publicity nightmare" for the network. It is in that environment, that Dobbs announced last night his immediate departure from CNN, his cable news home for nearly 30 years.

Media Matters released the following statement responding to the late breaking news :

> "For too long, CNN provided Lou Dobbs with its stamp of approval as he pursued a dangerous, one-sided and all too often false conspiracy tinged crusade against immigrants," said Eric Burns, president of Media Matters. "This is a happy day for all those who care about this nation of immigrants and believe in the power of media to elevate the political discourse."

Since CNN's Lou Dobbs first began spreading false, racially charged conspiracy theories about President Obama's birth certificate in July of this year, Media Matters for America has published 299 research items, video/audio clips, column, and blog posts about his misinformation and hate speech. Below are some of the most significant examples of work Media Matters has done -- this year and in the past -- to combat Dobbs' pernicious influence on the national dialogue.

The Drop Dobbs campaign and other efforts. Media Matters played a leading role in the Drop Dobbs Coalition (DropDobbs.com), which was launched to call attention to Dobbs' incendiary hate speech and falsehoods. Through this coalition, Media Matters worked successfully behind the scenes to persuade major corporations to stop advertising on Lou Dobbs Tonight. The coalition includes numerous national civil rights and other groups concerned about the kind of hate promoted daily by Dobbs on his television and radio programs. In addition to Media Matters in partnership with NDN, the coalition, representing over 2 million people, includes the National Council of La Raza, LULAC, the National Hispanic Media Coalition, America's Voice Education Fund, The Hispanic Institute, the Southern Poverty Law Center, Netroots Nation, Voto Latino, Labor Council for Latin American Advancement, the Center for New Community, Reform Immigration for America, the Dolores Huerta Foundation, the National Puerto Rican Coalition and the Georgia Association of Latino Elected Officials. There were also many others around the country involved in complementary efforts including the amazing grassroots organizing and activism conducted by Presente.org through their BastaDobbs campaign.

Media Matters released ads -- which CNN refused to run -- calling for Dobbs to be held accountable. In August, CNN refused to air a Media Mattes ad calling on the network to credibly address Dobbs' continued promotion of birther conspiracy theories. In October, CNN refused to air an ad produced by America's Voice and Media Matters calling out the network for giving Dobbs a prominent platform. Both ads ultimately ran on competing cable networks.

Dobbs repeatedly advanced false conspiracy theories about Obama's birth certificate. As Media Matters extensively documented , Dobbs suggested on his July 15, 2009, CNN show that the birth certificate Obama provided to FactCheck.org was not "the real document" and suggested on his radio show that day that it was not "the real deal." After asking if Obama should be "more forthcoming" about his birth certificate, Dobbs added: "One of our callers, by the way, pointed out that he didn't release -- he didn't release his medical records, either. Now isn't that interesting? And hasn't produced some other documents. What's the deal? What is the deal here? I'm starting to think we have a -- we have a document issue. Do you suppose he's un -- no, I won't even use the word undocumented. It wouldn't be right." On his July 21, 2009, radio show, Dobbs faulted "certain quarters of the national liberal media" for "absolutely trying to knock down the issue of President

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama's birth certificate." On his July 23, 2009, radio show, Dobbs addressed media reports on his conspiracy theories by declaring , "I do believe in a national left-wing media conspiracy in which they work in concert and attack like hell."

Dobbs used CNN to engage in wild conspiracy theories and legitimize hate groups. Dobbs' birth certificate obsession wasn't the first outrageous theory that he promoted on CNN. As Media Matters documented, Dobbs has repeatedly accused the U.S. government of secretly plotting with the governments of Mexico and Canada to merge the three countries into a "North American Union" -- a charge his own CNN colleagues labeled a "conspiracy theor[y]." Dobbs has promoted the smear that Mexican immigrants are conspiring to reclaim the U.S. Southwest for Mexico and at one point illustrated this theory by using a graphic sourced to the Council of Conservative Citizens, a hate group that "oppose[s] all efforts to mix the races of mankind." Dobbs famously aired a false report about a purported spike in leprosy cases linked to illegal immigration and repeatedly defended his show's reporting even after it had been proven wrong.

Dobbs had close ties to "hate group" FAIR. In September, Dobbs helped lead the annual "Hold Their Feet to the Fire" radio host rally organized by the Federation for American Immigration Reform (FAIR) -- an organization the Southern Poverty Law Center has designated a "hate group ." On August 28, Media Matters president Eric Burns wrote an open letter to CNN president Jonathan Klein urging him to prohibit Dobbs from participating in the FAIR event. Media Matters also documented that Dobbs used his CNN show to report on the FAIR rally without disclosing during those reports that he was helping lead it. A year earlier, Dobbs had broadcast his CNN show from the FAIR rally. In addition, the group has given Dobbs an award for "his continued efforts in leading the immigration reform movement through both his talk radio show and his television show." In the past year, Dobbs has cited FAIR as a credible source on immigration issues at least six times and has routinely failed to disclose his close association with the group.

Dobbs smeared U.S. Hispanic Chamber of Commerce as sympathetic to "Mexico's export of drugs and illegal aliens." On March 10, 2009, Dobbs criticized Obama for delivering a speech on education to the U.S. Hispanic Chamber of Commerce. Dobbs accused Obama of "pandering to the pro-amnesty open-borders lobby" and aired a clip of a FAIR spokesman saying, "We don't want the president to make it appear as if he's favoring one particular group in the disposition of public benefits." Dobbs also said, "Making a decision to talk about a national initiative on education from the U.S. Hispanic Chamber of Commerce, which is effectively an organization that is interested in the export of American capital and production to Mexico, and Mexico's export of drugs and illegal aliens to the United States. This is crazy stuff." On March 17, 2009, Dobbs said he "made a mistake," explaining, "I, of course, do not believe that the chamber supports or condones either drug or human trafficking. My apologies to the ... U.S. Hispanic Chamber of Commerce, and I hope that they will forgive me for that misspeaking."

Report: CNN's Lou Dobbs problem and the immigration debate. In September, Media Matters released a report on the most egregious conspiracy theories, hate speech, and undisclosed conflicts of interest in Dobbs' immigration reporting. Among other things, Media Matters documented that Dobbs used his CNN show to report on and praise a Hazleton, Pennsylvania, ordinance targeting undocumented immigrants without disclosing that he had been helping to fundraise for the town's legal defense fund.

Report: "Dobbs' immigration obsession out of step with CNN's news coverage." In July, Media Matters released a report documenting the extent to which Dobbs' broadcast was consumed by the topic of immigration, and undocumented immigrants specifically. Media Matters showed that over a period of six months, Dobbs had more than three times as many broadcast hours that included briefs, segments, and panel discussions on immigration -- often focusing on undocumented immigrants -- as The Situation Room, which is three times as long as Dobbs. In word count, the difference was even starker, with Dobbs devoting about 528 words per hour to discussions of immigration -- 13 times more than The Situation Room's 40 words-per-hour average.

Report: Conservative guests outnumber progressives on Lou Dobbs Tonight. In May, Media Matters released a report documenting that in the first four months of 2009, 52 percent more Republicans and conservatives appeared as guests on Lou Dobbs Tonight than Democrats and progressives. These results were consistent with a 2006 Media Matters study on Dobbs' guest lineup.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Lou Dobbs' right-wing war on health care reform. In August, Media Matters released a report documenting Dobbs' repeated use of discredited right-wing smears about health care reform efforts, including the notions that end-of-life counseling could lead to "euthanasia" and that Obama said he "doesn't even know what's in" the House health care bill. Dobbs also touted GOP Sen. John Barrasso as "one of the leading experts on ... health care" and provided a forum for serial misinformer Betsy McCaughey to falsely claim that the economic recovery package would allow the federal government to eliminate "whatever" it deems to be "unnecessary" health care.

Dobbs declared, "Mexico has become our enemy." As Media Matters documented, Dobbs complained on his March 3, 2009, radio show that there are people "trying to control our political agendas" and "social agendas with political correctness, trying to control thought, and, of course, speech through political correctness." He added that while it may be "politically incorrect," it is "absolutely factually correct" that "Mexico has become our enemy."

Online videos used to boost campaign against Dobbs. Media Matters effectively used its official YouTube channel to generate pressure against Dobbs through new media outlets. The ad addressing Dobbs' continued promotion of birther conspiracy theories that CNN refused to air in August generated nearly 168,000 views online, and at the same time, led to a huge media presence both in the traditional and new media. Moreover, a mini-documentary Media Matters produced for DropDobbs.com received more than 60,000 views since the launch of that site. In late July, when Dobbs was repeatedly advancing false conspiracy theories about Obama's birth certificate, Media Matters was able to expose his efforts through rapid response videos, releasing four videos from July 27 through July 30 on its YouTube channel exposing CNN's Dobbs problem; the videos generated well over 80,000 views. All together, Media Matters' special rapid response videos exposing Dobbs have generated well over 300,000 views.

So, what's next for Dobbs? In October, The New York Times reported that "Dobbs ... met for dinner with Roger E. Ailes, the chairman of Fox News, last month, according to two people with direct knowledge of the meeting" and that one of those sources "said Mr. Dobbs is a potential hire for the Fox Business Network." Well, that move may be a bit tough to pull off. Fox News' Geraldo Rivera recently ripped Dobbs for his Latino-bashing rhetoric saying he "is not coming to Fox News." Following news of Dobbs' resignation, Fox Business anchor Liz Claman tweeted, "Clearly Geraldo won." Rivera is by no means Dobbs' only obstacle. Dobbs had recently been involved in an on-air spat with new Fox Business hire John Stossel. After the former reporter of ABC's 20/20 said "I don't subscribe to Lou Dobbs-kind of rants about immigrants wrecking America," Dobbs went on the attack, calling Stossell a "self important ass" and his criticism, "myopic idiocy."

--

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail dubois.sara@gmail.com with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Margolis, Jim" <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com>
To:	"Dan Schwerin" <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com> "Speech Drafts" <speechdrafts@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	12/13/2015 6:32:44 AM
Subject:	Re: DRAFT: Tuesday speech on homeland security

Dan/jake:
I know you are doing a revised draft, but a few quick comments beyond saying I think you have a strong speech here.

1. Big picture, we've been talking a lot in prep about making sure that we connect to an underlying sense that people should be able to feel safe in America. You should be able to go about your life without fear. As you've written before, families should be able to go to church, go to a movie, go to the mall, go to school — feeling safe. And that's what HRC is determined to do. So I'd lift that notion up a bit.

2. Smaller notes:

- Page 1: We say they were Americans. He was. But she was a legal resident. I'm not sure I'd grant that she was 'American'… Even though I know you are making the homegrown point.
- Page 1: You say family members didn't know. It seems like the jury is out on that. Maybe it's SOME members of the family didn't know, or it appears family members didn't know (questions about the mother's knowledge).
- Page 3: You say 'we've overcome bigger challenge's. I would change that to 'overcome big challenges' before. If some gets ahold of nuclear material, this could be our biggest challenge.
- Page 4: I like what you did with the Cruz carpet bombing smack down. The only question is that two graphs later we lead with 'Pummel them from the air'. I like that too. I just wonder whether it's a little awkward given the proximity of the two points. Maybe it's okay. Just sharing.

From: Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com >
Date: Saturday, December 12, 2015 at 3:52 AM
To: Speech Drafts <speechdrafts@hillaryclinton.com >
Cc: Oren Fliegelman <ofliegelman@hfaintern.com >, Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com >, Laura Rosenberger <lrosenberger@hillaryclinton.com >
Subject: DRAFT: Tuesday speech on homeland security

All, as you know, we're doing a speech on Tuesday in Minnesota about homeland security and preventing domestic radicalization and terrorism. It will build on the plan to defeat ISIS that HRC laid out at CFR and also explain why anti-Muslim bigotry makes us less safe. This is more political than the previous two foreign policy speeches, in part with the GOP debate that night in mind. But hopefully it also continues to establish her as a far more credible commander-in-chief than any of our rivals.

We'd love your thoughts on the attached draft. If it's possible to get us comments on Saturday, that would be great. (Oren Fliegelman on our team will be tracking all the inputs, so please copy him at ofliegelman@hfaintern.com .)

Thanks
Dan

This email is intended only for the named addressee. It may contain information that is confidential/private, legally privileged, or copyright-protected, and you should handle it accordingly. If you are not the intended recipient, you do not have legal rights to retain, copy, or distribute this email or its contents, and should promptly delete the email and all electronic copies in your system; do not retain copies in any media. If you have received this email in error, please notify the sender promptly. Thank you.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Wilson Center" <wwics@wilsoncenter.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 10/28/2014 4:33:04 AM
Subject: The Ground Truth Briefing Takeaways--Ukraine Elections

To view this email as a web page, click here

Ground Truth Briefing

Wilson Center

Ukraine Elections

In case you missed the Ground Truth Briefing on the parliamentary elections in Ukraine, please see this summary of the conversation with experts Maryana Drach, Gennadiy Druzenko, and Oleksiy Haran. Click below to hear the full briefing.

The Takeaways:

1. President Petro Poroshenko's legitimacy and approval was reinforced on Sunday as pro-Western parties won the majority of seats in Ukraine's new parliament. Most pro-Russian parties were largely voted out of Parliament, and the new coalition plans to pursue agreements with the European Union.
2. Petro Poroshenko's Bloc and the People's Front were neck and neck in the exit polls with each gaining just over 21% of the total seats, making President Petro Poroshenko and Prime Minister Arseniy Yatsenyuk the biggest winners in the election.
3. Leading up to the elections, candidates largely campaigned on their personalities rather than policies and substance. Many candidates voiced support for a reformist and pro-European agenda yet failed to address how they would tackle the country's energy and economic challenges.
4. Despite relative calm, Ukraine is still at war and voter turnout in the eastern regions was fairly low, as expected, with only 30-40% of the electorate voting in the East. In the western regions, voter turnout ranged from 50-70% of eligible voters.

Listen Now

Summary:

With early parliamentary elections held on October 26, Ukrainian citizens had an opportunity to honor the spirit of the Euromaidan revolution and elect a new parliament that could steer the country out of conflict and towards a new future.

In western Ukraine, many citizens and candidates were eager for the early elections and have been vocally supporting the anti-corruption and pro-European platforms advocated by President Poroshenko and his bloc of political allies. As their popularity soared, Dr. Haran explained, "pro-European and reform parties" would win the majority of seats in the Rada. Ms. Drach agreed with this prediction, claiming she expected to see a "shift in (Ukraine's) political landscape" following Sunday's elections.

However, Dr. Haran also stated that, due to the country's unchanged electoral laws, a number of entrenched and potentially corrupt politicians, who served in the Yanukovich government, were likely to reclaim seats and still wield some influence in policy decisions. Indeed, the Opposition Bloc, which is essentially the remnants of The Party of Regions of former President Viktor Yanukovich, gained between 7-10% of the vote. With half of the contested parliamentary districts still operating as single-member constituencies, in which a simple plurality determines the winner, Dr. Haran was concerned that bribery and other forms of fraud would still be effective in determining election results. This could be problematic, as the demand for reforms will likely grow now that a new parliament is formed.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In particular, Mr. Druzenko worried that the new government will not be able to enact reforms quick enough so as to appease the peoples' high expectations. So far, the Poroshenko government has been able to justify its inaction by claiming that it is waiting for a parliament to be formed before introducing new policies. However, with the formation of a new parliament, there will be no excuse for the government not to act. Although leading parliamentary candidates have been quick to espouse progressive rhetoric, Mr. Druzenko is "skeptical" that they will be able to enact the "radical and very painful reform(s)" needed to tackle the country's looming energy and fiscal challenges.

Regardless of this new push for equal, open, and transparent voting, other realities on the ground cannot be ignored: most pressing, the country is still divided by war. Although surveys indicated that 70% of Ukrainians supported holding early elections, "Ms. Drach estimated that roughly 4.6 million people were not able to take part in the elections. In Crimea, home to 1.8 million people, only three and a half thousand people planned to vote in mainland Ukraine." This is a sharp decline since May's presidential election and many have reportedly voiced skepticism that "their vote will make a difference." Further, ethnic Tatars have stated that they are reluctant to cross the border to vote in Southern Ukraine because they are afraid Russian officials will not allow them to reenter Crimea.

Despite these reasons for uncertainty, many others were optimistic heading into the elections. Citing recent surveys, Ms. Drach confidently claimed, "more than 40% of Ukrainians expect good things from the elections."

Even now that the election results are coming in, and a picture of the new parliament is forming, significant challenges remain for Ukraine. There is a strong hope that the new Ukrainian government can begin to make significant progress implementing the post-Euromaidan reform agenda, heal lingering social wounds related to the conflict with Russia, and sustain a course towards integration with the European Union.

© Copyright 2014, The Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars , All Rights Reserved.

Ronald Reagan Building and International Trade Center
One Woodrow Wilson Plaza | 1300 Pennsylvania, Ave., NW | Washington, D.C. 20004 | 202.691.4000
Subscriber: podesta@law.georgetown.edu | Manage your Subscriptions | Unsubscribe from All

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
To: "Jennifer Palmieri" <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>
"Tony Carrk" <tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 5/4/2015 5:38:23 AM
Subject: Fwd: Podesta in the News Today

You guys tuned into any of this. One stream is that i'm pro-fracking because Tony and I went to Greek Independence Day together where he must have convinced me to be anti-environment
The other is Uranium 1.
I assume we ignore.

---------- Forwarded message ----------
From: "Tony Podesta" <podesta@podesta.com >
Date: May 4, 2015 9:52 AM
Subject: Fwd: Podesta in the News Today
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com >
Cc:

Sent from my iPhone

Begin forwarded message:

> From: Missi Tessier <tessier@PodestaGroup.onmicrosoft.com >
> Date: May 4, 2015 at 5:51:12 PM GMT+2
> To: Tony Podesta <podesta@podesta.com >, David Marin <DMarin@podestagroup.com >
> Cc: Stephen Rademaker <srademaker@PodestaGroup.onmicrosoft.com >
> Subject: RE: Podesta in the News Today
>
> Yes you are correct. David and Steve may want to give additional justification, but all of us agree that it is not in anyone's interest to engage with or respond to purposefully inaccurate right wing bloggers as it will only result in additional rounds of stories that will do nothing to correct the record. Our internal digital analysis has shown that this story line has flatlined over the last several days and we do not believe that inducing another spike in the online discussion will be beneficial.
>
> From: Tony Podesta
> Sent: Monday, May 04, 2015 10:43 AM
> To: Missi Tessier; David Marin
> Cc: Stephen Rademaker
> Subject: Fwd: Podesta in the News Today
>
> Weren't the Russians already owners when we started
>
> This implies we worked on cifius
>
> Don't think we should let anything pass
>
> Views
>
> Sent from my iPhone

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Begin forwarded message:

From: Gregory McGowan <gmcgowan@podestagroup.com >
Date: May 4, 2015 at 4:26:00 PM GMT+2
To: Everyone <PA-Everyone@podesta.com >
Subject: Podesta in the News Today

PODESTA IN THE NEWS: 05.04.2015

Note: numerous blogs are continuing to repost last week's DeSmog Blog article as well as the following Breitbart piece that was published over the weekend.

Clinton Guru Podesta' Brother Lobbied for Scandal-Ridden Uranium One

By: Ben Shapiro, Breitbart

Breitbart

May 1, 2015

Clinton Guru Podesta' Brother Lobbied for Scandal-Ridden Uranium One

By: Ben Shapiro

If you love the team that put together the Clinton Foundation and all of its various corrupt dealings with foreign nations, you'll love the Hillary Clinton 2016 campaign. It now turns out that John Podesta, chair of Hillary's presidential campaign – and the same man who called the allegations of Peter Schweizer's Clinton Cash "conspiracy theories" – has a brother who runs a company, The Podesta Group, that lobbied the State Department on behalf of Uranium One while Hillary Clinton was Secretary of State and beyond.

Uranium One is, of course, the uranium firm that sent a "flow of cash" to the Clinton Foundation as the Russian government gained increasing ownership of the company; the State Department had to sign off on the Russians' encroachment into the American uranium market. The Clinton Foundation did disclose its relationship with Uranium One in Hillary's State Department disclosures. According to the Daily Caller, Uranium One "paid the Podesta Group $40,000 to lobby the State Department, the Senate, the National Park Service and the National Security Council for 'international mining projects,' according to a July 20, 2012 filing."

Hillary's relationship with John Podesta goes back to the first Clinton administration. During Bill Clinton's second term, Podesta acted as chief of staff. After leaving, he created the Center for American Progress, a Clinton-backed leftist think tank designed to forward the political goals of the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clintons. As the Christian Science Monitor reported when Podesta joined Hillary Clinton's campaign back in January:

Podesta is the guy people call on when the going gets tough: He served as Bill Clinton's chief of staff from 1998 to 2001, helping control a series of crises including Clinton's impeachment trial. The Obama administration brought him on to help the President steer a path through Congressional impasses and to avert embarrassments like the Affordable Care Act's botched rollout.

Podesta's relationship with the Clintons didn't waver during Hillary's time in the White House; his own ties with the Obama administration grew stronger when he became a senior advisor to the Obama administration in late 2013, before resigning this year to join Hillary's campaign.

Podesta isn't the only member of the Clinton team embroiled in Clinton Foundation corruption. Hillary's new top fundraiser is Dennis Cheng, the former chief development officer for the Clinton Foundation, which means he did all the fundraising for that organization. Cheng has not been asked any questions thus far about his relationship with the Clinton Foundation or the new Clinton 2016 campaign.

Just as President Obama magically transformed his campaign organization, Obama for America, into a political action group, Organizing for Action, to lobby for his preferred governmental policies, Hillary Clinton has transformed the Clinton Foundation and its constellation of allies into her 2016 campaign.

GREGORY MCGOWAN ASSOCIATE

O 202.448.5204 / C / W www.podestagroup.com

1001 G Street NW, Suite 1000 West, Washington, DC 20001

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Adam Blickstein" <ablickstein@nsnetwork.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 10/5/2009 6:06:41 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Conservatives Undermine the Commander-in-Chief

Conservatives Undermine the Commander-in-Chief

Washington, D.C. - The mythical "water's edge" beyond which politics plays no part in US national security policy receded further this weekend, as Senator Jim DeMint personally worked to undermine US policy toward Honduras and other Senators sought to go around the chain of command on Afghanistan and called for military strikes on Iran. It is fair to advocate these positions; it is another thing to actively lobby for them in a political manner that undercuts our country's ability to navigate the already difficult terrain of national security policy.

The President's global agenda has come under withering attack from conservatives. Opposition to President Obama on national security policy has come to resemble little more than a consensus of "no". Their reflexive opposition - vividly evident in domestic debates and in the celebrations over the Olympic committee's decision against Chicago as well - has become their defining characteristic. The concept of a loyal opposition that provides subdued criticism of a President's national security policy seems to have been forgotten, replaced by a counter-productive, damaging and reckless political agenda. There no longer appears to be a water's edge in Washington.

Senator Jim DeMint (R- SC) undercuts Obama on Latin America by deliberately working "against the foreign policy of the United States" on Honduras. DeMint has prevented the Obama administration from fully fielding its Latin America diplomatic team, undercutting our ability to resolve the immediate tensions in Honduras as he tries to enforce policy goals at odds with the Administration..Senator DeMint's home state newspaper, The State, described the Senator's recent trip to Honduras saying, "U.S. Sen. Jim DeMint returned Saturday from his controversial fact-finding mission. DeMint led a delegation that met with Honduran President Roberto Micheletti, members of the Honduran Supreme Court, leading candidates for the upcoming Nov. 29 elections, election officials and Honduran business and civic leaders... The DeMint trip caused a spark last week after U.S. Sen. John Kerry, a Massachusetts Democrat, attempted to block DeMint's trip... DeMint has long objected to the Obama administration's response to the crisis, arguing the United States should not promote the former government's return to power." As Steve Clemons at the Washington Note further explains, "Senator Jim DeMint (R-SC) has announced that he is heading down to Honduras to encourage those who helped fund and supported the coup against Honduran President Manuel Zelaya to resist American pressure to return Zelaya to office. The US Department of State has begun to revoke the visas of wealthy supporters of the military coup. In other words, Jim DeMint is acting on behalf of, in cahoots with, and against the foreign policy of the United States of America in encouraging post-coup Honduran government officials defy the United States. He is encouraging a political leadership which has no legitimacy and which not recognized by other democracies in the region -- while the ousted President makes cell phone UN General Assembly statements from a couch-bed in the Brazilian Embassy in Tegucigalpa."

In addition, to his controversial trip, "DeMint has blocked the nominations of Thomas Shannon, President Barack Obama's pick to serve as ambassador to Brazil, and Arturo Valenzuela, the choice for the post of assistant secretary of state for Western Hemisphere affairs," according to The Hill. Clemons puts DeMint's actions in historical context: "A US Senator alone does not make the America's foreign policy, and working against the policies of the United States in collaboration with foreign officials... well... there are words that come to mind to describe this behavior, but I want to be civil towards the Senator." DeMint is not only out of sync with U.S. policy, but the policy of the entire hemisphere, undermining the international consensus of our regional partners to bring about a peaceful solution, as the Washington Post explains : "The administration, along with all other governments in the hemisphere, branded the action a 'coup.' It also cut off millions of dollars in aid and suspended the U.S. visas of Honduran officials. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton helped organize negotiations, led by Costa Rican President Oscar Arias, that produced a plan to allow ousted president Manuel Zelaya to return to his post temporarily, with limited powers." [The State, 10/4/09 . The Washington Note, 10/1/09 . The Hill, 9/20/09. Washington Post, 10/5/09]

Conservative Senators call on Obama to abrogate role as Commander in Chief and instead to simply defer to the military on Afghanistan - Gen. Jones takes them to task for playing politics. Over the last few weeks, certain congressional conservatives have exhibited a steady pattern of undermining the President's deliberations over the strategy for Afghanistan by using the military for political purposes. Senator Jon Kyl (R - AZ) accused White House officials of "being armchair generals," argued that the President should defer to the military leadership, and cautioned against "a big debate." Former Republican President Candidate and Kyl's colleague from Arizona Senator John McCain has pushed a similar position. Last week McCain attempted to pass an amendment to the Defense appropriations bill that would have required General Stanley McChrystal to testify before Congress, without complementary testimony from the civilian leadership involved in setting the strategy for Afghanistan. The amendment failed and a replacement amendment that respected the chain of command, authored by Senator Levin (D - MI), passed.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a rebuke to such efforts, National Security Advisor Jim Jones appeared on CBS's Face the Nation to underscore "the importance of the moment to make sure that the strategic issues and the strategic decisions that the president will make are fully aired and vetted and that the options that the president has are also put on the table. It would be, I think, unfortunate if we let the discussion just be about troop strength." Also appearing on CNN's State of the Union, Jones emphasized that "it's better for military advice to come up through the chain of command." When asked to respond to an insinuation by Senator McCain - that the Administration was kowtowing to its liberal base - Jones took exception to the remark and stressed the importance of not "play[ing] politics with national security." [Senator Jon Kyl (R - AZ), 10/04/09 . National Security Advisor Jim Jones on CBS 10/04/09 . National Security Advisor Jim Jones on CNN 10/04/09]

Conservatives on Capitol Hill attempt to undercut Administration's hard-headed negotiations with Iran. When asked by John King from CNN's State of the Union whether Congress should move ahead with sanctions against Iran, despite ongoing international negotiations, Senator Jon Kyl responded by saying "Putting sticks on the table is exactly the point, John... I think we should go forward with it." Kyl was joined by Senators Saxby Chambliss (R - GA) and Lindsey Graham (R - SC). On Fox News Sunday, Chambliss said that "just continuing the dialogue with them and threatening them with sanctions, if the President's gonna take that attitude, I don't think we're gonna get anywhere." Chambliss also urged that if sanctions failed, the U.S. should pursue "a full-out military strike."

Yet there is widespread agreement amongst top Pentagon officials, foreign policy experts, and even Iran's moderate opposition that this dangerous approach will not work and will be counterproductive to our interests:

- Colin Kahl, Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for the Middle East, told ThinkProgress: "'[I]t will have an unpredictable set of consequences for the region but we can imagine a number of destabilizing ones. Depending on how Iran chose to retaliate, whether they chose to retaliate through the use of proxies in places like Iran or in Afghanistan through incitement of Shia communities... They could activate potentially activate or encourage Hizballah and Hamas to engage in reprisals and you can imagine the second and third order consequences of that on the peace process and on our outreach to the Muslim world and all of that.... We don't exactly know how it would unfold you have the prospects for unintended escalation and kind of losing control of what's going on,' Kahl warned, adding that even though any military strike could delay Iran's nuclear program, it could also 'incentivize the Iranians to go all the way to weaponize.'"
- Ambassador Nick Burns, former Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs during the Bush administration: "Here again, I would just credit President Obama. I know that there are critics, particularly on the right, who say that engagement isn't going to work and that it has been a waste of time. I very strongly disagree with that. I think President Obama made clear from the very first moments of his presidency, from the clenched fist reference in his inaugural speech, through his Nowruz message to the Iranian people and then through his offer to negotiate unconditionally - I think he turned the tables on the Iranians. He has helped to put them on the defensive. I do think these talks start with the Iranians in a difficult position."
- Iranian opposition leader Mir Mir Hossein Mousavi: "[s]anctions would not affect the government but would impose many hardships upon the people, who suffer enough as a result of the calamity of their insane rulers."

[Senator Jon Kyl on CNN, 10/04/09 . Senator Saxby Chambliss on Fox News via TPM, 10/04/09 . DASD for the Middle East Colin Kahl, via Ben Armbruster, Think Progress, 10/1/09 . Ambassador Nick Burns, 10/01/09 . Mir Hossein Mousavi, Washington Post, 10/1/09]

###

Adam Blickstein
Communications Director
National Security Network
202-289-7113 (office)
617-335-0859 (mobile)
ablickstein@nsnetwork.org

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail dubois.sara@gmail.com with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.

-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Adam Jentleson" <Ajentleson@americanprogress.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 8/28/2009 2:14:49 AM
Subject: [big campaign] WaPo Poll Finds Strong Support for Clean Energy Legislation

Highlights:

-Nearly six in 10 of those polled support the proposed changes to U.S. energy policy being developed by Congress and the administration.

-Majorities of those surveyed say changes in energy policy would address global warming and not raise energy costs.

-Fewer than one in five say that the reform efforts would lead to job losses; more than twice as many see added jobs.

On Energy, Obama Finds Broad Support

Poll Shows Backing for Reform Efforts, But Cap-and-Trade Bill Is Harder Sell
By Steven Mufson and Jennifer Agiesta
Washington Post Staff Writers
Friday, August 28, 2009

Most Americans approve of the way President Obama is handling energy issues and support efforts by him and Democrats in Congress to overhaul energy policy -- including the controversial cap-and-trade approach to limiting greenhouse gas emissions, according to a Washington Post-ABC News poll.

Even as public support has slipped for Obama's health-care proposals, support for ambitious changes in energy policy has been steady. Although the issue of health care arouses more intense feelings than energy policy does, those who do feel strongly about energy and climate policy tend to tilt toward the administration's position and a broad majority of people echo Democratic lawmakers' views on the benefits of proposed changes.

Nearly six in 10 of those polled support the proposed changes to U.S. energy policy being developed by Congress and the administration. Fifty-five percent of Americans approve of the way Obama is handling the issue, compared with 30 percent who do not. A narrower majority, 52 to 43 percent, back a cap-and-trade system; that margin is unchanged since June. A cap-and-trade system would set a ceiling for the nation's greenhouse gas emissions, and it would allow firms to buy and sell emissions permits.

"Something definitely has to be done," said Marian Eldridge, a former legal secretary from East Windsor, N.J., who participated in the survey. "Anything's worth a try at this point." She said she tries to "ignore the politics; you get discouraged." But she said that higher energy costs were "inevitable" and that "we're too dependent on other countries."

Despite public support for an energy and climate bill, the prospects for legislation remain uncertain. The House narrowly passed a measure in June, but not before inserting a multitude of provisions for consumers, interest groups and corporations. The Senate remains divided over how to move forward, and getting 60 senators to back an end to debate could be difficult. Adding to that challenge is the thin public support for the cap-and-trade approach if it were to raise consumers' costs. Although 58 percent of those polled would support the plan if it reduced greenhouse gas emissions and cost them an extra $10 a month, support drops to 39 percent if new monthly costs reached $25.

Moreover, the Senate's calendar is crowded with legislation on a variety of matters, including health care, appropriations, an increase in the debt ceiling and the extension of a nuclear weapons treaty with Russia.

Effect on Jobs

Majorities of those surveyed say changes in energy policy would address global warming and not raise energy costs. Although many proponents of a cap-and-trade bill say it could spur job creation in the renewable-energy sector and foes say it would drive jobs overseas, a plurality of Americans -- more than four out of 10 -- think that the legislation would have no effect on employment in their states. Fewer than one in five say that the reform efforts would lead to job losses; more than twice as many see added jobs.

GOP criticism of the House energy and climate bill appears to have primarily influenced Republicans themselves.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Among Republicans, support for cap-and-trade legislation has dipped from 45 percent to 37 percent since a poll taken in June.

"It will make the cost [of energy] go up too high for people," said Mary Lou Pomeroy, an elementary school teacher's assistant in Renton, Wash., near Seattle. "I think there's a lot of people struggling and seeing their income reduced, and we don't need things that cost more. I'm just not sure that's our biggest issue. . . . I think health care right now is bigger. Or the huge deficit."

Support for the plan among independents has increased slightly, with a narrow majority now in favor. Overall, a slight majority of those polled say changes to energy policy would help address global warming, while a third say they will not. A slim 5 percent volunteered that global warming is not an issue.

Obama's goal of putting 1 million electric cars on the road by 2015 strikes a chord. More than eight in 10 people say they support the development of electric car technology.

Some people see the government's Cash for Clunkers program as a symbol of energy policy, even though it is separate from the comprehensive House legislation. Nearly seven in 10 backed using cash rebates to encourage people to buy more fuel-efficient cars .

Eldridge, the New Jersey resident, said, "I think the clunker thing was a good idea. It helped get some garbage off the roads."

Pomeroy, however, predicted that many people who traded in clunkers would be unable to make payments on their new cars. And she viewed the government's difficulty in getting payments to dealers as symptomatic of government involvement in the economy. "I don't think our government is all that great at efficiency," she said.

Energy Sources

The public's preferences regarding energy sources to meet the nation's needs remain mostly the same as they were at the start of the decade, with a modest uptick in support for new nuclear power plants and a decline in support for building oil-, coal- or natural gas-fueled plants.

Solar and wind power enjoy near-universal support; nine in 10 people support further development. More than eight in 10 favor requirements for greater fuel efficiency. Broad majorities also favor requiring increased energy conservation from businesses and consumers.

Fifty-two percent favor building more nuclear power plants, but that support drops to 35 percent if the new plants were within 50 miles of the respondent's home. Support for building nuclear plants is up about six percentage points since 2001.

But energy issues and the voluminous House bill remain difficult for people to understand. Fifteen percent say they have no opinion on Obama's handling of the energy issue, whereas 5 percent say they have no opinion on health care and 2 percent lack an opinion about the economy.

The poll was conducted Aug. 13-17 among a random national sample of 1,001 adults. The results have a margin of error of three percentage points.

Polling director Jon Cohen contributed to this report.

http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2009/08/27/AR2009082703823_pf.html

---

Adam Jentleson
Communications Director, Progressive Media ajentleson@americanprogress action .org ajentleson (AIM)
202-247-8614 (cell)

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail dubois.sara@gmail.com with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Adam Blickstein" <ablickstein@nsnetwork.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 9/17/2009 3:22:01 AM
Subject: [big campaign] TODAY 1PM: Missile Defense Press Call

TODAY 1PM: Missile Defense Press Call

Washington D.C. - Today at 1:00 PM EDT, several national security and missile defense experts will provide reaction to the Obama administration's decision to not to proceed with Bush-era plans to place untested, ground-based missile interceptor system in Poland and the Czech Republic. Nonproliferation expert Joe Cirincione, missile defense expert Philip Coyle, and intelligence expert Greg Thielmann will discuss how the decision reflects the need to respond to new threats and underscores the new technological realities of missile defense.

Call-in #: 1-800-862-9098**
International Only*: 785-424-1051
Passcode: 7DEFENSE**

WHO: Joe Cirincione, President of Ploughshares Fund;
Philip Coyle, senior advisor to the Center for Defense Information;
Greg Thielmann, senior fellow Arms Control Association

WHAT: Press Call to discuss Missile Defense

WHEN: Today, Thursday September 17
1:00 PM

Joseph Cirincione, President of the Ploughshares Fund, served previously as senior vice president for national security and international policy at the Center for American Progress and as director for nonproliferation at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace for eight years. He worked for nine years in the U.S. House of Representatives as a professional staff member of the Committee on Armed Services and the Committee on Government Operations, and served as staff director of the bipartisan Military Reform Caucus. He teaches at the Georgetown University Graduate School of Foreign Service and is a member of the Council on Foreign Relations.

Philip Coyle is a senior advisor to the Center for Defense Information. He is a recognized expert on U.S. and worldwide military research, development and testing, on operational military matters, and on national security policy and defense spending, including defense acquisition reform and defense procurement. Coyle also has extensive background in missile defense, in military space systems, and in high-technology weapons, such as high power lasers and other directed-energy weapons. From his many years at Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory, Coyle also has considerable experience in nuclear weapons research, development, and testing, and nuclear weapons effects, including EMP.

Greg Thielmann most recently served as a senior professional staffer of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence (SSCI). Prior to joining the SSCI in 2005, he was a U.S. Foreign Service Officer for 25 years, last serving as Director of the Strategic, Proliferation and Military Affairs Office in the Department of State's Bureau of Intelligence and Research. His foreign posts include Deputy Political Counselor of the U.S. Embassy in Brasilia, Brazil; Political-Military Affairs Officer in Moscow, USSR; and Political-Military Affairs Officer in Bonn, Germany. Thielmann also served as the Deputy Office Director in the State Department's Office of German, Austrian and Swiss Affairs; Special Assistant to Ambassador Paul Nitze (then Special Adviser to the President and Secretary of State on Arms Control Matters); and State Department advisor to the U.S. Delegation at the Geneva INF arms control negotiations. Greg is a member of the Council on Foreign Relations and a former member of the Board of Directors of the Arms Control Association (2003-2005). His July 2003 appearance at an ACA press briefing on faulty intelligence assessments on Iraq's WMD capabilities.

###

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Communications Director
National Security Network
202-289-7113 (office)
617-335-0859 (mobile)
ablickstein@nsnetwork.org

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail dubois.sara@gmail.com with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Adam Blickstein" <ablickstein@nsnetwork.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 1/4/2010 6:38:48 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Conservatives Spend Holiday Regifting Fear to the American People

Conservatives Spend Holiday Regifting Fear to the American People

Washington, D.C. - On Christmas day, a terrorist came perilously close to successfully staging an attack within the US. The event points to weaknesses and limitations in our intelligence, screening and information-sharing capabilities. The administration has set out to carefully review how this attempt could have taken place, with the President vowing to strengthen the system protecting Americans and to hold his administration accountable for its mistakes. This careful, sober response has become a hallmark of the administration's strategy for countering terrorism, an approach which at its core emphasizes integration, consistency with our laws and values, and a refusal to engage in the over-reaction and fear mongering that our enemies hope to produce. Praising the President's reformulated approach to counterterrorism, the Washington Post wrote that his administration has "demonstrated tenacity and pragmatism blended with a necessary reassessment of the flawed policies of his predecessors and a recommitment to the rule of law."

Sadly, the attempt has also confirmed some conservatives' unwillingness to answer the President's call for unity and calm. Within a day, conservatives had begun discussing preventive war on Yemen, confidently asserting that Obama's policies had caused the attack, and using the incident for fundraising purposes. The implications of such threat-hyping - war in every country where extremists operate - play directly into Al Qaeda's strategy: forcing the U.S. to over-extend itself through limitless military operations. And by leaping to inject partisan politics into what could have been a national tragedy, conservatives once again exhibited a worrisome refusal to act constructively when it comes to national security. For the sake of Americans' security, conservatives should abandon these dangerous tactics, and take up the administration's call for unity in countering the terrorist threat.

Administration's cool-headed approach is the right way to deal with terrorist threat. Since the attempted terrorist attack on Christmas Day in Detroit, the Obama administration has moved swiftly and soberly to ensure that everything possible is done to protect Americans' security. Following the failed attack, President Obama launched a comprehensive review to determine how the attempt could have taken place. The Administration's response highlights several key principles of its counterterrorism approach:

> Countering terrorism using an integrated approach: On Sunday, White House Counterterrorism and Homeland Security Advisor John Brennan explained how the reviews would feed into the administration's integrated approach for countering terrorism: "There's no single silver bullet that's going to be able to allow us to have that type of assurance that we're going to be able to stop individuals from coming aboard planes. It's -- has to be a package of things. It has to be technology, it has to be expertise, it has to be intelligence, it has to be cooperation with our international partners. And so all this has to come together seamlessly, and it has to be done on a daily basis." [John Brennan, Meet the Press, 1/03/10]
>
> Fighting extremism without letting the fight distort all our foreign and domestic policy: As he has in the past, Brennan also situated the administration's response within the President's broader commitment to security, prosperity and the rule of law: "Well, because, first of all, we're a country of laws, and what we're going to do is to make sure that we treat each individual case appropriately. In the past Richard Reid, the former shoe bomber; Zacarias Moussaoui; Jose Padilla; Iyman Faris; all of them were charged in criminal court, were sentenced some in -- in some cases to life imprisonment. We have these tools available, whether it's an enemy combatant avenue or to charge them criminally. We look at the cases, and in this case we decided it was best, in fact, to charge him criminally." Rep. Jane Harman (D-CA) chairwoman of the Homeland Security Subcommittee on Intelligence also stressed that holding true to America's values is important to maintaining security. She told the Washington Post that "Civil liberties matter, and we must stay mindful that an overreaction has the potential to overwhelm the system and fail to make us more safe," [John Brennan, Meet the Press, 1/03/10 . Jane Harman, via Washington Post, 12/28/09 .]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Refusing to overreact or give in to fear: In his address to the nation, the President made clear that he would not have his policies ruled by fear: "But as we go forward, let us remember this-our adversaries are those who would attack our country, not our fellow Americans, not each other. Let's never forget what has always carried us through times of trial, including those attacks eight Septembers ago. Instead of giving in to fear and cynicism, let's renew that timeless American spirit of resolve and confidence and optimism. Instead of succumbing to partisanship and division, let's summon the unity that this moment demands. Let's work together, with a seriousness of purpose, to do what must be done to keep our country safe." The CATO Institute's Jim Harper commented: "attacks would likely increase if it appeared that attacking the U.S. and its interests could visibly fluster the U.S. president. The discipline shown by the White House during this event is an important contribution to our security from the next attack. Politicians beneath President Obama's grade should take a lesson and control their reactions as well. " [President Obama, 1/02/10. Jim Harper, 12/30/09 .]

[President Obama, 1/02/10]

Fear mongering does nothing for our security - but it does play into Al Qaeda's hands. Marc Lynch, senior fellow at CNAS and professor at George Washington University, explains, "In fact, this risks becoming a classic case of massive overreaction playing right into the hands of a terrorist group. The Obama administration, which actually has been working on the Yemen issue all year, now risks falling right back into the classic catalog of Bush-era conceptual and practical mistakes as it scrambles for a response. To get Yemen right will require getting the complicated terrain of Yemeni and Gulf politics right -- not just looking for some kind of military intervention or an influx of foreign aid in order to be seen to have 'done something', and not reducing it to an Al Qaeda or COIN problem. Direct American military intervention in Yemen is so obviously ludicrous that it shouldn't even need to be said. Osama bin Laden himself explains in a 2004 video "We [Al Qaeda] are continuing this policy in bleeding America to the point of bankruptcy. Allah willing, and nothing is too great for Allah." In the video bin Laden, referring to the fight against the Soviet Union, said, "using guerrilla warfare and the war of attrition to fight tyrannical superpowers. We, alongside the mujahedeen, bled Russia for 10 years until it went bankrupt and was forced to withdraw in defeat." He also said Al Qaeda has found it "easy for us to provoke and bait" the Bush administration.

Disappointingly, the initial response from conservatives fell right into that trap. Rep. Peter King (R-NY), the ranking Republican on the Homeland Security Committee, first responded by saying that "This was the real deal... This could have been devastating." Charles Krauthammer offers Al Qaeda the grandiosity and uniqueness that it seeks: "A man who shoots abortion doctors is an extremist. An eco-fanatic who torches logging sites is an extremist. Abdulmutallab is not one of these. He is a jihadist. And unlike the guys who shoot abortion doctors, jihadists have cells all over the world; they blow up trains in London, nightclubs in Bali and airplanes over Detroit (if they can); and are openly pledged to war on America." Sen. Joseph Lieberman (I- CT) even went as far as to suggest that a future war in Yemen may be the solution to international terrorism. He said on ABC's This Week that "Senator Collins and I, with a few colleagues, were in Yemen in August. And one of our American personnel there said to us -- and I thought quite wisely -- that Iraq is yesterday's war, Afghanistan is today's war, and if we don't act preemptively, Yemen will be tomorrow's war." [Peter King, via NY Times, 12/25/09 . Charles Krauthammer, 1/1/10 . Joe Lieberman, ABC News, 1/3/10 . Marc Lynch, 1/2/10 . Al Qaeda video via CNN, 11/1/2004]

Conservatives use attempted attack as a chance to politicize national security, but counter-terrorism professionals push back. As Peter Baker documented for the New York Times Magazine, former senior Bush administration officials don't agree with the rhetoric of their former bosses. "A half-dozen former senior Bush officials involved in counterterrorism told me before the Christmas Day incident that for the most part, they were comfortable with Obama's policies, although they were reluctant to say so on the record," reported Baker. On Fox News Sunday, President Obama's counterterrorism advisor John Brennan criticized these attempts to politicize national security issues. "I just think that, you know, partisan politics should be put aside when something as important to national security as the threat of terrorism -- it's a serious threat. It continues to haunt us. And we have to make sure that we stay focused on Al Qaida. And so that's what I'm going to do in this job." He went on to says that "It's disappointing to me that either the vice president and others have willfully mischaracterized President Obama's position and actions, or they're just ignorant of the facts...I'm neither a Republican nor a Democrat. I've worked for the previous five administrations, and this president is determined, and I think it is demonstrated in his language. He says that we're at war with Al Qaida. We're going to destroy Al Qaida the organization." But conservatives have chosen to use the incident for partisan ends and even for fundraising: [NY Times, 1/4/10 . John Brennan, FOX News Sunday, 1/03/10]

Rep. Pete Hoekstra (R-MI), the ranking Republican on the House Intelligence Committee, within 72 hours of the attack, sent out a fundraising letter that strongly politicized the failed Christmas day airline bombing. Hoekstra, who is running for governor in Michigan, used the event to try and scrape up a few extra dollars for his campaign. After comically mentioning that "there should be no partisan rancor when it comes to keeping our citizens safe," Hoekstra attacked Obama and "his left-wing cronies" in an attempt to exploit national security issues raise money for a political campaign. The fundraising letter said "They just don't get it. The system didn't 'work' here. Far from it! It is insulting that The Obama administration would make such a claim, but then again, these are the same weak-kneed liberals who have recently tried to bring Guantanamo Bay terrorists right here to Michigan!" [Pete Hoekstra fundraising letter, 12/28/09]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Senator Jim DeMint (R-SC), who has continually politicized national security by blocking important nominations, is also blocking President Obama's nominee to head the Transportation Security Administration, putting partisan politics ahead of national security priorities. USA Today reports that "Sen. Jim DeMint, the Republican senator who is blocking the president's choice to head the Transportation Security Administration... DeMint is blocking Erroll Southers appointment over labor issues -- including possibly giving TSA employees collective bargaining rights." [USA Today, 1/4/10]

Former Vice President Dick Cheney has once again emerged, leading the attacks on the Obama administration. In a letter to Politico, Cheney attacked President Obama saying that he is "trying to pretend we are not at war... Why doesn't he want to admit we're at war? It doesn't fit with the view of the world he brought with him to the Oval Office. It doesn't fit with what seems to be the goal of his presidency - social transformation - the restructuring of American society." [Dick Cheney via Politico, 12/30/09]

Bill Kristol, in an attempt to gain political ground, says pronounces al Qaeda victorious. He said, "We can't protect our own embassy in Yemen, a place where we have special operations forces? A place we say we're working with the government on the front lines of the war on terror? And there's a terror threat, and we close the embassy? That's a victory for al Qaeda." [Bill Kristol via the Atlantic Wire 1/3/10]

###

Adam Blickstein
Communications Director
National Security Network
202-289-7113 (office)
617-335-0859 (mobile)
ablickstein@nsnetwork.org

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail dubois.sara@gmail.com with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace" <info@centerpeace.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 8/20/2015 2:50:01 AM
Subject: News Update - August 20, 2015

S. DANIEL ABRAHAM
CENTER FOR MIDDLE EAST PEACE

Israel and the Middle East News Update

Thursday, August 20

Click here for a printer-friendly version.

Headlines:

- White House 'comfortable' with Tehran 'Self-Inspecting' Concept
- US Reform Movement: We Can't Choose Sides on Iran
- Iran, Russia Reach Agreement on Delivery of S-300 Missiles
- Pelosi: Democrats Have the Votes to See Iran Deal Through
- Court Suspends Palestinian's Administrative Detention
- Abbas Orders Palestinian Branch of Geneva Initiative Closed
- Foreign Ministry Workers: We'll Delay Danon's Departure

Commentary:

- MSNBC: "Israeli Lawmaker: Iran Deal will Lower Nuclear Threat to Israel"
  - By [Insert Author Here]
- Al Monitor: "Herzog: Abbas Worries about 'Losing Control' of West Bank"
  - By Ben Caspit

Times of Israel

White House 'comfortable' with 'Self-Inspecting'

The White House on Wednesday said it was "confident" in the abilities of the International Agency for Atomic Energy to monitor and inspect the possible military dimensions on Iran's past nuclear work and was "comfortable" with confidential arrangements between the IAEA and Tehran to ensure compliance with the nuclear deal signed on July 14. "As the administration has said before — including in classified briefings for both chambers of Congress — we are confident in the agency's technical plans for investigating the possible military dimensions of Iran's former program, issues that in some cases date back more than a decade," White House National Security Council spokesman Ned Price said Wednesday in response to an Associated Press report that revealed the IAEA would cede investigative authority of a suspected nuclear site to Tehran.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jerusalem Post

US Reform Movement: We Can't Choose Sides on Iran

"There is simply no clarity that would support taking a position 'for' or 'against'" the Iranian nuclear accord, the leaders of the American Reform Movement's main institution organs asserted on Wednesday. In a joint statement, the Union for Reform Judaism, the Central Conference of American Rabbis, the Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism and the Association of Reform Zionists of America declined to take sides in the debate, instead asking American Jews to consider the "day after" and the repercussions of an acrimonious debate both upon communal cohesion and American-Israeli relations. The Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action agreed upon in Vienna and currently up for review before Congress is "challenging to analyze," the groups' leaders wrote, citing arguments both for and against legislative approval. "We recognize that these arguments have merit: The JCPOA does present a way forward, there are real dangers to rejecting it, and it does not foreclose Iran's ability to become a nuclear weapons threshold state."

Ha'aretz

Iran, Russia Reach Agreement on S-300 Missiles

Iran and Russia have reached an agreement to deliver S-300 surface-to-air missile systems, Russia Today reported on Wednesday. Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Mikhail Bogdanov was quoted as saying that "the topic is closed. We have reached full understanding on the matter together with our Iranian partners." It is still unclear whether the agreement lists three or four missile systems. Russian state arms producer Almaz-Antey in June said it would supply Iran with a modernized version of the S-300, among the world's most capable air defense systems, once a commercial agreement was reached. Russia says it canceled a contract to deliver S-300s to Iran in 2010 under pressure from the West. But President Vladimir Putin lifted that self-imposed ban in April following an interim nuclear deal between Iran and world powers. Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, one of the most vocal critics of last month's final nuclear deal between Iran and world powers, has expressed Israel's "dismay" at Russia's decision to supply the S-300s to Tehran.

AP

Pelosi: We Have the Votes to See Iran Deal Through

House Democrats have the votes, if necessary, to uphold President Barack Obama's veto of a resolution against his Iran nuclear deal, Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said Wednesday. Pelosi said that if such a vote were held today there would be enough support among House Democrats for Obama to prevail. That would take 146 House Democrats, and fewer than 60 have publicly declared their support so far. In an interview with The Associated Press, Pelosi declined to disclose her private vote count but expressed confidence in the outcome. "The president's veto would be sustained" if the vote were held today, Pelosi said, adding she hopes it doesn't get to that point. "But I feel very confident about it."

Ha'aretz

Abbas Orders Pal. Branch of Geneva Initiative Closed

In yet another move to minimize the influence of his political opponents, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas on Thursday signed a presidential order for the closure of the Palestinian branch of the Geneva Initiative. The head of Palestinian Peace Coalition, an NGO devoted to implementing the Geneva Initiative, is Yasser Abed Rabbo, who was recently fired by Abbas from his post as PLO secretary general for voicing criticism against the Palestinian president. Palestinian Peace Coalition was founded after the Geneva Initiative was unveiled in 2003. The nonprofit is working to promote the two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in various sectors of the Palestinian society and is also holding meetings between Palestinians and Israelis.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ynet News

Court Suspends Pal.'s Administrative Detention

Israel's High Court on Wednesday evening announced it was suspending the administrative detention of hunger-striking Palestinian Mohammed Allaan. The court ruled that if Allaan's brain damage proves to be irreversible, the administrative order for his detention will be completely revoked. It was unclear whether the damage was reversible. The justices also ruled that if Allaan's condition improves, and in the event that he requests transfer to another hospital or turns to the authorities, or if there are problems or disagreements, the court will reconsider the case. Justice Rubinstein explained the reasoning behind the decision: "He does not pose a danger because of his medical condition, and so the administrative order is not active now," he wrote. He added that relatives and associates could now visit Allaan, subject to normal hospital guidelines.

Ynet News

Foreign Min. Workers: We'll Delay Danon's Departure

Foreign Ministry workers, who have been in a labor dispute with the government for ten days, announced that they were intensifying their efforts, and will be delaying the issuing of diplomatic passports for different recent nominations by Prime Minister Netanhayu. These include the diplomatic passports for new UN Ambassador Danny Danon, new Ambassador to Brazil Danny Dayan, and new Ambassador to Italy Fiamma Nirenstein. Workers hope these steps will encourage Prime Minister Netanyahu (who also currently serves in official capacity as foreign minister) to quickly resolve the dispute.

MSNBC – August 19, 2015

Israeli Lawmaker: Iran Deal will Lower Nuclear Threat to Israel

By Omer Bar Lev

After carefully studying the agreement between six world powers and Iran to prevent the development of an Iranian nuclear weapon, I have concluded that the nuclear threat to Israel as a result of the deal will be significantly lower for the coming years than it is today.

Let me be clear – this is not a perfect deal. Indeed, the agreement contains fundamental flaws, such as allowing Iran to continue developing advanced centrifuges. But it also contains significant benefits for Israel that have not been sufficiently acknowledged in the debate over the agreement that has raged in my country.

For example, Iran already possesses enough enriched uranium today to produce more than five nuclear bombs. Under the agreement, Iran must ship most of its enriched uranium out of the country. For the next 15 years, it will be allowed to retain only 300 kilograms of low enriched uranium. Since 1.5 tons of highly enriched uranium are required to make just one nuclear bomb, this is a huge positive. Additionally, beyond the verification and inspection mechanisms outlined in the deal, Israeli and U.S. intelligence have robust capabilities that will allow them to detect an Iranian violation if it occurs.

Those who charge that the agreement increases the nuclear threat to Israel ignore these inconvenient facts. Some perhaps do so out of ignorance because they have not bothered to read the agreement. But others are undoubtedly doing so for political reasons, none more so than Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who has deliberately misled the public.

Mr. Netanyahu is deceiving the Israeli people by creating the perception that the implementation of the agreement and the removal of the sanctions depend solely upon the upcoming vote in the U.S. Congress. This could not be further from the truth. Already, Britain, France, Russia, China, as well as Germany and the United Nations Security Council itself, have voted to remove the sanctions as soon as the International Atomic Energy Agency confirms that Iran has upheld its part of the agreement.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This includes Iran exporting its enriched uranium and shutting down the majority of its centrifuges. For those who might be confused about time frames, these steps are supposed to occur before the end of 2015.

Now we must ask ourselves: What will the United States do? If Congress overrides President Barack Obama and rejects the deal, only American sanctions will remain in place. However, Article 36 of the agreement states that if one of the signatories does not abide by the agreement, Iran is allowed to reject the deal in its entirety and not uphold any of its commitments.

Such a development would pose a double threat to Israel. First, it will create a reality in which most of the sanctions will have already been removed and billions of dollars already flowed into Iran. No doubt some of them will finance Hamas in Gaza, Hezbollah in Lebanon, and other terror organizations in the Middle East and around the world.

Second, Iran will be able to resume its nuclear weapons program without violating any international agreement or resolution, and Israel – whose relationship with the United States has been badly damaged by Netanyahu – will be left isolated and blamed for the collapse of the agreement.

The strict implementation of the Iran nuclear agreement will significantly diminish the Iranian nuclear threat to Israel. It will allow Israel's defense establishment to focus on preparing the country for any potential confrontation with Hamas or Hezbollah. Moreover, the country will be able to divert resources to prepare proper defenses so the home front is ready to deal with missiles and rockets that will surely rain down upon Israeli cities in any future confrontation.

We should not take this lightly. If Israel had been party to the nuclear negotiations, or if we had been in close contact with the negotiators, we would likely have been able to shape a final agreement that would be far more favorable. However, given the reality we face, Israel would be best served if we objectively examined the situation rather than spreading fear and half-truths, which are nothing more than political tools.

Omer Bar Lev is a Knesset Member representing the Zionist Union.

Al Monitor – August 20, 2015

Herzog: Abbas Worries about 'Losing Control' of West Bank

By Ben Caspit

His meeting with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas on Aug. 18 was an encounter Zionist Camp leader Isaac Herzog had requested some time ago — immediately after losing to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in the March 17 elections. The only way the Zionist Camp party leader could differentiate himself from Netanyahu was to meet with Abbas and to demonstrate an affinity for and commitment to any kind of diplomatic process. The problem was that the Palestinian leader was not exactly enthusiastic about the idea. Spring went, summer arrived and suddenly, while Herzog was vacationing with his family in Cyprus, the telephone call came from presidential spokesman Nabil Abu Rodeina:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The chairman would be happy to see you, Herzog was told.

They sat together in Ramallah for almost an hour and a half, just the two of them. As opposed to prior visits and meetings, this tête-à-tête was without fanfare: no media presence, no escorts nor other participants. Just Abbas and Herzog sat together, the two great losers of the previous year. Herzog had almost made it to the prime minister's office when he lost to Netanyahu at the last minute and Abbas had remained the abandoned rear guard without an agenda, a diplomatic horizon, any kind of negotiations or international interest. Of the two of them, only Abbas is mulling possible retirement. Herzog, by contrast, is a relatively young politician who believes that his future is still before him.

What pressed the veteran Palestinian leader to meet with Israel's opposition chairman? The common assessment is that Abbas is very worried about telltale signs and publicity regarding real (though indirect) feelers between Israel and Hamas. Abbas is afraid of being left behind. A 10-year arrangement between Israel and Hamas in the Gaza Strip is liable to make Abbas irrelevant. Therefore, if Netanyahu can talk to Hamas, Abbas' main opposition, then clearly Abbas can talk to Herzog, Netanyahu's main opponent.

Herzog urged Abbas to join the contacts and attempt to create a larger package deal with Israel. Why should the Israeli government confine itself to talking to Gaza alone when it can raise the ante, adopt confidence-building measures and work for a settlement package deal for all the territories? "You have to ride this wave," Herzog reportedly told Abbas, "You can't let yourself remain behind."

After the meeting, Herzog told Al-Monitor, "This is a propitious time for the entire region; almost everyone is converging in the same place. The joint interests of the various players are mounting. Everyone wants peace and quiet; everyone wants to focus on their mutual enemies, which are Islamic State, Iran and the Shiites. Under such circumstances, Abbas cannot allow himself to lag behind. He also needs to take advantage of the situation and get on the bandwagon."

Asked what, exactly, Abbas should do, Herzog said, "He should set out his conditions for entering into the Gaza plan. Hamas should not be allowed to come out on top from everything that's been going on recently. We can still find ourselves in a situation in which Hamas brings 10 years of calm to Gaza allowing for prosperity, while Mahmoud Abbas finds himself on the cusp of a third intifada in Ramallah. Instead, everyone should be able to profit and Abbas, who truly fights terror and is a legitimate leader, cannot be left behind."

At the same time, Netanyahu's government denies reports about contacts with Hamas. "Not directly, not through another country and not through intermediaries," read an official statement released by the prime minister's office at the beginning of the week, stating that Israel has no contacts with Hamas and there is no agreement in the pipeline.

If so, how can one explain the current reality in which numerous figures headed by former Quartet envoy Tony Blair are diligently running the course between Gaza and Israel? It's very simple: This is Netanyahu's method. Netanyahu will always make sure he has wiggle room for denial. He'll send faceless emissaries that he can repudiate at the moment of truth along the lines of "it's only an American proposal" or "non-binding, unofficial contacts."

And that is exactly the situation this time around, as well. The contacts with the Palestinians in Gaza are coordinated by the Israeli security apparatus. At the head of the pyramid stands Yoav (Poli) Mordechai, the coordinator of Government Activities in the Territories. An Arab newspaper actually proposed, humorously, that Mordechai replace Abbas after the latter retires. Mordechai, who speaks fluent Arabic and makes numerous appearances on the Arab electronic media outlets in the Middle East, has become a familiar figure on practically every screen from Gaza to Cairo, Ramallah and Amman.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

One of the problems is trust. Abbas does not trust the Hamas leadership at all, and vice versa. The chasms separating the two entities are deeper than their commonalities. At the same time, the situation in the West Bank is continuing to deteriorate. "I am worried about losing control," Abbas admitted to Herzog, according to diplomatic sources. "Our streets are raging; the murder in Douma fanned the flames."

Abbas asked President Reuven Rivlin as well as Prime Minister Netanyahu to do everything possible to apprehend the murderers of the Dawabsha family. (The toddler, Ali, and his father, Saad, died of their wounds, and another son and the mother are still fighting for their lives.) Abbas feels that in order to restore peace, it is imperative to capture the murderers and serve justice to them. Then Herzog spoke to Abbas about the wave of terror attacks from the Palestinian side, including the daily stabbings of Israelis, the hurling of Molotov cocktails and stones, and a general deterioration of the territory to a dangerous level.

Abbas detailed the Palestinian Authority's anti-terror activities but claimed that he is unable to pinpoint and arrest every Palestinian with a knife who decides to retaliate. Abbas also complained about the open-fire policies of the Israel Defense Forces and other security forces. In most cases, Abbas argued, the attackers could have been neutralized by shooting at their feet, and some of them have been shot when they no longer posed a threat. The bottom line is that Abbas warned about a third intifada. The pressure cooker is heating up, he says, and eventually it may explode.

In his meeting with Herzog, Abbas verified the reports regarding his deliberations over retiring. Abbas' resignation threats are viewed by the Israeli security apparatus as serious, more serious than in the past. There is no diplomatic expectation, global interest in the Palestinian problem is dissipating, the Arab countries are busy with their own trials and tribulations, the political situation in the territories is touchy and the economic situation is hard. Most worrisome of all is that currently there are no signs of renewing negotiations and no responsible party (the Americans?) interested.

Abbas is already over 80 years old. He is tired and in constant danger, as swathes of the Palestinian people view him as a traitor who cooperates with the Israel security system. "Ultimately, he'll break [under the pressure] sometime or other," an IDF source said on condition of anonymity, though no one knows exactly when that might happen. Former President Shimon Peres celebrated his 92nd birthday this week and has no intentions of ever retiring. The question is whether Abbas is a chip off Peres' imperishable material.

If Abbas really does pick up and leave, said Herzog, Israel will find itself missing him. He emphasized that there is no doubt that Abbas is the first Palestinian leader who truly fought against terror and chose the diplomatic route. "I'm not naive," he added. "There is no permanent arrangement on the agenda, but we really could show some creativity. We could adopt financial and other steps such as confidence-building. We have to do everything to bring back hope."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace
633 Pennsylvania Ave. NW, 5th Floor, Washington, DC 20004
www.centerpeace.org

2015 S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace, All rights reserved.
YOU ARE RECEIVING THIS EMAIL BECAUSE YOU SIGNED UP FOR OUR NEWS UPDATES.

unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Eizenstat, Stuart" <seizenstat@cov.com>
To: Jake.Sullivan@gmail.com
Date: 6/29/2015 4:47:05 PM
Subject: Re: FW: HRC Iran statement

Jake,
Thanks. It's you call. I cannot open the letter in the format you sent it--sorry.
Stu

From: Jake Sullivan [mailto:jake.sullivan@gmail.com]
Sent: Monday, June 29, 2015 06:23 PM
To: Eizenstat, Stuart
Cc: dkurtzphelan@gmail.com <dkurtzphelan@gmail.com>; John D. Podesta (John.Podesta@gmail.com) <John.Podesta@gmail.com>; Huma M. Abedin (huma@hrcoffice.com) <huma@hrcoffice.com>
Subject: Re: FW: HRC Iran statement

Thanks Stu. I need to grapple with some of these edits, which go beyond where I might suggest she go at this point. Others are very well taken. Let me give it another crack and come back to you.

On Mon, Jun 29, 2015 at 6:14 PM, Eizenstat, Stuart <seizenstat@cov.com > wrote:

Dear Dan and Jake,

Here is a cleaner version. Something happened with the one I just sent that left gaps in the sentences.

Stu

From: Eizenstat, Stuart
Sent: Monday, June 29, 2015 6:09 PM
To: 'Daniel Kurtz-Phelan'
Cc: Jake Sullivan; John D. Podesta (John.Podesta@gmail.com); Huma M. Abedin (huma@hrcoffice.com)
Subject: RE: HRC Iran statement

Dear Dan and Jake,

I am sorry for the delay, but I only landed this morning from Israel via JFK. Please see my comments below. Of course, we do not know the details at this time.

Stu

From: Daniel Kurtz-Phelan [mailto:dkurtzphelan@gmail.com]
Sent: Sunday, June 28, 2015 8:52 PM
To: Eizenstat, Stuart
Cc: Jake Sullivan
Subject: HRC Iran statement

Dear Stu,

Jake asked that I share with you the current draft of HRC's statement on the Iran deal. It's pasted below. Some of this could of course change depending on the details of a final agreement, but it would be great to have your feedback at this stage,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Many thanks,

Dan

**

I applaud President Obama and Secretary Kerry for securing a nuclear agreement that offers the strongest chance to prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon. With vigorous enforcement, unyielding verification, and swift consequences for any violations, this deal will make the United States, Israel, our Arab partners, and the region safer and more secure than if there were no agreement.

At the same time, there are aspects of the agreement that are a cause for concern, and a basis for special diligence. has not been required to answer questions about the Possible Military Dimensions (PMD), including allowing the IAEA to inspect sites, interview key scientists and officials, and review documents that would shed light on their past and current PMD activities. In addition, clarity is required on what limits are imposed during the term of the agreement and thereafter to preclude Iran's work on advanced centrifuges. It is also critical that sanctions relief must come only when Iran has demonstrates to the satisfaction of the IAEA that they have complied with their obligations. Sanctions for terrorism and other non-nuclear sanctions must remain in place. I I want to make sure as President that any violation of the agreement by Iran would trigger a reimposition of sanctions, without an Iranian veto over the findings, and in ways that assure the US can act if we feel there is a violation. Most important is monitoring and verification. The IAEA inspectors must have timely and effective access to all sites in Iran, including military sites. It is unclear if this is the case.

Despite these concerns, it is critical in assessing this agreement to ask what alternatives exist. We already have in place the most effective, broad-based sanctions ever imposed on a country in peacetime. While they have brought Iran to the negotiating table, they have not stopped the continued expansion of their nuclear program. It is difficult to see what other sanctions would lead to greater Iranian concessions. Without an agreement, there would be no two-thirds reduction in their number of centrifuges; no dismantlement of their plutonium plant at Arak; no 24/IAEA inspections; no dilution of their 20% enriched uranium. Their capacity to "break-out: would be far more likely without this agreement, than with it. We also have to consider it we could maintain the partnership with the European Union, which has made the sanctions most effective.

Today's agreement is the culmination of an effective strategy executed over many years. By the end of the Bush administration, Iran was rapidly expanding its nuclear centrifuge capacity despite unilateral American sanctions and ineffective saber rattling. The Obama administration took a different approach, working with Congress and our allies and partners around the world. As Secretary of State, I logged tens of thousands of miles and twisted a lot of arms – especially in Moscow and Beijing – to build a global coalition to impose the most crippling sanctions in history against Tehran. That unprecedented pressure shattered Iran's economy, halted the progress of its nuclear program (NB. BE CAREFUL THEY HAVE SUBSTANTIALLY INCREASED THE NUMBER OF CENTRIFUGES AND AMOUNT OF ENRICHED URANIUM SINCE OBAMA TOOK OFFICE), and forced its leaders to the table to negotiate a deal that puts a nuclear weapon out of reach.

As President, I will use every tool in our arsenal to compel rigorous Iranian compliance. The response to any violation will be clear, immediate, and devastating -- starting with the return of sanctions but taking no options off the table, including, if necessary, the use of force. The message to Iran must be loud and clear: We will never allow you to acquire a nuclear weapon; we will never allow you permit you to produce sufficient fissile material or otherwise acquire it, sufficient for a nuclear weapons; not just during the term of this agreement – never.

Going forward, we have to be clear-eyed when it comes to the broader threat Iran represents. Even with an agreement that limits its nuclear ambitions, Iran still poses a direct challenge to the United States and our allies, especially Israel. The funds it will receive with sanctions relief will provide billions of dollars more for Iran to use to support terrorism. It continues to destabilize countries from Yemen to Lebanon, while exacerbating conflict in Syria. And it fuels terrorism throughout the region and beyond, including through direct support to Hamas and Hizballah. We have to aggressively oppose and raise the costs for Iran's destabilizing activities, insist on the return of U.S. citizens being held by the Iranian government, and strengthen cooperation with our allies and partners. This agreement under my Administration will not see this agreement as the beginning of an American-Iranian partnership. Our allies in the Middle East deserve to have this assurance, and they will have it if I am elected President.

Israel should be confident that now and in a Hillary Clinton Administration, the United States will always defend its security and ensure its military edge in the region. Our two countries have to be on the same page when it comes to the threat posed by Iran, so I would invite the senior Israeli leadership to Washington for early talks on further strengthening our crucial alliance. I will provide Israel with all the military means it requires to defend itself against an Iranian threat, and support its actions to defend itself. We should also deepen our security relationship with Arab partners who are threatened by Iran's ambitions.

Ultimately, this agreement is the best way to protect our country and our allies. To walk away from a deal that will stop Iran from getting a nuclear weapon, or to bomb Iran as long an agreement offers an alternative, [as some Republican candidates for President suggest,] would be both dangerous and shortsighted – fracturing our global coalition, raising the risk of regional war, and ultimately bringing Iran closer to a nuclear weapon.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So we should proceed with wisdom and strength in implementing a deal born out of effective diplomacy and strong American leadership.

**

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jeremy Funk" <funk@americansunitedforchange.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 8/19/2008 7:48:14 AM
Subject: [big campaign] One Month Ago Today, Iraqi Prime Minister Endorsed Obama Iraq Strategy

Iraq Campaign 2008

AMERICANSUNITED FOR CHANGE

www.americansunitedforchange.org

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE CONTACT: Jeremy Funk, 202.470.5878
DATE: August 19th, 2008

The Elephant Still Very Much in the Room

One Month Ago Today, Iraqi Prime Minister Maliki Endorsed Obama Timetable for U.S. Withdrawal from Iraq…and Put John McCain in a Tough Spot

When asked in and interview with SPIEGEL when he thinks US troops should leave Iraq, Maliki responded "as soon as possible, as far as we are concerned." He then continued: "US presidential candidate Barack Obama talks about 16 months. That, we think, would be the right timeframe for a withdrawal, with the possibility of slight changes." [SPIEGEL, 7/19/08]

One Month Later and Sen. John McCain Remains in Total State-of-Denial of the Iraqi Government's Wishes and At Total Odds With His 2004 Statement That "I think it's obvious that we would have to leave" if a Sovereign Iraqi Government Asked Us To

John McCain Stands Alone

The Iraqi Government Wants U.S. Out of Iraq…

Iraqi Prime Minister Endorsed Obama Timetable for Withdrawal from Iraq. According to FOXNews.com, "Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki told a German magazine that he supports Barack Obama's plan to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq within 16 months of taking office. The apparent endorsement of a cornerstone of Obama's foreign policy drew swift praise from the Obama campaign…"U.S. presidential candidate Barack Obama talks about 16 months. That, we think, would be the right timeframe for a withdrawal, with the possibility of slight changes," al-Maliki told the magazine Der Spiegel. He said he wants U.S. troops to leave "as soon as possible." [FoxNews.com, 7/19/08]

Iraq's National security Adviser: No Deal with U.S. Unless it Sets Specific Dates for Withdrawal. According to the Associated Press, Iraq's national security adviser said [on July 8, 2008] his country will not accept any deal with the United States unless the agreement sets specific dates for the withdrawal of U.S.-led forces…"Our stance in the negotiations underway with the American side will be strong," [Mouwaffak al-]Rubaie said. "We will not accept any memorandum of understanding that doesn't have specific dates to withdraw foreign forces from Iraq." [Associated Press, 7/8/08]

Iraqi parliament opposes security agreement without timetable for withdrawal. According to Politico, "Rep. Bill Delahunt (D-Mass.) released a letter [on June 4th, 2008] from 31 Iraqi legislators asserting that the proposed agreement is opposed by a majority of the parliament if it does not include a specific timetable for the withdrawal of U.S. military troops." [Politico, 6/4/2008]

The American People STILL Want Troops Home From Iraq…

62 Percent of Americans Favor Timetable for Withdrawal from Iraq. According to CNN/Opinion Research Corporation Poll conducted July 27-29, 2008, 62 percent of respondents replied "Set a Timetable" to the question: "Which comes closer to your view about U.S. troops in Iraq? The U.S. should set a timetable for withdrawal by announcing that it will remove all of its troops from Iraq by a certain date. The U.S. should keep troops in Iraq as long as necessary without setting any timetable for withdrawal." [PollingReport.com, Accessed 8/19/08]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Most of America's Top-Foreign Policy Experts Want U.S. Troops Out of Iraq and the Eye on the Ball in Afghanistan Where it Belongs...

According to a new report from the Center for American Progress, "almost 70 percent [of America's top foreign policy experts] recommend that the majority of U.S. forces be withdrawn from and redeployed to Afghanistan and the Persian Gulf in the next 18 months. ['The Terrorism Index,' AmericanProgress.org, 8/18/08]

The Troops Themselves Are Rejecting McCain's Endless War Policy...

Troops Deployed Abroad Give 6:1 to Obama Over McCain. According to an analysis of campaign contributions by the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics, Democrat Barack Obama has received nearly six times as much money from troops deployed overseas at the time of their contributions than has Republican John McCain , and the fiercely anti-war Ron Paul , though he suspended his campaign for the Republican nomination months ago, has received more than four times McCain's haul. [OpenSecrets.org, 8/14/08]

Even Bush Agrees to "time horizon" in Iraq...

President Bush Agrees to "time horizon" in Iraq. According to the Washingon Post, " President Bush and Iraq's prime minister have agreed to set a "time horizon" for the withdrawal of U.S. combat troops from Iraq as part of a long-term security accord they are trying to negotiate by the end of the month, White House officials said yesterday." [Washington Post, 7/19/08]

But, John McCain Knows Better Than Us...

His Better Judgment Tells Him to Spend $12 Billion a Month Keeping U.S. Troops in the Crosshairs of Iraqi Civil Conflicts for '100 Years' or More...

FACTBOX-Security developments in Iraq, Aug 18

18 Aug 2008 20:16:43 GMT

Source: Reuters: http://www.alertnet.org/thenews/newsdesk/ANW828684.htm

Aug 18 (Reuters) - Following are security developments in Iraq at 2015 GMT on Monday.

* denotes new or updated items

* RAMADI - A suicide car bomber killed five policemen and wounded seven in an attack on a police checkpoint in Ramadi, capital of Iraq's western Anbar province, police said.

* BAGHDAD - Two journalists for the Afaq satelite television channel and their driver were wounded by a grenade thrown at their car in Baghdad's central Allawi district on Sunday, the Iraq Media Safety Group said in a statement.

NEAR ABUL KHASIB - Gunmen killed two people working for Iraq's electoral commission and wounded another person in a drive-by shooting near the town of Abul Khasib, some 460 km (285 miles) southeast of Baghdad, police said.

BAGHDAD - Three police officers and a civilian were wounded in roadside bomb that exploded in the Karrada district of central Baghdad, police said.

BAGHDAD - Iraqi forces killed three militants and arrested 33 others during last the 24 hours in different areas in Iraq, Defence Ministry said in a statement.

MOSUL - A roadside bomb wounded three prison guards in eastern Mosul, 390 km (240 miles) north of Baghdad, police said.

BAGHDAD - A roadside bomb wounded five people, including three policemen, when it exploded in the Mansour district of western Baghdad, police said.

BAGHDAD - A roadside bomb wounded nine people, including three policemen, when it exploded near a U.S. military patrol in the Yarmouk district of western Baghdad, police said.

BAGHDAD - Gunmen killed a Shi'ite cleric and wounded his wife when they opened fire on the couple's car in Zaafaraniya district of southeastern Baghdad, police said.

BAGHDAD - U.S. forces detained 11 militants on Sunday and Monday during operations targeting al Qaeda in central and northern Iraq, the U.S. military said.

MOSUL - Gunmen killed a religious leader on Sunday outside a mosque in central Mosul, police said.

This is The Same Judgment That Led John McCain to...

Declare in 2002 that Hussein Continued To Acquire, Amass And Improve On His Arsenal of Weapons of Mass Destruction. During a floor debate on the floor of the senate, McCain said, "Saddam Hussein continues to acquire, amass, and improve on his arsenal of weapons of mass destruction. He continues to attempt to acquire a nuclear weapon. These are all well-known facts. So if you believe that Saddam Hussein....is not going to abandon his request for his weapons, then the longer we wait, the more dangerous he becomes." [Asheville Citizen-Times, 10/13/02; emphasis added]

Declare that "The Iraqi People Will Greet Us As Liberators." While appearing on NBC's The Today Show, McCain said, "But I believe, Katie, that the Iraqi people will greet us as liberators. I believe that they will have an opportunity over time, and it will be difficult, to realize the same hopes and dreams and aspirations that every person in the world has and deserves the opportunity to live in a free and open society." [NBC, "The Today Show," 3/20/03]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Declare that The War In Iraq Would Be "One of The Best Things That's Happened To America." While appearing on NBC's Meet the Press, McCain said, "We're going to be all right. We're going to prevail and we will win and it'll be one of the best things that's happened to America and the world in a long time 'cause it'll reverberate throughout the Middle East." [NBC, "Meet the Press," 3/30/03]

Predict That "There's Not A History Of Clashes That Are Violent Between Suunis And Shiahs, So I Think They Can Probably Get Along." While appearing on Hardball, McCain said, "There's not a history of clashes that are violent between Sunnis and Shiahs. So I think they can probably get along." [MSNBC, "Hardball," 4/23/03]

Predict that the Iraqi Oil Reserves Would Cover The Cost of War. During an interview with National Journal, McCain said, "Everybody now is talking of post-Saddam Hussein Iraq. I look on it with optimism and hope. As far as the cost is concerned, Iraqis have vast oil reserves and they, I'm sure, would shoulder the cost of the transition." However, according to the New York Times, "Soaring oil prices will leave the Iraqi government with a cumulative budget surplus of as much as $79 billion by year's end, according to an American federal oversight agency. But Iraq has spent only a minute fraction of that on reconstruction costs, which are now largely borne by the United States. [National Journal, 2/15/03; New York Times, 8/5/08]

Erroneously and Repeatedly State That Al Qaeda Was Being Trained By Iran. While speaking in Jordan, McCain said it was, "common knowledge and has been reported in the media that al-Qaeda is going back into Iran and receiving training and are coming back into Iraq from Iran, that's well known. And it's unfortunate." According to the HuffingtonPost, McCain made the same erroneous statement three times in two days. [Washington Post, 3/18/08 ; Huffington Post, 3/19/08]

This is the Same Judgment That Tells John McCain...

...To Keep Short Changing So Many Priorities Here at Home Like Veterans and Children's Healthcare -- to Keep Making Us Less Safe By Stretching Out Military to the Breaking Point in Iraq While Keeping the Eye Off the Ball in Afghanistan

Why? Because John McCain Just Knows Better.

Say, Senator '"[T]hat's not too important" when U.S. troops come home' McCain – Where Do You See the Goal Post in Iraq This Week?

Where's the Goal Post in Iraq This Week, Sen. McCain?

Early 2003: The End is "Very Much in Sight."

McCain Predicted a "Brief, Successful War In Iraq." While speaking on the floor of the senate on the day before U.S. military action commenced in Iraq, McCain said, "The costs of these enterprises are not known with any degree of certainty at this time. Nor are the costs we will incur after what I believe, what I fervently, hope, will be a brief, successful war in Iraq, as we seek to establish the foundations for a peaceful, stable and democratizing Iraq." He added, "I believe the war in Iraq can be concluded successfully in a relatively brief time." [McCain Senate Press Release, 3/18/03]

McCain Believed The War In Iraq Would Be Relatively Short. While appearing on NBC's "Meet the Press," McCain said, "I believe that this conflict is still going to be relatively short. I believe we've achieved significant goals and successes." [NBC, "Meet the Press," 3/30/03]

In 2003 McCain Said The End Was "Very Much In Sight." Senator McCain was asked "At what point will America be able to say the war was won?" McCain said there were oil fields to secure and "die-hards" to take care of but "it's clear that the end is very much in sight, and today I think Americans should be very proud of their leadership, their technology…There are still some foreigners, Syrians and others hanging around. But it won't be long. It will be a fairly short period of time, but this happens in wars. I'm confident that once they are confident the area is no longer a threat to the Marines and to or army troops that they'll start imposing discipline. In the meantime, we'll have a short period of chaos." [ABC, Good Morning America, 4/9/03, emphasis added]

In April 2003, McCain Said He Was "Sure" The End Of Conflict In Iraq Was Near. While appearing on "Lou Dobbs Moneyline," Dobbs asked McCain, "Is it your judgment that we are near the end of this conflict?" To which McCain replied, "Oh, I'm sure that's true." [CNN, "Lou Dobbs Moneyline," 4/10/03]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

October 2003: Five Years?

McCain Predicted The War Would Take "Four Or Five Years." During an appearance on ABC's Nightline, Ted Koppel asked McCain how much more money the war would cost. He said, "Estimates I hear as much as 50 to $55 billion more." When asked, "Over a course of how many years?" McCain answered, "Four or five years." [ABC, "Nightline," 10/1/03]

November 2003: A Few Months?

McCain Said "We Would Probably Know Within The Next Few Months" If America Won Or Lost In Iraq. During an appearance on MSNBC's "Buchanan & Press," McCain was asked what "victory" in Iraq was. McCain said, "I think the next three to six months are very critical in this whole scenario because the Iraqi people don't want to go back to Saddam Hussein. They're not crazy. But many of them in the Sunni Triangle are losing any confidence that the United States can bring them what their ambitions are all about for themselves and their families. So I think we're in a very critical time. And we would probably know within the next few months." [MSNBC, "Buchanan & Press," 11/6/03]

2004: Five Years?

McCain Said "Listen, My Friend, We're Going To Have To Be There For Five or Six Years." During a February 2004 appearance on MSNBC's "Hardball," McCain discussed the war in Iraq and said, "Listen, my friend, we're going to be there for five or six years. A little straight talk. We're going. We're going to have to be there for quite a while." [MSNBC, "Hardball," 2/25/04]

Early-2005: One Year?

McCain: "I Would Think That It's Going To Be Another Year To A Year And A Half." During an appearance on CBS's "The Early Show," McCain was asked "What is a realistic timetable" regarding the war in Iraq? McCain said, "If I had to guess, I would think that it's going to be at least another year to a year and a half, but, hopefully before then we could have our troops out of a lot of the areas where they're vulnerable to casualties." [CBS, "The Early Show," 2/3/05]

Mid-2005: A Couple of More Years?

McCain: "I Think Part Of That Is It's Going To Be, At Least, A Couple More Years." While appearing on NBC's "Meet the Press," McCain said, "I don't think Americans believe that we should cut and run out of Iraq by any stretch of the imagination. But I think they also would like to be told, in reality, what's going on and, by the way, I think part of that is it's going to be, at least, a couple more years." [NBC, "Meet the Press," 6/19/05]

McCain: "I Think We Should Tell People It's Not Going To Be A Short—I'd Rather Say Two Or Three Years." While appearing on NBC's "Meet the Press," McCain said, "And, again, I think we should tell people it's not going to be a short--I'd rather say two or three years, and be surprised a year from now, than say, 'Everything's fine,' and then be disappointed a year or two from now." [NBC, "Meet the Press," 6/19/05]

McCain: I Think It's Very Possible "Within The Next Year or Two." While appearing on "Meet the Press," McCain said, "I think it's going to be long and hard and tough." Tim Russert asked, "Years?" McCain responded by saying, "Well, when I say years, I think that it's very possible within the next year or two that you could see this transition taking place, but the American troops being a supplement rather than being replaced by, in other words, most of the effort being carried on over time by the Iraqis, but it's going to be tough. " [NBC, "Meet the Press," 12/4/05]

2006: Months?

McCain: "We're Either Going To Lose This Thing or Win this Thing Within the Next Several Months." While appearing on NBC's "Meet the Press," McCain said, "If you talk to most military experts, we're in a critical and crucial time. We're either going to lose this thing or win this thing within the next several months." [NBC, "Meet the Press," 11/12/06]

Early 2007: Ten Years?

McCain Said Americans Could Be Persuaded To Support The War For 5 to 10 Years. According to the Houston Chronicle, while at the opening of the Center for the Intrepid, "McCain said it was important for America to 'accomplish the mission' in Iraq, but said he didn't know how long that would take. He said Americans could be persuaded to support the conflict another five to 10 years 'if we can show progress.'" [Houston Chronicle, 1/30/07]

Mid 2007: "I Don't Have A Date"

McCain Said "I Don't Have A Date" When Asked About The End of The War. While discussing the war in Iraq on NBC's "Meet the Press," McCain said, "If it is only in a role that is of support and American casualties are minimal, then I think it's probably worth the investment. If the level of casualties stays where it is, and we do not have success, then we know that that will be a condition that we cannot stand before." Tim Russert then asked, "By when?" to which McCain replied, "I don't have a date, I think that the important thing is whether we assess as we move along." [NBC, "Meet the Press," 5/13/07; emphasis added]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Early 2008: Months?

McCain Said Winning The War "Is Going To Take Months." During an interview with the editorial board of the Detroit News, McCain was asked, "Can we win this war? And how long will it take?" McCain responded, "It is going to take months. Al-Qaida is on the run, but it is not defeated. [The Iraqi military] can be effective with our support. I know how frustrated all of us are with the lack of effectiveness of the Iraqi government. ... Whoever invented this form of government ought to be taken out and shot. There has been some progress..." [Detroit News, 1/3/08]

Early 2008: A Hundred Years?

McCain Said US Could Stay In Iraq for "Maybe A Hundred Years" and He Was "Fine" With It. In January 2008, McCain said the U.S. military could stay in Iraq for "a hundred years" and that "would be fine with me." At a town hall meeting in New Hampshire, a questioner said, "President Bush is talking about our staying in Iraq for 50 year," at which point McCain interrupted and said, "Make it a hundred. We've been in South Korea, we've been in Japan for 60 years, we've been in South Korea for 50 years or so. That'd be fine with me as long as Americans are not being injured, or harmed, or wounded, or killed. That's fine with me, I hope it would be fine with you." [Town Hall Meeting in Concord, NH, 1/3/08 ; emphasis added]

McCain: "I Don't Think Americans Are Concerned If We're There For 100 Years Or 1,000 Years Or 10,000 Years." In an interview on CBS's "Face the Nation," host Bob Schieffer asked McCain about staying in Iraq for 100 year. McCain responded, "We've got to get Americans off the front line, have the Iraqis as part of the strategy, take over more and more of the responsibilities. And then I don't think Americans are concerned if we're there for 100 years or 1,000 years or 10,000 years. What they care about is a sacrifice of our most precious treasure, and that's American blood. So what I'm saying is look, if Americans are there in a support role, but they're not taking casualties, that's fine. We're in Kuwait now. As you well recall, we had a war, we stayed in Kuwait. We didn't stay in Saudi Arabia. So it's going to be up to the relationship between the Iraqi government and the United States of America." [CBS, "Face the Nation," 1/06/08; emphasis added]

McCain: "It Doesn't Matter…We Could Be There For A Hundred Years, For All I Know." During an interview with the editorial board of the Detroit News, McCain was asked, "When should the United States leave Iraq?" McCain responded, "It doesn't matter. We're still in Kuwait since the first Gulf War. If we can continue to show this progress, we could be there for 100 years, for all I know, as long as Americans are not dying. It's not a matter of American presence; it's a matter of success so we can beat back this adversary. If we'd done what they wanted us to do six months ago, al-Qaida would now be trumpeting to the world that it defeated the United States of America." [Detroit News, 1/3/08,emphasis added]

McCain: "We're Going To Be In This Struggle For The Rest of The Century." While speaking at a town hall meeting in Sun City Center, Florida, McCain said, "I'd like to look you in the eye and tell you there's not gonna be any more wars. I'd like to look you in the eyes and tell you that this terrible evil called radical Islamic extremism is defeated. I can't do that. I've got to tell you that we're gonna be in this struggle for the rest of this century because it's a transcendent evil." [Town Hall Meeting; Sun City Center, FL 01/26/08; emphasis added]

McCain: "We Are In A Greater Struggle That Is Going To Be With Us For The Rest of This Century." While giving a speech in Nashua, New Hampshire, We are in two wars. We are in a greater struggle that is going to be with us for the rest of this century… He added, "These young people that are in this crowd, my friends, I'm going to be asking you to serve. I'm gonna be asking you to step forward and serve this nation in difficult times." [Speech in Nashua, New Hampshire, 1/7/08; emphasis added]

Mid 2008: "Not too important" when troops come home – No, wait, make it "2013"

On NBC's "Today Show," John McCain said bringing American troops home was "not too important." In an interview on NBC's Today Show, host Matt Lauer asked Sen. John McCain (R-AZ) about his support for the war in Iraq. Noting that violence has decreased in Iraq, Lauer asked if McCain has a better "estimate" of when he would withdraw troops from the country. McCain responded: "No, but that's not too important. What's important is the casualties in Iraq. Americans are in South Korea. Americans are in Japan. American troops are in Germany. That's all fine. [NBC's Today Show, 6/11/08]

McCain: Iraq War will be won by 2013: "By January 2013, America has welcomed home most of the servicemen and women who have sacrificed terribly so that America might be secure in her freedom. The Iraq war has been won." [McCain Remarks, 5/15/08]

Jeremy J. Funk
Communications Director, Americans United for Change
Office: 202.470.5878

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mobile: 605.366.3654
funk@americansunitedforchange.org
www.americansunitedforchange.org

Jeremy J. Funk
Communications Director, Americans United for Change
Office: 202.470.5878
Mobile: 605.366.3654
funk@americansunitedforchange.org
www.americansunitedforchange.org

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.

-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace" <info@centerpeace.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 3/5/2015 8:51:45 AM
Subject: News Update - March 5

S. DANIEL ABRAHAM
CENTER FOR MIDDLE EAST PEACE

Israel and the Middle East News Update

Thursday, March 5

Click here for a printer-friendly version.

Headlines:

- Herzog: The Bottom Line is that the Speech Will Achieve Nothing
- Kerry: Simply Demanding that Iran Capitulate Is Not a Plan
- Israel Asks Congress for Missile Defense Aid despite Public Row
- Ya'alon: Likud Hasn't Ruled Out Coalition with Zionist Union
- Channel Ten Poll: Likud Gains Two Seats
- As Election Nears, Women March to Put Peace on Agenda
- Abbas: We'll Work Toward Peace with Whoever Wins Israeli Vote
- U.S. Syria Strategy Falters with Collapse of Rebel Group

Commentary:

- USA Today: "Netanyahu Has Reasons to be Worried"
  - By Dennis Ross
- Wall Street Journal: "What Went Wrong Between the US and Israel - and How to Fix the Alliance"
  - By Brian Katulis and Michael Singh

Ma'ariv

Herzog: The Bottom Line is that the Speech will Achieve Nothing

The political establishment continues to buzz one day after Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu's speech to Congress, and the opposition is continuing its attack on the prime minister. Opposition and Zionist Camp Chairman Herzog responded yesterday to the speech and said, "Netanyahu is known to be a good orator and I am always happy when we receive applause in Congress. However, it has no connection with the result. The bottom line is that this speech will achieve nothing." "The citizens of Israel can be very pleased for a moment with the applause, but in the long run, Netanyahu is out of the picture, Israel is out of the picture. At the end of the day, the US has a presidential regime. The person who makes the rules on these matters is the president," said Herzog.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ha'aretz

Kerry: Simply Demanding that Iran Capitulate Is Not a Plan

The United States and Iran completed another round of talks in Switzerland on Wednesday, within the framework of ongoing attempts to reach a deal on the latter's nuclear program. After the talks, U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry responded to the speech made in Congress on Tuesday by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, and said "simply demanding that Iran capitulate is not a plan." Kerry has been trying in recent days to reach an understanding with Iranian Foreign Minister Mohammad Javad Zarif on two primary issues – the amount of enriched uranium Iran will retain after the deal with the world powers is signed, as well as the pace at which sanctions in place on the Iranian republic will be rescinded.

CNN

Israel Asks Congress for Missile Defense Aid despite public row

Publicly the U.S. and Israel have been clashing over Iran's nuclear program, but quietly Israelis have been making another appeal: getting more U.S. funds for missile defense systems to defend against Iran's growing ballistic missile program. A Republican congressional source told CNN that the Israelis are asking lawmakers to approve more than $300 million in additional U.S. funding for missile defense systems, above the $155 million the Pentagon is already requesting from Congress. For the first time, the source said, Israel is asking the U.S. for procurement funding for the Arrow 3 missile, designed to counter longer-range Iranian ballistic missiles, and the David's Sling missile defense system, for shorter-range Iranian weapons.

Jerusalem Post

Ya'alon: Likud Hasn't Ruled Out Coalition with Zionist Union

Likud has not ruled out sitting in a government with the Zionist Union party, Defense Minister Moshe Ya'alon told Army Radio on Thursday morning. He said however that the party would not agree to a rotation in the prime minister's office. "We haven't said no to anything, but it is clear that first we need to create a natural bloc, a natural coalition that is Right, and after if someone wants to join they can."

Channel 10 News

Channel Ten Poll: Likud Gains Two Seats

Was Netanyahu's "speech of a lifetime" ultimately electorally worthwhile? That depends on one's vantage point. While the Likud under Netanyahu's leadership rose by two seats to run neck-and-neck with the Zionist Camp, only seven percent of respondents said that Netanyahu's public statements about the Iranian threat had prompted them to change their minds as to which ballot to cast in the elections. Furthermore, nearly half of the Israelis believe after the fact that Netanyahu's speech did not justify the crisis in relations between Israel and the United States. Meanwhile, the joint Arab list has continued to gain ground, and is tied as the third-largest party in Israel along with Yesh Atid. The Jewish Home continued its downward trend and received only 11 seats in this poll. Among the smaller parties, Moshe Kahlon's Kulanu picked up another seat, and is now polling at 10 seats.

See also, "Polls: Netanyahu's Congress speech boosts Likud, but no game changer" (Ha'aretz)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Times of Israel

As Election Nears, Women March to Put Peace on Agenda

Braving a persistent Jerusalem drizzle, some 3,000 women from across Israel circled the Knesset on Wednesday to demand that peace take center stage in the next government ahead of elections on March 17. Rallied by Women Wage Peace, a grassroots organization created last August, the women — wearing turquoise ribbons and carrying signs reading "choosing a diplomatic agreement" — chanted "It's reality, not a dream, women make peace." Yael Elad, head of the group's media team, said Women Wage Peace was formed in the wake of Operation Protective Edge in Gaza by two prominent lawyers, Irit Tamir and Michal Barak, who felt that "women cannot just sit at home, complain, and hope for the best, without actively doing something to change the situation." "It's time for us to be part of the dialogue that revolves around security and peace," Elad told Times of Israel.

Times of Israel

Abbas: We'll Work Toward Peace with Whoever Wins Israeli Vote

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas said on Wednesday that he was willing to work with whichever party wins the upcoming Israeli elections and that achieving peace is central to regional stability. At the opening of a two-day meeting of the Central Council of the Palestine Liberation Organization, Abbas warned that the status quo of occupation in the West Bank is a provocation and cannot continue, the official WAFA news agency reported. Abbas said Israel had eroded the authority of his self-rule government in the West Bank to the point where it has "no real power here over anything."Abbas said the Arab Peace Initiative would be the best framework for peace talks. "Now is the time for Israel to wake up from its sleep … the ball is in its court," Abbas said.

Reuters

U.S. Syria Strategy Falters with Collapse of Rebel Group

The Hazzm movement was once central to a covert CIA operation to arm Syrian rebels, but the group's collapse last week underlines the failure of efforts to unify Arab and Western support for mainstream insurgents fighting the Syrian military. A blow to U.S. moves to aid rebels, the dissolution of Hazzm also highlights the risks that a new Department of Defense program could face in training and equipping fighters in Jordan, Turkey and Qatar.

USA Today - March 4, 2015

Netanyahu Has Reasons To Be Worried

By Dennis Ross

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu made a strong case to the Congress about why he thinks the potential agreement with Iran on its nuclear program is a "very bad deal." Leaving aside his fears that lifting sanctions will provide Iran more resources to pursue trouble-making in the Middle East, the prime minister worries that a deal that permits Iran to be a threshold nuclear state will not prevent it from acquiring nuclear weapons but actually pave the way for it to do so.

Netanyahu believes that the break-out time for producing weapons-grade uranium will inevitably be too short -- indeed, less than the year President Obama speaks about -- and that inspections of the Iranian program will necessarily be too limited and, in any case, promise no action in the face of violations. Worse, Iran will be treated like Japan or the Netherlands after the agreement expires in 10-15 years, permitting it to build tens of thousands of centrifuges and enabling it to produce a weapon at a time of its choosing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Accepting the mantra that "no deal is better than a bad deal," Netanyahu offers the alternative of insisting on better terms and increasing the pressure on the Iranians until a more credible agreement is reached. He does not fear the Iranians walking away from the negotiating table because, in his words, they need the deal more than the U.S. and its partners.
While the Obama administration is unlikely to accept his argument that it should simply negotiate better and harder, it should not dismiss the concerns he raises about the emerging deal. Indeed, the administration argument that there is no better alternative than the deal it is negotiating begs the question of whether the prospective agreement is acceptable.

And, here, the administration needs to explain why the deal it is trying to conclude actually will prevent Iran from getting nuclear weapons for the life-time of the agreement and afterwards. It needs to explain why the combination of the number and quality of centrifuges, their output, and the ship-out from Iran of enriched uranium will, in fact, ensure that the break-out time for the Iranians will not be less than one year. Either this combination adds up or it does not, but there should be an explicit answer to Netanyahu's charge that Iran will be able to break-out much more quickly.

Similarly, there should be an answer on how the verification regime is going to work to ensure that we can detect, even in a larger nuclear program, any Iranian violation of the agreement. The issue of verification is critical not just because Iran's past clandestine nuclear efforts prove it cannot be trusted but also because the administration has made a one year break-out time the key measure of success of the agreement. But we can only be certain that Iran will be one year away from being able to produce a bomb's supply of weapons-grade uranium if we can detect what they are doing when they do it.

Obviously, detection is only part of the equation. We cannot wait to determine what we will do about violations when they happen. Iran must know in advance what the consequences are for violations, particularly if we want to deter them in the first place. And this clearly goes to the heart of Netanyahu's concerns: if he had high confidence that we would impose harsh consequences in response to Iranian violations, including the use of force if we caught Iran dashing toward a weapon, he would be less fearful of the agreement he believes is going to emerge.

But he does not see that, and he fears as with past arms control agreements that we will seek to discuss violations and not respond to them until it is too late. So the administration should address this fear and prove it means what it says by spelling out different categories of violations and the consequences for each -- and then seek congressional authorization to empower this president and his successors to act on these consequences.If applied also to Iranian moves toward a nuclear weapon after the expiration of the deal, the administration would truly be answering the most significant of the concerns that Netanyahu raised. Maybe then, this episode of U.S.-Israeli tension would be overcome.

Dennis Ross, the counselor and William Davidson Distinguished Fellow at The Washington Institute, served as a senior Middle East advisor to President Obama from 2009 to 2011. This article was made possible in part by support from the Irwin Levy Family Program on the U.S.-Israel Strategic Relationship.

Wall Street Journal - March 4, 2015

What Went Wrong Between the U.S. and Israel–and How to Fix the Alliance

By Brian Katulis and Michael Singh

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

U.S.-Israel relations hit their lowest point in decades in the fracas that enveloped Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's address to Congress . Yet the foundation for bilateral ties is still stable. It includes a long list of shared security goals, continuous and deep engagement across government and society, and strong public support in both countries for working together. These features are in short supply among U.S. partners in the Middle East, and Israel needs all the help it can get–which is why U.S. and Israeli leaders should take steps to repair relations after Israel forms its new government, no matter who leads it.

The crisis in U.S.-Israeli relations is often attributed to an ideological or personal conflict between President Barack Obama and Mr. Netanyahu. But the roots of the crisis run deeper.

The United States and Israel have struggled to adapt their national security strategies to a changed regional landscape. Strategic shocks to the Middle East in the past decade include the rise of Iran's regional influence after the 2003 Iraq war; growing threats from Islamist terrorist groups such as Hamas, Hezbollah, and Islamic State (ISIS or ISIL); and the 2011 uprisings that opened the door to a series of transitions in Egypt and Syria's civil war.

Israel and the United States reacted to these shocks differently. President Obama prioritized diplomacy toward Iran and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict but otherwise sought distance from regional issues. Israel, having no option to withdraw, hunkered down. Mr. Netanyahu saw U.S. policy as imposing burdens on allies while relieving pressure on adversaries, and paving the way for a deeper disengagement that would leave Israel to fend for itself. Mr. Obama saw Israel as resisting U.S. ideas without offering viable alternatives.

Despite these dynamics, the cliché that the relationship is "indispensable" is true. Israel is a rare sort of ally in today's Middle East: It not only shares U.S. interests but also is willing and able to advance them, easing our burden. For Israel, the U.S. alliance is a national security pillar, conveying strength and support to adversaries that might otherwise be tempted to try to take advantage of Israel's small size and isolation.

This makes repairing the U.S.-Israel relationship a security priority as well as a political matter. Repair efforts should happen in a channel of empowered aides trusted by each side, much as French ambassador Jean-David Levitte and U.S. national security adviser Stephen Hadley were able to repair Franco-American relations in the wake of the Iraq war. Efforts should focus on three key fronts:

1. Iran. The White House must recognize that while Mr. Netanyahu may be the most vociferous critic of U.S. diplomacy with Iran, Israeli concerns are shared by other allies in the region–and this is not the only issue that divides us from allies. A nuclear deal is not assured, nor would one resolve our concerns about Iranian support for terrorism or other destabilizing activities. In addition to securing a worthwhile agreement, we need to reassure allies about continuing U.S. commitment to address these threats. Devising joint strategies for doing so and bolstering our allies' capacity to contribute is a start. The United States has lacked a broader regional strategy for a long time and would benefit from one, regardless of the outcome with Iran.

2. Counterterrorism on Israel's borders. The panoply of terrorist networks operating in Syria, Egypt's Sinai Peninsula, southern Lebanon, and the Palestinian territories of the West Bank and Gaza pose a threat to Israel and to the U.S. Israel used to worry about Arab strength; now, it fears Arab disarray and weakness. We should not only confront these groups directly but also offer to mutual partners such as Jordan support in the form of military and intelligence cooperation as well as close and early consultation on a shared regional agenda.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

3. The Israeli-Palestinian conflict. A steadier approach is needed. Washington's ability to advance peace is a function of the extent to which it enjoys the trust of all sides–Israel, the Palestinians, and the Arab states–and influence in the region. That trust and influence have receded on every front as each party despairs of reaching a negotiated two-state solution.

The U.S. must be willing to engage in the incremental, unglamorous work of restoring trust–among all sides–to halt the regression of the peace process and rebuild its foundation. For its part, Israel must recognize that bad ideas will continue to fill the diplomatic vacuum as long as it neglects to put forward a plan to resolve the conflict.

Hanging over our agenda is doubt among U.S. allies about our commitment to the region, to our allies and their interests, and to action. The U.S.-Israel alliance is a leading indicator of this commitment and is of surpassing value to U.S. security. Repair efforts will require leaders in both countries to take constructive steps together.Brian Katulis is a senior fellow at the Center for American Progress . Michael Singh is managing director of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. From 2005 to 2008, he worked on Middle East issues at the National Security Council.

S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace
633 Pennsylvania Ave. NW, 5th Floor, Washington, DC 20004
www.centerpeace.org

2015 S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace, All rights reserved.
YOU ARE RECEIVING THIS EMAIL BECAUSE YOU SIGNED UP FOR OUR NEWS UPDATES.

unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Milia Fisher" <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 8/18/2015 10:33:34 AM
Subject: Tom Blanton Oped

America classifies way too much information — and we are all less safe for it

By Tom Blanton July 31

Tom Blanton is director of the National Security Archive at George Washington University.

Warning: If you hold a security clearance, reading this column could expose you to information that potentially violates your security agreement. Reading this column will certainly expose you to information that is currently classified by some securocrats, though not by others.

The inspectors general of the State Department and the intelligence community have made a security referral to the Justice Department regarding Hillary Clinton's e-mails on the grounds that some of them were "potentially classified."

So is this column.

Watch out: Your clearance is at stake.

Let me get the suspense over with. Here's a classified fact: We, the United States, based medium-range ballistic missiles carrying nuclear warheads in Turkey in 1962, which angered Soviet leader Nikita Khrushchev so much that he put his own into Cuba.

Wait: I've read all about that. It's been declassified, hasn't it?

Well, yes. Except — in the immortal words of John F. Kennedy — "there's always some son of a bitch who doesn't get the word."

The word is the Cold War is over, yet Cold War secrecy rules still control the government's information systems.

The Defense Department still can't bring itself to declassify nukes in Turkey, and Italy, and the 50 or so other countries where we idiotically stationed them during the Cold War.

Here at the National Security Archive, in our "Dubious Secrets" series, we have published hundreds of U.S. government documents that one office or official considers declassified, while another insists must stay secret. Whom do you listen to?

We have two versions of the same page of White House e-mail, addressed to then-deputy national security adviser Colin Powell, with the top and bottom blacked out from one review, and the middle blacked out from another, 10 days later. Turns out it was the same reviewer both times. So goes the highly subjective process of classification.

But let's talk about Clinton. Thank goodness she used a private e-mail server when she was secretary of state. If she had used the State Department system, practically none of her e-mail would survive. That's how bad State's electronic archiving was then. Instead, the State Department has 30,000 of her messages, and history is becoming much the wiser. Her critics, not so much.

Now, the same folks who clamored to see those messages seem to want to lock them up in classified vaults. Foolishness. They intend to redact the e-mails, thus putting red flags right on messages that circulated for years in unclassified form, thus highlighting the secrets they contain, if there really are any. Keeping the e-mails unclassified would actually be the best way to protect anything sensitive — through obscurity.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There were significant efficiency gains for our national security when the secretary of state ran her main e-mail account in unclassified form. No artificial barriers to information sharing. A bright line against including truly classified documents. A standing rebuke to the massive overclassification all around her.

I've seen a couple-million pages of documents that were classified when the government put them on paper or computer screens. I can say from experience that few deserved such consideration.

There are real secrets. This is where I diverge from the Julian Assanges and the Chelsea Mannings of the world. I don't want the designs of binary chemical warheads getting out, nor the identities of any brave Iranian or Chinese voices who talk to our embassies or CIA stations. The bottom lines of our diplomats in negotiations, I think we should keep to ourselves until such time as the deals are done.

But the real secrets make up only a fraction of the classified universe, and no secret deserves immortality. In fact, essential to the whole idea of democratic government is that secret deals with dictators will come out eventually, not least to deter the worst deals from being made.

WikiLeaks produced hysteria in Washington with its large-scale release of U.S. diplomatic cables in 2010. The House Judiciary Committee asked me to talk about whether lawmakers should amend the Espionage Act to prosecute those guys. Bad idea, I said. I predicted that there would be little damage to real national security because most classified cables can be published within a few years with no harm done.

I showed Congress the estimates over the years of how much gets classified that doesn't deserve to be. Ronald Reagan's executive secretary for the National Security Council, Rodney B. McDaniel, said 90 percent. Thomas H. Kean, the Republican head of the 9/11 Commission, said 75 percent of what he saw that was classified should not have been.

In fact, the congressional inquiry into 9/11 concluded that secrecy had kept the American people — our best allies in the fight against terrorism — from engaging with the threat they faced. The only responders with enough information to disrupt any of the Sept. 11 attacks were the passengers on United Flight 93, who heard through their cellphones what was happening on other planes and attempted to retake control of their own, saving who knows how many lives in the process.

The best defense of an open society is open information. We are not safer in the dark.

Those inspectors general poring over Clinton's e-mails need to get back to their transparency and accountability jobs, where they should focus on opening — not closing — the files that will empower a free citizenry to protect our country and ourselves, and hold our leaders to account.

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Tom Matzzie" <tom@zzranch.com>
To: "Andrew Baumann" <ABaumann@gqrr.com>
Date: 2/20/2008 5:50:13 AM
Subject: Re: Joe Klein: McCain Soft on al Qaeda

note the hat tip in Klein's column to the National Security Network. good work by Ilan and Rand's team.

On Wed, Feb 20, 2008 at 12:47 PM, Andrew Baumann <ABaumann@gqrr.com > wrote:

In case anyone hasn't seen this, this was quite a piece by Joe Klein on Time.com today:

http://www.time-blog.com/swampland/2008/02/mccain_soft_on_al_qaeda.html

McCain: Soft on Al Qaeda?

A curious passage from John McCain's victory speech last night:

"Or will we risk the confused leadership of an inexperienced candidate who once suggested invading our ally, Pakistan, and sitting down without pre-conditions or clear purpose with enemies who support terrorists and are intent on destabilizing the world by acquiring nuclear weapons?"

In time, I'm sure, Barack Obama will explain that any meetings with Iranian leaders will be fully prepped by staff in advance, including advance meetings at the ministerial level...but what about the first part of the quote? Utter nonsense. Here's what Obama actually said:

"I understand that President Musharraf has his own challenges. But let me make this clear. There are terrorists holed up in those mountains who murdered 3,000 Americans. They are plotting to strike again. It was a terrible mistake to fail to act when we had a chance to take out an Al Qaeda leadership meeting in 2005. If we have actionable intelligence about high-value terrorist targets and President Musharraf won't act, we will."

And, in fact, Obama was merely saying that he supported current U.S. policy. A month ago, for example, a bomb launched from a CIA predator drone killed the Al Qaeda leader Abu Laith al-Libi in Pakistan. Was McCain opposed to that?

The point is, McCain's loose, inaccurate talk continues a sad pattern he has shown on national security matters, particularly with regard to Iraq, where he is a loose cannon, firing off hot-button words like "victory" and "surrender"--words that his hero General David Petraeus has never and would never use. As it now stands, McCain believes that Iraq, where 150,000 U.S. troops are chasing after 3,500 Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia terrorists, is the "central front" in the war against terrorism--and he is on the record opposed to taking military action against the real Al Qaeda, which is actively working to destabilize Afghanistan, and Pakistan, and may be planning the next 9/11 in the mountains of Waziristan. Indeed, the election results in Pakistan this week may lead to further instability, perhaps a military coup, which could make U.S. action--action, not invasion--to root out Al Qaeda all the more necessary.

A central foreign policy discussion in the general election should be: Are our troops deployed appropriately to meet the threats we are facing? Should we have more in Afghanistan and fewer in Iraq? (McCain, like Bush, has already ceded his authority as Commander-in-Chief on that decision to Petraeus, whom, he says, should have the last word on troop levels in Iraq--an abdication of authority that raises deep questions about McCain's ability to conduct a coherent national security policy.)

In sum, John McCain, who claims to take national security seriously, made a foolish statement to score political points last night. At the very least, I hope he retracts it and joins Obama in the effort to defeat Al Qaeda.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Andrew Baumann

Analyst

10 G Street NE, Suite 500, Washington, DC 20002

Phone: 202 478 8300 / Fax: 202 478 8301

abaumann@ggrr.com

www.greenbergresearch.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Gene Karpinski, League of Conservation Voters" <josh_hicks@lcv.org>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 10/31/2012 8:59:20 AM
Subject: Trick or Treat?

LEAGUE OF CONSERVATION VOTERS

Dear John,

Happy Halloween!

With only 6 days to go before the election, the race to the White House continues to tighten. Whether or not November 6th is a trick or a treat depends on just a few key states and races across the country.

We simply have to stop Mitt Romney and his Dirty Energy allies from gaining control. I don't think I have to tell you how devastating a President Romney would be for the environmental movement. Thanks to your steadfast support of LCV and LCV Victory Fund, we have continued to run a highly effective and targeted campaign in some of the tightest races in the country.

As you will see below, we recently and significantly have expanded our efforts. We are still trying to raise a final $250,000 for LCV Victory Fund in these closing days.

With deep appreciation,

Gene

Presidential and Senate Races Remain Close

LCV has been able to go back into important key states to make one final push for President Obama and some of our environmental champions in the Senate.

– In Colorado, LCV announced a new $850,000 television ad campaign re-launching an ad featuring a former employee of a local wind turbine manufacturing plant who says he "got laid off because Mitt Romney and his friends in Congress want to eliminate tax credits for wind energy." The ad features Chris Maese of Pueblo, Colo., who built wind turbines at Vestas' Pueblo facility. Vestas is the world's largest wind turbine manufacturer. In the ad, Maese talks about how Romney's opposition to extending the Production Tax Credit (PTC) for wind energy helped cause his layoff in August. The ad is airing in the Denver media market through Election Day.

– In Arizona, LCV Victory Fund and Majority PAC launched a new $1.2 million television ad campaign outlining the risks of sending former uranium mining lobbyist Jeff Flake to the Senate. Flake has worked in Congress to allow mining for radioactive uranium near the Grand Canyon and Colorado River, which would endanger the drinking water of 25 million Americans, while taking campaign cash from his mining industry allies. The ad, "Two Jobs," is airing through Election Day.

– In Virginia, earlier this week, LCV and Majority PAC launched an $800,000 ad buy in Virginia against George Allen. The ad targets George Allen's cozy relationship with special interests like the oil and gas industry. The ad will run through Election Day in key markets in Virginia. You can view the ad, "Worked for Them," by clicking here .

– In Wisconsin, LCV has announced its involvement in the Wisconsin Senate race with a $1 million dollar ad buy designed to help make Tammy Baldwin the next United States Senator. LCV is launching two ads that will air through Election Day. "Cash ," running in the Milwaukee media market, highlights how Tommy Thompson cashed in when he joined a lobbying firm in Washington. "Allies ," running in the Madison media market, outlines how Baldwin has worked with President Obama to create clean energy jobs and would build on those efforts in the United States Senate.

Update on Massachusetts Senate Race

I'm sure you are following the Massachusetts Senate race as closely as I am at this point. Most of the recent polls seem to be pointing in a good direction. LCV made the decision to spend over $1 million dollars to help send Elizabeth Warren to the US Senate. Here are a couple highlights of what we are doing:

- LCV kicked off our campaign late this summer with an unprecedented field effort to reach swing voters in the Boston suburbs. We've already knocked on nearly 200,000 doors and we're continuing to expand our campaign.

- We also launched a four-part mail program to expose Brown's ties to Big Oil and his 278 votes against President Obama's agenda. This targeted program will reach 150,000 persuadable households across the state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Update on the Michigan Clean Energy Ballot Measure

The only place in which clean energy will be explicitly on the ballot in November is in Michigan, where the voters will decide on Proposition 3, which would increase the state's production of clean renewable energy to 25 percent by 2025.

Both major utilities in Michigan are fiercely opposing the initiative, which is supported by labor unions, nurses, environmental groups and a broad array of organizations. In a year where oil and coal companies have spent millions of dollars attacking clean energy, passing Proposition 3 in a Midwestern industrial state like Michigan would send a clear message that clean energy is central to rebuilding the economy and creating millions of good-paying jobs. LCV is working closely with Michigan LCV in this critical campaign, which has recently received the endorsement from former President Bill Clinton.

Please check out my op-ed earlier this month on this important issue by clicking here .

LCV Action Fund Surpasses $2.1 million raised with GiveGreen

LCV Action Fund has now raised and contributed over $2.1 million in support of environmental candidates this cycle, thanks to many of you, and it continues to increase. If you haven't yet done so, now is the time to donate as generously as you can to pro-environment political candidates. For environmental voters like you, the best giving strategy is to "bundle" your contributions with contributions from others who share your environmental values. Bundling through LCV Action Fund's GiveGreen magnifies the power of your contribution by calling attention to the environmental values that drive you to support the candidate in the first place. Visit www.givegreen.com today to support LCV Action Fund's featured environmental champions.

Join Us for LCV's Post-Election Report, Analysis, and Discussion

What impact did you and LCV have on the outcome of the 2012 elections? What does the new political landscape mean for the environment? Please join LCV senior political strategists for an in-depth analysis of the election results and for a preview of what we can expect in the months ahead. The call will be held on Thursday, November 8th at 2 p.m. EST. To receive the call-in number, please contact Josh Hicks at (202) 454-4565 or Josh_Hicks@lcv.org.

Paid for by League of Conservation Voters, www.lcv.org , and not authorized by any candidate or candidate's committee.

Update Your Profile
To Unsubscribe Click Here

1920 L Street, NW Suite 800
Washington, DC 20036
202-785-8683

POWERED BY blackbaud nonprofit software

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>
To:	"Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>
Date:	2/22/2015 9:04:18 AM
Subject:	2.22.15 HRC Clips
Attachments:	20150222 HRC Clips.docx

HRC Clips
February 22, 2015

HRC

The making of Hillary 5.0: Marketing wizards help reimagine Clinton brand (The Washington Post) 2
For Clinton, Her Family Foundation May Pose Campaign Risks (Associated Press)..... 6
Hillary, Jeb and $$$$$$ (The New York Times)..... 8
Hillary Clinton And The Not Too Bitter, Not Too Smooth, Just Right Primary (Huffington Post) 11
One Thing That Might Surprise You About Hillary Clinton (ABC News)..... 15
Hillary Clinton's Nixonian strategy of lying low (CNN)..... 17
Have Obama's supporters forgotten how much they once disliked Hillary Clinton? (Slate)..... 20
Clarence Page: How Democrats lost white voters (The Fresno Bee)..... 23
Hillary Clinton, Jeb Bush and the problem with baggage (The Hill)..... 25
Bush and Clinton's generation game (The Sunday Business Post)..... 27
Peace negotiator to ease into role as key Jeb aide (The Sunday Times)..... 29
Clinton vs. Bush gives me the deja vu blues (Chicago Sun-Times)..... 31

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The making of Hillary 5.0: Marketing wizards help reimagine Clinton brand (The Washington Post)
By Philip Rucker and Anne Gearan
February 22, 2015
The Washington Post

Is Hillary Rodham Clinton a McDonald's Big Mac or a Chipotle burrito bowl? A can of Bud or a bottle of Blue Moon? JCPenney or J. Crew?

As she readies her second presidential campaign, Clinton has recruited consumer marketing specialists onto her team of trusted political advisers. Their job is to help imagine Hillary 5.0 - the rebranding of a first lady turned senator turned failed presidential candidate turned secretary of state turned likely 2016 Democratic presidential nominee.

Clinton and her image-makers are sketching ways to refresh the well- established brand for tomorrow's marketplace. In their mission to present voters with a winning picture of the likely candidate, no detail is too big or too small - from her economic opportunity agenda to the design of the "H" in her future campaign logo.

"It's exactly the same as selling an iPhone or a soft drink or a cereal," said Peter Sealey, a longtime corporate marketing strategist. "She needs to use everything a brand has: a dominant color, a logo, a symbol. . . . The symbol of a Mercedes is a three-pointed star. The symbol of Coca-Cola is the contour bottle. The symbol of McDonald's is the golden arches. What is Clinton's symbol?"

Clinton's challenge is unique. Unlike potential Republican challengers of relatively middling fame who are introducing themselves to a national audience for the first time, Clinton is almost universally recognized. Love her or loathe her, potential voters know who she is after more than two decades in public life.

Or they think they know.

As Clinton and her advisers conceptualize her 2016 image, her own history shows the potential for peril.

In politics, authenticity can be a powerful trait, and it is one that sometimes has escaped Clinton. In her 2008 presidential campaign, despite some raw displays of emotion, she often came across as overly programmed.

In 2016, a challenge for Clinton will be adapting to the political moment with a fresh image while remaining true to her settled identity. "Look at Budweiser," said a former campaign adviser to President Obama, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to talk candidly. "That's what Hillary Clinton is. She's not a microbrew. She's one of the biggest, most powerful brands ever in the country, and recognizing that is important."

Ahead of her campaign launch, Clinton has tapped some of the Democratic Party's star strategists as well as two of corporate America's branding wizards: Wendy Clark, who specializes in marketing age-old brands such as Coca-Cola to younger and more diverse customers; and Roy Spence, a decades-long Clinton friend who dreamed up the "Don't Mess With Texas" anti-littering slogan as well as flashy ad campaigns for Southwest Airlines and Wal-Mart.

Clark took an unpaid leave in January from Coca-Cola, where she is president of brands and strategic marketing for carbonated beverages in North America, to help Clinton in what Clark called "a passion project." Spence is co-founder and chairman of GSD&M, an Austin-based corporate ad firm, and has experience in politics, including with Clinton's 2008 campaign.

Clinton's words suggest that her 2016 campaign will stress economic fairness - the level playing field for the middle class implied by her Twitter message last month praising Obama's State of the Union address. "Now we need to step up & deliver for the middle class. #FairShot #FairShare," Clinton wrote.

But the plans for Clinton's rebranding are not yet clear, nor are the influences of the Madison Avenue sensibility Clark and Spence bring to her operation.

Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill declined to comment on the branding strategy or the specific work of Clark and Spence.

People familiar with Clinton's preparations said Clark and Spence are focused on developing imaginative ways to "let Hillary be Hillary," as one person said, and help her make emotional connections with voters.

"I just want America to know the Hillary Clinton I know," said Jerry Crawford, a friend and the Iowa chairman of Clinton's 2008 campaign. "I want as many people as possible to get to know the woman I've seen behind closed doors. She's bright, disciplined, quick to throw her head back and laugh - just a very, very attractive person."

Spence, who got to know Bill and Hillary Clinton when they worked in Texas on George McGovern's 1972 presidential campaign, tried to steer Clinton out of a rough patch in 2008 after her early losses to Obama. He is credited with her provocative "3 a.m. phone call" ad but also with soft-focus initiatives to reveal what he called "Hillary's heart."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mark McKinnon, a friend and competitor of Spence and a media strategist with George W. Bush's presidential campaigns, said: "Spence and Clark have a lot of experience refreshing established, well-known brands like AT&T, Coca-Cola and Wal-Mart. Should come in handy."

Spence and Clark have been credited with creating three- dimensional personalities around otherwise dull consumer brands. At Coca-Cola, Clark spearheaded the "Share a Coke" campaign to put names such as Brittany and Zach on soda cans, a marketing move that boosted sales among millennials. Spence helped DoubleTree Hotels make the freshly baked chocolate chip cookies the chain serves guests upon check-in an icon for its sales pitch of warm comfort for beleaguered travelers.

But Fred Davis, a Republican advertising guru, said that if Clinton's rebranding "seems like a craven attempt to try to put fresh paint on an old house, then it will backfire."

"I think most voters are actually pretty intelligent, and they'll see through any blatant attempt to change," Davis said. "Her only hope, to me, is not a rebranding, but it's actual policy positions and ideas that are fresh and new - and because those are fresh and new, voters might think, 'Wait a minute, I'm going to give her another chance.' "

Some Clinton allies agreed. They dismissed the suggestion that refreshing her brand alone will make the candidate seem current. They said Clinton's paramount challenge is to answer two questions: why she is the right person to step into the Oval Office, and what she would do when she's there. If she does that, they said, her image will take care of itself.

"I don't think people are looking for someone who's being reinvented or rebranded," said Steve Elmendorf, a top Democratic lobbyist who was a strategist for Clinton's 2008 bid and other presidential campaigns. "This is somebody they know, whom they have confidence in, and the question is, can she lead us to a better place over the next four years? That's her biggest challenge. What are the new ideas? . . . It can't be yesterday's program."

Sealey, who is credited with the successful "Always Coca-Cola" campaign in the 1990s, said that Clinton, like Coke, "has incredible top-of-mind awareness, and it's a huge asset."

"The issue is: What is her promise?" he said. "With Mercedes, it's quality. With Volvo, it's safety. With Coca-Cola, it's refreshment. If you can get her promise down to one word, that's the key."

Spence's business partner, Haley Rushing, said their approach to all clients, corporate and political, "starts with them at the center," rather than market trends. "We always start from the inside out, not the outside in," she said.

Rushing and Spence co-founded the Purpose Institute, where Rushing's title is "chief purposeologist" and the staffers act as "organizational therapists" uncovering the central purposes of their client organizations. Rushing said she is not working on the Clinton effort but that she envisions a Clinton brand built around years of experience. She said, "Everything emanates from, 'What is Hillary's purpose in the world?' "

Clinton has faced that question before, with mixed results.

After a complicated tenure as first lady, Clinton reinvented herself as a potholes-and-pork senator from her adopted state of New York. Then she ran for president as a tough woman in the mold of Margaret Thatcher. Failing that, she had a careful run as the country's top diplomat under Obama that allies believe raised her stature.

Perhaps her most significant rebranding came in 2000, when she became a popular elected official in her own right after her husband's Monica Lewinsky scandal and after a controversial tenure as first lady. Clinton was ridiculed as a dilettante and a carpetbagger, but she won over critics, even some Republicans, with a dogged commitment to local issues.

In 2008, however, Clinton's rebranding went badly, starting with a misreading of the zeitgeist that had her stressing her commander-in-chief qualifications when the public preferred Obama's promise of hope and change.

Clinton's advisers were divided then about how to bust the caricature of Clinton as remote and brittle. Some begged Clinton to reprise a campaign feature that had charmed New York voters, in which she stayed in ordinary people's homes while traveling around the state. But Clinton insisted that doing so in Iowa or New Hampshire would come across as forced.

Similarly, an online compilation of testimonials meant to showcase Clinton's humanity and relatability fell flat. Too cheesy, some advisers said; at odds with her strength-and-competence message, others said.

A rebranding that stuck: Clinton's workmanlike turn as secretary of state, during which she visited more countries than most of her predecessors - and used her celebrity to draw attention to women's empowerment and human rights issues.

Now, Clinton will try to refresh her image once more so that voters see her as a champion for the middle class amid deep concerns about income inequality. Rohit Deshpande, a marketing professor at Harvard Business School, offered a fast-food giant as a case study.

"Refresh with the times is the issue McDonald's is facing right now," he said. "It's considered tired, and the marketplace has moved on."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Fabian Geyrhalter, a corporate branding consultant, also drew a parallel between McDonald's and Clinton: "There has been a brand value proposition over so many years, and suddenly she needs to shift that legacy into Clinton 2016: 'This is what I stand for now.' "

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For Clinton, Her Family Foundation May Pose Campaign Risks (Associated Press)
By Ken Thomas
February 22, 2015
Associated Press

The foundation launched by former President Bill Clinton more than a decade ago has battled HIV and AIDS in Africa, educated millions of children and fed the poor and hungry around the globe. It also has the potential to become a political risk for Hillary Rodham Clinton as she moves toward a second presidential campaign.

The former secretary of state has struggled with some recent bad headlines over large donations given to the foundation by foreign governments in the past two years, and the $200 million-plus the organization has raised since 2013, ahead of her anticipated White House campaign.

Republicans contend that foreign governments donating to a foundation led by a potential U.S. president creates unacceptable conflicts of interests. Also, the involvement of big money reinforces a long-standing narrative pushed by the GOP of the Clintons as a couple who frequently mix business and politics.

"Unless Hillary Clinton immediately reinstates the ban on foreign countries giving to her foundation and returns the millions of dollars these governments have already donated, she's setting an incredibly dangerous precedent," said the chairman of the Republican National Committee, Reince Priebus. "The American people are not about to elect a president in Hillary Clinton who could expose them to the demands of foreign governments because they dumped massive sums of cash into her foundation."

The foundation, which is scheduled to hold events in Morocco and Greece this spring, defended its financial support and addressed how it might function if Clinton runs for president. If she seeks office again, something taken as a given by most, the foundation said it would ensure its policies and practices are "appropriate, just as we did when she served as secretary of state."

In 2009, when Clinton became President Barack Obama's chief diplomat, the foundation stopped raising money from foreign governments. The fundraising involving non-U.S. entities resumed in 2013, after she left the his administration.

The Wall Street Journal last week reported the foundation had received money in 2014 from the United Arab Emirates, Saudi Arabia, Oman and others. The Washington Post reported the charity has raised nearly $2 billion since the former president started it in 2001. About one-third of its donations of $1 million or more come from foreign governments or non-U.S. entities, the newspaper found.

Democrats say the Clintons can defend their work at the foundation because of its track record and history of tackling some of the world's biggest problems, from AIDS and clean water to hunger, educational opportunities and the protection of endangered wildlife.

They also note that the foundation voluntarily discloses its donors — nonprofits are not required to do — and say there is no evidence the Clintons have used it to enrich themselves. Nearly 90 percent of the foundation's money goes toward its programming.

"The foundation has done amazing work," said Connecticut Gov. Dan Malloy, a Democrat who campaigned with Bill Clinton last year. "It has been a unifying force in our national affairs and in our international affairs."

Yet the influx of corporate and foreign money just before a potential Hillary Clinton campaign has caused some anxiety within her party.

"There was a reason they stopped taking foreign government donations when Hillary was secretary of state," said Mike Carberry, a Johnson County, Iowa, supervisor and former county Democratic chairman. He said the foundation should reinstate the policies used from 2009 to 2013. "It doesn't seem right."

The foundation has strong ties with several corporations and other large foundations. Last September's annual meeting in New York was sponsored by an array of companies that regularly lobby the federal government, including financial firms HSBC Bank USA, Barclays and Deutsche Bank, as well as Fortune 500 companies such as Coca-Cola, Microsoft, Monsanto, Procter & Gamble and ExxonMobil.

Goldman Sachs, whose corporate officers have played leading roles in the Treasury Department in recent years, has worked with the Clinton Foundation on the 10,000 Women Initiative aimed at helping female entrepreneurs around the globe access capital.

Many of the same donors to the Clintons' political campaigns have given money to the foundation. Dennis Cheng, a former Hillary Clinton campaign fundraiser, recently left the foundation as its chief development officer and is expected to be a top fundraiser for her expected campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The examination of the foundation's finances come as many Democrats want Clinton to take on a more populist economic agenda that would demand more oversight of Wall Street firms. It also follows efforts by Democrats to scrutinize Republican Mitt Romney's business practices in 2012 and tie Republican candidates to millions of dollars provided by the Koch Brothers and their business interests.

Beyond the headlines, many Democrats say it shows the need for Clinton to begin actively campaigning and build an apparatus better suited to rapidly respond to these types of critiques.

"There's a vacuum," said Tom Henderson, the chairman of the Polk County, Iowa, Democrats, who noted potential candidates such as former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb are visiting soon. "She isn't doing anything" in Iowa, he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary, Jeb and $$$$$$ (The New York Times)
By Frank Bruni
February 22, 2015
The New York Times

LAST week began with the comedy extravaganza of the "Saturday Night Live" reunion, but not one of its sketches or jokes was half as funny as four words three days later by Jeb Bush.

"I'm my own man," he said.

And he kept a straight face somehow.

The remark came during a foreign policy speech in Chicago, and he was making clear that he was no slave to the policies and priorities of his father, the 41st president, or his older brother, the 43rd.

I'll buy that.

But immediately following the speech, donors sought to buy him.

It was estimated that at back-to-back fund-raisers, he hauled in about $4 million for his Right to Rise PAC and for a "super PAC" that supports him.

This was on top of another $4 million that he reportedly netted the previous week in one evening alone at the Manhattan home of a private equity bigwig. After Manhattan came the Washington, D.C., area, where he racked up $1 million at two events, according to Politico . An atlas of cities, an avalanche of dough: It's what successful campaigns are made of, and his is expected to raise between $50 million and $100 million over a span of three months.

Those dollars come with expectations. Money almost always does.

Bush is no more his own man than Hillary Clinton is her own woman. And in her case, too, I'm not talking about the imprint of her family, specifically a husband who served two terms in the White House and still looms impossibly large and loquacious on the post-presidential stage.

I'm talking about financial ties — past, present, future. I'm talking about the reality, growing ever more pronounced and ominous, that you can't run for a major, fiercely contested political office in this country without becoming a monstrous, ceaseless, insatiable Hoover of money.

The Clintons suck it in like no one before them, with a dearth of caution that boggles the mind. Stories in The Wall Street Journal and The Washington Post last week tabulated and detailed the fund-raising of the Clinton Foundation over the last decade and a half, calculating that it had raised $2 billion.

And the sources of some of that money should give us pause. As The Wall Street Journal reported , "Recent donors include the United Arab Emirates, Saudi Arabia, Oman, Australia, Germany and a Canadian government agency promoting the Keystone XL pipeline."

There are firm and necessary laws against American candidates accepting foreign donations. There's no such prohibition for a philanthropy like the Clinton Foundation, which undeniably does much essential, heroic work around the globe.

But it's a philanthropy headed by a woman who's most likely running for president and by her husband and daughter. Their requests and their gratitude cannot be separated entirely from politics. There's inevitable overlap and blending.

As The Washington Post wrote, the foundation "has given contributors entree, outside the traditional political arena, to a possible president. Foreign donors and countries that are likely to have interests before a potential Clinton administration — and yet are ineligible to give to U.S. political campaigns — have affirmed their support for the family's work through the charitable giving."

And this isn't some minor wrinkle of the foundation's structure and workings. "A third of foundation donors who have given more than $1 million are foreign governments or other entities based outside the United States, and foreign donors make up more than half of those who have given more than $5 million," according to The Post's analysis.

That analysis also showed that "donations from the financial services sector" represented the "largest share of corporate donors." In other words, the foundation is cozy with Wall Street, which has also funneled Clinton some of her enormous speaking fees.

The Journal noted that "at least 60 companies that lobbied the State Department during her tenure donated a total of more than $26 million to the Clinton Foundation."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A few prominent Democrats with whom I spoke were spooked, not because they believed that Clinton would feel a pressing need to repay these kindnesses, but because the eventual Republican nominee had just been handed a potent weapon against her.

And in the income-inequality era, how does a candidate crowned with this many dollar signs put herself forward persuasively as a woman of the people and a champion of the underdog?

THE answer — and her salvation — may be that we've all become so accustomed to the tide of money washing through politics that we just assume all candidates to be equally (and thoroughly) wet. We give in. And we stop acknowledging frequently or urgently enough that American elections, which should be contests of ideas and character, are as much (if not more) contests of cold, hard cash.

Certainly those of us in the news media are somewhat guilty of this, because something that's no longer new is no longer news.

Sure, we publish stories about the dizzying, obscene heights of spending by major donors, like one written in The Times last month by Nicholas Confessore. He noted that the Koch brothers had drawn up a budget of $889 million for the 2016 election cycle.

But we discuss the damage being done to Chris Christie's presidential dreams by the defection of potential donors without digressing to underscore the perversity of a small circle of people having so much consequence.

We report, as we did in January, on how well or poorly Rand Paul, Marco Rubio and Ted Cruz performed when they spoke at a gathering put together by the Kochs in Southern California. But we don't flag the oddity of these auditions, the chilling bizarreness of the way the road to the White House winds not only through the Iowa caucuses and the New Hampshire primary but also through plutocrats' posh retreats.

An astonishing bounty of the comments and developments that make headlines emanate from the arena of fund-raising. We learned that Mitt Romney might enter the 2016 race because he was telling donors as much, and we learned that he had decided otherwise because he was letting donors know. In neither instance did we take sufficient note of that.

We articulate misgivings about how much of Clinton's or Bush's thinking may be rooted in the past. But the bigger issue, given the scope of not just their own political histories but also their relatives', is how heavy a duffel of i.o.u.s each of them would carry into office.

Their prominence is commensurate with their debts. And only so many of those can be forgotten.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton And The Not Too Bitter, Not Too Smooth, Just Right Primary (Huffington Post)
By Jason Linkins
February 22, 2015
Huffington Post

It shouldn't be controversial to say that at this point in the 2016 race, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton enjoys virtually every possible advantage in the Democratic primary field. She's the best-known candidate with the highest level of name recognition and visibility. She has a long-nurtured campaign apparatus and the ability to call campaign infrastructure into being on the fly. Against the rest of the Democratic field, she's the overwhelming favorite in every poll that's ever been conducted.

Of course, anytime we talk about a "Democratic field," we should really say, "insofar as one exists." Her competition -- so far a dimly lit constellation of long shots (and perhaps the current vice president) -- isn't shaping up as a particularly robust challenge. Clinton plays a role in that simply by looming on the landscape. As has been discussed previously, Clinton has the power to "freeze the field" -- meaning that her dominance is such that Democratic party elites and mega-donors are loath to invest in a competitor, creating a sort of vicious cycle in which no viable competitors can truly present themselves.

There is a very real possibility that Clinton could face only a nominal challenge in a Democratic primary, and potentially none at all. And that's produced an interesting phenomenon among the members of the political media who, expecting a competitive primary to generate monetizable content and grist for "The Narrative," find themselves somewhere in the middle of a story that doesn't seem to have started. This is how you can understand the constant attention given to Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren -- a woman who is not running for president -- as a "foil" for Clinton. Every great protagonist needs an antagonist, and the political press would dearly love, if possible, to will one into being.

Elsewhere, there are the Hot Takes, suffused by the media's drug of choice, counter-intuition. Are all the advantages that Clinton secretly holds actually disadvantages in disguise? Is Clinton's ability to quelch all viable contenders for the Democratic nomination actually the Achilles heel that will lead to her undoing? A better question might be: Are all the people offering that opinion simply planting a flag for a future "Told ya so" story down the line?

I think it's fair to say that most of us, if we wanted something important (like, say, a job), wouldn't spend much time regretting the news that we were the only person in the running. Just about everyone would prefer to win in a blowout. At the same time, there is something that we all understand instinctually about the nature of competition: It tests mettle. And the old eyeball test informs us of the virtues of tested mettle. When we look at the 27-1 Gonzaga University men's basketball team alongside the other basketball teams in the top four of the NCAA's national rankings, many of us downgrade the Bulldogs because we know that they didn't play against the same level of competition as Kentucky, Virginia and Duke did. So, in the back of our mind, Gonzaga looms as a paper tiger.

That said, eventually Gonzaga is going to have ample opportunity to show that they're superior to their competition -- just like Clinton will, even if she runs in an uncontested primary.

Of course, the fact that there isn't already vigorous competition for Clinton to face tells us a few potentially ominous things. First and foremost, it shows that the Democratic Party's bench is not terribly deep right now. Elections are, at bottom, a competition of ideas -- one in which a losing candidate's vision may persist beyond the candidate's own electoral hopes. That's a good thing for any political party. Furthermore, a quickly decided primary could negatively impact state-level political organizing, which in turn would impact the vitality of down-ticket campaigns.

But let's stick with the question: Is Hillary running virtually unopposed a bad thing? As Vox's Matt Yglesias points out, having a competitive primary means "real debates, real media strategy, real policy rollouts, and all the other accompaniments of a presidential nominating congress." He goes on to note that "competition" in this instance goes well beyond simply having other credible opponents:

A vigorous primary campaign is a means through which, among other things, the key potential vulnerabilities in a candidate's biography get aired. Was Clinton lying about her opposition to gay marriage the way David Axelrod says Obama was? Have too many years at the pinnacle of American politics left her out of touch with middle class struggles? Can she distance herself from Obama administration foreign policy initiatives that didn't work out (settlement freeze? Russia reset?) without sounding disloyal or ineffectual? Can she answer questions about the complicated finances underlying her husband's foundation?
As long as she's "not running," we just don't know. And the closer she gets to obtaining the nomination without answering the questions, the more vulnerable the position she leaves herself in for the general election.
Here's the thing: All of that is smart-sounding stuff. It's thoughtful argument that appeals to our instincts. You can take that to a Beltway soiree or the set of a Sunday morning talk show, and with a little charm, you'll hold up. And yet, it's still really just gut feelings. It's still that instinct that pushes you to take an at-large team from the ACC deeper in the tourney than the one-loss Western Conference champions -- a good enough gamble that could, nonetheless, leave your bracket in tatters.

And it's worth pointing out that over on the GOP side, Republican elites are making their own set of gambles with their primary. The Republican National Committee's interpretation of their 2012 cycle woes has led them to believe that the long primary cost them dearly. The RNC believes that their primary afforded too many fleeting also-rans too much media coverage, that the length of the competition provided too many opportunities for their party to be shown in a bad light, and that ultimately, everything conspired to force their nominee into a bunch of positions from which the extrication was too difficult. They have, subsequently, undertaken a number of moves to "fix" this problem, and while they've not created a situation in which one candidate has a massive advantage over everyone else, it's still a drive toward limiting the competition, all based on some gut feelings.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Can we get closer to the truth of how, if at all, a competitive primary brings benefits -- or pitfalls -- to candidates? Well, if we turn to political science, there seems to be one constant notion: A competitive primary is very good for candidates, right up to where the competitive primary becomes a divisive primary, at which point the benefits of competition tend to fade.

The virtues of competitive primaries are hotly debated, as it turns out. Back in February of 2008, The Monkey Cage's John Sides embarked on an exploration of the topic, noting that the most relevant research at the time pointed to other factors as being far more determinative of success in a general election. From a gambler's point of view, the health of the economy and the popular regard for the presidential incumbent matter a lot more than what happens during a primary.

But Josh Putnam, proprietor of Frontloading HQ, nevertheless saw something interesting in the notion that a competitive primary could take a dark, blowback-producing turn. Just as the RNC concluded after the 2012 cycle, the factor that fascinated Putnam in 2008 was timing -- the notion that on a long enough timeline, a competitive primary eventually, maybe inevitably, turns divisive. Per Putnam:

At what point does the positive competitiveness of the race for delegates turn into the negative, party-splitting divisiveness? Should Clinton do well in Ohio and Texas on Tuesday, then 2008 may have reached that point for the Democrats. But in the Super Tuesday era (1988/1992-2004), no challenger has been afforded such an opportunity. That era was marked by frontrunners who were able to snuff out insurgencies before competitiveness turned to divisiveness. ... [Walter] Mondale quelled Gary Hart before a movement started (No, this isn't within the era I defined above but it is a good example.). George W. Bush kept [John] McCain at bay. And [John] Kerry silenced John Edwards. Competitiveness yielded to reality in all three cases before divisiveness took hold or could attempt to take hold.
It's almost as if there's a sort of "uncanny valley" phenomenon happening, in which competition elevates everyone until it gets too hot or turns too personal. There's a sweet spot: Ideally, you want your level of competition to be challenging, but not bedeviling. You want the primary race to look like a collegial bit of tire-kicking, not a campaign in which you're sending arsonists out to torch the rival dealership. So maybe all of the people who continually pen that "Elizabeth Warren versus Hillary Clinton" fan fiction are onto something, instinctually: They have a sense that the Jim Webbs and Martin O'Malleys of the world might not make it out of Iowa and that Clinton needs someone who can stay in the game long enough to make it to Super Tuesday. But not much further than that.

In the end, that data-driven conclusion about competitive primaries that we really want remains elusive -- or at the very least, not strong enough to talk us out of our horse-sense feelings on the matter. But let's return to one last study, cited by The Monkey Cage's Jonathan Robinson, about that 2008 competition between Clinton and Barack Obama:

Using a survey that tracked individual voters from the primary to the general election, Michael Henderson, D. Sunshine Hillygus, and Trevor Thompson ... examine whether and why Clinton supporters did or did not support Obama in the general election. They find that 71% of Clinton supporters ended up voting for Obama. Moreover, supporters of Clinton and the other Democratic candidates were no more likely to stay home on Election Day. The most important factors that predicted a vote for McCain among supporters of the other Democratic candidates were not frustration with the primary election's outcome but ideology and political issues, especially the Iraq War.
All of that suggests that even though the 2008 Democratic primary got fiercely competitive, it still stoked an energy that lasted throughout the election cycle, ensuring that Democratic voters stayed engaged over the long haul. Perhaps what a political party, ideally, wants out of a primary is a contest where the competitiveness fosters some amount of voter engagement without tipping into a grotesque spectacle that leaves those who had engaged with it feeling nauseous, discouraged and just plain done with politics for the year.

Handled the right way, a contested primary creates a number of "products" organically that would need to be manufactured by other means in a non-contested primary. Competition helps to present those Big Ideas to the electorate, a vision of the future for which to fight. It breeds passion and gets voters to start using those muscles of commitment, which eventually get them out of the house and to the polls on Election Day. Perhaps most importantly, it allows the candidates to make connections with those activist members of the electorate, who'll use their muscles to make sure those committed voters know how to get to those polls on time.

At this point, it sure looks like Hillary Clinton can grab the nomination without too much trouble. Trouble is, some trouble might be a nice thing to have.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

One Thing That Might Surprise You About Hillary Clinton (ABC News)
By Benjamin Bell
February 21, 2015
ABC News

This week, we asked Amy Chozick, national political reporter for the The New York Times, who covers Hillary Clinton, about when the former secretary of state might announce her 2016 intentions, her possible competition and one thing that surprised Chozick about Clinton.

1] Hillary Clinton has not said she is running for president, although obviously many people assume she will. If she does, what do we know about when she might announce?

Amy Chozick: The conventional wisdom is that she would establish some sort of exploratory committee to begin raising money in April. She could then do a splashy public rollout of an official campaign later in the spring or early summer. But the exploratory committee would give Clinton the legal apparatus to begin to raise and spend money for a political campaign.

2] Clinton's Twitter account has been closely watched since she started tweeting. Do we know who is in control of that account and the strategy behind it?

Amy Chozick: I think we might be overanalyzing. Clinton, apparently, handles her own Twitter account and enjoys the medium. Just look what it did for her with the "Texts from Hillary" meme. Tweeting allows her to comment (albeit in 140 characters) on events of the day in a very controlled, but heavily disseminated way. That beats the unpredictability of a press conference, at least for now.

3] The New York Times reported Clinton met with Sen. Elizabeth Warren in December. Do they [team Clinton] perceive her as a threat to a possible Clinton candidacy for president? And if so, how large? Also, is there a specific Republican that team Clinton perceives would pose the biggest challenge to Clinton should she decide to run and secure the nomination?

Amy Chozick: Sen. Warren says she is not running for president, but she has had a significant impact on the national conversation, especially about Wall Street and inequality and how Clinton and the Democratic Party writ large address those issues. On the Republican side, Jeb Bush is currently perceived as the biggest threat. He has name recognition, appeals to Latinos, and has deep coffers and some centrist appeal.

4] At this point, who are Clinton's closest advisers? Should Clinton decide to run for president, who might be at the top of the power structure? Who might run her campaign?

Amy Chozick: Many of the same loyal aides who have been with Clinton since the White House (when her team was known as Hillaryland) continue to serve as her closest advisers, but a lot of newcomers will come on board for a 2016 campaign. John Podesta, who worked in former President Bill Clinton and President Obama's administrations, is expected to serve as a campaign chairman.

5] Covering Clinton, what is one thing that has surprised you about her?

Amy Chozick: Hmm. She likes to drink. We were on the campaign trail in 2008 and the press thought she was just taking shots to pander to voters in Pennsylvania. Um, no.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton's Nixonian strategy of lying low (CNN)
By Dan Merica
February 20, 2015
CNN

Washington (CNN)Few White House hopefuls would ever want to be compared to former President Richard Nixon, but some of Hillary Clinton's pre-campaign moves -- or lack thereof -- are reminiscent of the 37th president.

As Clinton eyes another run at the presidency in 2016, some close to her -- especially those who are cheering reports she may wait until summer to officially announce a bid -- point to Nixon's successful 1968 presidential bid as a positive sign, particularly how Nixon's public operation went dark for about six months before entering the race.

Despite being the presumed Democratic front-runner since Obama was reelected in 2012, Clinton has been largely absent from the public spotlight since the midterms wrapped in November 2014. And with the exception of the occasional paid speech and non-profit event, she could lie-low through the spring, a months-long hiatus similar to one Nixon took more than fifty years ago before winning the presidency for the first time.

READ: Clinton Foundation defends foreign donations

In "The Greatest Comeback: How Richard Nixon Rose from Defeat to Create the New Majority," author and longtime Nixon aide Patrick Buchanan retells the debate and intrigue around Nixon deciding to take a six-month hiatus from presidential politics ahead of the 1968 election.

The comparisons to Clinton, while not perfect -- she is the same young lawyer who worked as an aide on the Nixon impeachment trial of the former president -- are obvious.

Clinton is the favorite to win the Democratic nomination in 2016 and has already had to deal with attacks about her not being a "fresh face." A CNN/ORC poll out Wednesday found that Clinton leads the field with a whopping 61%. Both candidates have unsuccessfully sought the presidential nomination before and held high profile West Wing positions elevating their status and name recognition.

Nixon, who had then served a vice president for eight years but lost in the 1960 presidential election and the 1962 California gubernatorial race, was seen as the overwhelming favorite to win the Republican nomination in 1968. There was strong competition -- notably from then Michigan Gov. George Romney -- but none had the support Nixon had.

That is why, according to Buchanan, it was shocking when Nixon told an interviewer that after the 1966 midterm elections he was "going to take a holiday from politics for at least six months."

"Is it really wise to cede the field to Romney and lock ourselves into a six-month moratorium with no flexibility," Buchanan recalls asking Nixon.

Nixon pointedly responded: "Let 'em chew on him for a little while."

"That is what he expected the press to do to George. Romney, and that is what the press did," Buchanan writes. "The new year would prove an annus horribilis for the governor of Michigan."

Buchanan adds: Nixon knew "if he started out on a presidential campaign in 1967, even as an unannounced candidate... the press and public would tire of him and begin looking about for the 'fresh face.' Thus he would back away and not appear center stage as a candidate until more than a year later. ... It was a risky strategy and, judging by the results, a brilliant one."

Nixon would go on to narrowly win the 1968 election over Democrat Hubert Humphrey, but more importantly, he emerged from the Republican nomination process as the clear winner, trouncing Nelson Rockefeller, Ronald Reagan and Romney.

Buchanan, who ran for president three times, said he does see some of Nixon's strategy in Clinton.

"I see her more looking at the scene, asking, 'Why move now,'" he said. "I think that whole idea is absence makes the heart grow fonder."

He added that he wasn't surprised Clinton, despite her work to impeach Nixon, has mixing his strategy.

"What dictates the strategy is more the circumstance and the individual," he said. "This was not just a lark, this was thought though."

By ducking from public events -- Clinton had only two public events in January and has only one slated for February -- the frontrunner is clearly trying to lie low. Clinton has four events planned for March, but that number is nothing compared to how many events she headlined in 2014.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Reports have surfaced that she may wait until summer to officially kick off a campaign, but Clinton confidants have told CNN that they expect some sort of campaign move to happen in April.

The Nixon comparison favored by some close to Clinton -- but also causing some in Clinton-land to grimace -- have some . There are two obvious holes: The first being even if Clinton decides to lie low, today's media landscape doesn't have to abide by her wishes.

Leaks about who she is hiring, where she may put her campaign headquarters and the problems she will face on the trail are rampant and the media is still as focused on her -- if not more -- than they were months ago.

Secondly, unlike Nixon, Clinton's crowded field of realistic challengers isn't in the primary.

On her Democratic side, Vice President Joe Biden, Democratic Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, Sen. Bernie Sanders from Vermont and former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb haven't really made much a splash in polling, and one of her closest liberal competitors has repeatedly said she's not running. While Clinton finds herself with over 60% support, her next closest competitor, Biden, has gained six points since December and stands at 14%. Warren follows at 10%.

Instead, the real crowded field facing Clinton comes mostly from Republicans, who have roughly two dozen possible hopefuls who might compete for the presidential nomination. While the media spotlight has burned a few contenders, it's unclear if those missteps on the GOP side will translate to Clinton's benefit once she finally decides to officially hop into the race.

Quite simply, Clinton doesn't have a George Romney for the media to "chew" on.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Have Obama's supporters forgotten how much they once disliked Hillary Clinton? (Slate)
By Alec MacGillis
February 20, 2015
Slate

As a presidential candidate, says one political veteran, Hillary Clinton does not offer the country a "fresh start." "For all of her advantages, she is not a healing figure," he continues. "The more she tries to moderate her image … the more she compounds her exposure as an opportunist. And after two decades of the Bush-Clinton saga, making herself the candidate of the future could be a challenge."

Who said this? Marco Rubio? Scott Walker? A consultant for their fledgling 2016 campaigns? In fact, none of the above. They are the words of David Axelrod, the uber-strategist for Barack Obama's 2008 campaign, and are drawn from his new memoir, Believer. The hefty, engaging book has been dissected mostly for Axelrod's analysis of his former client and his presidency, but it's actually far more remarkable from another vantage: It is a reminder of how far liberals who were in the pro-Obama camp in 2008 have traveled in their view of Hillary Clinton—and how much they've allowed themselves to forget along the way.

The reconciliation of Obama's following with the presumptive 2016 Democratic nominee has been the great underexamined story on the Democratic side of the ledger heading into an election year. One simply cannot overstate how much ill will there was between the two camps in 2007 and 2008—that historic, down-to-the-wire primary standoff was based not in policy contrasts (good luck recalling the differences in their health plans) but in a deeply personal clash about the meaning and methods of progressive politics. "Triangulating and poll-driven positions because we're worried about what Mitt or Rudy might say about us just won't do," Obama said in his breakout speech in Des Moines in November 2007. "This party … has always made the biggest difference in the lives of the American people when we led, not by polls, but by principle; not by calculation, but by conviction; when we summoned the entire nation to a common purpose—a higher purpose."

Clinton fired back sarcastically three months later: "Now, I could stand up here and say, 'Let's just get everybody together. Let's get unified. The skies will open, the light will come down, celestial choirs will be singing, and everyone will know we should do the right thing and the world will be perfect.' " The legions of young Obama foot soldiers in Iowa, South Carolina, and elsewhere were fired not just by airy notions of hope and change and making history but by the more negative motivation that the prospect of a Clinton nomination stirred in them.

And yet here we are, eight years later, and it is almost as if that great showdown never happened. Some of those young Obama loyalists have now assumed leading positions in the vast Clinton apparatus, as have some of his most senior campaign staff. With no serious opposition looming in next year's primaries, Clinton's standing among Democratic voters is vastly stronger than it was at this point eight years ago (right around the time Obama announced his challenge), notes Nate Cohn in the New York Times. As was the case then, the papers are full of eyebrow-raising stories about overlap between her political backers and donors to the Clinton Foundation. Yet whereas in 2007 those stories were seized on by many liberals as confirmation of their wariness of Clinton, this time around there is little sign of the stories—or those about her continuing to rake in $300,000 speaking fees—causing any real agita on the left.

It's not hard to come up with explanations for liberals' newfound acceptance. There is the fact that she and Obama reconciled and her (mostly) dutiful service as his secretary of state. There is the letdown that some (many?) Obama liberals have felt about their man and his high-flown aspirations for changing Washington, which has led to a reassessment of Clinton's more Earth-bound approach. There is the simple reality that there is not a credible rival to assume Obama's spot in the field as the more liberal, dynamic, and idealistic alternative—were Sen. Elizabeth Warren to run, she would quickly remind liberals of their misgivings about Clinton, but it really looks like she's not running.

The result is a sort of collective amnesia among Obama supporters when it comes to their former estimation of Clinton—a reluctance to reckon fully with their aversion to her then and what has come of it since. This amnesia may seem harmless now, but one can't help but wonder if it might come back to haunt Democrats in the general election if it is not confronted more fully before then. Democrats, including Obama's diehard 2008 backers, may now seem willing to accept Clinton with a shrug or even a hug, and let bygones be bygones. But will that acceptance hold once they start seeing her out on the trail again—giving the stump speeches they found so dreadfully dull in contrast to those of their chosen guy in 2008, giving such hyper-cautious answers in debates, coming off as stumbling and disingenuous in her efforts to align herself with the mood of the moment? Better for Democrats to reckon with that prospect now than in the heat of the 2016 campaign, when they might suddenly find themselves feeling as unenthusiastic about her as they did about another Democrat running to succeed a two-term president with a stronger claim to the party's emotional core.

That is why Axelrod's new recounting of the 2008 showdown provides a service to Obama liberals—it cuts through the fog of forgetfulness, like some kind of Ghost of Primaries Past, to bring Obama-ites face to face with the Clinton they could not abide. Axelrod is no Clinton-hater—he did ads for her 2002 Senate campaign and expresses repeated gratitude in the book for her support of his and his wife's efforts to spur research on epilepsy, which their daughter has battled for years.

But, unlike Obama 2008 veterans, he has not signed up with Clinton this time around, and is willing to recount the grand clash in clear-eyed terms. He recalls Clinton's weakness for gun-for-hire consultants like the "bloodless and calculating" Mark Penn, who "saw his mission as quashing any liberal impulses" and "justified himself with fuzzy polling numbers and a smug self-assurance that made everything grating." He distinguishes Obama's offer of change in Washington from Hillary's copy-cat rhetoric: "The 'change' Hillary was offering was not much change at all—certainly not a move away from the raw, divisive politics that had come to define Washington. Rather, she seemed to revel in those politics. … The change she was offering was not away from Washington's habit of parsing words and passing on tough issues. (She habitually sought safe harbor.) The change she was offering was not away from a system dominated by PACs and corporate lobbyists. (She had taken their money and defended their work.)"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He casts in distinctly unflattering terms Clinton's turn to a more aggressive tone once it became clear how much trouble she was in, calling her "downright gleeful" about attacking Obama and describing "the ardor with which she bared her teeth," all of which "validated our critique that she was a reflection of scorched-earth Washington politics rather than an answer to it." He singles out for opprobrium Clinton's clumsy suggestion that Bobby Kennedy's assassination late in the 1968 primaries was proof that anything could happen and that she should therefore stay in the race until the bitter end—an "inexcusable" and "thoughtless" comment that Axelrod says "enraged" him.

And he reminds readers of Bill Clinton's provocative efforts to rally white voters around his wife in the South Carolina primary, which he says set off another senior Obama adviser, Alabama native Robert Gibbs: "Gibbs was convinced that Bill Clinton was trying to tap into the ugly impulses in southern politics that he had done so much to allay during his political career. 'This guy had risen above the Old South,' Robert said, 'Now their backs are to the wall, and look at what they're doing. Campaigning right out of the Lee Atwater handbook!' " Axelrod even gets in a small dig once his narrative turns to the general election, speculating that Hillary was unwilling to speak out against Sarah Palin after the GOP vice presidential nominee gave her a shoutout in her introductory speech because she was "perhaps flattered by Palin's tribute."

Axelrod makes sure to close on a conciliatory note, writing that Clinton was "as game, smart, and experienced an opponent as Barack could draw" and that "the warm partnership they built would become one of the inspiring subplots of my time in the administration."

But make no mistake—Axelrod has not forgotten what the differences were that motivated him, and millions of other Democrats, to come to Obama's side instead of Clinton's not that long ago. And it would be better for their party's sake if those voters grappled with those memories and realities sooner rather than later.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clarence Page: How Democrats lost white voters (The Fresno Bee)
By Clarence Page
February 21, 2015
The Fresno Bee

While talking to black and white Republicans recently about the Grand Old Party's outreach efforts to voters of color, I wondered: What are Democrats doing to reach working-class whites?

Much has been said and written — some of it by me — about how desperately Republican leaders seek to woo voters of color back to their side, the fabled "party of Lincoln" to which earlier generations of African-Americans were fondly devoted.

The surprisingly robust exodus of Hispanic, Asian, unmarried women and young voters, too, in Mitt Romney's racially lopsided 2012 presidential election loss convinced GOP chairman Reince Priebus and other moderate GOP leaders that, yes, maybe it's time to spend serious time and dollars on expanding the party's voting base.

Fast forward to now: After last year's large Republican victories in low-turnout midterm congressional elections, Democrats are asking themselves a similar question to the one Republicans have raised about themselves: How can Andrew Jackson's and Franklin D. Roosevelt's fabled "party of labor" expand its outreach to its own largest bloc of demographic defectors, working-class whites?

Yes, despite having one of their own in the White House and demographic trends favoring Democrats in future electoral maps, the Dems face several minefields in the short run.

One, what happens to the black vote after President Barack Obama leaves the White House? African Americans are likely to vote heavily Democratic for the foreseeable future, but it doesn't take much of a shift in the size or partisan preferences of black voters to shift outcomes in the electoral map.

Two, will Democratic gains in presidential elections be offset by Republican gains in mid-terms? Democrats won the popular vote in five of the past six presidential elections, but surprisingly large GOP conquests in the 2010 and 2014 midterms show how more reliably and enthusiastically the Republican base turns out.

The GOP's 2006 "thumping," as President George W. Bush called it, resulted from unusual high anger over the Iraq war and the Bush administration's Hurricane Katrina response. Surprises like that show how democracy can keep politicians on their toes.

Three, Hillary Rodham Clinton looks strong in national polls but has a history of snatching defeat out of the jaws of victory. (See her 2008 contest versus a relatively unknown Illinois senator.) Once the lesser GOP lights are eliminated in the primaries, a Jeb Bush, Marco Rubio or even a fast-rising star like Scott Walker could give Clinton another nail-biter of a race.

Today's partisan racial divide took shape a half-century ago as the hard-won victories of the civil rights revolution coincided with the decline of high-paying, low-skill industrial jobs. As long-overdue opportunities opened up for women and minorities, they began to dry up for workers who lacked much education beyond high school.

Former Alabama Gov. George Wallace gave voice to blue-collar frustrations and middle-class resentments of "pointy-headed professors," the liberal "beatnik crowd" and Washington's "briefcase-totin' bureaucrats." Richard Nixon won the presidency in 1968 partly by positioning himself as a moderate, pragmatic alternative to Wallace's extremism in attracting what were called "white backlash" votes.

Where, many reasonably asked, were the affirmative action programs for white workers?

A new conservative voting majority replaced the once-dominant Democratic presidential coalition beginning in the late 1960s, as described by Thomas Byrne Edsall and Mary Edsall in their landmark 1992 book, "Chain Reaction: The Impact of Race, Rights and Taxes on American Politics."

The book helped to inform Bill Clinton's 1992 campaign, in which Clinton vowed to aid "the forgotten middle class" and "end welfare as we know it."

Two decades later, many Democrats still ask why so many working-class whites "vote against their economic interests?"

Blogging in The New York Times after November's elections, Tom Edsall said Democrats really should be asking themselves: "What has the Democratic Party done for these voters lately?"

Good question. As the Republicans' post-2012 autopsy found, working-class voters understand their interests. Obama's victory was helped not only by voters of color but also by working-class white voters who switched to Obama or didn't vote at all because of Romney's failures to connect with working-class interests.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It is important to ask why voters don't vote their economic interests. But I think the most important question in politics, regardless of race, creed or color, is simply, "Who's on my side?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton, Jeb Bush and the problem with baggage (The Hill)
By Niall Stanage and Amie Parnes
February 21, 2015
The Hill

Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush are dealing with the baggage of their political histories even before their 2016 campaigns officially begin.

For the former secretary of state, the new scrutiny of Clinton Foundation donors — especially foreign governments and wealthy non-U.S. citizens — is bringing back memories of Whitewater and the selling of the White House Lincoln Bedroom to political patrons.

Revelations about the Clinton Foundation's donor list caused The New York Times to editorialize that someone needed "to reinstate the foundation's ban against foreign contributors, who might have matters of concern to bring before a future Clinton administration."

Jeb Bush's baggage is comprised of the decisions made by his father and his older brother during their years in the White House, particularly President George W. Bush's 2003 invasion of Iraq.
Much attention was given to Jeb Bush's speech this week in Chicago in which he paid due deference to his father and older brother's achievements but added, "I am my own man." In a question-and-answer session that immediately followed the speech, he also acknowledged that "there were mistakes made in Iraq, for sure."

The focus on their histories, and that of their families, is enough to make the assumed frontrunners dwell on William Faulkner's famous words, "the past is never dead. It's not even past."

Still, some observers argue that, just as the duo's decades in the public eye have given them records on which they can be attacked, it has also tempered them so they are better able to withstand the heat.

Tony Fratto, who served as deputy press secretary to President George W. Bush, said that while people will be interested in the pasts of Clinton and Jeb Bush, "they're both skilled in getting people to see past that."

"The difference with [Bush and Clinton] is that they've got a lot of experience in having to answer these types of questions, having to deal with unfortunate situations," Fratto added. "They have what you might not expect from other candidates and campaigns who will overreact, try to hide it, not have a clear answer. With both of these candidates, they've been around it for so long and know how to deal with these situations."

Terry Shumaker, a former U.S. ambassador who co-chaired Bill Clinton's New Hampshire campaigns and is involved in Ready for Hillary in the Granite State, argued it was unrealistic to expect anyone who can entertain realistic hopes of entering the White House to have lived a blank, unblemished life.

"When people get to the high level of running for president, they've lived interesting, complicated lives in the private and public sectors and have done a lot. But I think voters are going to look beyond that stuff. They're more interested in who's going to be the best president. Elections are about the future — not the present or the past."

Still, there are other experts who do not believe things will be quite that simple — especially when the protagonists are from families that arouse such high emotions, even within their own parties.

Referring to this week's Clinton Foundation flap, Boston University professor Tobe Berkovitz asserted that "what all of this does is reinforce the way that the Clintons, though they are beloved by many people in the [Democratic] Party, also have an incredibly checkered history which despite their best efforts, constantly re-raises its head."

Bill Clinton, of course, also has more personal peccadilloes, notably his affair with Monica Lewinsky while in the White House. Lewinsky has re-emerged on the public stage of late as an anti-bullying advocate.

The consensus appears to be that Lewinsky has little capacity to cause the Clintons any further damage. One Clinton ally even went so far as expressing the hope that opponents would raise the issue, on the basis that such a tactic was bound to backfire. "Please, please, throw me in that briar patch," the ally said.

When it comes to more strictly political matters, Berkovitz argued that Clinton had a disadvantage over Bush in dealing with the past.

By the nature of being first lady, and a very politically engaged one, she was a genuine player in the Clinton White House. For Bush, on the other hand, "his baggage is much more family baggage than his own. How can you blame Jeb Bush for Iraq? Or how can you blame him for the early 1990s recession? That's a real stretch."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cal Jillson, a political science professor at Southern Methodist University, took a different tack. He asserted that the time that has passed since Bill Clinton was in the White House has allowed the once-boiling partisan passions that surrounded him and his wife to cool to some degree.

Hillary Clinton, Jillson said, "at least has the benefit of 15 years of separation from the Clinton presidency, whereas Jeb Bush has a more immediate proximity to the George W. Bush presidency. That still has a rawness to it that the Clinton years no longer have."

Still, for both candidates — and for good or for bad — the past cannot be avoided.

"It's best to acknowledge it and not make it go away," said Fratto. "The best way is to try and deal with it directly."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush and Clinton's generation game (The Sunday Business Post)
February 22, 2015
The Sunday Business Post

The names on the ballot in the 2016 US presidential election might well be the same ones that appeared almost a quarter of a century before. The last names, that is.

Back in 1992, Democrat Bill Clinton defeated Republican George HW Bush, then the sitting president. Next year, Hillary Clinton is the heavy favourite to win the Democratic nomination. The Republican field will be more competitive, but Jeb Bush – son of HW, and younger brother of George "Dubya" Bush – is the early frontrunner.

The prospect of another Clinton-Bush election says a lot about the state of US politics – and most of it isn't good. It seems only to confirm the suspicions of those who insist that the choices for US voters are too limited, the importance of money too suffocating, and the game suspiciously close to being rigged.

To merely note the 1992 precedent is to underestimate the extent to which the two families are fixtures on the landscape. Consider this, instead: with the sole exception of 2012, the last presidential election in which no Bush or Clinton played a key role was in 1976.

The record runs as follows. George HW Bush was Ronald Reagan's vice-presidential running mate in 1980 and 1984. He then won the presidency in 1988. Bill Clinton, having defeated Bush in 1992, was re-elected in 1996. He was succeeded by George W Bush in 2000, who won a second term in 2004. In 2008, Hillary Clinton was vanquished by Barack Obama after an epic battle within the Democratic Party.

And now here we go again.

It's true that neither Clinton nor Bush has officially declared her or his candidacy. But that is only a technicality at this stage. The fact that Clinton is planning yet another tilt at the presidency is the worst-kept secret in Washington DC. Political newspapers and websites are full of reports about the likely site of her campaign headquarters (among the current favourites: Brooklyn, New York) and the identities of the Beltway insiders who will be at the helm of her campaign.

There had been more doubt about whether Jeb Bush would run in 2016, but it is fast disappearing. He stole a march on potential rivals by announcing in mid-December that he was "actively exploring" a presidential candidacy.

Candidates who "actively explore" such a possibility and then decide against it are as rare as hen's teeth.

Just last week, Bush made a major speech distancing himself from his elder brother's decision to invade Iraq. "I am my own man," he insisted. In a question-and-answer session, he acknowledged that "there were mistakes made in Iraq, for sure".

The status of Clinton and Bush as frontrunners in their respective parties has little to do with any unique abilities they possess, however. Were either of them to have a different last name, how would they be seen?

Bush's two terms as Florida governor were proficient but hardly brilliant. Much the same can be said of Clinton's one-and-a-bit terms as a senator representing New York.

Bush's last name is a millstone overseas. Clinton's is an asset, but a deceptive one. In many places, including Ireland, it leads people to vastly overestimate her political skills. It's worth remembering that her main endeavours in more than three decades on the national stage have been to try to reform healthcare during her husband's presidency (she failed); to try to win the Democratic Party's presidential nomination in 2008 (holding vast advantages, she lost); and to serve as Obama's Secretary of State, a tenure which went undistinguished by a single major accomplishment.

So what do Clinton and Bush have going for them aside from fame? In a word: money. They're able to take advantage of the fundraising networks that have served their respective families for so many years, they can rake in bucketloads of the stuff.

Left-wing Democrats would love Clinton to face a challenge from her liberal flank in the shape of Elizabeth Warren or Bernie Sanders, two senators who are among the fiercest critics of Wall Street. But either one would likely be buried under an avalanche of Clinton cash.

Among Republicans, religious evangelicals hold former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee in high regard. But he is an economic populist whose appeal to the richest donors among his party's followers is cripplingly limited.

None of this is to say that a Clinton-Bush choice would be no choice at all. There are legitimate differences in their views. But they hardly span the ideological gamut, to put it mildly.

This, in turn, means that the broader, structural problems of US politics and society – wage stagnation, grotesque income inequality, and the creeping failure of the body politic itself to function – are unlikely to be addressed in any fundamental way, whatever the outcome of such an election.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Can a candidate win without the advantages of a Bush or a Clinton? Yes. The current president – a black man, raised by a single mother — attests to that. But our familiarity with Obama has dulled us to just how exceptional, in the literal sense of that word, he is.

So settle in for another long and brutal presidential election campaign. But remember, too, the way in which the wealthiest and most familiar voices shut so many others out.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Peace negotiator to ease into role as key Jeb aide (The Sunday Times)
By Toby Harnden
February 22, 2015
The Sunday Times

SHE is a Harvard professor with maroon hair, she was a key player in Northern Ireland peace talks for more than a decade and she was once nearly killed in a rocket attack in Baghdad.

Now Meghan O'Sullivan is in line to take on one of the most potentially influential foreign policy jobs in the world as a top adviser to Jeb Bush, the Republican frontrunner for the White House in 2016.

Her expected role as the former Florida governor's senior foreign policy aide seems to encapsulate his desire to draw on the cautious pragmatism of his father's approach to the world without renouncing the actions of his brother. While she was an undergraduate at Georgetown University, O'Sullivan, now 45, earned extra money by modelling for Washington department stores. She later took a doctorate in politics at David Cameron's alma mater of Brasenose College, Oxford.

As President George W Bush's lead adviser on Iraq, she was an architect of the "surge" strategy that, temporarily at least, snatched victory from the jaws of defeat in 2007. She is also closely associated with the "realist" school of foreign policy epitomised by President George Bush Sr.

Her mentor Richard Haass, the former US special envoy for Northern Ireland, has been critical of the so-called "neoconservative" faction that championed the Iraq invasion.

O'Sullivan was one of 21 foreign policy advisers named by Jeb Bush last week. Of those, 19 had served under his brother, the 43rd American president, and six under his father, the 41st. Only two of the advisers have never worked for a Bush administration.

If she is confirmed in the top post, O'Sullivan will be in charge of leading the attack on Hillary Clinton, the secretary of state for President Barack Obama's first term.

In Chicago last week Bush used his first major foreign policy speech of the 2016 campaign to declare: "I love my father and my brother. I admire their service to the nation and the difficult decisions they had to make. But I am my own man."

That statement was a recognition of the difficulty he will have in dealing with the Bush legacy. While the family name is a huge boost in raising money and attracting establishment support, his advisers concede that it could turn off centrist voters and make him appear to be a figure from the past.

Rick Wilson, a veteran Florida political consultant who says he is "an old Bush guy", said: "There's probably too much amateur psychology going on about the Bush family — is Jeb W, or is he '41'? "Jeb was shaped by experiences that did not occur in the rest of the Bush family. His time in Latin America, marrying Columba [his Mexican wife] — all these things are of a different flavour. He's lived all over the place. He switches between English and Spanish instantaneously. He's very cosmopolitan."

A former Bush administration adviser, who has worked closely with O'Sullivan, said: "Jeb Bush didn't say much in Chicago. He gave some broad critiques of the Obama administration foreign policy, which is not hard to do.

"People take cues from his demeanour that he might be leaning more towards the conception of the Bush One foreign policy, but demeanour is not a good indicator of doctrine."

O'Sullivan, he said, would be a major asset to Bush, although her reserved and serious manner might not be best suited to a hard-fought campaign: "She's not a bomb thrower. She doesn't fit neatly into the realist versus neoconservative box.

"When I've heard her give advice it is always backed up by deep knowledge of what's happening on the ground. That's not always the case with advisers and it's a great advantage."

O'Sullivan narrowly escaped injury in October 2003 when an insurgent rocket hit her hotel in Baghdad, killing a lieutenant colonel. The blast jammed O'Sullivan's door shut and she escaped by clambering onto a ledge outside her 10thfloor window.

Long viewed as an enigmatic figure in Washington, O'Sullivan has always been instantly noticeable in foreign policy circles because of her practice for at least the past 15 years of dyeing her hair red.

That has prompted comparisons with a red-haired Irish-American on the other side of the political aisle: Samantha Power, Obama's ambassador to the United Nations. But while Power is passionate and forthright, O'Sullivan tends to stay in the background.

The job of top foreign policy adviser tends to lead to a major position in government if the candidate wins the White House.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Condoleezza Rice, the former secretary of state, and Susan Rice, Obama's national security adviser, were both lead foreign policy advisers on campaigns.

If Bush is to win his party's nomination and defeat Clinton, however, he will have to come to terms with the doubleedged sword of his family name — a problem Clinton herself would also face, of course.

Wilson said: "Is it like Voldemort [the Harry Potter villain] to Democrats, the one word they can use to stoke up their ageing hippie base with one more round of Bush hatred? That's a real question."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton vs. Bush gives me the deja vu blues (Chicago Sun-Times)
By Steve 20, Huntley
February 2015
Chicago Sun-Times

Dynastic politics can be complicated. Obviously, it offers vast benefits in name recognition, a built-in network of supporters and invaluable experience in the nitty gritty of politics. But it has its downsides. Jeb Bush keeps having to explain how he's different from the previous two Bush presidents. And Hillary Clinton finds herself mired in a conflict-of-interest controversy over a family foundation that sucked in $2 billion in donations from heavy hitters domestic and foreign who crave influence in Washington.

OPINION

Dynastic political families aren't alien to America. Think of the Adams, Harrisons, Roosevelts and Kennedys. What is new is the possibility of a clash of two dynasties for president, as could happen in 2016 if Bush and Clinton are the Republican and Democrat nominees.

Neither has faced the issue of dynasty head on. Bush has referred to it, saying, for instance, that he confronts an "interesting challenge." Or he differentiates himself from Presidents George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush as he did the other day at the Chicago Council on Global Affairs: "I am my own man, and my views are shaped by my own thinking and own experiences."

But that doesn't address the question of why Americans should vote for a family dynasty. Likely he doesn't have an answer to that. Clinton, wife of former President Bill Clinton, probably doesn't have an answer other than she offers the best hope of electing the first woman president.

Though Bush the father had many successes in the White House, he was brought down by a revolt among the party's conservative base over a tax increase he promised would never happen and an economic downturn. President Bush the son has seen the stock in his presidency rise a bit in recent years, but he is remembered for the Iraq war and the disastrous aftermath. That his military surge left Iraq largely stabilized is mostly lost in the crisis of the Islamic State.

Jeb Bush is haunted by that history. With foreign policy looming as a top tier issue in 2016, he will only be pressed more and more about the Iraq war. How quickly and how well he can separate himself will be a major test of whether he can secure the GOP nomination and then convince voters that the nation needs a third Bush president.

Clinton seems all but assured of the Democrat nomination. Still, take away the history-making prospect of a female chief executive, and there's not much to get excited about in a Clinton dynasty.

First lady is neither an appointed nor elective office (despite the Clinton 1992 campaign two-for-one theme). Who remembers anything about her U.S. Senate term — other than her vote for the Iraq war? Her time as secretary of state was mostly distinguished by miles traveled — activity, not accomplishment, as possible GOP presidential candidate and former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina put it. Clinton's book tour for her "Hard Choices" was a flop, noted for blunders, like her claim that her family left the White House "dead broke."

Now come disclosures of mega-donations from big corporations and foreign countries and families to the Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation. Everyone proclaims innocence and lofty charitable motives, but it smells like influence peddling and currying of favors. And the foundation looks like a home for Clinton staff between campaigns. For example, the Wall Street Journal reports that a Clinton campaign fundraiser in 2008 is back at that job for 2016 after working in the intervening years for the foundation. Ironies abound, such as a foundation dedicated to women's rights taking millions from Saudi Arabia, which doesn't permit women to drive a car.

Clinton vs Bush.

Any votes for a fresh face in 2016?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Belfer Center for Science and International Affairs" <info@belfercenter.hks.harvard.edu>
To:	podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date:	1/28/2016 1:00:10 PM
Subject:	Introducing "Office Hours"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Gregory Rosalsky" <grosalsky@progressivemediausa.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 5/23/2008 5:33:34 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 05/23/08

Main Topics: McCain Medical Records, Pastor Disaster, Biden Interviews

Summary of Shift: John McCain released his medical records today. Reportedly the Obama and Clinton campaigns are discussing VP possibilities. 15 GOP senators broke with Bush yesterday and helped to pass the war-funding bill that includes billions for veterans' aid. The House Judiciary Committee subpoenaed Karl Rove. Rove's lawyer says he will not testify due to instructions from the White House.

Also in the news, a Texas court ruled the state lacked authority to seize the children of polygamists. Myanmar is now letting in international aid workers. Wildfires rage in California, a tornado ravaged Colorado, and the death toll of the Chinese earthquake is now more than 80,000.

Highlights:

1) McCain's medical records released
a. CNN's Dr. Sanjay Gupta raises questions about McCain's bouts with cancer
b. Dr. Gupta Goes Over Early AP Reports From McCain's Health Records: Skin Lesions, Cell Carcinoma, Colon Polyps, Vertigo, Cholesterol Problems, Arthritis and Ear Wax
c. CBS gives positive coverage for McCain campaign, says age should not be a factor
2) McCain's Pastor Disaster
a. David Brody: "A quick Google search would've helped the McCain campaign clearly"
b. Brian Todd: McCain rejects an endorsement "once seen as critical to his conservative credentials"
c. Chuck Todd: McCain's problems with Hagee and Parsley are symptomatic of "inexperience of the McCain campaign dealing with evangelicals"
d. "Early Show" mentions McCain "rejected" the endorsement of Hagee and Parsley
e. MSNBC plays footage of Hagee and Parsley controversial comments
3) Joe Biden does rounds on morning shows
a. On CNN, "Bush-McCain saber rattling" is "self-defeating"
b. On "Today Show", says we're "weaker" under Bush and mentions McCain did not support US action in the Balkans
c. On "Good Morning Joe", defends Obama's foreign policy with historical examples and spells out a more rational Iran policy
d. Biden is disappointed that McCain on the GI Bill is resorting to "ad hominem" attacks against Obama, says "this whole campaign in drifting toward a place I'm not comfortable with"
4) McCain vs. Obama on the GI Bill, Jewish outreach, and age

Clips:

Highlight #1

Dr. Sanjay Gupta Highlights Lack of Information about McCain's Bouts With Cancer: "In McCain's case they kept cutting and removing and we don't know why"(CNN 05/23/08 7:02am)

SANJAY GUPTA: […] One of the big things that has happened since he last released his records is his diagnosis of melanoma. That's something that a lot of people have paid attention to. They've seen the scars on the left side of his face, they're pretty extensive. The question has been, what exactly do those scars mean? We take a look.

DR. KEITH DELMAN: It looks to me as if he had surgery on the left side of his temple for this, what we know is his melanoma. What happens is they take off the melanoma, which is not only the melanoma but the area of normal tissue around that. So it can be a pretty sizeable defect that they take off there. And then to take out the area in the face and the lymph nodes there, they took out part of his paradig gland which sits right in front of the ear, just along the ear. Similar to an incision you would have for a facelift, but not quite as pretty.

GUPTA: As a surgical oncologist that strikes you as saying what?

DELMAN: That's a little bit aggressive.

GUPTA: It didn't all fit. Make no mistake, melanoma is malignant cancer but why would the doctors aggressive with McCain's operation? Was the cancer more extensive than we've been told or was it just an abundance of caution?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

DELMAN: You'd have to speculate that perhaps they were aggressive because it was Senator McCain.

GUPTA: […] But here is where surgeons typically stop. In McCain's case they kept cutting and removing and we don't know why.

Dr. Gupta Goes Over Early AP Reports From McCain's Health Records: Skin Lesions, Cell Carinoma, Colon Polyps, Vertigo, Cholesterol Problems, Arthritis and Ear Wax (CNN 05/23/08 8:01am)

SANJAY GUPTA: [visual] Precancerous skin lesions frequently removed. Early-stage Squamous Cell Carcinoma removed: Feb. 2008, Benign colon polyps removed: March 2008.

GUPTA: Also as I mentioned before, people are gonna be concerned about his heart. [visual] He was on a treadmill, sometime in the last 8 years for 10 minutes and he was able to tolerate that well as you may know, a lot of viewers know that 10 minutes is sort of the gold standard for checking someone's heart. He has a good cholesterol level, although not optimal. He was on a medication known as Vitorin. That medication came under some criticism; he has now switched over to Cymbastat. He also complained of these episodes of dizziness, John. […]

JOHN ROBERTS: […] He's suffering degenerative arthritis from the war injuries that he received during his captivity?

GUPTA: Yeah, that's right. They talk about his joints, his shoulders, I think his hip as well. And I think, at least according to his doctors, this might mean in the future at some point, he might need a joint replacement. You know, again, which is not uncommon for someone of his age, even without the degenerative problems from the war injuries.

ROBERTS: There's also a citation here about ear wax […]

CBS Gives Positive Coverage to McCain's Medical Records, Segment Says Age Should Not Be Factor (CBS 05/23/08 7:15am)
REPORTER: We have breaking news this morning. Republican presidential candidate John McCain has just released his medical records in an effort to put to rest any concerns that voters may have about his age and vitality [...]

JEFF GLOR: If voters pick John McCain in November, at 72 he'll be the oldest president elected to a first term. According to a CBS News/New York Times poll just 2% of Americans believe the best age for a president would be in his or her 70s. 20% say someone's 40s, and nearly half say 50s. Fair or not, John McCain knows this mentality presents a challenge.

JOHN MCCAIN: What should we be looking for in our next president? Certainly someone who is very very very old.

GLOR: To address concerns about his age, McCain's been using the model established by Ronald Reagan, elected to a second term at 73, humor.

FRANK LUNTZ: Ronald Reagan turned age from a negative to a positive against Walter Mondale, it changed the entire election.

RONALD REAGAN: I am not going to exploit for political purposes my opponent's youth and inexperience (laughter).

LUNTZ: The American people laughed and all of a sudden age wasn't an issue.

GLOR: And according to doctors it shouldn't be.

DR. BRENT RIDGE: The most threatening thing to John McCain as a president is the threat ageism and that's the belief that people hold that because of his age he won't make a good president and that's just not true.

GLOR: McCain has faced some medical challenges. The injuries he suffered in Vietnam left him unable to completely lift his arms. In 2000, he had surgery to remove a patch of skin from his lymphnods in his neck to battle stage two melanoma. But McCain's age is not the defining factor in his health.

DR. BRENT RIDGE: Someone who is 70 and might be actually healthier and aging better than who is 60 or even 50.

GLOR: What he means is that there's a difference between chronological age, which is just a number, and physiological age, essentially how well you're aging. Staying physically active, mentally engaged, and socially connected, those are the keys, all things McCain has clearly been doing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MCCAIN: And of course, my mother Roberta McCain.

GLOR: To assure voters he can well handle a four year term McCain points to his 96 year old mother's longevity. Strategists believe he'll need even more.

LUNTZ: John McCain's gonna need a line, he's gonna need a phrase that gets him through the challenge of age, turn it into an advantage. You've seen it all, you've done it all, and you've succeeded a lot more than you've failed.

GLOR: Ok now, more than a thousand pages of McCain's medical records, first previewed this morning show he has had no sign of melanoma since 2002, melanoma, blood pressure and weight are healthy, he has an occasional bout of dizziness when standing suddenly but repeated tests say it is harmless, and he takes a common medication for cholesterol. McCain's internist describes his patient as "considerably younger than his chronological age, based on his cardiovascular fitness."

Highlight #2

David Brody: "A quick Google search would've helped the McCain campaign clearly. John Hagee has been somewhat controversial in evangelical circles for awhile"
(CNN 05/23/08 7:51am)
JOHN ROBERTS: […] John McCain desperately needed people like Hagee and Rod Parsley to shore him up in places like Texas, courting the Christian conservative vote there but I guess he found out that endorsements can come back to bite him.

DAVID BRODY: Well, at times for sure. This was a vetting process error, John. I mean a quick Google search would've helped the McCain campaign clearly. I mean John Hagee has been somewhat controversial in evangelical circles for awhile and so that's been out there. This goes to the larger issue, John, which is this tap dance that John McCain needs to do with evangelicals. I mean he desperately wants the evangelical support. He's not gonna pander to get it but he wants evangelical leaders out there and so John Hagee it seemed at the time to be a perfect fit. […]

Brian Todd: McCain rejects an endorsement "once seen as critical to his conservative credentials" (CNN 05/23/08 6:32am)
JOHN ROBERTS: He had once accepted their backing in a bid to win support from religious conservatives. But McCain is now rejecting the endorsement of Pastor John Hagee over remarks he made about the holocaust as well as the backing of Rod Parsley who called Islam 'inherently violent.'

BRIAN TODD: John McCain now rejects an endorsement that was once seen as critical to his conservative credentials.

[video of Hagee's endorsement]

TODD: McCain's camp tell us that when Hagee endorsed McCain in February, McCain was not aware of remarks Hagee had made in a sermon years earlier. […]

[audio and visual of Hagee's hunters quote]

TODD: […] But McCain has another pastor problem.

[video of Parsley]

TODD: Pastor Parsley another popular televangelist who also endorsed McCain in February.

UNNAMED PERSON: Well, it was shocking to hear that Senator McCain would associate himself with someone who holds such bigoted views against Muslims and Islam.

Chuck Todd: McCain's Problems with Hagee and Parsley Symptomatic of "Inexperience of the McCain Campaign in Dealing with Evangelicals" (MSNBC 05/23/08 9:20am)
CHUCK TODD: [...] I think what you see with this McCain and Hagee, and also the dumping of this Rod Parsley person from Ohio, that this was the inexperience of the McCain campaign in dealing with evangelicals. This has not been a constituency they've tried to woo in the past. Basically at the end of the nomination fight, where he was finally getting the primary campaign wrapped up. He wanted to try to reach out that that constituency and it seems as if they didn't vet these guys [...]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The Early Show" Mentions McCain "Rejected" the Support of Hagee and Parsley for Extremist Statements (CBS 05/23/08 7:00am)
CHRIS RAGEE: Once again a candidate is distancing himself from the words of a pastor. Texas preacher John Hagee endorsed John McCain three months ago but McCain rejected the endorsement yesterday after an audio recording surfaced in which Hagee said God sent Adolf Hitler to help Jews reach the promise land.

JOHN MCCAIN: I just think that the statement is crazy and unacceptable. I've received their endorsement which did not mean that I endorsed their views.

RAGEE: McCain also rejected the support of Ohio evangelist Rod Parsley who called Islam 'inherently violent.'

MSNBC Plays Footage of Hagee and Parsley Controversial Comments (MSNBC 05/23/08 9:50am)
MIKA BRZEZINSKI: John McCain now rejecting the endorsements of two influential priests, preachers. The first, evangelical Pastor Hagee whose made controversial remarks, to say the least, about Catholics and Katrina victims. But his comments about Hitler and Jews were the straw that broke the camel's back. The second, Rod Parsley, an Ohio Preacher who made incendiary comments about Islam. Take a listen to both.

[audio of Hagee]

[video of Parsley]

BRZEZINSKI: Hmmm, not good. Repudiating these comments of both men, McCain also tried to make a clear distinction between his Pastor problems and Barack Obama's relationship with Reverend Wright.

[video of McCain]

Highlight #3
Biden: 'The Bush-McCain saber rattling is the most self-defeating policy imaginable' (CNN 05/23/08 7:25am)
JOE BIDEN: [visual of quote] The Bush-McCain saber rattling is the most self-defeating policy imaginable. It achieves nothing.

BIDEN: This has been the single most ineffectual, incompetent administration in the conduct of foreign policy in modern history. […]

JOHN ROBERTS: Senator we just got this statement in from the McCain campaign and they claim that your "missing the point about the unconditional summit saying the actual issue is that the office of the President of the United States should lend its prestige and legitimacy to Ahmadinejad, saying 'when a tyrant or dictator is afforded the promotion of an equal footing of unconditional summit with the President of the United States, those bad actors are emboldened and it threatens the security of the United States and our allies.' What do you say?

BIDEN: […] The lack of the sophistication on the part of Republicans of not realizing that Ahmadinejad does not control the security of the apparatus in Iran, it is theocracy. […] So the whole notion is that they don't even know what we're talking about. […] It does not respond to whether the [GI] bill is good. It takes on a cheap shot on whether or not Obama, who is 40 years younger than John, whether he served in the military.

On "Good Morning Joe", Defends Obama's Foreign Policy with Historical Examples and Spells Out a More Rational Iran Policy (MSNBC 05/23/08 8:00am)
MIKA BRZEZINSKI:[...] Is Barack Obama's foreign policy possibly undermining to our safety in the world?

JOE BIDEN: Absolutely not. Look, one of the reasons I responded to my friend Joe, is I'm going to respond no matter who the nominee is because I refuse to sit back like we did in 2000 and 2004. This administration is the worst administration in American foreign policy and modern history, maybe ever. The idea that they are competent to continue to conduct our foreign policy, to make us more secure, and make Israel more secure is preposterous [...] Can you imagine Franklin Roosevelt, can you imagine President Truman, can you imagine President Kennedy conducting the kind of policy this outfit has? You remember, during the Vietnam War, while China was supplying North Vietnam with weapons killing Americans and help, President Nixon sat down with Mao. Remember, President Reagan sat down with President Gorbachev without any freeze on the nuclear weapons system. This president of the United States had his people sit down with Libya, Momar Kadafi, a terrorist and cut a deal. This president Bush is writing letters, Dear Mr. Chairman Kim Jong Ill, who makes

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Amhadijhad look like a much lesser threat. This is ridiculous.
[...]
BIDEN: [...] You know as well as I to, that our options relative to Iran now are relatively limited, in terms of the military, and our options in terms of sanctions are limited without getting both Russia, the European Union, and China into the deal. And one of the reasons I think we have to make it clear we're prepared to the leadership, is we have to demonstrate to Russia, to Europe [...] and to China we were willing to go the extra mile. So they can't look back at us and sat we're the problem. Because the last place we want to be Pat is them continuing to march, no one with us, and our only option being war and us not being able to conduct that war while we have a 140,00 people tied down in war. So it requires a smarter, tougher policy [...]

On "Today Show", Defends Obama, Says We're "Weaker" Under Bush, and Mentions McCain Opposed Action in the Balkans (NBC 05/23/08 7:20am)
MATT LAUER: Barack Obama has taken a lot of heat from John McCain for his willingness to meet with and talk to America's adversaries and engage them. Now a former presidential rival, fellow Democratic Senator Joseph Biden is coming to Obama's defense today with an Op-Ed piece in the Wall Street Journal. Senator good morning, nice to see you.

JOE BIDEN: Good morning Matt [...]

LAUER: This issue seems like it's gonna be front and center in the fall election for a couple of reasons. One it seems to draw a line between perceived strength and weakness and it also seems to draw a line between perceived change and the politics of the past. By coming to Senator Obama's defense in this Op-Ed piece are you admitting that he is somewhat vulnerable on this issue?

BIDEN: No, what I'm saying is I'm sick and tired of Republicans characterizing Democrats generally as well as Barack and Hillary as being weak on national security. The truth is we've never been weaker in the last 100 years, in terms of our position in the world than under this administration. And it's not, they talk about 'freedom on the march in the Middle East', well it's Iran on the march in the middle east. I've never seen a time, [with] the seven presidents I've been with, when America 's been less respected around the world and has less leverage. And the idea that we sit there and let this President and my friend John McCain characterize us as "weak" is just preposterous.

LAUER: And your friend Joe Lieberman, by the way, in an op-ed piece the day before in the Wall Street Journal, I think you're referring to some of that [...] His argument basically Senator, is that the Democratic Party itself somewhere in the late 1960s became weak on National Security [...] Now as we look at the upcoming election, particularly between a war hero and Barack Obama, do you think that's gonna be a major problem Democrats?

BIDEN: Well I think that's what they're gonna try to revive. There's truth to that. I ran in 1972 as a young 29 year old guy who won a Senate seat, being the guy who was viewed as hawk because I didn't join in that mantra. It was Bill Clinton, and I might say me pushing it, saying that you had to go to war in the Balkans to end genocide. It was John McCain, initially saying 'no, no, no, no, we can't do that.' The Republicans voting 'no, no, we can't do anything, we don't have the power to do that.'

LAUER: Why than Senator the perception? If you look at the history of polls taken in this country over the last 20 years or so, voters tend to rate the Republicans higher on issues like national security and strength abroad than they do Democrats. Why?

BIDEN: No, I know they do Matt and that's why we've got to fight back [...]

Biden Disappointed that McCain on GI Bill is Resorting to "Ad Hominem" Attacks Against Obama, Says "This Whole Campaign is Drifting Toward a Place I'm Not Comfortable With" (MSNBC 05/23/08 8:00am)
WILLIE GEIST: Senator I want to ask you about something we witness yesterday between Barack Obama and John McCain. Barack Obama there on the floor of the Senate criticizing Senator McCain for not backing this, the bill that Jim Webb is co-sponsoring, the GI Bill. I want you to listen to John McCain's response to Barack Obama, I want to hear your reaction.

JOHN MCCAIN: I believe that I have earned the right to speak out on veterans issues. As a matter of fact, I've received the highest award from literally every veterans' organization in America. I don't know if the American people will judge Senator Obama, as to whether he has military experience or not, but I think they may judge him as to whether he has experience and knowledge to make the kind of judgment necessary to care for our veterans.

GEIST: Senator, so essentially Barack Obama has questioned John McCain for not backing up this bill. How do you see these two guys coming down on this?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BIDEN: Well look. John's a. This is tough for me. Because John's been my friend for 35 years. Umm, and I'm disappointed because you know there's a , as you all know, there's a difference between an ad hominem argument and a logical response. A logical fallacy is an ad hominem argument and that's basically what John engaged in [...] It's not right, it's not fair. John McCain does have every single right in the world to be able to say he thinks he knows what's best for veterans. But to make the argument, that because he's a national hero, because he was a veteran, that he knows it's not necessary to provide for these college scholarships [...] This whole campaign seems to be drifting toward a place that I'm not comfortable with, in terms of how they're gonna respond to Barack.

Highlight #4

Local News Highlights McCain vs. Obama on the GI Bill, Jewish Outreach, and Age (NBC-WRC-DC 05/23/08 6:30am)
BROOKE HEART: John McCain and Barack Obama competed for veterans' attention ahead of this memorial day weekend. It seems bound to kick off summer and a hot political season too [...] Today John McCain looks to put questions about his age and health to rest. In Sacramento the 71 year old joked about age and his rival.

JOHN MCCAIN: Senator Obama, who I admire and respect Senator Obama, for a young man with very little experience he's done very well.

HART: McCain's comments masted a day of sharp barbs, starting with Barack Obama on the Senate Floor.

BARACK OBAMA: But I can't understand why he would line up behind the president in his opposition to this GI Bill.

HART: The bill to give education benefits to veterans passed, despite warnings it will thin the ranks of the military.

MCCAIN: I don't need anybody to tell me about what veterans needs, I know them.

HART: The two battled on another front too, courting Jewish voters[...]McCain did damage control too, after more statements surfaced from the evangelist who endorsed him, John Hagee on Hitler as a Hunter.

HAGEE: And they the hunter shall hunt them, that would be the Jews. '

HART: It was enough for McCain to renounce Hagee's endorsement [...]

--
Gregory E. Rosalsky
Progressive Media USA
202-609-7691 (office)
707-484-3796 (cell)
GRosalsky@progressivemediausa.org
--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	5/23/2015 3:42:15 AM
Subject:	H4A News Clips 5.23.15
Attachments:	H4A 5.23.15 Clips.docx

H4A Press Clips

May 23, 2015

SUMMARY OF TODAY'S NEWS

Yesterday Hillary Clinton was in New Hampshire to speak about small business and community banks. She criticized congressional Republicans and presidential hopefuls for their opposition to Export-Import Bank, saying Friday that their priorities are "absolutely backwards" when it comes to helping Americans workers and businesses.

The State Department released 300 emails that Hillary Clinton sent and receiv ed when she was secretary of state. The emails are the first tranche of many that will be released by the State Department ov er the next year. The news outlets covered the emails briefly and with little speculation, only noting that the GOP would not find a "smoking gun" in this release of emails.

LAST NIGHTS EVENING NEWS

ABC had a brief report on the State Department has released part of HRC's emails, one has been classified. The emails show that HRC nev er sent classified information, but one email contains redacted information. Many of the emails are mundane and Republicans hav e yet to point to a smoking gun.

CBS aired a two minute report on the release of almost 300 of HRC's emails dealing with Benghazi on Friday; reported there were no major revelations in the emails; cuts to Nancy Cordes' report; said the emails verify the confusion surrounding the aftermath of the Benghazi attacks; reported on both of the emails from Sidney Blumenthal that came after the attacks; reported many of the emails were heavily redacted including one about rev ised TPs that wrongly claimed the Benghazi attacks were spontaneous.

NBC also included a report on the State Department emails including much of the same information; used footage of HRC's answer at her press conference in New Hampshire on Friday about the classified email; reported the release included what may have been the last email HRC saw from Christopher Stevens; reported that HRC said she did not see Stevens' emails where he warned of increased v iolence; reported the emails released show how concerned HRC's team was about how she was portrayed and the political fallout from misleading talking points after the Benghazi attack.

SUMMARY OF TODAY'S NEWS..... 1
LAST NIGHTS EVENING NEWS..... 1
TODAY'S KEY STORIES..... 4

Hillary Clinton Says GOP Hopefuls Are Afraid to 'Stand Up to the Tea Party and Talk Radio' // Bloomberg // Jennifer Epstein - May 22, 2015..... 4

Clinton backs small business // Union Leader // Jason Schreiber - May 22, 2015..... 5

Sorry, GOP. There's No Smoking Gun In Hillary Clinton's Benghazi Emails // Daily Beast // Tim Mok - May 22, 2015..... 7

Two Actual Everyday Americans Walk Into A Hillary Clinton Event…..... 11

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

…and get crushed. The challenges of the "everyday" campaign. // Buzzfeed // Ruby Cramer – May 22, 2015 11

SOCIAL MEDIA..... 13

Jay Rosen (5/22/2015;6:45 AM): In this dispatch from the campaign trail with HRC and reporters I defy you to find any point to the exercise..... 13

Jennifer Epstein (5/22/2015; 2:07PM): "There is no role whatsoever for American soldiers on the ground to go back" to Iraq except as trainers/advisers, Clinton says in NH"..... 13

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 13

State Department Releases Hillary Clinton Emails // NYT // Michael S. Schmidt – May 22, 2015.. 13

Hillary Discussed Speculation About Her Health With Aides In Emails // Daily Caller // ALEX PAPPAS // May 22, 2015..... 14

Clinton emails silent on deadly danger facing Americans in Benghazi // Washington Examiner // BYRON YORK - MAY 22, 2015..... 14

First batch of Hillary's State Department emails released // Politico // LAUREN FRENCH, JOSH GERSTEIN and BRYAN BENDER – May 22, 2015..... 16

Clinton's Benghazi emails show correspondence with adviser // Concord Monitor // Lisa Lerer - May 22, 2015..... 17

Another day of damaging disclosures for Hillary // Fox News // Chris Stirewait - May 22, 2015..... 18

Blumenthal's hidden hand in Hillary's State Department // Washington Examiner // Editorial Board - May 22, 2015..... 18

Clinton Foundation Silent on Blumenthal's Exit Date // Washington Free Bacon // Alana Goodman - May 22, 2015..... 19

Hillary Clinton's Surprisingly Effective Campaign // The Atlantic // PETER BEINART - MAY 22, 2015 21

On policy, Clinton plays it safe : With broad rhetoric but risk-averse stances, she tilts left without moving very far. // Politico //ANNIE KARNI – May 22, 2015..... 22

Clinton Foundation muscles the media // AP // Jake Tapper - May 22, 2015..... 25

Hillary Clinton's dark whisperer is back // Politico // Glenn Thrush - May 22, 2015..... 28

Clinton's 'Secret' Email Accounts // Fact Check // Eugene Kiely - May 22, 2015..... 31

Clinton N.H. trip interrupted by Benghazi e-mail release // Boston Globe // James Pindell - May 22, 2015 36

Insiders: Benghazi testimony works to Hillary's advantage // Politico // Katie Glueck - May 22, 2015 37

Clinton emails show concern about image after Benghazi // Reuters // Mark Hosenball and Alistar Bell - May 22, 2015..... 40

First Batch of Hillary Clinton's Emails on Libya Made Public // NBC News // CARRIE DANN - May 22, 2015 42

Clinton says she's not running for a 'third term' of her husband or Obama // WaPo // Robert Costa - May 22, 2015..... 43

Hillary Clinton defends emails, slams GOP's small business agenda // MSNBC // Alex Seitz - Wald - May 22, 2015..... 43

In a War-Torn Middle East, Clinton's Legacy in Tunisia Is a Bit Brighter // Newsweek // Emily Cadei - May 22, 2015..... 45

Hillary Clinton Takes It to the People // US News // David Cantanese - May 22, 2015..... 47

Hillary Clinton Aims to Capture the Cool // NYT // Jason Horowitz - May 22, 2015..... 50

Clinton campaigning in a bubble, largely isolated from real people // McClatchy // Anita Kumar - May 21, 2015..... 53

Journalists' contributions to Clinton Foundation raise credibility questions // Baltimore Sun // Jules Witcover - May 22, 2015..... 55

Clinton: GOP threatening small-business jobs // AP // Ken Thomas - May 22, 2015..... 57

Clinton's claim that it takes longer to start a business in the U.S. than in Canada or France // WaPo // Glenn Kessler- May 22, 2015..... 57

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Why Hillary Clinton Prefers to Talk About Community Banks // TIME // Sam Frizell - May 21, 2015 59

Hillary Clinton, Acutely Aware of Pitfalls, Avoids Press on Campaign Trail // NYT // Jason Horowitz - May 22, 2015..... 61

Hillary Keeps It Boring // Bloomberg // Margaret Carlson - May 22, 2015..... 64

Koch organization attacks Hillary on Ex-Im bank // Politico // Kenneth Vogel and Tarini Parti - May 22, 2015..... 66

GOP chairman: Hillary a 'natural cheerleader' for Export-Import Bank // The Hill // Kevin Cirill - May 22, 2015..... 67

Republican PAC calls on Clinton to take clear position on trade agreement // WMUR // John DiStaso - May 21, 2015..... 68

Clinton the leader in Granite State Facebook traffic // NH1 // Paul Steinhauser - May 22, 2015..... 69

Hillary Clinton's scripted campaign is starting to make New Hampshire mad // Boston Globe // Nik DeCosta-Klipa -May 22, 2015..... 70

New Hampshire paper blasts Hillary Clinton campaign for lame conference call // WaPo // Erik Wemple - May 22, 2015..... 71

New York Times does its best to be a 'real opponent' to Hillary Clinton // Daily Kos // Laura Clawson - May 22, 2015..... 72

Prospect of Hillary Clinton-Marco Rubio Matchup Unnerves Democrats // NYT // Jeremy W. Peters - May 22, 2015..... 73

Hillary Clinton's Accomplishment Deficit // RCP // Jonah Goldberg - May 22, 2015..... 76

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 78

Clinton plants a flag in O'Malley's home state // Baltimore Sun //John Fritze - May22, 2015..... 78

O'Malley to campaign in Iowa hours after 2016 announcement // AP // Catherine Lucey - May 22, 2015 81

O'Malley has trips planned to Iowa and N.H. after 'special announcement' // WaPo // John Wagner - May 22, 2015..... 81

Some Iowa Democrats prefer Sanders over Clinton // Des Moines Register // Brianne Pfannenstiel - May 22, 2015..... 82

Presidential Election Campaigning Underway in Iowa // VOA // Kane Farabaugh -May 22, 2015.. 83

Prospect of Hillary Clinton-Marco Rubio Matchup Unnerves Democrats // NYT // Jeremy W. Peters - May 22, 2015..... 85

A Win for Progressives in Philadelphia // The Atlantic // Molly Ball - May 21, 2015..... 88

GOP..... 89

'Optimistic' Jeb Bush faces hard truths in New Hampshire swing // MSNBC // Benjy Sarlin - May 22, 2015 89

Jeb Bush's War on Gay Adoption // Daily Beast // Betsy Woodruff - May 22, 2015..... 92

Christie: Patriot Act debate is 'dangerous' // MSNBC // Jane C. Timm - May 22, 2015..... 96

Chris Christie Says the Difference Between Coverage of Him and Hillary Reveals Biased Media // IJRreview / Chris Enloe - May 22, 2015..... 98

Florida's Jewish voters a target for 2016 Republicans, but a near lock for Democrats // Tampa Bay News // Adam C. Smith and Kirby Wilson - May 22, 2015..... 98

TOP NEWS..... 102

DOMESTIC..... 103

Senate Vote Is a Victory for Obama on Trade, but a Tougher Test Awaits // NYT // Johnathan Weisman - May 22, 2015..... 103

Obama Set to Strengthen Federal Role in Clean Water Regulation // NYT // Coral Davenport -May 22, 2015 105

Wal-Mart urges meat suppliers to curb antibiotic use // Reuters // P.J. Huffstutter and Nathan Layne - May 22, 2015..... 107

INTERNATIONAL..... 109

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Islamic State loyalists claim Saudi mosque attack // AP // Abdullah Al-Shihri and Aya Batrawy - May 22, 2015..... 109

In heavily Catholic Ireland, voters to decide on same-sex marriage // LAT // Alexandra Zavis - May 22, 2015..... 111

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS..... 115

The Trigger-Happy Generation // WSJ // Peggy Noonan - May 22, 2015..... 115

Traders hoped for a more interesting Yellen, got same old // CNBC // Patti Domm - May 22, 2015 117

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Hillary Clinton Says GOP Hopefuls Are Afraid to 'Stand Up to the Tea Party and Talk Radio' // Bloomberg // Jennifer Epstein - May 22, 2015

As the State Department releases a batch of her e-mails, the Democratic front-runner takes aim at the right.

Hillary Clinton chided congressional Republicans and presidential hopefuls for their opposition to Export-Import Bank, saying Friday that their priorities are "absolutely backwards" when it comes to helping Americans workers and businesses.

"It is wrong that Republicans in Congress are trying to cut off this vital lifeline for small businesses," the former secretary of state and Democratic presidential candidate said at Smuttynose Brewery in Hampton, N.H.

"It seems as though they would rather threaten the livelihoods" of the estimated 164,000 workers whose jobs are supported by the bank "than stand up to the Tea Party and talk radio," she said.

Clinton spoke at a roundtable on small business in the brewery 's warehouse just as the State Department released a small trov e of her e-mails on Libya. She did not address the release but kept her focus on exports, community banks and other issues related to small business.

The Export-Import Bank guarantees loans for American businesses involved in exporting products. Its authorization expires June 30, and some Republicans hav e voiced strong opposition to keeping the agency aliv e. The Chamber of Commerce and other establishment groups continue to support the bank, but conservative groups such as Americans for Prosperity and the Club for Growth want to see it dismantled.

Speaking before the latter group in February, former Florida Governor Jeb Bush said the bank was one of sources of government overreach that he believ es "should be phased out." Florida Senator Marco Rubio has been opposed to the agency since at least 2012 and has reiterated his position in recent weeks. Other Republican presidential candidates also want to see the bank lose its charter.

The bank's current chairman, Fred Hochberg, is a longtime Clinton supporter who helped raise money for Hillary Clinton in 2008. He's contributed more than $18,000 to various Clinton political campaigns and has also given between $10,000 and $25,000 to the Clinton Foundation.

Clinton backs small business // Union Leader // Jason Schreiber - May 22, 2015

HAMPTON — Surrounded by beer kegs at the Smuttynose Brewing Company, Democratic presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton met with locals Friday to talk about ways to strengthen small businesses, which she described as an engine for economic growth.

During her second campaign visit to New Hampshire, the former First Lady and U.S. Secretary of State spent much of her time at Smuttynose batting around ideas for small business growth with a panel of sev en local business leaders.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I want to be the small business President," Clinton said during a roundtable discussion before an audience of about 80 people inside a warehouse at the Hampton brewery.

Later in the day , Clinton traveled to downtown Exeter, where she met with about 50 supporters at the Water Street Bookstore.

At the rally, Clinton said she's not running for a third Bill Clinton or Barack Obama term but wants to continue their "positive results," according to a pool report.

She wrapped up her day with a final public stop at Moo's Place, an ice cream shop in Derry , the pool report said.

After touring the brewery earlier in the day, Clinton sat down at a table where there were no mugs of beer, but panelists were treated to water in Smuttynose glasses.

Clinton took notes as she listened to Smuttynose co-owners Peter Egelston and Joanne Francis and other local business owners talk about their successes and the challenges they've faced growing their companies.

Clinton shared her thoughts on expanding small businesses, expanding access to capital, tax relief for small businesses, and the need to access new markets.

She said the local brewery exemplifies a lot of the reasons why she's talking a lot about small businesses.

Clinton said she wants to make it easier for small businesses to grow "so it feels less like a gamble."

While the ev ent was about business, Clinton said her campaign will focus on ensuring the economy is running "full steam" ahead with job creation and rising incomes; making sure families and communities are strong; fixing what she calls a dysfunctional political system; and dealing with the threats being faced in the world today.

Clinton also addressed the debate in Congress over keeping the U.S. Export-Import Bank open.

The bank is an independent federal agency that fills gaps in private export financing by offering financing, including working capital guarantees and export credit insurance, to promote sales of American goods and services abroad.

Many conservative Republicans want to let the Export-Import Bank's charter expire on June 30.

"Assistance from the Export-Import Bank supported hundreds of millions of dollars in exports by small businesses here in New Hampshire over the past five years," Clinton said, adding that Ex-Im supports up to 164,000 jobs nationally.

"It is wrong that Republicans in Congress are trying to cut off this vital lifeline for American small businesses. It's wrong that candidates for President, who really should know better, are jumping on the bandwagon. In fact, it seems as though they would rather threaten the livelihood of those 164,000 jobs than stand up to Tea Party and talk radio," she said.

Clinton also talked about the middle class, say ing one thing that hasn't changed are the values that "made the middle class mean something."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"That is true for my family and generations of families like mine. Being middle class should mean you feel control (over) your own financial future, you have confidence that everything you've worked for won't be lost in a flash particularly because of actions taken by people and institutions over which you have no control and are not a part of the decision making," she said.

Clinton took no questions from audience members, most of whom were supporters who either reached out to the brewery to get a seat or were contacted by the campaign.

Town hall meetings with voters haven't been a part of her campaign so far, but supporters said they're hopeful they'll be coming soon.

"I think that she's trying to make this campaign a little bit different than the last campaign. She's going small and then going big. I understand her emphasis on small businesses and getting to know the individuals in a smaller setting," said supporter Rich Green, 26, of Durham.

Hampton Democrat Lenore Patton, 78, also wasn't worried about the lack of town hall meetings.

"I say to people when they tell me that, 'Do you realize how far the election is from today and the time there is going to be to campaign?'" said Patton, who is vice chairman of the Rockingham County Democrats but wasn't speaking on behalf of the group.

Outside the brewery, supporters gathered with signs.

Corina Chao, 19, of Hampton, held a sign that read, "A woman's place is in the House, Senate and Oval Office."

Chao has never heard Clinton speak, but has followed her since her 2012 campaign and is excited to vote in her first presidential election.

"I've always liked her and I've liked the idea of a woman President, but that's not the only reason I support her. Of course she's on the right side of all the issues that I care about, especially from my generation, like LGBT (lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender) rights, raising the minimum wage (and) making college more affordable," she said.

Sorry, GOP. There's No Smoking Gun In Hillary Clinton's Benghazi Emails // Daily Beast // Tim Mok - May 22, 2015

Conspiracy-minded conservatives, be warned: The trove of Clinton emails don't prove much about her culpability for the infamous 9/11 anniversary attacks.

If Republicans were looking for a silver bullet to use against Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton, the State Department's Friday document dump about Benghazi wasn't it.

There's no illicit weapons Libyan program to be found in the emails, as some have speculated. No 'stand-down' order. Just a hectic flow of information to and from Hillary Clinton—about danger, about death, and ultimately, about condolences.

The State Department released Friday 296 emails involving Hillary Clinton during her tenure as Secretary of State, from 2009 to 2013. The documents include some 300 emails related to Benghazi, which were turned over to the Congressional committee investigating the 2012 attacks. The attacks left four Americans dead, including the U.S. ambassador to Libya.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The hundreds of emails released by the agency show a Secretary of State who was deeply engaged on Liby an issues—but usually just in a crisis. While Clinton was a key proponent of interv ening in Libya to protect civilians under threat from then-Libyan leader Moammar Qadhafi, her emails show that she took a largely hands off approach towards the country.

Of course, this document trove is an incomplete v iew, at best. It excludes any phone calls, briefings or memos. It doesn't include the emails that were deleted by Clinton—and we know there were many. (Republicans noted "inexplicable gaps" in Secretary Clinton's emails ov er sev eral time periods, such as from Oct. 2011 to Jan. 2012, and from April 2012 to July 2012.) And it was released by a State Department that was formerly helmed by Clinton and is still part of a Democratic administration.

But according to her Benghazi-related email traffic, Clinton appears to be only been involved at times of crisis and even then deferred to those on the ground, including Stevens and friends outside gov ernment.

Clinton's emails show that the late Amb. Christopher Stevens had multiple brushes with danger in Benghazi in 2011—more than a y ear before the September 2012 attacks that would ultimately take his life.

Then-Secretary of State Hillary Clinton received an update about Stevens' 2011 security situation: that there had been intelligence indicating a credible threat to his safety, and that officials were moving swiftly out of the hotel he was staying at in Benghazi.

"There is credible threat info against the hotel that our team is using—and the rest of the Intl community is using, for that matter… DS [Diplomatic Security] going to evacuate our people to alt locations. Info suggested attack in next 24-48 hours," wrote top Clinton aide Jacob Sullivan in an email to Clinton on June 10, 2011, with the subject line, 'Hotel in Benghazi.'

At the time Stevens was a special env oy to Libya, and the U.S. had joined a U.N. campaign to set up a no-fly zone to assist rebels in the overthrow of Muammar Qadhafi.

In a separate incident, in April 2011, a State Department official wrote:

"The situation in Ajdabiyah has worsened to the point Stev ens is considering departure from Benghazi. The env oy's delegation is currently doing a phased checkout (paying the hotel bills, moving some comms to the boat, etc). He will monitor the situation to see if it deteriorates further, but no decision has been made on departure."

The communications received by the Secretary of State illustrate the fast pace of security decisions made on the ground—but don't show Clinton with a direct role in these decisions. For example, there's no indication that Clinton intervened in the decision-making process when told about Stevens' 2011 security scares.

Clinton was heav ily criticized when it emerged in March that she had used a private email server to conduct business while she was Secretary of State. Her private email accounts prevented the normal process of archiving official government records. Clinton's staff had turned over some 55,000 pages of email correspondence to the State Department in December 2014.

Democrats on the Select Benghazi Committee had urged the release of Benghazi-related emails for months. Clinton herself had urged the State Department to swiftly publish the emails, telling reporters earlier this week that she wanted them in the public domain as soon as possible.

"I am pleased that the State Department released the complete set of Secretary Clinton's emails about Benghazi—as Democrats requested months ago," said Rep. Elijah Cummings, the top Democrat on the committee.

The American people can now read all of these emails and see for themselves that they contain no evidence to back up claims that Secretary Clinton ordered a stand-down, approv ed an illicit weapons program, or any other wild allegation Republicans have made for years.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the time between the June 2011 security scare and the September 2012 terrorist attacks, the mood in Libya ebbed and flowed—Stev ens left Libya in November 2011 before returning as U.S. ambassador in May 2012.

In July, Libya held national elections which went off well, leading to people heralding the country worldwide. Meanwhile, Islamist flags had emerged on buildings throughout Benghazi.

The correspondence in summer 2012 shows a somewhat positive situation in Libya: the last email from Stevens that Clinton receives paints a rosy picture: in July 2012 Sen. John McCain is in Tripoli, Liby a, being lauded for his support of the rebels.

“The atmosphere in Tripoli is very festive,” Stevens wrote in one email on July 7, 2012. “The gov’t declared today a holiday and people are driving around honking and wav ing flags and making peace sign gestures… McCain was applauded and thanked for his support wherever we went.”

The world’s focus doesn’t dwell on Libya, and Clinton doesn’t receive additional emails about Benghazi again until the 2012 attacks on U.S. facilities.

By September 2012, the situation in Libya had deteriorated. In a diary entry on Sept. 6, Stevens wrote about a “security vacuum” and “dicey conditions,” even suggesting that he was on an “Islamist ‘hit list’ in Benghazi.”

On the fateful day of Sept. 11, 2012, at approximately 4 p.m. in Washington, D.C., the first attack on the U.S. diplomatic compound occurred. Clinton had previously testified (PDF) that she was at the State Department that day, which could explain why she did not send or receive a large volume of emails about Benghazi.

She becomes more active on emails that evening, and at 11:37 p.m., she receiv es word through her Chief of Staff Cheryl Mills that the Libyan government had confirmed Amb. Stev en’s death.

“Cheryl told me the Libyans confirmed his death. Should we announce tonight or wait until morning?” Clinton wrote in an email to top aides.

Throughout the morning after the initial attacks she has a lot of activ ity: in particular she received a large number of messages expressing condolences to her and the State Department ov er the death of the ambassador.

“The Ambassador was a perfect role model of the kind of person we need representing us around the world, and the others had so much to give—and already had given so much,” said former Secretary of Defense Bob Gates.

“What a wonderful, strong and moving statement by your boss. please tell her how much Sen. McCain appreciated it. Me too,” wrote a top national security aide for Sen. John McCain.

That weekend, Clinton continued to exchange emails on the Benghazi issue. On Saturday Sept. 15, the day before Susan Rice appeared on cable shows to make the since-rescinded claim that the Benghazi attacks were the result of protests-turned-v iolent, Clinton was involved arranging calls from her home and the collection of an action memo via classified courier.

The emails give insight into how Clinton operated at the time: using classified couriers to move memos and getting on the phone with other world leaders, rather than using email.

None of the released emails show Clinton being involved with Rice’s appearance on the Sunday shows, or the discussion of what Rice should say . She does, however, receive a transcript of what Rice would eventually say.

Findings of the Republican-led Select committee on Benghazi may not be released until sometime in 2016, in the thick of campaign season.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If the Select Committee continues to operate through the end of the 2015, its estimated cost will rise to $6 million dollars. The House Select Committee on Benghazi was established in May 2014. If it continues through to the end of 2015, it will have been investigating for 19 months—longer than other major, comparable investigations.

(To compare, the joint inquiry into the intelligence community's actions with regard to the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks took less than a year. The Senate Watergate committee operated for about 17 months before presenting its findings. And the Warren Commission on the assassination of President Kennedy operated for under a year.)

The release of Friday's Benghazi-related emails has itself been months in the waiting: the State Department had been going through an excruciating process of assessing the emails for any information that would show sensitive or personally identifiable information, and then removing it. The State Department will now turn its attention to performing the same task on thousands of Clinton emails that are not related to Benghazi.

In fact, Hillary Clinton's email correspondence has the potential to generate headlines at least through the end of the year, acting as a disruptive force that distracts from her presidential campaign.

For Republican committee chairman Trey Gowdy, the release of these emails are just the first step in a long slog to "collect and evaluate all of the relevant and material information necessary." Gowdy said that the emails released Friday had all been exclusively reviewed and released only after review by her own lawyers.

Earlier this week, a federal judge had dismissed a State Department plan to release her email archives, comprised of some 55,000 pages of emails, by January 2016. Instead, the judge asked the State Department to come up with a plan to gradually release the emails in stages.

In the nearer term, Hillary Clinton is expected to appear before the Select Committee on Benghazi, Gowdy said last week that he will not schedule the former Secretary of State's testimony until the State Department turns over more documents.

"The Select Committee should schedule Secretary Clinton's public testimony now and stop wasting taxpayer money dragging out this political charade to harm Secretary Clinton's bid for president," Cummings, a Democrat, said Friday.

The New York Times obtained and published about a third of the Clinton Benghazi emails earlier this week, revealing that longtime Clinton friend Sidney Blumenthal had frequently written to her about Libya, serving as a source of information about the country before and after the 2012 attacks.

While Blumenthal had originally blamed demonstrators in the American diplomatic facility in Benghazi, a subsequent memo fingered a Libyan terrorist group for the attacks, arguing that they had used the demonstrations as cover for the violence. This week, the Select Committee on Benghazi subpoenaed Blumenthal to appear before the panel.

Two Actual Everyday Americans Walk Into A Hillary Clinton Event…

…and get crushed. The challenges of the "everyday" campaign. // Buzzfeed // Ruby Cramer – May 22, 2015

HAMPTON, N.H. — When they heard Hillary Clinton would be here on Friday in Hampton — a small coastal town just south of the Maine border — Lenore and Gary Patton contacted the campaign. They wanted to lend a hand as volunteers.

The morning of the event — a roundtable discussion about small businesses at the locally owned Smuttynose Brewing Company — the Pattons arrived early, help set up, and secured the best spot in the house: front row, first two seats.

Lenore, 78, and Gary, 77, had a perfect view of the candidate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Had this been a typical event, the Pattons may not have been able to attend.

Clinton aides emphasize — in every email, memo, and press release — that this campaign is about "everyday Americans." But as a result of efforts to keep each gathering intimate — allowing Clinton to best "get the input of every day Americans" — few Americans of that particular stripe actually end up in the room.

Clinton's campaign functions are typically so small that there is barely an audience, just a handful of invited guests, often local Democratic officials.

Last month, before her first event in New Hampshire, a group of young supporters stood outside the venue in the rain, hoping to catch a glimpse of the candidate. Clinton never materialized. But every now and then, one could be seen at the window, face pressed to the glass, hands cupped on either side for a better view.

The roundtable in Hampton was Clinton's largest yet. About 60 people came — including the Pattons, who described themselves as local activists who "fervently supported" Barack Obama in 2008 and now "fervently support" Clinton. The rest of the group was a mix: some invited by the campaign, some invited by the brewery, and others who'd simply asked to come. According to a Clinton aide, the campaign was able to accommodate nearly every request to attend that they received.

For about an hour, the Pattons and the five other dozen guests watched Clinton, alongside her seven roundtable participants, discuss in granular detail the challenges facing small businesses.

And then the spell of the everyday was broken. Clinton was swarmed by reporters. From the aisle, pressed up against a wall of beer cases stacked to the ceiling on pallet shelves, they gathered in a thick circle that happened to coalesce right around the two best seats in the house. Lenore and Gary Patton could not talk to the candidate they had come to see. They could not even get out of their chairs.

Cameras flashed wildly. Lenore was crunched. Gary had a tape recorder in his right ear, a television camera in his left, and microphones just overhead. They were inches from Clinton, with her "in the eye of the hurricane," as Gary put it after watching her field questions on Iraq, her emails, and her image. ("Do you have a perception problem?")

"I'm gonna let the Americans decide that," Clinton replied on her way out.

"Hey," Gary said to no in particular. "She's smart. She's experienced. End of story."

But most people had left by then. One reporter turned to the Pattons to remark on their good view. "Well, we could hardly help it," Gary said. "We couldn't get out."

There was a certain disconnect the Pattons felt they had just witnessed.

"My God, end of story. Stop telling me about the tape recorders," Gary said, referring to the media swarm. "This woman has what it takes."

"She has ideas for the direction of the country," said Lenore. "She cares about the middle class. We're about as middle class as you can get."

"She's so experienced, she's so bright, and she's so adroit," her husband added. "And I came in here not necessarily feeling all of those things, but I go away thinking that we would be lucky to have her as the president, because she has so many attributes that you need."

"It's an incredibly impressive performance," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton announced this week that her first rally wouldn't be until June 13, a month later than originally expected, kicking off what aides have signaled will be a faster, bigger phase of the campaign.

On Friday afternoon, at her second event of the trip, Clinton suggested that she'd prefer to push that all back indefinitely — staving off for a little bit longer the reality that her campaign isn't small, intimate, or everyday.

"Some people had asked me, particularly in the press, 'When are you going to have really big events?" she told a group of supporters.

"And I said, 'Later, later, later...'"

SOCIAL MEDIA

Jay Rosen (5/22/2015:6:45 AM) : In this dispatch from the campaign trail with HRC and reporters I defy you to find any point to the exercise .

Jennifer Epstein (5/22/2015; 2:07PM): "There is no role whatsoever for American soldiers on the ground to go back" to Iraq except as trainers/ advisers, Clinton says in NH"

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE

State Department Releases Hillary Clinton Emails // NYT // Michael S. Schmidt – May 22, 2015

WASHINGTON — The State Department said on Friday it was releasing 296 emails that Hillary Rodham Clinton sent and received when she was secretary of state.

The emails are the first tranche of many that will be released by the State Department over the next year. After it was revealed in March that Mrs. Clinton had exclusively used a personal email account when she was secretary of state, she asked the State Department to release all of the emails she had provided it from her time in office.

The State Department said the emails it was releasing Friday were provided to a specially appointed House committee investigating the 2012 attack on the American mission in Benghazi, Libya. The emails were sent from January 2011 and December 2012, the State Department said.

The New York Times on Thursday obtained and published an initial batch of the emails online.

"The emails we release today do not change the essential facts or our understanding of the events before, during, or after the attacks, which have been known since the independent Accountability Review Board report on the Benghazi attacks was released almost two and a half years ago," the State Department said.

The website that the State Department uses was not working on Friday when it said it was releasing the emails.

Hillary Discussed Speculation About Her Health With Aides In Emails // Daily Caller // ALEX PAPPAS // May 22, 2015

Then-Secretary of State Hillary Clinton discussed with aides the chatter on cable news about whether she actually suffered a concussion in 2012, according to emails released by the State Department on Friday.

A week before she was to testify before Congress in December 2012 about the attacks in Benghazi, Clinton postponed her appearance with aides explaining she had fainted and suffered a concussion.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Dec. 20, chief of staff Cheryl Mills forwarded Clinton by email a transcript of Fox News host Greta Van Susteren discussing Clinton's health with Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain.

"Senator," Van Susteren said during that segment, "there is a report from the State Department that Secretary of State Hillary Clinton will testify on Benghazi before the middle of January . There has been some criticism of whether or not she has a concussion. I believe she has a concussion. What do you think?"

McCain replied: "I have never seen her back down. And I believe that she is now not physically well enough to testify and she will testify the middle of January."

Mills sent a transcript of that interview to Clinton's personal email — hrod@clintonemail.com — and to close aide Huma Abdein.

Speaking of McCain, Clinton replied: "Huma called him and [South Carolina Sen. Lindsey] Graham."

"Also," Clinton added, "someone should call Greta VS to thank her for 'knowing the truth.'"

The emails released Friday , ahead of the Memorial Day weekend, are a few of the thousands the Democratic presidential candidate has turned over to the State Department from her personal email account. Clinton acknowledges she used that email account for both personal and official business.

Clinton emails silent on deadly danger facing Americans in Benghazi // Washington Examiner // BYRON YORK - MAY 22, 2015

The newly-released Hillary Clinton Benghazi emails do not contain any communications relating to security from the critical last month before the September 11, 2012 terrorist attack on the U.S. facility in Libya. During that period, Ambassador Christopher Stevens, who along with three other Americans would die in the attack, warned Clinton and other State Department officials of a growing danger, indeed a security emergency, in Libya. Stevens specifically noted that the possibility of an attack on Americans was growing, and, if such an attack occurred, the U.S. contingent did not have the strength to repel it. But to judge from the emails made public Friday, Clinton gave not a thought to the matter.

Go back to August 2012. On the 15th of that month, U.S. security officers in Libya held an "emergency" meeting to address the very real possibility that growing violence in the area could soon target Americans. The next day, August 16, Stevens sent a cable to Clinton concluding that the Americans in Liby a could not defend U.S. facilities "in the event of a coordinated attack, due to limited manpower, security measures, weapons capabilities, host nation support, and the ov erall size of the compound."

It was a clear call for help, one that, judging by the newly -public emails, went entirely unheard at the highest level of the State Department. Apart from some hugger-mugger analyses of Libyan politics by Clinton's friend Sidney Blumenthal, there is nothing at all in the emails concerning Benghazi from the month before the attack.

Clinton has long maintained she never saw the August 16, 2012 cable. "That cable did not come to my attention," Clinton testified under oath before the House Foreign Affairs Committee in January 2013. "I have made it very clear that the security cables did not come to my attention or above the assistant-secretary level, where the [State Department internal investigation] placed responsibility."

Clinton explained that she was simply too busy , and there were simply too many cables, for her to see ev ery one. "One-point-43 million cables a year come to the State Department," she told the House committee. "They're all addressed to me. They do not all come to me."

But wasn't that August 16, 2012 cable -- warning of dire consequences should the existing violence in Libya target

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Americans -- a pretty important communication? What struck Republicans investigating Benghazi is that, while they knew Clinton was indeed busy, other equally busy top Obama administration officials did read the cable. In an appearance before the Senate Armed Services Committee, both former Defense Secretary Leon Panetta and Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Martin Dempsey -- two busy men with pretty big jobs -- testified they knew about it.

"You were aware that Ambassador Stevens -- of his cable that said that the consulate could not withstand a coordinated attack, is that right?" Republican Sen. Kelly Ayotte asked Panetta.

"Correct," said Panetta.

"General, you had said that you previously were aware of that?" Ayotte aid to Dempsey.

"Yes, I was aware of the communication back to the State Department," Dempsey answered.

Clinton, on the other hand, insists to this day that she knew nothing. And there is nothing in the newly-released emails to contradict her sworn testimony on the matter. That should not come as a surprise to anyone. After all, because Clinton kept her communications on a separate, secret system, the only emails that State Department officials possess are the ones Clinton has given them. Clinton and her lawyers, of course, chose the emails that she gave to the State Department and then destroyed all of her email communications, including backups. Could anyone possibly be surprised that nothing Clinton turned over to the State Department -- and ultimately to the public -- contradicted her testimony under oath?

The period leading up to the Benghazi attacks is the most critical time in the entire tragic episode. What did Clinton know about the danger to American officials there, and what did she do about it? That is the key question of Benghazi. What happened afterward -- the blame-the-video spin -- can be interpreted as an attempt to cover up Clinton's inaction before the attack. Yes, the spin campaign was dishonest. But the more serious offense was allowing the conditions that led to the deaths of Stevens and three other Americans. The crime is worse than the cover-up. And if Republicans thought they would receive any new information in the Clinton-edited version of the emails released Friday, they will surely be disappointed.

First batch of Hillary's State Department emails released // Politico // LAUREN FRENCH, JOSH GERSTEIN and BRYAN BENDER – May 22, 2015

The first batch of emails from Hillary Clinton's four years running the State Department was released Friday.

Even before the emails were made public, the State Department argued that the nearly 900 pages of documents do not fundamentally alter the findings of the State Department's Accountability Review Board that probed the Benghazi terrorist attacks.

"The emails we release today do not change the essential facts or our understanding of the events before, during, or after the attacks, which have been known since the independent Accountability Review Board report on the Benghazi attacks was released almost two and a half years ago," wrote the department's deputy spokeswoman Marie Harf.

These highly anticipated emails, some of which have already leaked out, give insight into Clinton's tenure as the top U.S. diplomat. They're also serving as fodder for critics of the Democratic presidential front-runner, who is still dogged by questions about a 2012 terrorist attack in Benghazi that killed Ambassador Chris Stevens.

And they are sure to raise more questions about the administration's and Clinton's response to what quickly became a political scandal. There is an email dated Sept. 15 with Clinton providing "talking points" for an upcoming closed-door hearing before the House Select Committee on Intelligence, but with the exception of Jake Sullivan the recipients are blacked out, along with the entire document.

It states only: "Per the discussion at Deputies, here are the revised TPs for HPSCI."

The emails also show that Clinton received now-classified documents on her personal email address. One of the documents State recently deemed classified was a November 2012 email reporting possible arrests in Libya related to the Benghazi attack. The memo was sent through unclassified State Department channels and forwarded to Clinton's private account by Sullivan, State's Director of Policy Planning. A notation on the document released says it was classified as –"SECRET"—the middle tier of national security classification—on Friday, the same day the records were released.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton has been under intense pressure for weeks since it was revealed that she used a non-official email address while at the State Department and stored those emails on a personal server in her New York home. Republicans jumped on those revelations to accuse Clinton of attempting to runaround federal records laws and keep key documents about Liby a and Benghazi from the public.

Republican Rep. Trey Gowdy, chairman of the House Select Committee on Benghazi, has subpoenaed the State Department for all documents on Libya from Clinton's time at the State Department and is refusing to schedule the former secretary to testify until the Obama administration turns the emails over to congressional investigators.

Clinton's Benghazi emails show correspondence with adviser // Concord Monitor // Lisa Lerer - May 22, 2015

A batch of Hillary Rodham Clinton's emails from her time as secretary of state show her corresponding with a longtime adviser about the Libyan rebellion against Moammar Gadhafi and the Benghazi attack.

The set of messages, which were published yesterday by the New York Times, focus on the 2012 attacks on the U.S. diplomatic post in Benghazi, Libya, that killed four Americans, including U.S. ambassador Christopher Stev ens.

The emails – many of which are marked "sensitive but unclassified" – show the role play ed by Sidney Blumenthal, a longtime Clinton family confidante, who was working for the Clinton family foundation and advising a group of entrepreneurs trying to win business from the Libyan transitional government. Blumenthal, who was not an employ ee of the State Department at the time, repeatedly wrote dispatches about the events in Libya to Clinton, who often forwarded them to senior diplomatic officials.

Clinton has faced months of controversy after revealing that she used a private email address while working as secretary of state, rather than a government address, and failed to preserve all of her messages. This week, a district court judge ruled that the agency must set a timetable to release the 55,000 remaining pages. The portion of the emails about the events in Libya have already been given for review to a special House panel investigating the attacks. They are expected to be released by the State Department in the coming days after months of delay.

Clinton had initially been expected to testify this week on the attacks, but her testimony was put off after panel chairman Rep. Trey Gowdy, R-S.C., complained that he lacked the necessary State Department documents to thoroughly question her. Speaking after a campaign stop in Iowa this week, Clinton urged the agency to make her emails public as quickly as possible.

Another day of damaging disclosures for Hillary // Fox News // Chris Stirewait - May 22, 2015

If the first rule of scandal management is to completely purge the damaging information and cauterize the wound, Hillary Clinton is failing badly. We learned today that Clinton's family foundation hid $26 million in foreign and corporate contributions as "revenue" on the grounds that the presumptive Democratic nominee or her husband or daughter gave speeches in exchange for the gifts. The donors include a Chinese energy consortium, a Nigerian newspaper and Citibank. And later today we will get the first wave of her emails from a secret serv er.

"This is coming from individual who when she worked in State Department didn't obey the law to begin with, which said she should hav e had an official email on an official government server. So she's already broken the law once, so now we're to trust her that the ones she turned over are all of emails? I personally won't be satisfied till we look at the server." – Sen. Rand Paul, R-Ky., on "America's Newsroom"

Blumenthal's hidden hand in Hillary's State Department // Washington Examiner // Editorial Board - May 22, 2015

The New York Times ran an alarming report this week on how Sidney Blumenthal, a former Clinton aide from the 1990s and an employ ee of the Clinton Foundation, may have helped shape U.S. policy in Libya.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Despite being barred by former White House chief of staff Rahm Emanuel from employment at the State Department when then-Secretary of State Hillary Clinton tried to hire him in 2009, Blumenthal passed intelligence to Clinton at an email address she had prev iously maintained she did not use at the time. She evidently took his adv ice v ery seriously, routinely forwarding his unvetted memos to senior diplomats. Her aide would anonymize the memos, concealing the fact that Blumenthal — a polarizing figure known in the 1990s for ruthlessly attacking the Clintons' critics, and accused of attacking Obama during the 2008 campaign — was their source.

Blumenthal's information "appears to have come from a group of business associates he was advising as they sought to win contracts from the Libyan transitional government," the Times revealed.

Much of the information Blumenthal handed over was wrong — in some cases ignorantly so, as when he confused two different politicians who had the same last name. But Blumenthal had Clinton's ear, so that his intelligence was disseminated anyway throughout the upper echelons of the State Department. Clinton even recommended passing information from one of his unvetted memos — purporting to describe the attitude of Libya's new president toward Israel — to the Israeli government.

The rev elation of Blumenthal and his scurrilous, possibly self-serving rumors raises the question of exactly who was running things during Clinton's tenure at the State Department, and just how public-spirited their goals were.

This would not be nearly as much of an issue if the U.S. military intervention in Liby a had gone well. The fact that it has been a disaster — nearly as big as the invasion of Iraq, albeit with fewer American casualties — makes the situation ev en more troubling. Since the U.S. intervention, Liby a has become a failed state featuring rival governments, warring militias and hundreds of thousands of internally and externally displaced persons. It is also a new locus of power for the fanatics of the Islamic State terrorist group, who have become known for proudly posting video of their crimes against humanity online.

The Times report is dispiriting and raises many grave questions. For example, Blumenthal seems to have had Clinton's ear in a way that American diplomats, with their repeated requests for additional security at their vulnerable facilities, did not.

But more to the point, he had access to a gullible or complicit top government official who was willing to treat his word as fact. If used in a proper and convincing way, this access could have put the resources of the U.S. government into the serv ice of helping Blumenthal and his business partners make a considerable amount of money, even if they nev er succeeded in doing so.

Clinton Foundation Silent on Blum enthal's Exit Date // Washington Free Bacon // Alana Goodman - May 22, 2015

Controversial Clinton pal Sidney Blumenthal is no longer on the Clinton Foundation payroll, but it is still unclear when he left and under what circumstances.

A spokesperson for the foundation told the Washington Free Beacon that Blumenthal "hasn't worked here in a while," but did not confirm when he left or why. Blumenthal did not respond to request for comment.

The New York Times reported on Monday that Blumenthal was simultaneously working for the foundation, entities with business interests in Libya, and providing foreign policy advice to Hillary Clinton while she was at the State Department.

The congressional committee investigating the Benghazi attack subpoenaed Blumenthal on Tuesday for a closed-door deposition, which could take place as early as June 3.

According to the Times, Blumenthal sent Clinton numerous emails with advice on Libya policy, which she then passed on to other State Department officials. Some of the messages mentioned officials related to Blumenthal's business interests, while others included information that seemed dubious to State Department officials.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At the time, Blumenthal was also being paid as an adv iser to the Clinton Foundation, according to the Times.

Blumenthal, a former journalist who became an advisor to President Bill Clinton, used his media clout to help defend the Clintons in the 1990s. But some critics accused him of underhanded tactics. According to his long-time former friend, the late journalist Christopher Hitchens, Blumenthal shopped around false stories about Monica Lewinsky in an attempt to discredit her during the Kenneth Starr investigation.

Blumenthal's ties to the Clintons came under new scrutiny in 2013, after his private emails advising Hillary Clinton on Libya policy were leaked by a hacker known as Guccifier.

Later that year, Blumenthal began promoting a controversial anti-Israel book written by his son, Max Blumenthal, and launched a behind-the-scenes attack campaign against the book's critics.

The book, Goliath, compared the Israel government to Nazi Germany and painted the Jewish state as inherently racist. It was endorsed by the white supremacist David Duke's website, and landed Max Blumenthal on the Simon Wiesenthal Center's list of the "Top 10 Global Anti-Semitic and Anti-Israel Slurs."

The left-leaning columnist Eric Alterman wrote in the Nation that the book "could have been published by the Hamas Book-of-the-Month Club (if it existed)."

In response, Sidney Blumenthal launched an attack campaign against Alterman by blasting the columnist's credibility in a widely circulated mass email reported by BuzzFeed. He also hosted the book launch party for Goliath at his home, the Free Beacon reported.

At the time, media outlets were stonewalled by the Clinton Foundation when they asked whether Sidney Blumenthal was on the payroll. Blumenthal also fled from a Free Beacon reporter who asked whether he was being paid by the foundation.

At the time, Clinton ally Alan Dershowitz called on the Clintons to cut ties with Blumenthal if he did not distance himself from the views expressed in the book.

"In light of the long association between the Clintons and Sid Blumenthal, I hope that the Clintons ask Sid to expressly disasscoate himself from his son's views–and if he refuses to, that they no longer work with him on any matters," Dershowitz told Breitbart News.

Hillary Clinton defended her long-time adviser on Tuesday in response to the new revelations.

"We've been friends for a long time," said Clinton during an ev ent in Iowa. "He sent me e-mails I passed on in some instances. That's part of the giv e and take. ... I'm going to keep talking to my old friends, whoever they are."

Hillary Clinton's Surprisingly Effective Cam paign // The Atlantic // PET ER BEINART - MAY 22, 2015

Hillary Clinton has been an official candidate for president for five weeks, and she still hasn't done the thing most candidates do on day one: giv en a speech laying out her vision for America. Nor is she planning on doing so anytime soon. Politico reports that Hillary's "why I'm running for president," speech, initially scheduled for May , has now been delayed until June, or even later.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There's a reason for that: The speech is unlikely to be very good. Soaring rhetoric and grand themes have never been Hillary's strengths. That's one reason so many liberals found her so much less inspirational than Barack Obama in 2008. And it's a problem with deep roots. In his biography, A Woman in Charge, Carl Bernstein describes Hillary, then in law school, struggling to articulate her generation's perspective in an address to the League of Women Voters. "If she was speaking about a clearly defined subject," Bernstein writes, "her thoughts would be well organized, finely articulated, and delivered in almost perfect outline form. But before the League audience, she again and again lapsed into sweeping abstractions."

Team Clinton appears to understand this. And so it has done something shrewd. Instead of talking vision, Hillary is talking policy, which she does really well.

The Many Measures of Hillary Clinton

If Hillary's struggles with vision go back a long time, so does her passion for wonkery. As a student government leader at Wellesley, Bernstein notes, Hillary developed "a better system for the return of library books" and "studied every aspect of the Wellesley curriculum in developing a successful plan to reduce the number of required courses."

In 1993, she took time off from a vacation in Hawaii to grill local officials about the state's healthcare system. In his excellent book on Hillary's 2000 Senate race, Michael Tomasky observes that, "In the entire campaign, she had exactly one truly inspiring moment" but that, "over time it became evident to all but the most cynical that she actually cared about utility rates."

Hillary's handlers have played to this strength. On April 29, she devoted the first major speech of her campaign not to her vision for America, but to something more specific: race and crime. She began with a graphic and harrowing description of the young black men recently killed by police:

Walter Scott shot in the back in Charleston, South Carolina. Unarmed. In debt. And terrified of spending more time in jail for child support payments he couldn't afford. Tamir Rice shot in a park in Cleveland, Ohio. Unarmed and just 12 years old. Eric Garner choked to death after being stopped for selling cigarettes on the streets of this city. And now Freddie Gray. His spine nearly severed while in police custody.

She recounted advocating for prisoners while director the University of Arkansas' legal-aid clinic. She noted the parallels between race and class, observing that life expectancy is declining not only for many African Americans, but also for white women without high-school degrees. And she made the crucial point that because government currently treats drug addiction and psychiatric disorders primarily as criminal rather than public-health problems, "our prisons and our jails are now our mental health institutions."

The speech was not merely substantive. It was authentic. It showcased the real Hillary Clinton: A woman who, whatever her faults, hates injustice and knows what she's talking about when it comes to government.

A week later in Las Vegas, Hillary gave another impressive speech, this one on immigration. In a media environment where "pro" and "anti" immigration often refers merely to how many people America lets in, Hillary turned the conversation to how America treats immigrants once we do. First, she talked movingly about her childhood memories of the migrant farm workers who worked in the fields around Chicago. Then she attacked the idea, common in "pro-immigration" Republican circles, that America should legalize undocumented immigrants without allowing them citizenship. "Today not a single Republican candidate, announced or potential, is clearly and consistently supporting a path to citizenship," she declared. "Not one. When they talk about "legal status," that's code for "second-class status." America, Hillary insisted, must see the undocumented not merely as workers, but as human beings.

Sooner or later, Hillary will have to move from policy to philosophy. It may be a rocky transition. And if the Republicans nominate Marco Rubio (which at this point looks like a decent bet), she will face a candidate who interweaves personal biography and national aspiration better than she does. But if Hillary stumbles, these opening weeks of her campaign may offer a template for how she regains her footing. She's at her best talking about America not abstractly, but concretely. She's most inspiring when talking not about what she believes, but about what she wants to do. And she most effectively humanizes herself by being true to who she is: knowledgeable, passionate, and vaguely obsessive about making government work. Against Rubio, or any other likely Republican challenger, that identity should provide an excellent contrast.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On policy, Clinton plays it safe : With broad rhetoric but risk-averse stances, she tilts left without moving very far. // Politico //ANNIE KARNI – May 22, 2015

HAMPTON, N.H. — Hillary Clinton's approach to policy, so far, has been as risk-averse as her media strategy.

On the trail, she prefers the safe hav en of the controlled roundtable setting, and for the most part avoids taking questions from the press. And when it comes to the issues she wants to talk about, Clinton sticks with those that are either so broadly popular as to present no threat to her brand or general-election prospects, or so small-bore as to carry little chance of backlash.

On Friday in New Hampshire, Clinton spoke with a passionate, progressive voice, pounding away at Republicans for "jumping on the bandwagon" to kill the Export-Import Bank, whose authorization in Congress is set to expire June 30. It was a safe call, to say the least: House Democrats support the bank. Moderate Democrats such as Sen. Chuck Schumer support the bank. A liberal like Sen. Elizabeth Warren? She's pro-bank, too.

"It is wrong that Republicans in Congress are now trying to cut off this vital lifeline for American small businesses," said Clinton, at the SmuttyNose Brewery in Hampton. Republicans, she said, would threaten the livelihoods of American workers rather than "stand up to the Tea Party and talk radio. It's wrong, it's embarrassing."

Weighing in forcefully on an issue where her outlook matches that of the majority of her party was right in line with Clinton's posture on many policy issues during this first phase of her campaign.

In her month and a half on the trail, Clinton has spoken in broad terms that give her the appearance of sometimes channeling Sen. Elizabeth Warren and championing the left — in the case of her appearance at SmuttyNose Brewery, sticking up for small businesses and bashing the GOP.

She sounds like she's wrapping her arms around the progressive wing of her party while alienating few. She uses rhetoric that sounds Warren-esque ("The deck is still stacked in favor of those at the top") while being vague about details of how precisely she would address the problem.

One Democratic strategist described Clinton's positioning as a "head fake, making the general audience of the left think she's one of them."

The risk is that Clinton play s into the stereoty pe that she is a cautious and poll-driven politician more inclined to appease rather than lead. In an op-ed in the Portsmouth Herald Friday, Sen. Marco Rubio knocked Clinton for playing it safe and feeling no pressure to "offer new ideas."

Clinton campaign advisers, meanwhile, argue that her positioning is not a strategy at all, but rather a sincere reflection of her record of fighting for the middle-class.

"The campaign is built on that record and consistent with the values Hillary Clinton has always championed," spokesman Jesse Ferguson said. "It's not about left or right, it's about the v alues Hillary Clinton believes in and the fight she is continuing to wage."

But the issues her advisers cite tend to be broadly accepted Democratic chestnuts. Clinton has said same-sex marriage should be a constitutional right; the minimum wage should be raised; the Supreme Court's Citizens United decision should be overturned to remove big money out of politics; community college should be free; police departments should be equipped with body cameras; what works in Obamacare should be extended and the high cost of prescription drugs should be lowered; paid family leave should be instituted; effective treatment should be provided for those who suffer from mental health and substance abuse problems.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Some of her stances, such as that on same-sex marriage, represent an evolution from where she has been in the past. But overall, Clinton has not supported progressive positions where she would hav e to stick her neck out from where the majority of her party is.

Moderate Democrats have taken note. “She’s being smart by checking the boxes on progressive issues that have wide appeal across the party , but keeping her general election powder dry by not going too far to the left,” said Jonathan Cowan, president of Third Way, a think tank started by former Clinton administration staffers.

Nonetheless, she’s succeeded in giving the impression of moving to the left.

The right-wing America Rising PAC has already accused Clinton of “staking out far-left positions that are outside of the mainstream of most Americans.” Ev en some of her biggest donors claim they see a shift.

“I think she is moving a little bit to the left and I think that’s fine,” hedge fund manager Marc Lasry, who recently hosted a fundraiser for Clinton, said in a television interview with Bloomberg. “People who are giving money to her understand that.”

But supporting universal pre-k and reforming student loans are hardly bold positions for Democrats in 2015 — instead, Democratic strategists argued, they act as liberal stalking horse issues that allow a candidate to appear boldly progressive while risking little.

A real sign that Clinton was tacking left would be a call for a single-payer healthcare sy stem, or a promise to break the country’s large banks, or returning to a higher income-tax rate on everyone making more than $1 million a y ear. Clinton is unlikely to take those positions, and so far has not offered those kinds of specifics.

Indeed, as Vox.com’s Jonathan Allen pointed out, 91 percent of voters said they fav ored police officers wearing body cameras, according to a Pew poll from last year. An NBC/Wall Street Journal poll from April showed that 58 percent of respondents favor legalizing same-sex marriage. And 57 percent of voters support a path to citizenship for undocumented immigrants who live in this country, according to a CBS/New York Times poll from earlier this month.

On those issues that could be potentially costly to her — like weighing in on President Obama’s trade deal or the Keystone XL Pipeline— Clinton has notably refused to weigh in.

“Her strategy: alienate no one,” said Democratic strategist Hank Sheinkopf. “Give the left of the Party no reason to criticize. Rhetoric works better than detail. Rhetoric you can change or edit. Details are difficult to erase.”

Details, such as how much she would like to raise the minimum wage, hav e yet to be shared. Even on immigration, where Clinton surprised many of the immigration activists who in the past had protested her speeches, some are still waiting eagerly for specifics. Clinton has yet to outline how, legally , she would be able to institute any policy that would go beyond where Obama went with an executive action to let millions more undocumented immigrants gain protections and work permits.

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton eyes her chocolate peanut butter fudge ice cream Friday during a stop at Moo's Place in Derry, N.H. AP Photo

“Everything we hear now is words on the campaign trail, but the proof is in the pudding,” said Javier Valdes, co-executive director of Make the Road Action Fund. “We appreciate that she’s pushing the envelope. But the details will matter. We’re happy to hear that she’s taking that stance but we need to hear a little bit more.”

The hope, Democrats said, is that Clinton will soon add specifics to the outlines of policy she has only traced so far.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Thursday, the campaign announced its big kick-off rally, where Clinton will address thousands of supporters with a big-picture speech about her candidacy and her vision for the future.

Clinton Foundation muscles the media // AP // Jake Tapper - May 22, 2015

CNN anchor and chief Washington correspondent Jake Tapper this week entered the news cycle obliquely. An article in USA Today noted some turbulence over just how to describe his role in the June 8-10 Clinton Global Initiative America Meeting in Denver. Was he going to be a "speaker" at the event, or something else?

CNN and the Clinton Foundation appear to be going back and forth on the matter, as Breitbart's John Nolte has reported.

Neither USA Today nor Breitbart would have plowed such interest into this matter a year ago, back when the Clinton Foundation was an aggressive global charity with a bipartisan roster of supporters. After Hillary Clinton ramped up and then announced a 2016 presidential bid, the Clinton Foundation has turned into something different: An aggressive global charity with a bipartisan roster of supporters — and whose every move is suspect. Author Peter Schweizer, the New York Times, The Washington Post and Fox News, among others, have combed the foundation's records in search of overlaps with Clinton's dealings as secretary of state from 2009 to 2013. "We will see a pattern of financial transactions involving the Clintons that occurred contemporaneous with favorable U.S. policy decisions benefiting those providing the funds," writes Schweizer in "Clinton Cash: The Untold Story of How and Why Foreign Governments and Businesses Helped Make Bill and Hillary Rich."

The sudden touchiness of the Clinton family charity explains why last week's revelation that ABC News chief anchor George Stephanopoulos had donated $75,000 to the foundation blew a pothole in an otherwise smooth career. And it surely contextualizes the negotiations between the foundation and CNN over just how Tapper's participation in the Denver event is presented. At the Denver confab next month Tapper will not only interview former president Bill Clinton as part of the proceedings but is also listed as the moderator of a panel on "The Business Case for Investing in America's Workforce," according to the event's Web page. Portions of that discussion will air on CNN, according to a network spokesperson, who notes that details are still being negotiated.

The proceedings will take place under the banner of the Clinton Global Initiative (CGI), a Clinton Foundation subsidiary that "convenes global leaders to create and implement innovative solutions to the world's most pressing challenges," according to the foundation. And by the foundation's accounting, CGI community members "have made nearly 3,200commitments which have improved the lives of over 430 million people in more than 180 countries."

Those numbers look impressive, but it's a name that attracts media heavies such as Tapper. He'll interview Bill Clinton for 15 to 20 minutes, according to the foundation. Even when his wife is not at the center of the country's biggest ongoing news story, former president Clinton is an ideal interviewee — informed, agile and ever willing to joust with his questioners. Says a CNN spokesperson: "This on-the-record interview with President Clinton will be broadcast exclusively on CNN. Nothing is off limits and Jake intends to use this opportunity to ask important, pressing and relevant questions of the former President who happens to have a unique role in the 2016 elections."

So why is Tapper also moderating a CGI panel?

Because that's part of the media-CGI "template," to cite the term of Craig Minassian, chief communications officer for the Clinton Foundation. This template features access to the former president in addition to — or, perhaps, in exchange for — participation in one of the CGI's panel discussions. "There's an understanding that the package has two elements because that's how we've always done it," says Minassian, who indicates that the arrangement dates back to 2006.

The template saw some action earlier this month, when CNN chief international correspondent Christiane Amanpour participated in a CGI event in Marrakesh, Morocco. She interviewed Bill Clinton and moderated a panel discussion on youth and education. The interview made some waves, as Bill Clinton chided "Clinton Cash" author Schweizer: "Even the guy that wrote the book apparently had to admit under questioning that we didn't have a shred of evidence for this, we just thought we would throw it out there and see if it flies. It won't fly!"

The panel discussion on youth and education yielded less striking headlines. It consisted of Amanpour chatting with Chelsea Clinton, vice chair of the Clinton Foundation, along with two others — Kenyan Kennedy Odede, who runs a girls school in Nairobi that's sponsored by the Clinton Foundation, and Tunisian activ ist Asma Mansour. The first question from Amanpour to Chelsea Clinton: "What about your current trip has really staggered you or stood out for you?" Softballs aside, the discussion was thorough, informed and utterly shadowed by the Clinton Foundation iconography on the curtain surrounding panel members:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The panel discussion, as well as the Clinton interview, secured air time on Amanpour's show.

The Clinton Foundation doesn't micromanage the questions posed by the likes of Amanpour or Tapper in these sessions. "We don't put editorial restrictions on interv iews with the president," says Minassian. "We're not try ing to compromise the editorial perspective of the journalist but the reason we're working with news organizations is so that we can get the message and word out about the work that CGI is doing."

At that, CGI has been successful. Though Tapper is the news peg for this go-round, many of his colleagues have plowed this same terrain over the years. Former CNN anchor Piers Morgan, CNN anchor Erin Burnett, former CNBC host Maria Bartiromo, PBS's Charlie Rose, former NBC News anchor David Gregory and others hav e all worked the CGI interview-panel circuit.

Consider that last one. In June 2014, Gregory interviewed Bill Clinton in the aftermath of media buzz about the Clinton family's wealth. In her then-headline-making tour for her book "Hard Choices," Hillary Clinton had madenews with her comment that the family was "not only dead broke, but in debt" after leav ing the White House. When asked about the topic by Gregory at CGI, Bill Clinton said, "It is factually true that we were $7 million in debt."

Gregory also moderated a panel with Clinton and national business leaders on economic issues, portions of which aired on "Meet the Press," not to mention a "Meet the Press Extra".

That's not all, either. MSNBC aired an "extended" version of the panel discussion.

The tradeoff facing media organizations that want a seat at the CGI scene appears stark: You get to interview Bill Clinton one on one. But you have to stick around to do one of our wonky panel discussions — and air the end product. Which brings up an idea — couldn't CNN or NBC News or ABC News simply tell CGI that they'll take Door No. 1 (President Clinton interview) and decline Door No. 2 (panel discussion)? "They could but we wouldn't do it," says Minassian.

Assertive! For Clinton watchers who chronicle the family's transactional nature, log this one in the books. The foundation's people know they have a commodity for which news organizations will negotiate. And the byproduct of the negotiations is extensive exposure for the Clinton Foundation. This should go down in the Philanthropy Book of Best Practices.

It's all a collaborative arrangement, notes Minassian. "Hopefully it works for everybody," he says. "We like to think it's a creative approach. Ev erybody has felt that it gives them access not only to an interview but also to other important voices. . . . Our approach is that CGI is a content platform, where the content is the philanthropic work that all sectors of society are doing."

The Erik Wemple Blog is agnostic about whether CGI is a content platform. In any case, Minassian highlights the ways in which CGI's interests overlap with the media's. For instance, the topic of Amanpour's panel discussion very much tracked on the sort of issues she approaches in her international coverage. The economics topics explored by Gregory's panel, likewise, melded with the fare on "Meet the Press." "We're working with them to create content," say s Minassian.

Yet it's not quite as collaborative as all that. The Clinton Foundation is doing what other global charities only dream of doing, which is to muscle media organizations into promoting and moderating discussions on themes of the charity's choosing. Consider that after more than a decade of holding CGI conferences, the foundation now fields proposals from TV outlets. "The networks have been coming to us for years," says Minassian, noting that CNN last fall approached the foundation about its 2015 plans.

"Working with networks to originate programming from CGI events is just one of the many ways we showcase philanthropic work that's improving the lives of millions of people around the world to as wide an audience as possible,"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Minassian writes in an e-mail. “Since CGI has a long history of conv ening global leaders from all sectors of society, it shouldn’t be surprising that networks approach us about working together to create compelling content. Good news about what’s going right in the world is a tough sell so of course we’re going to take every opportunity to promote it.”

If nothing else, the arrangement places pressure on the networks to tell viewers just who is deciding on the themes of discussion and the guests arrayed on stage. Transparency , that is. Said Tapper in a note to the Erik Wemple Blog: “As I learned from the late, great David Carr and from you when I worked for you at Washington City Paper years ago, transparency is extremely important in journalism. That lesson (and others) I learned during my time at WCP guide me to this day, and that will not change no matter whom I interview.”

Hillary Clinton's dark whisperer is back // Politico // Glenn Thrush - May 22, 2015

Sidney Blumenthal is right back where he wants to be: in the middle of another partisan blood feud with the Vast Right Wing Conspiracy he’s been fighting since the 1990s.

Hillary Clinton’s wartime, peacetime — anytime — confidant has been thrust again into the public eye by disclosures that he had shoveled questionable second-hand intelligence on Libya in 2012 to then-Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, in the form of reports she forwarded to her skeptical Foggy Bottom aides.

The rev elations, contained in 850 pages of emails grudgingly released by Clinton, are likely to earn Blumenthal an appearance before Rep. Trey Gowdy’s Benghazi committee – but they haven’t weakened the bond between the former New Yorker writer and the Clintons, according to a half-dozen people who know both parties. In the words of one longtime Clinton ally, Blumenthal’s involvement in the email mess “has if anything strengthened his position” by underscoring his loy alty and willingness to share inside dope, however flawed — always coin of the realm for the information-hungry Clintons.

Blumenthal’s knack for passing along intriguing tidbits and strategic advice has long given him a position of influence, if not direct operational power, inside Clinton’s inner circle of friends. His now-central role in the Benghazi fight comes as no surprise to allies who have watched with fascination, and not a little alarm, as he’s outlasted a musical-chairs cast of professional Clinton advisers ov er the past 20 years.

Clinton was unapologetic about her relationship with Blumenthal when asked about the emails on Tuesday during a campaign stop in Iowa. “I have many , many old friends, and I always think that it’s important when you get into politics to have friends you had before you were in politics, and to understand what’s on their minds,” she said. “He’s been a friend of mine for a long time.”

People close to Blumenthal say he’s lawyering up, unbowed and eager to fight back. And he’s confident the Clintons will have his back — as part of an informal loyalty pact that extends back to the early 1990s when he defended them in print, often to the dismay of his own editors.

In addition to being a friend, Blumenthal is also on the extended payroll of Clinton Inc., drawing a salary as a strategic adviser to the Clinton family foundation and another from Democratic-aligned advocacy groups run by a powerful Clinton ally.

Blumenthal is no longer in the inner circle of full-time Clinton operatives populated by the likes of Huma Abedin, John Podesta and the increasingly inv olved Chelsea Clinton. He consults with Bill and Hillary Clinton less frequently than he did during the 2008 campaign, when he forged a powerful alliance with Clinton pollster Mark Penn, people close to her tell POLITICO. And campaign officials don’t consider him to be as influential as other key intimates outside the official chain of command, such as superlawyer Cheryl Mills or Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe.

But Blumenthal has been plenty active since Clinton declared her candidacy in March, sharing his insights with the Clintons on the 2016 Republican field and quietly offering opinions on how to battle conservativ e groups to a select group of friends, according to Democratic operatives familiar with his activities.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And Blumenthal still enjoys unmediated access to the former first couple, to the irritation of the candidate's senior staff, especially campaign chairman John Podesta, who chafed at Blumenthal's back-channel access to the first family when he serv ed as chief of staff — and Blumenthal's boss — in the Clinton White House.

When POLITICO reached out for comment, Blumenthal responded by saying he was entirely consumed with finishing the first installment of a four-volume political biography of Abraham Lincoln. "I have cultiv ated patience, and made no attempt at a retort," Blumenthal emailed — Lincoln's statement to critics following his 1858 defeat in the Illinois Senate race to Stephen Douglas.

He has, indeed, thrown himself into book research: When a reporter approached him at a pre-White House Correspondents' Dinner event last month, Blumenthal responded by saying he would be happy to chat — so long as the conversation was confined to the topic of Honest Abe. Then followed a cheerful, erudite and achingly detailed analysis of the political motivations underly ing Lincoln's 1847 speech opposing the Mexican war.

Blumenthal broke his silence on the Benghazi emails late Thursday, issuing a statement through his attorney saying he intended to fully cooperate with congressional investigators and emphasizing the informal nature of his consultations with Clinton. "From time to time, as a private citizen and friend, I prov ided Secretary Clinton with material on a variety of topics that I thought she might find interesting or helpful," he wrote. "The reports I sent her came from sources I considered reliable. I have informed the House Select Committee on Benghazi that I will cooperate with its inquiry and look forward to answering the Committee's questions."

The Benghazi email trov e is probably just a hint of what's out there. Over the y ears, Blumenthal has corresponded more or less constantly with the Clintons, but especially Hillary, on a wide range of topics — not for nothing did he earn the nickname "Grassy Knoll" for spinning dark conspiracy theories during his tenure in the White House during the Lewinsky scandal. Blumenthal's noir, wheels-within-wheels worldview meshed with the first lady's less-than-sunny v iew of the press and Republicans.

In his 2003 chronicle of 1990s life in the White House, "The Clinton Wars," Blumenthal describes feeding Hillary Clinton's appetite for intelligence on her enemies as an operational — and emotional — necessity, a psy chic security blanket that gave her a sense she could survive whatever Republicans threw her way. "Hav ing knowledge restored a sense of normality, even amid the storm," he wrote. "We could see the lines of influence underlying the scandal — the cause and effect, intent and action — and they were political and familiar."

Blumenthal's greatest coup — and the one that cemented his standing as a Clinton loyalist — was the secret recruitment of David Brock, a conservativ e investigative reporter who had done more damage than any other anti-Clinton journalist, as a double agent of sorts in the late 1990s. In 1997, Blumenthal reached out to Brock through a mutual friend and to his surprise, Brock expressed his disgust with the machinations of the right-wing press and the rich conservatives who funded his anti-Clinton work.

The two stuck a friendship. Eventually, Brock flipped sides, developed his own relationship with the Clintons and built a powerful network of Democrat-allied organizations that have made him a major player in party politics. Blumenthal and Brock remain close, and Blumenthal has worked for the Brock-founded Media Matters for America and his super PAC, American Bridge.

One job he couldn't get: an appointment as a formal staff adviser to Clinton at the State Department. Her attempt to bring him on board in 2009 was vehemently opposed by President Barack Obama's team, led by then-chief of staff Rahm Emanuel and press secretary Robert Gibbs, ov er Blumenthal's role in pushing unflattering stories about Obama's drug use and personal life to the media.

Yet, as the Benghazi emails show, Blumenthal and Clinton managed to work together anyway, in typical ov er-the-transom fashion. One could hear the y ou-can't-stop-me in Clinton's voice Tuesday when she defended the correspondence: "He sent me unsolicited emails which I passed on in some instances, and I say that that's just part of the give and take."

The first tranche of emails, revealed Thursday by The New York Times, shows the danger of this sort of informal arrangement: Blumenthal sent then-Secretary Clinton a memo a day after the Benghazi attack claiming that the murderous mob was part of a wav e of protests against a YouTube video that had prompted an attack on the U.S. diplomatic compound in Cairo. Clinton forwarded the email to Jake Sulliv an, a top foreign policy adviser, requesting "More info."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the emails also show that Republicans' hoped-for smoking gun is, at least so far, nowhere to be found: Sullivan responded politely but noncommittally to most of the Blumenthal emails and forwarded the information, at Clinton's request, to the appropriate State Department specialists. There they seem to hav e died.

Despite the fact that Clinton doesn't name Blumenthal as her source in the emails, two former administration officials told POLITICO that Sullivan, who now serv es as the Clinton campaign's policy czar, knew very well that he was her source and that he resented Blumenthal's freelancing.

"Jake was too nice to tell the secretary what he really thought," said one former senior national security official. "But he was really pissed off that Sid was wasting everybody's time."

Still, Sulliv an is discovering what other Clinton hirelings have known for years: Bill and Hillary think Sid's time, advice and dish are yet valuable.

Clinton's 'Secret' Email Accounts // Fact Check // Eugene Kiely - May 22, 2015

The Republican National Committee thinks it has the smoking gun that prov es Hillary Clinton used "multiple secret email addresses" as secretary of state. It doesn't.

The RNC made its claim in a May 18 blog post hours after the New York Times published copies of emails that Clinton had sent and received when she was secretary. The emails displayed two accounts: hdr22@clintonemail.com and hrod17@clintonemail.com . That seemed to clearly contradict Clinton's claim that she used only hdr22@clintonemail.com while in office, which was from January 2009 to February 2013.

But the Clinton campaign says there is a simple explanation for this apparent discrepancy: The emails published by the Times were printed out in 2014 after Clinton had left the State Department and after she had changed her email address, so the printed copies of emails she sent while in office display her new address (hrod17@clintonemail.com), even though they were originally sent under her old address (hdr22@clintonemail.com). We agree that this is possible.

The Clinton explanation passed two tests — including one conducted for us by Ray Tomlinson, the man who is widely credited with inv enting email.

Tomlinson ran an optical character recognition on the PDF of the emails that the Times posted to its website, and what he found is consistent with the Clinton campaign's explanation for what happened.

We at FactCheck.org also tested Clinton's explanation. Our IT staff created originaluser@asc.upenn.edu and renamed it newuser@asc.upenn.edu . An email sent by originaluser@asc.upenn.edu printed out as if it had come from newuser@asc.upenn.edu after we changed the name of the email account.

Tom Conte, a professor at the Schools of Electrical & Computer Engineering and Computer Science at Georgia Institute of Technology and president of the IEEE Computer Society, said Clinton's explanation is "technically possible" and that our test "proves it."

@clintonemail.com

As most know by now, Clinton did not use the gov ernment email sy stem while secretary of state. Instead, she used a priv ate server and email account. This unusual arrangement — first detailed March 2 by the New York Times — triggered a political firestorm.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republicans have accused Clinton of seeking to avoid public disclosure of her emails on controversial issues, such as the Sept. 11, 2012, attack on the temporary consulate in Benghazi that resulted in the deaths of four Americans, including U.S. Ambassador to Liby a Chris Stevens. For her part, Clinton has said that her email arrangements were a matter of convenience, and that the "v ast majority of my work emails went to government employees at their government addresses," so they were preserved at the State Department.

The issue of how many private email accounts Clinton used was first raised by a special House committee inv estigating Benghazi.

On March 4, two day s after the Times disclosed Clinton's exclusive use of personal emails to conduct official business, the Select Committee on Benghazi said it was "in possession of records with two separate and distinct email addresses used by former Secretary Clinton and dated during the time she was Secretary of State." At the time, the House committee declined our request to provide us with the second email address.

Why does it matter how many private email accounts Clinton had? The Republicans question whether Clinton has been forthcoming in turning over all the documents related to Benghazi. Clinton turned over 55 ,000 pages of emails to the State Department in December 2014, her office confirmed after the Times story appeared.

The existence of hdr22@clintonemail.com has been public knowledge since March 2013, a month after she left office. But the existence of hrod17 @clintonemail.com became public when the New York Times on May 18 and May 21 published copies of the printed emails.

On May 18, the RNC wrote that the emails published by the Times contradicted a claim by Clinton's lawy er that she used only one @clintonemail.com email account as secretary of state. Clinton's lawy er David Kendall sent a letter on March 27 to Rep. Trey Gowdy, the chairman of the Benghazi committee, that said " 'hrod17@clintonemail.com ' is not an address that existed during Secretary Clinton's tenure as Secretary of State."

On May 20, House Speaker John Boehner's spokesman Matt Wolking wrote that Kendall's response to the committee is "completely false." He wrote, "The address hrod17@clintonemail.com did exist while she was Secretary of State, according to emails from 2011 and 2012 published by The New York Times on Monday."

Conservative websites were abuzz with claims that Clinton was "caught in another email lie," as Breitbart put it.

The Blaze embedded several emails (like the one below) into its news article and said, "Multiple emails show Clinton used account "hrod17@clintonemail.com " while serving in the Obama administration as secretary of state."

But all is not what it seems.

What the Ev idence Shows and Experts Say

When we contacted the Clinton campaign about the apparent discrepancy, we were referred to an explanation that was first contained in a Q&A issued by the campaign on March 10. The question and answer addressed the allegation, made by the Benghazi committee, that Clinton had two private email addresses:

Why did the Select Committee announce that she used multiple email addresses during her tenure?

In fairness to the Committee, this was an honest misunderstanding. Secretary Clinton used one email account during her tenure at State (with the exception of her first weeks in office while transitioning from an email account she had previously used). In March 2013, a month after she left the Department, Gawker published the email address she used while Secretary, and so she had to change the address on her account.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At the time the printed copies were provided to the Department last year, because it was the same account, the new email address established after she left office appeared on the printed copies as the sender, and not the address she used as Secretary. In fact, this address on the account did not exist until March 2013. This led to understandable confusion that was cleared up directly with the Committee after its press conference.

Kendall, in his letter to the committee, identified the new email address established in March 2013 as hrod17@clintonemail.com .

But why would the emails — including the one we display above — show hrod17@clintonemail.com as the sender if it came from hdr22@clintonemail.com ? Is that even technically possible?

We consulted four computer experts, and all agreed that it was possible. There is one example in the trove of emails that the Times posted online that proves it is possible. That's a May 6, 2011, email from Clinton to Jake Sullivan, who at the time was her deputy chief of staff and director of policy planning.

On page 31 of the New York Times' PDF of Clinton's emails is a print copy of Clinton's email to Sullivan that shows Clinton's email address as hrod17@clintonemail.com (the one she says was created after she left office). But that same email also appears on page 35 of the PDF as part of an email exchange with Sullivan (who had responded to her), and the email address for Clinton in that case is displayed as hdr22@clintonemail.com .

"This string of email messages proves the Clinton team's explanation is true," said Conte, the president of the IEEE Computer Society.

The reason, he said, is simple: The hdr22@clintonemail.com address that is part of the email string is now static text, so it wouldn't change. That means that the email originated from hdr22@clintonemail.com . But the address on the printed version of just Clinton's email to Sullivan would be populated with the new email address because that is an active data field — giving the illusion that it came from hrod17@clintonemail.com .

We asked our IT staffers to see if they could recreate the same behavior, and they did. They created an email account called originaluser@asc.upenn.edu , exchanged emails with this author and then changed the name of the account to newuser@asc.upenn.edu . The emails were then printed out by the sender after the account was renamed. The results are below.

The first email sent on Thursday, May 21, at 12:26 p.m. displays originaluser@asc.upenn.edu as the sender, because it was part of an email string and was static text:

But that same email appeared to be sent from newuser@asc.upenn.edu when it was printed out separately:

Original

The steps that we followed for the test were the same as those suggested by Tomlinson, who was inducted into the Internet Hall of Fame for inventing email.

Tomlinson conducted a separate test that weighs in support of Clinton's claim. He used optical character recognition (OCR) to convert the Times' PDF of the Clinton emails into searchable text. He said "the 37 messages that were purportedly sent from H have hrod17@clintonemail.com in the From: field. No such message is From: hdr22. hdr22 appears only in the From: field of 15 messages that were included in a received message. All such messages contained in replies to H are from hdr22 and no such message contained in replies to H are from hrod17."

He said that outcome is consistent with the Clinton campaign's "statement that the messages originally sent from H appear in the pdf as if they were sent from hrod17. There are no counterexamples."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The RNC noted that IT expert Bruce Webster told the Daily Caller that Clinton's explanation "made no sense." But the conserv ative website also quoted Webster as saying it is possible with servers hosted by Microsoft Exchange — which, as it turns out, is the serv er that we used for our test.

Tomlinson initially also told us that the Clinton explanation was "not a completely natural outcome," even if it is possible. But after we told Tomlinson of our test and sent him our results, he replied: "Your experiment may refute that last statement."

This doesn't prove, of course, that Clinton did not have more than one @clintonemail.com address while secretary of state. All four experts told us the only way to know for sure how many @clintonemail.com accounts Clinton had while in office is to conduct a forensic examination of her mail server. (Clinton has said she will not make her personal server available to the gov ernment or an independent third party.)

"The best way to obtain all of the facts about these emails would be for a third party forensic examiner to conduct an examination of Ms. Clinton's mail server and desktop system," said Jonathan Zdziarski, forensics expert and author of the book "iPhone Forensics: Recovering Evidence, Personal Data, and Corporate Assets." "That could easily determine what email addresses existed at approximately what dates, possibly even when they were changed, as well as retrieve the original email env elopes and content."

What we do know, however, is that the emails posted by the Times do not support the RNC's claim that Clinton had "multiple secret email addresses" as secretary of state, and there is no evidence to contradict Clinton's claim that she created hrod17@clintonemail.com after she left office.

Clinton N.H. trip interrupted by Benghazi e-mail release // Boston Globe // James Pindell - May 22, 2015

HAMPTON, N.H. – Hillary Rodham Clinton said she was pleased the State Department released hundreds of e-mails she sent from a priv ate server in the days following an attack in Benghazi, Libya, that left four Americans, including a US ambassador dead.

On Friday the State Department released 900 pages of e-mails, which they characterized as not contradicting an official review on what went wrong during the September 2012 attack. After a presidential campaign event in New Hampshire, Clinton told reporters these e-mails had already been sent to a House Committee inv estigating the Benghazi matter.

"I'm glad that the e-mails are starting to come out," Clinton said. "It is something that I've asked to be done, as you know, for a long time. Those releases are beginning."

The moment served as just another reminder of how difficult it will be for Clinton to move on from e-mail scandals during her tenure as US secretary of state. With cases of beer and kegs serv ing as Clinton's backdrop, a chorus of vibrating phone news alerts interrupted her roundtable with small business leaders at Smuttynose Brewery Co.

Later during her trip Friday, her second to the state since launching her campaign for president, she went to a grass-roots event at a bookstore in Exeter. She is scheduled to attend a similar event in Amherst later.

Earlier in the day, the Clinton campaign hoped she could seize some attention in calling for Republican presidential candidates to back reauthorizing the US Export-Import bank. The bank helps underwrite loans for American businesses selling abroad. Some Republicans say the bank doesn't create American jobs, arguing that the bulk of the loans benefit just a handful of major companies like Boeing and Caterpillar.

At her noontime event, Clinton argued that Republicans who espouse this position are "embarrassing."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

About 50 people attended her appearance at the brewery, which was invitation only — like the rest of her events so far as a candidate. The Clinton campaign has been criticized for not holding a single public event in Iowa or New Hampshire

Clinton addressed some of that criticism at her second stop of the day at a Water Street Bookstore in downtown Exeter.

“Some people had asked me, particularly in the press, when are you going to have really big events. And I said later, later, later. I want to listen to people. I want to talk to people on small groups,” Clinton said. “What I want to do is to make sure that we have a conversation about what we want to accomplish in our country and this is the way I feel most comfortable doing it.”

Dozens of supporters gathered outside the bookstore on the sidewalks for her arrival. More fans awaited inside, including one with a sign that read: “Welcome home to New Hampshire.”

Apparently, those who show initiative can make their way onto the guest list.

For example, earlier this week, Trinette Hunter, 13, of Henniker, N.H., told her mother it was her dream to have dinner with Clinton. When she was 5, her mother, Jessica Gorhan, took her into the voting booth to pull the lever for Clinton in the 2008 New Hampshire primary.

This week, Gorhan called the brewery to ask how to get in, and the Clinton campaign got in touch with her. After the event, Hunter and her mom were among about 50 people lined up to take pictures with Clinton and get her autograph.

“It was awesome,” Hunter said.

Insiders: Benghazi testimony works to Hillary's advantage // Politico // Katie Glueck - May 22, 2015

Three out of four Democratic insiders in the early states believe testifying before Congress about the attacks on the U.S. consulate in Benghazi, Libya, will work to Hillary Clinton’s advantage.

This week’s survey of The POLITICO Caucus, a bipartisan group of the most influential activists, operatives and elected officials in Iowa and New Hampshire, found that most Democrats think it would be beneficial to Clinton when she is called to discuss the matter before Congress, something she is expected to do at some point, likely this summer.

Story Continued Below

Earlier this week, Sidney Blumenthal, a Clinton ally, was subpoenaed by a House committee investigating the incident, which in the past has been a major galvanizing issue for Republicans critical of Clinton’s role when she was secretary of state.

Democrats were skeptical that Clinton would get a fair hearing, but were confident she would do a good job shutting down questioners in the hopes of moving on from the issue.

“Republicans prefer the safety of manufactured outrage on Benghazi. In person, I think Clinton will crush their questions,” said an Iowa Democrat.

Added a New Hampshire Democrat, “As she has proven many times before, Hillary is not afraid to testify and is a very good witness; she will walk out of the hearing room enhanced.”

A majority of Republicans — nearly 60 percent — also said it would be helpful for Clinton to address the issue head-on (she appeared before Congress once before on this issue in 2013). Several Republicans warned some in their party could overdo the confrontation, which could work to Clinton's advantage if she appears to be answering questions openly and honestly.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"It is a real opportunity for her to face this and defuse it—the R's will not be able to resist the temptation to gang up and it may actually engender some sympathy for her, hard as that is to imagine," said a New Hampshire Republican.

Another Granite State Republican acknowledged, "Hillary is at her strongest when she answers her critics head-on. She should embrace it — and hope her opponents overplay their hands. Which they could do, easily."

An Iowa Republican added, "Do not underestimate the ability of Republican House members to overplay their hand and appear more focused on scoring partisan points than ascertaining the truth."

The issue of Clinton's handling of the Benghazi tragedy itself appears to have faded slightly from the minds of GOP primary voters, though one nonpartisan Iowan said that if the former secretary of state testifies, "The testimony keeps the story alive and in the newspapers on a daily basis. Also continues to give Republicans reason to talk about it on the campaign trail."

Still, 74 percent of Democrats and 22 percent of Republicans — including one-third of the 15 New Hampshire Republicans who responded this week — say that the Benghazi attack is not quite as much of a hot-button issue for the GOP base as it was in the aftermath of the attacks and during the 2014 midterm elections.

"The nut job conspiracy theorists on the fringe love the issue. Everyone else sees shades of gray in a horrible, messy, tragic situation, and how it was handled," said a New Hampshire Republican. "Could have happened just as easily in a Republican administration."

An Iowa Republican who also thinks the issue has faded, reacted very differently, saying, "Sadly I think many people have forgotten about the issue. Perhaps with congressional hearings and a campaign it will again gain attention."

In any case, the issue still moves the dial, according to 78 percent of Republicans surveyed. "It's a rally cry that still unifies activists," an Iowa Republican said.

Here are four other takeaways from this week's POLITICO Caucus:

The furor surrounding the release of Clinton's emails isn't breaking through … yet.

A judge ruled this week that the emails Clinton sent from a personal account during her time at the State Department should be released on a rolling basis. Clinton herself also said this week that she wants the emails, which have been the subject of significant controversy because she sent government communications through a personal account, released as soon as possible. But 96 percent of Democrats and about one-third of Republicans say voters aren't paying much attention yet.

"So Beltway," yawned an Iowa Democrat. Another one added, "Second-rate Clinton 'scandals' are like seasonal allergies: predictable and annoying but not concerning."

A New Hampshire Democrat said, "[This] is reporter-land territory, not kitchen table people land territory."

Republicans saw the extended scrutiny of her emails as potentially more damaging. But one New Hampshire Republican noted, "This has drawn out (and will continue to draw out) so long that people have become numb to it, regardless of the seriousness of the issue."

Still, said other Republicans, reminders that Clinton was using her own email to do official government business reinforce problematic narratives — that the Clintons are secretive and see themselves as above the law.

"Democrats try to dismiss the email scandal as white noise and Beltway chatter, but the saga reinforces with voters all the worst attributes of the Clintons: secrecy, arrogance, hypocrisy and one set of rules for them and a different for every one else," said a New Hampshire Republican who believes the issue is hurting Clinton. "… Undercutting and discrediting Clinton's secretary of state bona fides is going to be a big part of the GOP strategy for defeating her in 2016, and the emails are going to play a key role in that process."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republicans don't want to see a crowded debate stage — and Democrats are gleeful at the prospect.

Close to 20 Republicans could seek the GOP nomination this year, and many campaigns are obsessing ov er which candidates will make the cut and whether the standards for inclusion in the debates are fair. On Wednesday, it became clear that the television networks would set the rules for some of the early debates. Before that news broke, insiders were asked whether every one should be allowed onstage — and 87 percent of Republicans said no. But many also said that finding the right threshold for inclusion would be a daunting task.

"There is no good answer but whoever picks should get armed protection for the rest of his or her natural life," said one New Hampshire Republican.

Others suggested fundraising and polling thresholds, but recognized that there was no way to placate all the campaigns. So far, Fox News and CNN have indicated that polling averages will be a factor.

"You probably have to use polling and fundraising parameters, but the candidates will scream about it," added another Republican Granite Stater.

Democrats, on the other hand, relish the prospect of messy debates marked by long-shot GOP candidates taking v aluable time away from more viable contenders.

"Please include every single one — please!" urged one Iowa Democrat.

Another offered, "The crazier the candidate, the more air time they should get."

Insiders on both sides were preoccupied by the question of whether Donald Trump would qualify to compete.

"Filed presidential committee (to smoke out Trump once and for all)," should be a key criterion, advised one Iowa Republican.

Jeb Bush's Iraq headache isn't over y et.

Last week, Bush fumbled several attempts to answer the question of whether he would have invaded Iraq if he had known at the time of intelligence failures. Ultimately he spelled out that he wouldn't have, and he was back on the campaign trail this week seeking to bounce back. But 61 percent of Republicans and 85 percent of Democrats say he has not put the issue behind him.

"He's able to mov e on and talk about other things, but that clip is going to come back to bite him one way or the other in the next seven months," said an Iowa Republican.

"The video lasts forever," added an Iowa Democrat.

Hillary Clinton was also asked about her Iraq position this week, an issue that plagued her during the 2008 primary. But she called her Senate vote authorizing the war a mistake, and 80 percent of Democrats surveyed this week said that's good enough for them.

Rick Santorum shouldn't expect a repeat of his 2012 performance.

The former Pennsylvania senator, who in 2012 won the Iowa caucuses and stayed in the Republican primary far longer than expected, is expected to announce another presidential bid next week. But an overwhelming majority of Republican insiders surveyed — 93 percent — said he won't match or outpace his performance from last time. Forty-one percent said Texas Sen. Ted Cruz is in the best position to win social conserv atives in Iowa and New Hampshire, followed by Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker at 23 percent, and former Arkansas Gov . Mike Huckabee at 18 percent. Santorum got 2 percent.

Clinton emails show concern about image after Benghazi // Reuters // Mark Hosenball and Alistar Bell - May 22, 2015

Top aides to former U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton fretted over how she would be portrayed after the 2012 Benghazi attacks that killed the U.S. ambassador to Libya and three other Americans, emails released on Friday showed.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The emails from Clinton's personal email account made public by the State Department do not appear to contain any revelations that could badly damage her bid for the presidency in 2016 or prov ide fodder for Republicans who accuse her of being negligent before the Benghazi attacks.

But they offer a glimpse into how Clinton's team was concerned about her image immediately afterward.

A senior adv iser to Clinton forwarded an email from a State Department official about positive media coverage of a statement she gave on Sept. 12, 2012, the day after the killings.

"Really nice work guys," State Department official Matthew Walsh wrote in an email to other staffers, which linked to a story on the Slate news site praising Clinton's comments about Benghazi as "her most eloquent news conference as secretary of state." Sullivan passed the email on to Clinton with the letters "FYI."

In another email from September 2012, Sullivan assured the secretary of state that she had used the correct language to describe the lead-up to the Benghazi attack by Islamist militants on a U.S. diplomatic compound and CIA base.

The U.S. ambassador to the United Nations at the time, Susan Rice, drew heav y criticism from Republicans for defending this view on Sunday TV shows, ev en though intelligence indicated within hours that the attacks were the carefully planned work of Islamist militia members.

Sullivan assured Clinton that her language when discussing the attacks in public had been correct.

"You never said spontaneous or characterized the motives, in fact you were careful in your first statement to say we were assessing motive and method," he wrote in an email.

Long a focus of Republican investigators in Congress, accusations that Clinton was negligent on Benghazi are putting her under more intense scrutiny now that she is running for the Democratic Party nomination in the 2016 presidential election.

Republicans say the Obama administration was lax about the security of U.S. personnel in Libya and then misled the public about the nature of the attacks, but various congressional probes have produced little damaging evidence.

State Department spokeswoman Marie Harf said that the 296 emails released on Friday "do not change the essential facts or our understanding of the events before, during or after the attacks."

They were the first installment of a rolling release of 5 5,000 pages of emails from her time as secretary of state between 2009 and 2013 that are due to be released in the coming months.

Clinton or her aides have deleted another 30,000 emails which she has termed as personal from the same private account, causing Republicans in Congress to accuse her of picking and choosing what she wants to make public.

Rep. Trey Gowdy, the Republican who heads the Benghazi probe in the House of Representatives, said the emails made public on Friday "continue to reinforce the fact that unresolved questions and issues remain as it relates to Benghazi."

"The best way to answer all questions related to the attacks in Benghazi continues to be having access to the full public record, not a 'record' controlled, possessed and screened exclusively by Secretary Clinton's personal lawyers," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

First Batch of Hillary Clinton's Emails on Libya Made Public // NBC News // CARRIE DANN - May 22, 2015

A batch of Hillary Clinton's personal emails made public on Thursday morning offers a glimpse into her team's initial exchange of information in the wake of the Benghazi attacks as well as her relationship with longtime confidante Sidney Blumenthal, who sent her at least two dozen memos regarding Liby a during her tenure as Secretary of State.

The State Department plans to release about 850 pages of the emails, which had been handed over to the congressional panel investigating the Benghazi attacks. But on Thursday, the New York Times released about a third of that batch of correspondence, which Clinton exchanged using a private server rather than a government email account.

The documents show that, while Clinton used her personal email account to receive information the gov ernment calls "sensitive," she did not appear to use her priv ate server to exchange classified information.

The "sensitive" information included details like the location of State Department officials in Libya during a time of instability in the country in 2011.

The documents released by the New York Times also show that Clinton received numerous briefing memos about Libya from Blumenthal, a longtime friend of the Clintons who was not employed by the State Department. The New York Times reported earlier this week that Blumenthal was also involved with a possible business venture in the country at the time.

Two of those memos from Blumenthal came in the day s immediately following the September 11, 2012 Benghazi attacks.

In one, sent on September 12, Blumenthal suggested that top security officers in the country believed that the attacks "were inspired by what many devout Libyan viewed as a sacrilegious internet video on the prophet Mohammed originating in America." Clinton forwarded that information to top adviser Jake Sullivan with the message "more info."

But another memo sent the following day indicated that the attacks may have actually been carried out by a militia group. Blumenthal wrote that officials in the country "believe that the attackers having prepared to launch their assault took advantage of the cover prov ided by the demonstrations in Benghazi protesting an internet production seen as disrespectful to the prophet Mohammed."

The release of the emails comes after a prolonged political fight for Clinton ov er her use of a private email server while serv ing as Secretary of State.

On Tuesday, Clinton urged the State Department to expedite the vetting of the emails after initial reports suggested that the data trove would not be ready for public release until January of next year.

Clinton says she's not running for a 'third term' of her husband or Obama // WaPo // Robert Costa - May 22, 2015

EXETER, N.H. -- Hillary Rodham Clinton on Friday sought to distance herself somewhat from both her husband, a previous president, and Barack Obama, the current White House occupant who defeated her in 2008.

"I'm not running for my husband's third term and I'm not running for Barack Obama's third term," Clinton said here, where she met with activists. "I'm running to continue the positive results oriented policies that both of them worked for."

Clinton is attempting a balancing act between highlighting her own identity as a former U.S. senator and secretary of state while embracing many of the policies of her Democratic predecessors, especially Obama. With her husband, Clinton has already notably deviated from policies enacted or expanded under Bill Clinton by embracing gay marriage and calling for an end to harsh criminal sentencing policies that took root in the 1990s.

During her second trip to New Hampshire, Hillary Clinton also defended the low-key beginnings of her presidential campaign, which hav e focused on tightly controlled meetings with handpicked activists and supporters in Iowa and New Hampshire. The Clinton campaign announced Thursday that she would hold her first big campaign rally and speech event in mid-June.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Some people had asked me, particularly in the press, when are you going to have really big ev ents," Clinton said. "And I said later, later, later. I want to listen to people. I want to talk to people on small groups."

Hillary Clinton defends emails, slams GOP's small business agenda // MSNBC // Alex Seitz - Wald - May 22, 2015

HAMPTON, New Hampshire – After declaring in Iowa earlier this week that she wants to be "a small-business president," Hillary Clinton came to a craft brewery here Friday to slam Republicans for trying to kill what she called a crucial institution for small companies. She also answered questions from reporters on the ongoing controversy over her private email account, moments after the State Department released almost 300 of them. Clinton said all the information in the emails was "handled appropriately."

Her comments came after a roundtable discussion at Smuttynose brewery here, where she defended the Export-Impact bank, which she said supports 164,000 American jobs.

"It is wrong that Republicans in Congress are trying to cut off this vital lifeline for American small businesses," she said "Republican candidates for president who really should know better are jumping on this bandwagon, and it seems as though they would rather threaten the livelihood of those 143,000 jobs than stand up to the Tea Party and talk radio."

She called the attacks on the Export-Import bank "wrong" "embarrassing" and "absolutely backwards."

Long a noncontroversial government agency, the Export-Import bank, which helps companies engaged in international trade secure financing, has lately become a top target for some libertarian-leaning conservative. Tea Party activists and others view the bank as "crony capitalism," and have mounted several attempts to kill it in Congress.

New Hampshire is an exporting state, and Clinton said the Export-Import bank helps many local businesses around the state.

Fred Hochberg, the Obama-appointee who runs the Export-Import bank, is a longtime Clinton donor and was one of her top bundlers during her 2008 presidential campaign. He also ran the Small Business Administration under the presidency of Clinton's husband.

As she did at a similar event at a bike shop in Iowa Tuesday, Clinton noted that her own father was small businessman. Hugh Rodham owned a tapestry business in suburban Chicago, where Clinton grew up, and taught her the value of hard work and entrepreneurship, she said.

But even as Clinton laid out her message here, questions swirled nationally over her use of a private email account while she served as Secretary of State.

In the middle of her event here, the State Department released its first batch of Clinton's emails – 296 documents put online about 30 minutes after she began her remarks.

After the event, Clinton, took questions from the press for the second time this week. She defended her use of private emails after being asked by NBC's Andrea Mitchell.

"All of the information in the emails has handled appropriately," she replied, adding that she was glad the emails are coming out. “I want people to be able to see all of them.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It’s expected to take months for all 55,000 pages of email Clinton turned over to State to be fully released. Asked if she was worried that people don’t trust her after the email issue, she replied only, “I’m going to let the Americans decide that.” Meanwhile, thursday night, the Clinton Foundation also disclosed information on 97 speeches Bill, Hillary, and Chelsea Clinton gave on behalf of the charity since 2002. The speeches, mostly from Bill Clinton, raised between $12 million and $26 million for the charity’s work from a wide range of companies, banks, univ ersities, and nonprofits.

Also that night, Sidney Blumenthal, the former Clinton White House adv isor who sent Secretary Clinton intelligence-like reports on Libya before and after the Benghazi terror attack, defended himself and said he had agreed to testify before a House committee investigating Benghazi in a statement Thursday night.

Clinton also met with grassroots organizers in New Hampshire Friday. She heads to South Carolina and Florida next week.

In a War-T orn Middle East, Clinton’s Legacy in T unisia Is a Bit Brighter // Newsweek // Emily Cadei - May 22, 2015

Hillary Clinton was secretary of state on December 10, 2010, when a street vendor named Mohamed Bouazizi set himself on fire, lighting a fuse that became the Arab Spring. When the new Tunisian president, Beji Caid Essebsi, v isited the White House Thursday, the country remained the only real democracy left standing out of the uprisings across the Middle East and North Africa earlier this decade. As Essebsi observed in public remarks Wednesday in Washington, D.C., “There is actually no such thing as an Arab Spring. There is a Tunisian spring.”

So, sure, Libya, Egy pt and Sy ria didn’t work out. But maybe little Tunisia is Clinton’s State Department success story, the example of a foreign policy accomplishment that has proven so elusive, even to her supporters. Let’s take stock.

Tunisia has never been a focus of American foreign policy the way, say , Egypt or Jordan have been. It’s just not as important from a security standpoint, and its cultural and economic ties have traditionally been much stronger with Europe, which lies just across the Mediterranean. So when the uprising in Tunisia toppled dictator Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali in early 201 1, sparking a wav e of protests elsewhere in the region, Clinton and her team at the State Department had to scramble to respond.

According to the Congressional Research Service, the United States has allocated over $610 million in aid to Tunisia since 2011, equivalent to over 40 times what U.S. aid was in fiscal y ear 2009. Much of the early money was to stabilize the country and help with the democratic transition. But as Clinton, herself, pointed out during a visit to the country in March 2011, “It’s not just about the politics, because what sparked the Tunisian contagion was a terrible incident of a young man taking his own life out of such desperation because he saw no future.” Economic reforms, she said, were key, including “opening up the system, creating more entrepreneurs, people like those who started this station and more businesses, employ more young people who are educated.”

Tunisia’s economy , however, isn’t in great shape. Economic growth,according to the African Development Bank, was just 2.6 percent in 2013, lower than projected and a dip from 2012. And many of the programs that Clinton and other Obama administration officials touted early on, saying they’d help kick-start the economy, are decidedly works in progress. Take the Tunisian-American Enterprise Fund, one of the signature efforts, which Clinton and others said would promote private investment in the country. The U.S. government has provided $60 million in funding, but has made just one $2.4 million investment, in a private equity fund, according to a Gov ernment Accountability Office report. Another early initiativ e was to submit Tunisia for a major grant through the Millennium Challenge Corporation, a U.S. aid agency . That never materialized amid criticism from the development community and Congress.

At a more general level, the United States has also struggled, under Secretary Clinton and her successor, John Kerry, to keep Tunisia on the front burner, despite its symbolism as the cradle of the Arab Spring. Middle East expert Amy Hawthorne, who worked at the State Department on the response to the uprisings until 2013, says it was apparent to her that “Secretary Clinton was quite interested in Tunisia.” She signaled to staff there that “this is a priority; we need to put a spotlight on this country.”

Clinton wasn’t able to overcome some harsh realities, however. In an era of fiscal austerity, few politicians in Washington were eager to dump a lot of money into a North African country of just 11 million people. And with major conflicts exploding elsewhere in the region at the same time, Washington was consumed with crisis management. Tunisia, too, felt the impact of the chaos next door in Libya, with a steady flow of refugees, weapons and militants across its border (and some of the blame for that could arguably fall at Clinton's feet given her support for the invasion there). And then Tunisia, itself, was unstable, going through a series of interim governments.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

None of those things are very conducive to economic rebirth. The fact is, the type of economic development Clinton and the State Department talked up are slow and grinding in the best of times. There "wasn't really an appreciation of how long these takes," says Hawthorne, now senior fellow at the Atlantic Council, a think tank. "These things were really oversold."

And yet, Tunisia is still standing. The country adopted a relatively liberal new constitution in January 2014 and held free and fair elections later that year, won by Essebsi and his secular Nidaa Tounes party. Its relationship with the United States is strong and growing stronger. During Essebsi's visit to the White House Thursday, President Obama announced his intent to designate Tunisia as a major non-NATO ally. The White House has proposed doubling foreign aid to Tunisia this year. The president and Essebsi also penned a joint op-ed in the Washington Post, hailing the fact that "democracy and pluralism are taking root" in the country.

As Hawthorne observes, "Whenever an authoritarian leader falls from power suddenly, it's really tumultuous. Tunisia is doing pretty well, but it hasn't been easy." There have been failures, and progress has come in fits and starts. But there are signs of progress, and that started during Clinton's tenure at State.

Hillary Clinton Takes It to the People // US News // David Cantanese - May 22, 2015

Hillary Clinton's animus toward the press was born long before her failed run for the presidency in 2008, and even before the painful impeachment trial of her husband a decade earlier.

It dates back even further, to those early days in Arkansas around when Bill Clinton lost the governorship after just one term in 1980, stunning the couple and suspending their dogged political ascendancy.

Ellen Brantley, who went to college with Hillary at Wellesley and was later appointed an Arkansas state judge by Bill, explained it to The New Yorker in 1994.

"She has always really disliked the press. Her attitude is, 'We're the ones who are trying to accomplish some good, we're doing the best we can, we're on the right side – so stop taking potshots at us. And, especially, don't raise anything during a campaign.'"

Flash-forward more than two decades to her own political comeback, and it's no surprise Clinton has not made reporters a priority as she ramps up her candidacy.

"If she's decided not to speak to the press, she has her reasons," Brantley told U.S. News this week.

The difference is, back then, Clinton needed to cultivate the media to achieve her political goals. Now, in the opening stages of her 2016 campaign, she is universally known, obsessively covered and the overwhelming front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination. She simply doesn't have to.

While Republicans have piled on Clinton for answering only approximately 20 questions from reporters since launching her bid, the former secretary of state is countering by highlighting her direct contact with everyday Americans, whom she says, in turn, are altering her message and priorities as a candidate.

"Somebody asked me the other day, 'Well, you know, you're going to these events where you're taking time to actually talk and listen to people. Is that what you're really going to do?'" Clinton said Monday at a home in Mason City, Iowa. "And I said, 'Well, yes, it is. Because not only do I learn a lot, but I also feel like it's the best way to make those connections that will not only give me a firm foundation in the caucus here in Iowa or in a primary in New Hampshire – because it really is about people-to-people connections ... but it will also give me the kind of information I need to be an even better president."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Correct The Record, an effort launched by pro-Clinton super PAC American Bridge 21st Century , has outlined more than 100 questions Clinton has asked supporters who have attended her round-tables in Iowa, New Hampshire and Nev ada. But even by their count, she had fielded only 20 queries from these "everyday Americans" through Monday.

As concerns continued to mount this week about the fundraising pursuits of the Clinton Foundation during her time as the country's top diplomat and the revelation of a second private email addressshe used during her tenure, the demand for a substantive exchange with Clinton reached a boiling point.

"Why won't you answer any questions?" Fox News Channel's Ed Henry shouted at Clinton Monday as she climbed into a traveling v an positioned safely away from reporters.

On Tuesday in Cedar Rapids, Henry interrupted Clinton in the middle of a small business round-table, complaining that "we haven't heard from you in a month."

Raising her open hand up in his direction, she replied, "Maybe when I finish talking to the people here."

Henry 's gambit worked, forcing Clinton later into a semicircle of hungry reporters, where she fielded seven questions in five minutes. She called her vote as a U.S. senator to authorize the Iraq War a "mistake" and asked the State Department to expedite the process for releasing her emails.

Her very act of engaging the press was enough to prompt a breaking news chyron by CNN: "Just In: Hillary Clinton Takes Questions."

But these types of rapid-fire rope line interactions aren't conducive to the follow-ups or depth required to penetrate controv ersial issues. Unlike ev ery one of the Republicans contemplating presidential bids, Clinton hasn't done a sit-down interview with even a local reporter since formalizing her candidacy.

What's more, she appears largely unmoved by the pressure thus far, seeing little need to appease a frustrated press corps whose complaints are far from the minds of those "everyday Americans" who will ultimately determine her fate.

Hav ing absorbed years of battle wounds, her respect for the media likely has only declined since she was pitching her husband's health care reform initiative in 1993 and referred to the "unjust, inaccurate reporting that goes on from coast to coast, north to south, east to west."

Stuart Stevens, Mitt Romney 's chief strategist in 2012, thinks Clinton has simply surveyed the scars from her 2008 campaign and made a calculus of risk over reward.

"The only thing that matters is what the numbers tell you, and if the numbers tell you y ou can get away with not talking to the press, don't talk to the press," he says. "If they're winning, it's OK. If they 're losing, they'd do some regression analysis to see if there's any causality. Until there is some reason to change, they won't change. What they're betting on is the press doesn't matter."

On the other side of the campaign, the press has mattered, and the risk-reward equation has come out negatively for some. Republicans Jeb Bush and Marco Rubio recently sat for those longer interviews but found they didn't necessarily serve them well. It was a conversation with Fox's Megyn Kelly that produced Bush's befuddling Iraq answer, which metastasized into the former Florida governor's worst week as a potential presidential candidate.

Rubio's sit-down with Fox's Chris Wallace similarly produced a combative back-and-forth that exposed flaws in the Florida senator's defense of the 2003 decision to go to war.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But, unlike Clinton, both Bush and Rubio are wrestling for every potential inch of support in a wide-open primary battle for their party's nomination. The accessibility deficit between Clinton and the GOPers is, at least in part, due to a lack of robust Democratic competition.

"The Republicans, because there's so many of them, are straining for attention," says Iowa Democratic National Committeeman Scott Brennan, a former state party chairman who defended Clinton.

"She can't win. The problem is, when she ran in the 2008 cy cle, the criticism was she didn't talk to real Iowans. She had big rallies, giant press events. They heard that criticism and are out talking to Iowans and now they get criticized for talking to Iowans," Brennan adds.

Most of the "real people" Clinton is talking to have been thoroughly vetted beforehand and are interested in local issues, a smoother alternative to a pesky press corps angling for reaction to the latest revelations about her complicated political entanglements.

Standing in a supporter's home in Mason City on Monday, Clinton spoke about learning of the drug epidemic plaguing rural communities from Davenport to Council Bluffs through kitchen table conversations.

"I did not believe I would be standing in your living room talking about the drug abuse problem, the mental health problem and the suicide problem," Clinton said. "But I'm now convinced I hav e to talk about it."

This is her implicit rationale for skirting the media – it's a play to gather up ideas from the ground that will eventually inform her policies.

And while Stevens, the former Romney operative, calls the semi-staged confabs "insulting," he also admits the Clinton camp has the luxury of adopting such a strategy.

"They are operating under different rules," he says. "I don't know that they 're not right."

Brantley, who knew Clinton 40 years ago, thinks her old college classmate's mindset is based on "many, many years of experience."

"I'm sure she will" engage with the media, she said. But "right now ... she's thought it through, and her strategy seems to be not to."

Hillary Clinton Aims to Capture the Cool // NYT // Jason Horowitz - May 22, 2015

On Super Tuesday of the bitter 2008 Democratic primary campaign, a group of Barack Obama supporters riding the New York City subway noticed Audrey Gelman wearing aHillary Rodham Clinton campaign button on her jacket.

They berated Ms. Gelman, then a junior staff worker on the Clinton campaign, for backing a candidate standing in the way of the first black president. At another point, the button invited mocking inquiries at a Lower East Side cafe as to whether Ms. Gelman was a Republican.

Now a 27-y ear-old public relations consultant with one foot in Democratic politics and the other in New York's hipper-than-thou fashion, arts and music scene, Ms. Gelman is feeling more confident in her Clinton accessories this time around. "If you go to a party in Williamsburg or Bushwick now and wear a Hillary pin," she said, "people are going to be like, 'Right on.' "

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Cool Kids for Hillary." You may be able to imagine it on a campaign button, but would any of them wear one? Whereas Mr. Obama's 2008 candidacy organically prompted excitement on college campuses, the country's skinny-jean citadels and celebrity hangouts, the candidate Clinton seems to be trying awfully hard to be down with the in crowd.

"Say you'll Bey on Team #Hillary2016, too" read a May 15 tweet on Mrs. Clinton's official account above an article in Marie Claire (where Ms. Gelman is a contributing editor) that was headlined "Bey oncé just publiclyshowed her support for Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign."

Then there's the Brookly n Heights campaign headquarters. "Brookly n U.S.A. How can you beat that?" Mrs. Clinton asks in a meet-the-neighbors web video — complete with a precious faux-handwriting font — that captures her greeting adoring Brooklynites. (Nev er mind that this is one of the borough's more-staid neighborhoods.)

Ms. Gelman, who called the former secretary of state "a feminist icon and a cultural icon," has sought to lift Mrs. Clinton's cultural cred. On the day Mrs. Clinton announced her candidacy , Ms. Gelman said that approving Instagram messages poured in from the singer Ciara, the stars of the raunchy millennial comedy "Broad City" and her best friend and "Girls" creator Lena Dunham. ("My new tramp stamp," Ms. Dunham wrote under the campaign logo.)

There have also been endorsements from Katy Perry, 50 Cent and America Ferrera, the star of TV's "Ugly Betty." On Thursday evening, Mrs. Clinton replied "Back at you" to the singer Kelly Clarkson, who called herself a "fan of Hillary."

But in campaign appearances, Mrs. Clinton has targeted voters on the opposite side of the cool-kid spectrum. On Monday, she stood before leatherbound classics and a ceramic life-size dog in the Mason City, Iowa, living room of Dean Genth and his husband, Gary Swenson.

"People really got to see a personable, down-to-earth, approachable Hillary Clinton that I think a lot of people don't realize exists," Mr. Swenson said after the event, adding that she was "really interested in what the heartland of America and what America in general is interested in."

The next day, Mrs. Clinton sat for a round-table discussion about small businesses inside a Cedar Falls, Iowa, bicy cle shop. With the clean-cut owner of Goldie's Ice Cream Shoppe on her right, Mrs. Clinton put on her super-folksy accent and stated, again, "I'm running for president because ev ery day Americans and their families need a champion."

And yet, Mrs. Clinton would love for young trendsetters to champion her cause and to replicate Mr. Obama's success at converting his cultural currency among young voters into hard votes.

The campaign argues that she enjoy s their widespread support, thoughDemocratic Party operatives say that has more to do with the increasingly liberal positions she has taken than any excitement about her per se.

"Obama was new," the actor Steve Buscemi said on a recent afternoon as he took a break from filming a scene for a television show on Mott Street. He called Mrs. Clinton "formidable" and "amazing" but added, "She's been around a long time, so we can't expect her to have the same thing."

Mrs. Clinton has made efforts to maintain contact with cultural signposts. In 2012, she posed with the singer Lia Ices at Roberta's, the Bushwick pizzeria housed in a former garage that was all the rage. That same y ear, she tasted viral Internet fame and liked it.

Stacy Lambe and a friend were at Nellie's Sports Bar, a popular Washington gay hangout, when they got the idea of writing humorous texts under a photograph of Mrs. Clinton wearing oversize sunglasses and reading her BlackBerry. The resulting Tumblr account, "Texts From Hillary," turned into an Internet meme of a woman so ice-cold as to be cool. Mrs. Clinton embraced the image, making it her Twitter avatar.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Mr. Lambe, who now works at “Entertainment Tonight,” said the meme’s momentum and excitement over Mrs. Clinton has abated somewhat since the controversy over her personal email accounts.

Moreover, “there was this cool-kids factor with Obama,” he said, “and I definitely think Hillary didn’t have that.”

There is little doubt that young voters, who are traditionally Democrats, will prefer Mrs. Clinton over the Republican nominee. And one of the most accomplished women in American political history certainly does not care much about the opinions of people whose defining characteristics are the style of their Warby Parker glasses or the origins of their pour-over coffee. But she does care a lot about becoming president.

The question is then whether she can get young people excited about her candidacy. A temperature-taking in Washington Square Park was not promising.

“Honestly, I really haven’t seen anything,” said Mckennah Spagnola, 19, a New York University student studying psychology, when asked about her peer group’s response to Mrs. Clinton.

A few feet away, the actress Anne Hathaway and her husband smiled as they watched toddlers interacting with dogs. She politely declined to comment (a former boyfriend of hers who once pledged $50 million to the Clinton Global Initiative pleaded guilty to fraud in 2008) and instead admired a circle of aspiring Broadway stars shouting voice exercises.

While the musical theater set had approving things to say about Mrs. Clinton, Mariah Ramirez, 18, who was in sixth grade in the months before the 2008 presidential election, said, “It’s not cool to support Hillary.” Ms. Ramirez said that while the prospect of a female president was exciting, she supports Senator Bernie Sanders because he has said he would not accept super PAC money.

Apathy may be preferable to some of the ambiguous messages Mrs. Clinton has triggered on the streets around her Brooklyn headquarters, where black-and-white posters popped up in April depicting the former first lady over the words “Secretive” or “Ambitious.”

That’s a far cry from the Hope posters (and subsequent ubiquitous T-shirts) made by the graffiti artist Shepard Fairey, who said he is not going to be making another one for Mrs. Clinton.

“I was interested in Obama in 2008 because his stated positions at the time made him seem like a subversive delivery vehicle for progressive principles I believe in,” Mr. Fairey wrote in an email. “Since then, I’ve realized that the corrupt nature of the system itself, with current campaign finance structure and the stranglehold corporations have on government, limits the kind of candidates that will make it into the system and narrows the spectrum of what’s available in our near non-Democracy.”

Try putting that on a T-shirt.

On a recent afternoon, in front of St. Ann’s, a private school across the street from the Clinton headquarters, Adrian Briscoe, 42, paused from chatting with the actress and Brooklyn Heights native Jennifer Connelly to discuss Mrs. Clinton’s decision to base her campaign nearby.

“Do I seem excited?” he asked. He did not.

Neither did Stewart Gerard and Jessica Mazza, who walked out of Glasserie, a trendy restaurant in Greenpoint that evening, to smoke a cigarette in front of a red retro pickup truck. Ms. Mazza, 25, an aspiring filmmaker and artist, said she wished Elizabeth Warren would get in the race.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Gerard, 32, a production designer, insisted that while he was “down with Hillary,” he worried that young people wouldn’t come out to vote for her, as he had seen none of the enthusiasm Mr. Obama had generated in 2008. He added with a touch of nostalgia, “I wish I could vote for Obama for a third term.”

Clinton campaigning in a bubble, largely isolated from real people // McClatchy // Anita Kumar - May 21, 2015

CEDAR FALLS, IOWA — Here’s how Hillary Clinton campaigned for president this week: She took a private 15-minute tour of a bike shop that had closed for her visit. She spoke to four small business owners chosen by her staff in front of an audience of 20, also chosen by her staff. She answered a few questions from the media following weeks of silence.

And after a little more than an hour, Clinton was off, whisked away by aides and Secret Service agents, into a minivan and on to the next event.

Members of the public who wanted to go inside the building to support her, oppose her or merely ask a question of her were left outside on an unseasonably cool Iowa day. Most didn’t bother showing up.

“I am troubled that so far in this caucus cycle she hasn’t had any public town halls,” said Chris Schwartz, a liberal activist from Waterloo, as he stood outside the bike store hoping to talk to Clinton about trade. “If she had a public town hall then we wouldn’t be out here. We would much rather be in there engaging with her.”

Welcome to Hillary Clinton 2.0. Mindful of her defeat by Barack Obama in 2008, Clinton has embraced a new strategy – one that so far does not include town-hall meetings and campaign rallies, media interviews, even public events.

Instead, she holds small controlled events with a handful of potential voters in homes, businesses and schools. She repeats many of the same lines (“I want to be your champion” is a favorite), participants are handpicked by her staff or the event host, and topics are dictated by her campaign.

Brent Johnson, 35, the owner of Bike Tech, said Clinton campaign staffers walked into the shop a week earlier and asked him if he’d be interested in hosting an event. He and the three roundtable participants were on a conference call with the campaign the day before to hear Clinton’s “basic talking points” about helping small businesses. A campaign aide says they found guests through the small business community.

Clinton’s approach – made possible by her lack of strong competition for the Democratic nomination – comes as she works to relate to working American families after years of being criticized as an out-of-touch Washington insider garnering hefty paychecks for her speeches and books.

But the campaign to show the world that she’s never forgotten her middle-class, Middle America sensibilities can be a tough sell from inside a bubble of armored cars, Secret Service agents and wary aides.

“It’s going to come back and haunt her,” said Eric Herzik, chairman of the political science department at the University of Nevada, Reno. “I think it will backfire.”

Clinton takes a minute at most events to talk about her approach.

“This conversation is just another example of why I love doing this, because I always learn something and I feel like we need a conversation in our country again, where we are talking to each other, where we are respecting each others’ opinions,” she said, thanking the roundtable participants Tuesday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As of Monday, Clinton had answered 20 questions from “everyday Americans” and asked 117 questions to “everyday Americans,” according to Correct the Record, a research organization designed to defend Clinton against attacks.

“In 2008, the rallies got so big you couldn’t talk to her,” said Scott Brennan, a former chairman of the Iowa Democratic Party. “This provides a chance to get to know her.”

Clinton’s distance from the public stands in contrast to other candidates in both parties, who routinely mix and mingle with the public, hold town-hall meetings and appear on TV news programs.

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley , a Democrat, has been known to unexpectedly break into song on the campaign trail when someone hands him a guitar. Wisconsin Gov . Scott Walker, a Republican, unexpectedly posed for photos with a bride and groom last month after his speech in New Hampshire had to be moved to accommodate their wedding. And Sen. Rand Paul, R-Ky., was surrounded by crowds this week after campaign events in Philadelphia, where people lined up to shake his hand or pose for photos.

“You can’t script y our way to the presidency – put yourself in a protective bubble and never interact with people, only talk to people who totally agree with you,” said former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, a Republican. “It’s not going to work.”

Walking outside the bubble does pose political risks, of course.

Bush, for example, has faced tough questions, such as when a 1 9-year-old college student confronted him about former President George W. Bush’s role in allowing the Islamic State terrorist group to grow. “Your brother created ISIS,” the student said in a tense exchange at a town hall in Reno.

So far, Clinton has not held one ev ent open to the public since she launched her campaign, though aides say she eventually will hold bigger ev ents. She sometimes makes unannounced visits to coffee shop and stores, though the easily recognizable Clinton, who often travels with an entourage, frequently finds herself physically removed from the crowds.

“She’s someone I’m interested in seeing in seeing face to face and asking her some questions,” said Christine Elliott, 28, a librarian at nearby Wartburg College who generally votes for Democrats.

Elliott said she appreciates Clinton’s new strategy but wonders if it’s authentic. “It’s just advertising,” she said. “It’s a ploy to show that she can get down to our lev el. That’s how it is with all politicians.”

Andrew Smith, director of the University of New Hampshire Survey Center, said that while there’s value in hearing what potential voters say , the Clinton campaign has ensured she only gets friendly audiences even if she doesn’t know exactly what they will say.

“There’s not the same level of push-back. It’s always going to be artificial.” he said. “She shouldn’t be afraid to talk to voters and really campaign.”

Clinton spoke Monday to about 60 people at the Mason City home of Dean Genth and Gary Swenson, major Democratic organizers in Iowa who were among the first gay couples married in the state. They supported Barack Obama in 2008.

“It just thrills me that Hillary is coming to Iowa and really doing what Iowa caucus-goers love, which is having up-close personal interactions,” Genth said. “I think she is astute and smart at this stage of the campaign to come to Iowa and gather what is on Iowans’ minds.”

Journalists' contributions to Clinton Foundation raise credibility questions // Baltimore Sun // Jules Witcover - May 22, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While much of the political community frets over the influence of billionaire money in presidential campaigns, the much smaller world of journalism occasionally worries over the ethics of politicians crossing over into the news-and-analysis business.

The latest stir has occurred in the disclosure that George Stephanopoulos, an ABC News anchor and once a key political aide to President Bill Clinton, contributed$75,000 between 2012 and 2014 to the charitable Clinton Foundation, headed by Bill, Hillary and Chelsea.

The red flag of conflict of interest immediately fluttered, especially since Mr. Stephanopoulos had been mentioned to moderate a Republican presidential debate in early 2016 sponsored by the network and the Republican National Committee.

ABC News quickly announced that he had decided not to be the moderator, and he apologized for not having disclosed the donations himself, saying he thought his gifts "were a matter of public record." In hindsight, he said, "I should have taken the extra step of personally disclosing my donations to my employer and to the viewers on air during the recent news stories about the foundation."

I'm unaware of any reporting that Stephanopolous has done on the Clinton Foundation. Even so, are reporters not allowed to ever give to the Gates Foundation? That's a pretty ridiculous bar you've set.

Mr. Stephanopoulos was referring to a recent interview he did with Peter Schweizer, author of a book, "Clinton Cash," highly critical of the Clintons and their foundation. It questioned whether donations from foreign governments might have affected Hillary Clinton's decisions as secretary of state in the first term of the Barack Obama administration. The ABC anchor reported that his network and others had found no evidence of it.

The close tie between Mr. Stephanopoulos and Bill Clinton has been well known in the political community in light of his White House departure after the Monica Lewinsky scandal. That scandal led to Mr. Clinton's impeachment and subsequent acquittal (thanks to Democratic senators who held their noses and voted not to convict). Mr. Stephanopoulos's book, "All Too Human," was a frank if sympathetic account of his five years as a key Bill Clinton political insider.

He has defended his contribution as motivated by the foundation's work on global AIDS and deforestation, but he has admitted he should have been aware of the appearance of conflict of interest. The fact that he came into high-profile journalism after working as a political partisan may be an explanation for his blind spot, but hardly an excuse.

Along with this disclosure came word that another prominent television anchor, Judy Woodruff of "PBS NewsHour," had also made a one-time contribution the Clinton Foundation of $250 for Haitian earthquake relief in 2010 in response to a plea from Mr. Clinton and former President George H.W. Bush. But that was peanuts compared to the Stephanopoulos donations and Ms. Woodruff had no working connection with either president, rising in journalism as an Atlanta newscaster who moved to the White House beat for NBC with the 1976 election of former Georgia Gov. Jimmy Carter.

The phenomenon of political operatives segueing into high-level journalistic posts as been a longtime subject of discussion within the journalistic community. A once-honored wall between the two professions has increasingly broken down, especially as television and its huge advertising revenue have produced astonishingly high salaries and made celebrities of the recipients. The recently suspended Brian Williams, anchor of "NBC Nightly News," reportedly had just signed a $10 million contract.

Occasionally, a journalist who already has attained star status, such as CBS' Edward R. Murrow, may switch teams at a president's request for less money. He became director of the U.S. Information Agency in the Kennedy administration, and NBC's John Chancellor was recruited for a time to head the government-run Voice of America by Lyndon Johnson. But the switch most times works the other way around. For example, ABC's Diane Sawyer was a press aide in the Nixon White House, and Chris Matthews of MSNBC was a press secretary to House Speaker Tip O'Neill before achieving prominence in television news.

Press credibility took a big hit from the revelation that Mr. Williams was given to exaggerations, to say the least. Any appearance of conflict of interest in reporting or commenting on the news can easily lead to further public distrust, unless there is full disclosure of any possible suspicion of favoritism or softness in journalists' relations with public officials.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton: GOP threatening small-business jobs // AP // Ken Thomas - May 22, 2015

HAMPTON, N.H. (AP) — Hillary Rodham Clinton says Republicans in Congress and GOP presidential hopefuls are threatening tens of thousands of small-business jobs by seeking to cut a little-known gov ernment agency that guarantees loans to help U.S. exporters.

The Democratic presidential contender said during a round-table discussion at Smutty nose Brewery in New Hampshire that Congress should renew financing for the Export-Import Bank. She argues the GOP is risking up to 164,000 jobs supported by the bank.

She says Republicans running in the 2016 campaign would rather threaten the jobs than "stand up to the tea party and talk radio."

Conservatives have sought to eliminate the Export-Import Bank, arguing it giv es the government too big a role in helping some large American companies sell products overseas at the expense of others.

Clinton's claim that it takes longer to start a business in the U.S. than in Canada or France // WaPo // Glenn Kessler- May 22, 2015

Our antenna alway s goes up when a politician asserts a "fact." Clinton made this remark in the midst of a discussion about the "perfect storm of crisis" that she said small businesses face in the United States.

She made a similar point in an article she posted on LinkedIn on May 21, but with an additional country added: "It should not take longer to start a business in the U.S. than it does in Canada, Korea, or France."

This statement poses a fact-checking conundrum because, as the Clinton campaign hastened to point out, it is accurately drawn from a database at the World Bank. But sometimes, depending on the context, things can be technically true but still misleading. Let's take a look.

The Facts

The World Bank's database lists 189 countries in terms of the time required to start a business. For 2014, in first place is New Zealand, with one day. In France and Canada, along with eight other countries, it takes five days. (South Korea, along with six other countries, is listed as four days.) The United States, with 12 other countries, is listed as six days.

First of all, one extra day does not seem like much of a hindrance — so much so that, as Clinton asserted in the LinkedIn article, the fact signified the "red tape that holds back small businesses and entrepreneurs."

But if you did dig even deeper into the data, the differences narrow further. From France it works out as 36 hours (4.5 days), Canada 40 hours (5 days) and the United States 45 hours (5.6 days).

The average time for starting a business in the world was 22.3 days, according to the World Bank. In high-income countries, it was 15.2 days, while in the Euro area, it was 10.6 days. So, within the world, the United States ranks very close to France and Canada — and exceeds many other industrialized countries.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We should note that the World Bank studied a very specific size of company —employing between 10 to 50 people within one month, having five owners, using start-up capital equiv alent to 10 times income per capita and being engaged in industrial or commercial activities and owning no real estate.

But there's another funny thing about the data. While Clinton uses these numbers as a proxy for entire countries, in most cases, researchers only looked at the time it took to start a business in a country's largest city. That would be Paris in France and Toronto in Canada. But the United States was one of the few countries in which its figure was an amalgam of the two largest cities — New York and Los Angeles.

When y ou look at the individual city data, it turns out that it takes four days to start a business in New York and eight days to start one in Los Angeles. In the report, that was averaged as six days. But if you really used an apples to apples comparison – the largest city in each country –then actually the United States (ie, New York, with four days) tops France (Paris, with 4.5 days) and Canada (Toronto, with five days.)

The World Bank Web site lets you compare the individual cities to countries, so New York ends up tied for 6th place — with Belgium, Iceland, South Korea, the Netherlands and Sao Tome. Los Angeles is down in 15th place, tied with Cyprus, Egypt, Madagascar and the Kyrgyz Republic, among others. Another World Bank report notes that the differences are so large because, in the United States, "company law is under state jurisdiction and there are measurable differences between the California and New York company law."

So what does data about starting a business in the largest city hav e to do with small businesses in Iowa? Beats us.

The Clinton campaign noted that the United States (ie, the combined ranking for New York and Los Angeles) ranked 46th on a broader "starting a business" category, which also includes time to start a business, the number of procedures, cost of capital and paid-in minimum capital. Each element is weighed equally to come up with an ov erall ranking.

Under this criteria, Canada ranked second, Korea was 17th and France was 28th. But again, the U.S. score is dragged down by greater difficulties found in starting a business in Los Angeles. And Clinton spoke simply of the time it took to start a business.

The Pinocchio Test

In the context in which Clinton used this factoid, it does not make much sense. This is specifically about starting businesses in a country 's largest city — and the score for the United States is affected by the fact that it is one of the few countries with a blended figure for two cities.

There is such a wide v ariation between New York and Los Angeles because corporate law generally is set at the state level — making us wonder what federal solution Clinton is proposing. (Her article said such specific policy suggestions would be forthcoming in the future.)

On a strictly technical level, this factoid at least is based on a legitimate data set. But it means much less than Clinton suggests in her statement and lacks important context. So she earns a Pinocchio.

One Pinocchio.

Why Hillary Clinton Prefers to T alk About Comm unity Banks // TIME // Sam Frizell - May 21, 2015

Like many Democrats, Hillary Clinton has talked tough about reining in mega banks. But as her presidential campaign has gotten underway, she's focused on the homier side of the financial industry: community banks.

At times, listeners might have even mistaken Clinton for a moderate Republican.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Today,” Clinton said, “local banks are being squeezed by regulations that don’t make sense for their size and mission—like endless examinations and paperwork designed for banks that measure their assets in the many billions.”

“And when it gets harder for small banks to do their jobs, it gets harder for small businesses to get their loans,” she said. “Our goal should be helping community banks serve their neighbors and customers the way they alway s have.”

Community banks tend have less than $1 billion in assets, are usually based in rural or suburban communities and are the kind of place your uncle in Idaho might go for money to open an antique shop. Touting small businesses is a tried-and-true trope for candidates on both sides of the aisle. For office-seekers from Barack Obama to Marco Rubio, the subject is as noncontroversial and all-American as crabgrass.

The difference, then, comes at how politicians want to handle bigger banks. Congress right now is debating how far to exempt banks from certain regulations. Democratic lawmakers generally want to reduce them only for smaller banks; some Republicans want to exempt all banks, an approach Clinton criticized.

Big banks in the United States have become increasingly large and powerful in the seven years since the financial crisis. Of the 6,000-odd banks in the United States, the five largest control nearly half of the country’s banking wealth, according to a December study. In 1990, the five biggest banks controlled just 10% of the industry ’s assets.

Small banks complain that federal regulation in the aftermath of the Dodd-Frank legislation is contributing to a decline in their numbers. Annual examinations at a community banks, for instance, require staff to walk regulators through paperwork. Filling out paperwork and pay ing for compliance lawyers to deal with new Dodd-Frank stipulations are burdensome extra costs, banks say. And new rules can impose high damages on lenders who do make unsafe loans.

“There’s an inherent advantage in scale,” said Mike Calhoun, president of the Center for Responsible Lending, pointing out that small banks often hav e more trouble pay ing for regulation compliance. “Community banks, being smaller, have less business to spread the cost of regulations over.”

It’s an issue that resonates with Iowa bankers, says John Sorensen, president and CEO of the Iowa Bankers Association. “A lot of the banks we have across Iowa are small businesses with 10 to 30 employees that have been interrupted in their ability to serve their customers through a good part of Dodd-Frank,” he said.

But some say the discussion about scrapping community bank regulations as Clinton suggests is a distraction. Small banks were in steady decline for many y ears before Dodd-Frank, and they are protected from liability on certain loans that big banks are not. And regulators argue that preventing risky mortgages of the kind that brought on the financial crisis is a good thing.

Much of the push to deregulate community banks comes from bigger institutions who want exemptions from regulation themselves. “If you were able to somehow magically trace who is whipping up frenzy about regulator burden on small banks, you’d find its trade associations at the behest of bigger banks,” said Julia Gordon of the Center for American Progress, a left-leaning think tank that has supplied some top officials in the Clinton campaign.

During the roundtable, Donna Sorensen, chair of the board of Cedar Rapids Bank and Trust and a participant on Tuesday, suggested to Clinton that more U.S. Small Business Administration-supported loans come with no fees. Clinton took notes and nodded in assent.

“If we really wanted to jumpstart more community bank lending, part of what we would do is exactly that—raise the limits to av oid the upfront fee” for businesses that need loans, Clinton said.

Clinton did not say specifically what regulations she would remove if she were elected president, but locals in Independence, Iowa, where Clinton stopped by for a v isit after her small business roundtables, asked her to hold true to her sentiments. Terry Tekippe, whose family owns an independent hardware store, walked onto the street as Clinton walked by. “Keep us in focus,” Tekippe said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I want to be a small business president, so I am,” Clinton called back as she continued down the street.

Hillary Clinton, Acutely Aware of Pitfalls, Avoids Press on Campaign Trail // NYT // Jason Horowitz - May 22, 2015

CEDAR FALLS, Iowa — Hillary Rodham Clinton was in a forgiving mood. She had been discussing the small-business economy at a round-table gathering at a bike shop here on Tuesday when the Fox News correspondent Ed Henry interrupted. When, he shouted, would she take questions from the news media she had ignored for weeks on end?

“May be when I finish talking to the people here,” Mrs. Clinton said as she leaned over a 3-D printed mechanical part that looked like a post-apocalyptic Rubik’s cube. “How’s that?”

“You’ll come over?” Mr. Henry followed up.

“I might,” Mrs. Clinton said teasingly . For the amusement of the 19 local residents invited to attend this latest installment of the movable Clinton court, and to the annoyance of the more than 50 members of the news media roped off around them, she added: “I have to ponder it. But I will put it on my list for due consideration.”

Unlike in 2008, when Mrs. Clinton’s regal bearing was brought low by Barack Obama’s insurgent campaign, there is no one to force her out of her Rose Garden. Neither Bernie Sanders, the socialist senator from Vermont, nor Martin O’Malley, the former gov ernor of Maryland, has applied significant pressure on her. That leaves the news media as her only real opponent so far on the way to the Democratic presidential nomination, and while it may not be great for an educated populace or the furtherance of American democracy, it makes all the political sense in the world for Mrs. Clinton to ignore them, too.

What Hillary Clinton Would Need to Do to Win

There is no shortage of reminders of the downsides of engagement. She need only look at her Republican counterparts, starting with Jeb Bush, who has made a point of opening up more to reporters butdamaged himself during a sev eral-day struggle with how to answer a question about the wisdom of the war in Iraq.

Senator Marco Rubio’s difficulties with the same question were condensed to a few highly awkward and viral minutes. Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin has been working for weeks to overcome his flubbing of initial questions about foreign policy, and Senator Rand Paul’s snappish interactions with female reporters have only fed the impression that he is thin-skinned.

Mrs. Clinton had her own rocky introduction to the 2016 press corps when she gave defensiv e and not entirely convincing answers at a news conference prompted by the revelation that she had used a private email server as secretary of state. But as reporters have dug deeper into the emails, the financial conduct of her family’s foundation and the character of the company she keeps, Mrs. Clinton has only seemed more comfortable and dominant on the campaign trail.

She has rolled out more liberal positions on immigration reform and college debt and stayed mum on inconvenient things she does not want to talk about, like a potential trade deal or Israeli policies loathed by her liberal base. And unlike in 2008 — when the battle between her and Mr. Obama forced Mrs. Clinton to do ev ents late into the night, and she often slipped up or held forth about brain science — she is keeping her campaign schedule to a bare minimum.

This week, as she campaigned in Iowa, in Chicago and, starting Friday, in New Hampshire — a relative flurry of activity — she generally filled each day with one event open to the news media, a smaller one with a pool reporter, and then some unexpected stops where she ordered coffee or bought toys for her grandchild. Always the grandchild.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At the bike shop event on Tuesday, she listened intently to the stories of the round-table participants, nodding 43 times a minute as they talked about their ice cream shops and 3-D printing. As television lights cast the shadows of two rows of "everyday Americans" onto the tablecloth, she looked expertly over the locals' heads and into the television cameras behind them to give her prepared remarks ("I want to make the words 'middle class' mean something again").

Who Is Running for President (and Who's Not)?

She complimented the participants on their inquiries ("that's a very fair question" or "that's a very good question"), and when the moderator unexpectedly pushed her on her position on President Obama's proposed Trans-Pacific Partnership, she dodged artfully.

When it finally came time to ask their questions, the reporters seemed more agitated than the candidate as they pushed against a rope line for the impromptu news conference and gasped when her traveling press secretary, Nick Merrill, joked, "Wouldn't it be funny if she walked off?"

"Hey, y'all ready?" Mrs. Clinton asked as she sauntered over.

"Yeah!" said the chorus of reporters.

"Tell me — tell me something I don't know," she said, almost musically, as she snapped her head to the left in a Janet Jackson-era dance move. "Ha, ha, ha, ha."

The smile on Mrs. Clinton's face slowly faded as she nodded and replied and obfuscated in response to the half-dozen questions asked of her. She did so with ease, despite the people shouting about her destroying her emails and calling out, "Did you take official actions for the Clinton Foundation donors?" And then she turned away, essentially dusting the whole dodging-the-press story line off her bird's-eye blazer.

Rick Santorum Denounces Fox News Curbs on Debate07:40 AM ET

Today in Politics: No Time for a Lazy Summer as Campaigns Ramp Up 07:01 AM ET

Clinton Foundation Releases List of Speeches That Filled Its Coffers 9:42 PM ET

Mrs. Clinton's relationship with the political press has never been warm. She started the 2008 race straight-arming reporters, and only when the nomination began slipping from her grasp did she seek to embrace them. It was too late. When she boarded the press bus with bagels ("I didn't want you to feel deprived"), no one partook. Despite that chill, though, there was a sense of professionalism and familiarity on the Clinton bus, because many of the reporters represented New York-based publications and had covered her as a senator. News conferences were not frequent, but they occurred behind curtains after events.

Now, both Mrs. Clinton and the news media have changed. She seems less a presidential candidate than a historical figure, magically animated from a wax museum to claim what is rightfully hers. And the press corps, both blessed and cursed with live streaming, tweeting and Snapchatting technologies, is armed with questions devised to win the moment. The result is a carnival atmosphere. It is not clear what Mrs. Clinton gains politically from playing the freak.

The solution for her team has been to keep the press at bay as Mrs. Clinton reads the scripts to her daily campaign shows.

"The media was confined between the bar and the stove," Gary Swenson said, describing an event with Mrs. Clinton at his home in Mason City, Iowa, on Monday. Asked if he had learned anything from her talk, he said, "No, I don't think I learned anything remarkably new," but added after a pause: "I think it was more her demeanor. It astonished me. I expected somebody who had space between herself and the people who lived here, and there was none."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The press did not learn much, either, from Mrs. Clinton's remarks in Mason City or her answers at the impromptu bike store news conference, except that she is an exceedingly strong candidate. But that did not mean the ev ent was entirely without news.

Outside, by the steps of the bike shop, Mr. Henry did a stand-up in front of his Fox camera. "The reason she had a news conference is because I started shouting questions," he crowed to his viewers. He called that the day's "bottom line."

Small v ictories.

Hillary Keeps It Boring // Bloom berg // Margaret Carlson - May 22, 2015

This week, Hillary Clinton broke her almost month-long streak of avoiding the press. After a speech on small businesses in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, she took six questions from reporters who have been diligently following her around since she announced her presidential candidacy April 12.

No surprise, the media didn't clamor for her to flesh out her plan for small businesses. Instead, she found herself parry ing queries about her e-mails, the Clinton Foundation and its donors, and her vote to approve the invasion of Iraq in 2003.

What would have been a squirm-inducing moment for any other candidate was for Clinton an occasion to draw on skills tempered in the fires of decades in politics. It prov ided both a reminder of her past in the hot seat of Whitewater, Monica and other battles and a glimpse of her future campaign strategy: She will swat away any unwanted questions by stonewalling as long as possible and, when that's no longer viable, by deflecting with responses designed to make the topic seem as boring as rain and her questioners as tedious gnats.

Here's how she handled a question about the burgeoning scandal involving questionable donations to the Clinton Foundation: "I am so proud of the Foundation," she said. "I'll let the American people make their own judgments."

There's nothing to see here. Move on.

My boring question: Is Hillary just kidding us or is she also kidding herself? At the very least, she didn't report the Foundation's donations from foreign governments, as she promised the president she would when she became secretary of state. At worst, the Foundation took money from some shady characters hoping to put a Clinton gloss on dicey businesses.

But the thin gruel she served up has a strategic purpose: Next time the controversy comes up, she can say: asked and answered, old news. Can we please talk about the important issues the American people care about?

It works, too. The Clintons have an extraordinary ability to thrive amid turmoil that would fell mere mortals. They -- and the rest of us -- have seen it all before.

Speaking of déjà vu, Sidney Blumenthal, a consigliere from the Clinton White House and Monica Lewinsky scourge, has re-emerged as the author of memos on Libya that Clinton passed on to top State Department aides as urgent reading. So how does he fit now and why was a political operative giving adv ice on Liby a policy? Hillary played the loyalty card: "I have many, many old friends and I always think that it's important when y ou get into politics to hav e friends you had before you were in politics and to understand what's on their mind."

Even ABC News anchor George Stephanopoulos, one of the few top aides to President Bill Clinton to escape the association seemingly unscathed, recently found the tentacles reaching around his neck because of a charitable donation to the Foundation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But she will wriggle free of all that and whatever else comes her way. In March, Hillary waited eight days to address the missing e-mails, and said no more about it for another month. She was following the first rule of Clintonland: Wait out the first wave of attacks, then say there's nothing to be concerned about in a frustrated, sing-song voice, as if to a group of kindergartners.

The template was forged when her husband intoned his infamous denial about not having sex with that woman, then left the stage to his enemies for six months, giving them time to self-destruct. Instead of Clinton having to resign for a scandalous dalliance with an intern, Ken Starr looked pruriently overzealous, Republicans viciously partisan, and impeachment a bridge too far.

If boring worked for Monica -- Bill Clinton is one of the most popular men on the planet -- surely it's going to work for Hillary's more mundane, sex-free scandals. She's had a lot of practice weathering flare-ups: Gennifer Flowers, the embarrassing tax deduction for Bill's underwear, cattle futures, the pardons, the furnishings taken (and returned) to the White House, nefarious friends with private jets and the list goes on.

There were predictions that Hillary's poll numbers would plummet after the public learned that thousands of e-mails spanning her tenure at state were destroyed. It didn't happen. What's more, with the passage of time, Hillary was able to conflate two separate sets of e-mails into one so that now it's the darn State Department's fault if anything's missing. All she has to do is to keep repeating the answer she gave Tuesday, "I have said repeatedly I want those e-mails out."

Note the deft use of "repeatedly," conveying the sense that these questions are getting really tiresome.

We should have known when Hillary announced her candidacy with a supremely boring video that she intended to run the most boring campaign ever. She's off to a good start.

Koch organization attacks Hillary on Ex-Im bank // Politico // Kenneth Vogel and Tarini Parti - May 22, 2015

The Koch brothers organization on Friday blasted Hillary Clinton's support for the Export-Import bank, previewing a potentially rancorous and expensive fight between the leading Democratic presidential candidate and the deepest pocketed network of donors on the right.

The issue of re-authorizing the once little known export credit agency is getting a lot of attention on the campaign trail, with the bank's charter set to expire June 30 and Republican presidential candidates and members of Congress under pressure from influential conservative groups including those in the Koch network to oppose it.

It's a fight that plays into the sweet spot of both — Clinton and the Koch network.

For the Kochs and their network, it's a chance to elevate a pet issue while engaging in the presidential race at a time when its legions of rich donors remain divided over which GOP candidate to back.

Freedom Partners, the umbrella group overseeing the Koch network, in a statement released Friday and promoted on social media asserted that Clinton's support for re-authorizing the bank draws "a clear line between her and the Republican presidential field and push(es) the Ex-Im Bank into the national dialogue." Freedom Partners also linked Clinton's support to donations to her family's foundation from beneficiaries of the bank, while the Koch group's spokesman James Davis called Clinton's position "a case study in cronyism and corporate welfare. Congress should reject Mrs. Clinton's Ex-Im position and end this culture of corruption, and start fighting on behalf of hard-working taxpayers."

Clinton during a Friday afternoon roundtable at Smuttynose Brewery in New Hampshire, criticized Republicans for targeting the bank and risking up to 164,000 jobs supported through its programs at the behest of "the tea party and talk radio."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And her campaign seemed to welcome the attack from Freedom Partners, with spokesman Jesse Ferguson responding in a statement “Hillary Clinton just made the case that Republicans were jeopardizing small business exports by blocking the Export-Import Bank to please their tea party base when an overwhelming share of the bank’s transactions support American small businesses. And then a leading tea party organization came out attacking her for it. Enough said.”

Democrats in the last couple elections spent significant time and money trying to make a campaign issue of the unprecedented political and public policy spending by the industrialist billionaires Charles and David Koch and the donors in their network, which they allege created the tea party protest movement in 2009.

Freedom Partners didn’t actually form until late 2011 and since then it has overseen a vast expansion of the Koch network to include scores of wealthy conservative donors funding groups pushing primarily fiscal conservative initiatives and messaging. The network helmed by Freedom Partners intends to spend $889 million in the run-up to the 2016 election through electoral and advocacy efforts.

Freedom Partners in a web video last month signaled its desire to take on Clinton over her support for the bank. It distinguished her position on the issue with those of the leading GOP contenders. The group has spent the last few months pressuring the GOP’s presidential prospects to support their economic policy agenda, which includes expiration of Export-Import bank’s charter.

“Should your tax dollars fund foreign companies? Hillary Clinton does,” a narrator says in the video, which ends with pictures of Sens. Marco Rubio, Rand Paul, Ted Cruz and Gov. Scott Walker and Jeb Bush. “Will Congress follow Hillary or free market champions who oppose it?”

GOP chairman: Hillary a 'natural cheerleader' for Export-Import Bank // The Hill // Kevin Cirill - May 22, 2015

House Financial Services Committee Chairman Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas) attacked Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Clinton Friday over her support for the embattled Export-Import Bank.

Clinton is expected to reiterate her support for the bank during campaign appearances in New Hampshire, as Congress continues to grapple with whether or not to reauthorize the 80-year-old bank's charter before it expires June 30.

“Hillary Clinton is a natural cheerleader for the Export-Import Bank. After all, Ex-Im’s biggest beneficiaries are foreign governments and giant corporations," Hensarling said in a statement.

Hensarling and other conservatives — including all top-tier Republican presidential candidates — oppose reauthorizing the federally-backed bank, which finances business projects overseas.

Critics argue that the bank unfairly benefits big corporations by backing major, politically connected firms as opposed to small businesses. Boeing, for example, received more than a third of the Bank's total loan commitments between 2007 and 2013, according to an S&P report.

"Conveniently, these just happen to be among the biggest donors to the Clinton Foundation as well as major underwriters of the speaking fees that added millions of dollars to the Clinton bank account," Hensarling said in a statement.

“If Mrs. Clinton truly wants to help small business and exporters, she would be an outspoken supporter of trade promotion authority, pro-growth tax reform, the Keystone pipeline and real regulatory relief," Hensarling said.

Hensarling's panel has jurisdiction over a reauthorization bill and it's unclear whether the House will vote to extend the bank's charter.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The issue has exposed a rift between the Tea Party and the business community within the Republican Party.

The business community — including prominent groups like the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers — are working to reauthorize the bank, arguing that its support of big businesses helps sustain small business jobs in the supply-chain economic ecosystem.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), a potential presidential candidate and supporter of the bank, said Thursday that he expects a v ote in the Senate before the bank's charter expires.

Republican PAC calls on Clinton to take clear position on trade agreement // WMUR // John DiStaso - May 21, 2015

MANCHESTER, N.H. —A top official of a pro-Republican political action committee Thursday called on Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton to take a clear position on the Trans-Pacific Partnership, which cleared a major hurdle in the U.S. Senate earlier in the day.

Ahead of Hillary Clinton's second trip to New Hampshire on Friday, a small business owner from Portsmouth will get a unique social media opportunity. For one day, she'll be tweeting to more than 3.5 million followers.

MORE

Colin Reed, executive director of America Rising PAC, charged that Clinton's "refusal to take a position on President Obama's bipartisan trade deal undercuts all her empty small business rhetoric and leaves no doubt that she is nothing more than a typical politician desperate to get elected."

His comments came on the eve of Clinton's second visit to New Hampshire since announcing her candidacy. She will focus on small businesses while in the state, her campaign said.

Reed, the former campaign manager for 2014 Republican U.S. Senate candidate Scott Brown, cited a 2012 study by the Peterson Institute for International Economics and East-West Center that said the TPP would result in 3,359 new jobs for the state. The institute was founded by Peter G. Peterson, a commerce secretary during the Nixon administration and an investment banker and fiscal conserv ative. The study was published on the U.S. Chamber of Commerce website.

America Rising PAC, founded in 2013 by former Mitt Romney campaign manager Matt Rhoades, cited remarks by Clinton supportive of the TPP in 2010 and 2011, when she was secretary of state. The group noted that since becoming a presidential candidate, she has been less definitive in her position.

In Iowa earlier this week, she said she wants to "judge the final agreement. I hav e been for trade agreements. I have been against trade agreements."

CNN reported that Clinton said she wants to see rules included in the TPP that would penalize countries for driving down the value of their currencies in order to give their exports a price advantage in the U.S. market. She also reportedly said she is concerned about a prov ision that would give, she said, "corporations more power to overturn health and environmental and labor rules than consumers have."

Clinton's campaign on Thursday declined to comment on the criticism by Reed of America Rising and to comment further on the trade agreement.

The Senate Thursday voted 62-38 to provide President Barack Obama "fast-track" authority he needs to complete the TPP deal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Reed said, “It’s impossible for Secretary Clinton to credibly talk about small business without addressing this major piece of bipartisan legislation."

The issue has split Obama, who strongly supports the agreement, and liberal Democrats such as Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren, who strongly oppose it.

Clinton the leader in Granite State Facebook traffic // NH1 // Paul Steinhauser - May 22, 2015

CONCORD – Hillary Clinton’s the overwhelming front runner in the race for the Democratic presidential nomination, and it appears she’s also far out in front in the battle among 2016 White House contenders for Facebook visitors in the first-in-the-nation primary state.

New numbers provided to NH1 News by the social media giant indicate that over the past two months 71,00 people on Facebook in New Hampshire made 45 7,000 likes, posts, comments and shares related to Clinton.

GOP Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas, who was the first big name in the Republican Party to launch a White House campaign, was a distant second, weighing in with 29,000 unique people and 162,000 interactions. Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, who’s running for the Democratic nomination, had 21,000 unique people and 107,000 interactions. Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky, a GOP presidential candidate, scored 20,000 interactions and 111,000 likes, posts, comments and shares.

With social media increasing play ing a larger and larger role in campaign politics, these numbers matter.

"Facebook is home to a political conversation that isn't just large, it's authentic and meaningful. Not only are voters are using Facebook to connect with candidates, debate public policy issues, and get the latest election political news and information, but so are presidential contenders using Facebook to reach out to voters,” Erin Egan, Facebook’s vice president of U.S. Public Policy , told NH1 News.

And in the Granite State, Facebook trumps Twitter.

“With regards to social media, in New Hampshire, no offense to Twitter, the best way to reach people is through Facebook,” said NH1 News Digital Director Kevin Deane.

Hillary Clinton’s scripted campaign is starting to make New Hampshire mad // Boston Globe // Nik DeCosta-Klipa -May 22, 2015

At some point in the 1970s, a man in Manchester, New Hampshire asks his friend, “What do you think about Mo Udall for president?” The other man replies, “I don’t know, I only met him twice.”

Or so goes John McCain’s oft-repeated joke about the Granite State’s brand of personal politics.

Now it appears that Hillary Clinton’s campaign is starting to get on New Hampshire’s nerves for being impersonal.

The Nashua Telegraph published an editorial Thursday that said a conference call by Clinton’s campaign with local media was “the antithesis of what NH is about.”

According to the Telegraph, the former secretary of state’s campaign expected that participating media would write stories from the call using unnamed sources only, even though it had “little or no substance.” Clinton’s campaign wanted to talk about their social media outreach plan.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From the Telegraph's editorial:

"And then there was this: New Hampshire voters "would be seeing a lot of (Clinton) in the months ahead," said a campaign strategist.

That's not exactly stop-the-presses material right there.

The importance of what was said by campaign operatives in no way rose to a level that required anonymity .

In fact, the nature of the call itself runs counter to a long tradition where the appearance of unnamed sources – be they presidential candidates or their operatives – are few and far between in New Hampshire newspapers, including this one. Anonymity, as a matter of course and for its own sake, is part of the culture in Washington, not New Hampshire."

The editorial came one day after a prominent Democratic activist in New Hampshire told The Boston Globe that when it comes to Clinton, "We feel like we don't matter. I feel like she doesn't realize it is personal in New Hampshire."

During her first New Hampshire visit, Clinton held panel discussions and house parties, only open to pre-credentialed media and individuals selected by campaign organizers.

As The Globe's Annie Linskey pointed out, "Those ev ery day Americans who want to quiz Hillary Rodham Clinton on trade, foreign policy , or even her favorite color hav e one option: They need to be on the right inv ite list to get in a room with her."

However, a spokesman for the campaign told Linskey the pattern is not part of a long-term strategy, noting there is "plenty of time" before the state's primary February 9, 2016.

Clinton's campaign is set to return to New Hampshire this weekend, v isiting Smuttynose Brewery in Hampton and an organizing ev ent in Exeter. A campaign press release indicates neither will be open to the public.

Clinton's national and New Hampshire campaigns didn't immediately respond to requests for comment.

New Hampshire paper blasts Hillary Clinton campaign for lame conference call // WaPo // Erik Wemple - May 22, 2015

The "background call" is a staple of contemporary American politics. A message-shaping tool, it inv olves spinmeisters telling a group of reporters about their strategies on the condition that their names not be used. It's the launching pad of those quotes you see in the media citing a "senior campaign official" or a "White House official" and so on.

Too rarely do the shenanigans of the "background call" get called out. But that's precisely what the the Telegraph of Nashua, N.H., did today in a searing editorial ripping the paltry information that Hillary Clinton's campaign dished under the cover of anonymity. Here's a look:

Clinton operatives held a conference call about efforts the campaign is making to bulk up a social media outreach campaign and plans to build working groups that are – get this – based on specific issues rather than the traditional county-by-county breakdown.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We'll give you a moment to recover from the impact of such revelatory news.

There was no reason to report any of the "news" from the call, noted the editorial. Except for the existence of the tepid call itself. The editorial ripped away:

"Everyone has a story , and connecting that story to their support for this campaign is something that is as crucial and important and something that people want to do – people want to tell those stories," said a top official with the national campaign.

They needed anonymity for that? Really?

Another bonus came from a Clinton strategist, who said that New Hampshire v oters "would be seeing a lot of (Clinton) in the months ahead."

The killer line: "Anonymity , as a matter of course and for its own sake, is part of the culture in Washington, not New Hampshire." The Erik Wemple Blog can confirm the part about Washington.

New York T im es does its best to be a 'real opponent' to Hillary Clinton // Daily Kos // Laura Clawson - May 22, 2015

New York Times reporters really aren't bothering to hide their loathing of Hillary Clinton anymore, to the point where the next logical step is for the newspaper to adopt the mottoes "fair and balanced" or "we report, you decide." Here's how one Times reporter tweeted his latest article:

In Iowa, Queen Hillary and the Every day Americans of the Round Table distribute alms to the clamoring press. http:// t.co/..

— @jasondhorowitz

Yeahhhh, Queen Hillary. "We report, you decide!" As for the article itself ...

Unlike in 2008, when Mrs. Clinton's regal bearing was brought low by Barack Obama's insurgent campaign, there is no one to force her out of her Rose Garden. Neither Bernie Sanders, the socialist senator from Vermont, nor Martin O'Malley, the former gov ernor of Maryland, has applied significant pressure on her. That leaves the news media as her only real opponent so far on the way to the Democratic presidential nomination, and while it may not be great for an educated populace or the furtherance of American democracy, it makes all the political sense in the world for Mrs. Clinton to ignore them, too.

"That leaves the news media as her only real opponent so far." It's a horrible premise, as Jay Rosen among others has made clear. But boy is it ev er a premise Jason Horowitz does his best to liv e out in an article with personal animus oozing from under ev ery line. Here's how Horowitz describes Clinton taking press questions, as they'd been endlessly whining she was not doing:

"Tell me — tell me something I don't know," she said, almost musically, as she snapped her head to the left in a Janet Jackson-era dance mov e. "Ha, ha, ha, ha."

The smile on Mrs. Clinton's face slowly faded as she nodded and replied and obfuscated in response to the half-dozen questions asked of her.

Later in the piece, "She seems less a presidential candidate than a historical figure, magically animated from a wax museum to claim what is rightfully hers." So, Janet Jackson-era dance moves and a historical figure magically animated from a wax museum—she's old! To claim what is rightfully hers—Queen Hillary , so entitled! How dare she be a strong presidential candidate when we, the press, don't like her?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The entitlement here is on the part of the press, claiming a role in politics that does not belong to it by any reasonable read of the role of the press, with reporters insisting that their inane questions and picayune obsessions are what's important in this race. Insisting that, rather than covering Bernie Sanders' campaign as seriously as they 're covering the campaigns of Republicans with lower polling numbers than Sanders, the right way to cover the Democratic primary is by dismissing Sanders and setting themselves up as Clinton's true opposition. It's disgraceful.

Prospect of Hillary Clinton-Marco Rubio Matchup Unnerves Democrats // NYT // Jeremy W. Peters - May 22, 2015

WASHINGTON — They use words like “historic” and “charismatic,” phrases like “great potential” and “million-dollar smile.” They notice audience members moved to tears by an American-dream-come-true success story. When they look at the cold, hard political math, they get uneasy .

An incipient sense of anxiety is tugging at some Democrats — a feeling tersely captured in four words from a blog post written recently by a seasoned party strategist in Florida: “Marco Rubio scares me.”

What is so unnerving to them at this early phase of the 2016 presidential campaignstill seems, at worst, a distant danger: the prospect of a head-to-head general-election contest between Mr. Rubio, the Republican senator from Florida, and Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Yet the worriers include some on Mrs. Clinton’s team. And even former President Bill Clinton is said to worry that Mr. Rubio could become the Republican nominee, whittle away at Mrs. Clinton’s support from Hispanics and jeopardize her chances of carrying Florida’s vital 29 electoral votes.

Interactiv e Feature | What Marco Rubio Would Need to Do to Win Mr. Rubio will try to position himself as a next-generation conserv ative who can unite the Republican Party.

Democrats express concerns not only about whether Mr. Rubio, 43, a son of Cuban immigrants, will win over Hispanic voters, a growing and increasingly important slice of the electorate. They also worry that he would offer a sharp generational contrast to Mrs. Clinton, a fixture in American politics for nearly a quarter-century who will turn 69 less than two weeks before the election.

As her supporters recall, Barack Obama beat Mrs. Clinton for the nomination in the 2008 elections after drawing similar contrasts himself.

Patti Solis Doyle, who ran Mrs. Clinton’s presidential campaign for most of the 2008 contest, said Mr. Rubio “could have the ability to nip away at the numbers for the Democrats.”

Ms. Doyle, the first Hispanic woman to manage a presidential campaign, added that Mr. Rubio could allow Republicans to regain a “reasonable percentage” of the Hispanic v ote, which hit a low of 27 percent in the 2012 presidential election.

Interactiv e Feature | What Hillary Clinton Would Need to Do to Win Mrs. Clinton can expect little if any opposition in the Democratic primaries. But she was similarly well positioned when she declared her candidacy in 2007.

“He is a powerful speaker,” she added. “He is young. He is very motivational. He has a powerful story.”

Recognizing how essential it is to win Hispanic support, Mrs. Clinton has gone further in laying out an immigration policy than she has on almost any other issue, saying that she would extend greater protections to halt deportations of people in the United States illegally. She has also hired a former undocumented immigrantto lead her Latino outreach efforts.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Her own strategists, their allies in the “super PACs” working on her behalf and theDemocratic Party all say they see plenty of vulnerabilities in Mr. Rubio’s record and his views. And they are trying to shape the perception people have of him while polls show that he is still relatively unknown: Yes, the Democratic National Committee said in a recent memo, Mr. Rubio was a fresh face, but one “peddling a tired playbook of policies that endanger our country, hurt the middle class, and stifle the American dream.”

So far, Democrats who have combed over Mr. Rubio’s voting record in the Senate have seized on his opposition to legislation raising the minimum wage and to expanding college loan refinancing, try ing to cast him as no different from other Republicans.

The subtext: He may be Hispanic, but he is not on the side of Hispanics when it comes to the issues they care about.

Democrats will try to use Mr. Rubio’s youth and four-y ear career in national politics against him, depicting him as green or naïve — a liability at a time when unrest abroad is a top concern. “A Dan Quayle without the experience,” suggested Christopher Lehane, a veteran strategist who has worked for the Clintons.

Bill Richardson, the former governor of New Mexico, who is of Mexican heritage, said Democrats would also make an issue of Mr. Rubio’s mixed record on how to overhaul the immigration system: He initially supported a Senate bill to grant people in the United States illegally a path to citizenship, but he later backed down.

Mr. Richardson said that would poison his chances with Hispanic voters. “His own Hispanic potential would defeat him,” he said.

It is also unclear how much Mr. Rubio would appeal to Puerto Ricans, Mexicans and other voters with Latin American ancestry who may not feel much cultural affinity with a Cuban.

Still, when many Democrats assess Mr. Rubio’s chances, as nearly a dozen of them did for this article, they put him in the top tier of candidates who concern them the most, along with former Gov. Jeb Bush, another Floridian who is courting Hispanics, and Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin.

Mr. Rubio’s heritage and his youth could be particularly dangerous to Mrs. Clinton, they said. Each of those points could help neutralize one of her biggest strengths: the opportunity to help elect the first female president, and the experience Mrs. Clinton gained as secretary of state.

Mr. Rubio already appears to be pursuing that strategy. By calling himself a candidate of the “21st century, not the 20th,” he seeks both to turn Mrs. Clinton’s long career against her and to entice voters who may desire a change of direction.

In Florida, Democrats who have watched Mr. Rubio’s rise warn against playing down his strengths.

Former Gov. Charlie Crist, who lost to Mr. Rubio in the Republican primary for the 2010 senatorial election but later switched parties, said he admired how Mr. Rubio told the story of his immigrant parents — his mother a maid, his father a bartender — and how they worked hard so that he could succeed. “It’s hard to get more compelling than that,” Mr. Crist said.

John Morgan, a major Democratic donor in Florida who will hold a fund-raiser for Mrs. Clinton next week, said he planned to raise the issue of Mr. Rubio’s strengths with her.

“Jim Messina talks about how elections are about where we want to go from here,” Mr. Morgan said, naming the strategist who helped President Obama win two national elections. What is problematic about Mr. Rubio, he said, is “his theme will be, ‘We don’t want to go back; we need to go forward.’ ”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I think they do underestimate him,” Mr. Morgan added. “He’s energetic, he’s photogenic, and he will say whatever you want him to say.”

Steve Schale, the Florida strategist who wrote the “Marco Rubio scares me” blog post, said that when he worked for the Democratic leader of the Florida House of Representatives, his boss, Dan Gelber, had a saying about Mr. Rubio’s effect on crowds, and about his sincerity: “Young women swoon, old women pass out, and toilets flush themselves.”

And Mr. Gelber himself recalled the day in Tallahassee, Fla., in 2008 when he and Mr. Rubio, then the speaker of the State House, gave their farewell speeches. He spoke first, followed by Mr. Rubio, as Mr. Gelber’s wife looked on.

“She’s sitting there weeping,” Mr. Gelber recalled, still incredulous. “And I look up, and I mouth, ‘Are you kidding me?’ ”

Mr. Gelber praised Mr. Rubio’s ability to use his family’s story to convey compassion for people marginalized by society, but he said he believed, as many Democrats do, that this was disingenuous.

“It’s a little maddening when his policies are so inconsistent with that,” Mr. Gelber said. “My head would explode.”

A Rubio-Clinton contest could ultimately come down to Florida. Republicans can ill afford to lose the state if they hope to win the White House. And bleeding Hispanic votes could make Mrs. Clinton’s path much harder.

“Losing a point among whites means winning Hispanics by about 5 percent more just to make up that loss,” Mr. Schale wrote in his memo on Florida’s election demographics. If Democrats continue to lose white voters, he added, Mr. Rubio’s place on the ballot would only complicate matters.

“He should be the one you don’t want to face,” Mr. Schale wrote.

Hillary Clinton's Accomplishment Deficit // RCP // Jonah Goldberg - May 22, 2015

There are plenty of reasons to believe 2016 will be a very ugly election year. Here’s one more.

Bloomberg Politics convened a focus group of Iowa Democrats. Nearly all loved Hillary. “She’s a bad mama-jama,” said one female participant. Bad mama-jama is good, by the way. The woman explained that Clinton is “not afraid to step up” or “afraid to say, ‘No. I don’t want to do it that way. I’m going to do it this way.’”

Another participant insisted that Clinton is a “better woman than I am” — a great standard for selecting a president, to be sure — because of Clinton’s ability to weather various scandals and humiliations.

The awkward part came when Bloomberg’s Mark Halperin asked the room, “What did she accomplish that you consider significant as secretary of state?”

The answers — or rather, the replies, since no one had an answer — were awkward to say the least.

“I really can’t name anything off the top of my head,” one squirming Democrat admitted.

“Give me a minute. Give me two minutes. Go to someplace else,” another Iowa Democrat pleaded.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A third let the uncomfortable silence play out for as long as she could before confessing, “No.”

One young man offered the most grudging endorsement he could. “She’s been at a high level in numerous offices for about 25 years now. It’s either going to be that or it’s going to be Scott Walker . . . destroying America’s unions. She’s not perfect. But she’s been in the eye for a long time — in the public’s eye — and you’re going to have some stuff on her. But, you know, she has great policies and she knows how to get stuff done.”

So, the best case for her is that she weathered a lot of scandals and, to borrow Robert Hoover’s defense of the Delta Tau Chi fraternity in Animal House, Hillary Clinton has “a long tradition of existence.”

Supporters also said she knows how to get stuff done but can’t name anything she’s actually, you know, done. This is like praising a coach for knowing how to win football games but not being able to cite any actual wins.

In fairness to them, Clinton can’t name anything significant she did as secretary of state either — because she didn’t do anything very significant.

The consensus inside the Beltway is that this isn’t a big problem for Clinton. I’m not so sure.

The Beltway view does have merit. Most voters are party-line voters. The young man who hates Scott Walker will vote for whichever candidate isn’t Scott Walker. (Likewise, Republicans will likely vote for whichever candidate isn’t Hillary Clinton.) John Kerry had no significant accomplishments to his credit after decades in the Senate — and yet, in 2004, he got more votes than any Democratic presidential candidate ever had up until then.

Still, Clinton has a problem. While partisan Democrats will surely vote for her, their difficulty — and her difficulty — in citing any meaningful accomplishments may not play well with independents and swing voters.

Personally, I think swing voters are a mixed bag. We don’t have a formal parliamentary system in this country, but in reality we vote for parties, not personalities. Do you want these 5,000 appointees running the government or those 5,000 appointees? If you’re a liberal Democrat, you want liberal policies implemented by liberal officials. If you’re a conservative Republican, you want conservative policies implemented by conservative officials.

Swing voters put more emphasis on particular personalities. They also put a premium on their own self-conception as independent thinkers. Thus, they give a lot of weight to things like accomplishments, if for no other reason than to justify their “swing voterness.” If neither Clinton nor her fans can offer evidence she’s effective, that could hurt her among swing voters in swing states.

And that’s why the 2016 election will be an ugly affair. Going by her own fan base in Iowa, Clinton is not a fresh face. She has more baggage than the luggage-claim level at O’Hare Airport. Her record amounts to surviving scandals, many of her own making. Her most compelling selling point is that she’s a woman. And her strategists have decided she needs to energize the “Obama coalition” of low-information voters.

All of this points to a general election strategy of demonizing her opponent — whoever he (or she) might be. If you can’t make the case for yourself, you make the case against your opponent. And the Clintons certainly have a long record of accomplishment in doing exactly that.

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE

Clinton plants a flag in O'Malley's home state // Baltimore Sun //John Fritze - May22, 2015

It's Martin O'Malley's home turf, but Hillary Clinton is beginning to engage in Maryland.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For a state that rarely plays a role in presidential politics because of its late primary , Maryland has received considerable attention from Clinton's nascent presidential campaign — including an effort to engage elected leaders and early communication with political donors.

O'Malley, a former two-term governor, is widely expected to announce his presidential ambitions in Baltimore next weekend. Since leaving office in January, the Democrat has become a regular presence in early-nominating states and has promoted his record in Annapolis and as Baltimore's mayor.

Polls show Clinton crushing O'Malley in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina, even as the former secretary of state has faced her share of obstacles. Hundreds of emails sent from a private account she used during her time at the State Department were released Friday, resetting attention on a controversy that had ebbed somewhat in recent weeks.

With its late-April primary — nearly three months after the Iowa caucuses — Maryland has long been flyover country for presidential candidates.

Yet Clinton called Rep. Steny H. Hoyer when she formally launched her campaign last month and requested that he reach out to other elected officials in the state. The Southern Maryland lawmaker also helped coordinate an organizing meeting for Clinton v olunteers this month in Bethesda.

Her campaign has held at least three similar meetings in the state since then.

"I don't think Hillary is taking anything for granted," said Hoy er, the No. 2 Democrat in the House. "What I've experienced so far is a lot of enthusiasm and broad-based support for her candidacy."

And what of O'Malley, who led state Democrats for eight years?

"I admire Gov ernor O'Malley, I like Governor O'Malley," Hoyer said, echoing a sentiment expressed by others backing Clinton.

"I think he's proving to be ... a very attractive candidate," he added.

Most of Mary land's federal elected officials long ago expressed support for Clinton, including Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski. The dean of the state's congressional delegation, who is close with O'Malley, came out early for Clinton, prov iding a measure of political cover for others to follow.

Sen. Ben Cardin, who had previously expressed his support for Clinton, reiterated that position in an email Friday .

"Hillary's ground-breaking presidency will be a message to the world that the U.S. has selected the very best to lead our nation and that we are prepared to take on the challenges necessary to ensure a progressive future where all y oung girls and boys, regardless of ZIP code or continent, have an equal shot at reaching their dreams," Cardin wrote to supporters.

An O'Malley spokeswoman said the campaign isn't putting much stock in such gestures.

"The establishment backing the establishment is the oldest story in politics," O'Malley spokeswoman Haley Morris said in a statement. "If Governor O'Malley runs for president, he'll bring new leadership — not old-guard establishment thinking — to the race."

Clinton's campaign has repeatedly pressed its network of elected officials in Maryland to engage in the race. Lawmakers and their staff have been asked to use social media to direct their supporters to events for Clinton, for instance.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That effort has caught the attention of some O'Malley supporters who speculate Clinton's team is trying to undercut him.

"I'm surprised that they are being as aggressive as they are right now," said Yvette Lewis, a former chair of the state Democratic Party and an O'Malley ally. "If it was me, if I was getting calls this early in the game, I would be a little concerned because I would feel like I'm being strong-armed."

In public, the Clinton campaign has gone out of its way to ignore O'Malley's potential candidacy. Several Clinton supporters said they have not seen evidence of an approach that is any more heavy-handed than in other states that aren't home to a presidential aspirant.

"Just like we are doing in all 50 states, D.C. and the territories, we are starting early, building a lasting relationship with communities and organizing to earn every vote in each primary and caucus, taking nothing for granted," Clinton campaign spokesman Tyrone Gayle said in a statement.

In addition to interactions with elected officials, Clinton is hiring staff in Maryland, including several former aides to then-Lt. Gov. Anthony G. Brown's unsuccessful gubernatorial campaign last year. Alicia Jones, a Baltimore native who worked briefly for Brown, is serving as the Clinton campaign's "grass-roots organizer."

Michael Schultz, a fundraiser for Brown, is now the Clinton campaign's finance director for Maryland and Delaware.

And there are early signs the Clinton operation is beginning to tap political donors in the state. Maryland ranked ninth in the nation in political giving in the 2008 presidential campaign.

"Absolutely," said longtime political operator and donor Lainy LeBow-Sachs, when asked if she had heard from Clinton's campaign finance team. "I've given and I'm going to raise for her."

LeBow-Sachs also has given thousands of dollars to O'Malley. But, she said, she's supporting Clinton.

Polls have shown voters in Maryland have a mixed view of O'Malley. About 60 percent of both Democratic and Republican residents polled by Goucher College in February said O'Malley should not run, compared with 31 percent who said he should.

That's an improvement, said Mileah Kromer, director of the Sarah T. Hughes Field Politics Center at Goucher. During last year's gubernatorial campaign, when Republican Gov. Larry Hogan was running television ads criticizing O'Malley's record, 65 percent of respondents said O'Malley should not run.

O'Malley does better among state Democrats who would actually vote in the presidential primary. Only half of them say he should not run.

"Maryland might not necessarily be throwing their support behind the hometown guy," Kromer said, "but the pathway to the presidency doesn't go through Maryland."

O'Malley to campaign in Iowa hours after 2016 announcement // AP // Catherine Lucey - May 22, 2015

Once he announces his presidential decision, Martin O'Malley will waste no time in getting himself to Iowa.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Malley will campaign in the leadoff caucus state on May 30, the same day he makes an announcement in Baltimore about whether he will seek the Democratic presidential nomination. A Democrat with knowledge of O'Malley's travel plans, who spoke on condition of anonymity so as not to pre-empt the formal announcement, said O'Malley would appear in Davenport in the afternoon and Des Moines at night.

If he runs for the nomination, as his travel plans strongly suggest he will, O'Malley will join former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton and Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders as the major candidates in the race for the Democratic nomination.

The former Maryland governor has made several visits to the early caucus state this year, has two paid staffers on the ground and plans to add more. He also invested heavily in Iowa last year, making four trips to the state and putting 14 staffers to work on state campaigns.

During a visit earlier this year, O'Malley said Iowa Democrats needed to get to know him. He said that at a certain point, "the race quickly narrows between the once inevitable front-runner and the new and unknown candidate who emerges to offer a more compelling alternative."

O'Malley has trips planned to Iowa and N.H. after 'special announcement' // WaPo // John Wagner - May 22, 2015

Former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley has back-to-back trips planned to Iowa and New Hampshire after his presidential announcement at the end of this month, according to activists in those early nominating states.

The Democrat has heavily teased a "special announcement" the morning of May 30 at Federal Hill Park in Baltimore, the city he served as mayor for seven years. According to activists, O'Malley will then travel to Iowa, where he has events scheduled in Davenport and Des Moines, and he plans to be in New Hampshire the following day.

The activists spoke on the condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to speak for O'Malley's campaign-in-waiting. Aides to O'Malley, who are relocating to new office space in Baltimore, did not immediately return phone calls on Friday.

If O'Malley moves forward with a White House bid, he will become the third Democrat to enter the race, joining Hillary Rodham Clinton, the dominant frontrunner, and Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), who is drawing support from the party's liberal wing. Sanders has a "hometown campaign kickoff" planned Tuesday in Burlington, Vt., where he served as mayor before being elected to Congress.

O'Malley aides have continued to be coy about his intentions, though all signs point to a White House bid, including a recent solicitation for a May 29 fundraiser that went out under an "O'Malley for President" banner.

On Friday, Daniel Goetzel, finance director for O'Malley's political action committee, send out an e-mail solicitation saying O'Malley "is really close to a very important decision, one that will transform the 2016 political landscape." He asked for contributions of $20.16 "to show that we're with him."

O'Malley has also been adding in staff in both Iowa and New Hampshire, according to activists in the two states.

This weekend, O'Malley plans to travel to Ireland, where is scheduled to give a paid speech that was canceled late last month. O'Malley cut that trip shortafter rioting and looting broke out in Baltimore, saying he wanted to be present amid the unrest in the city he had served.

Some Iowa Democrats prefer Sanders over Clinton // Des Moines Register // Brianne Pfannenstiel - May 22, 2015

Iowa Democrats participating in a Bloomberg Politics/Purple Strategies focus group this week acknowledged exercising pragmatism over idealism in the 2016 elections.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Four participants in the 10-person focus group said they would favor U.S. Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont over frontrunner Hillary Clinton in the presidential race if they thought he had a better shot at winning the nomination. They prefer his policies, but don't believe he's electable, they said.

"He proposed something — free college tuition at public universities," said Charlie, a 24-year-old graphic designer. "You know what, good luck getting that through."

"And that's the big difference," he said. "You know, he is to the left on just about every issue. And a lot of the issues I agree with him — not on maybe every issue, but I am with him on a lot of stuff. But, you know, good luck with that. ... It's just not going to get passed."

Sanders, who is an independent but caucuses in the Senate as a Democrat, announced his candidacy in April, joining a small list of possible challengers to Clinton. Others include former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and former U.S. Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia.

John, a 31-year-old teacher, said he likes that Sanders' policies are generally more liberal than Clinton's. He voiced — and others echoed — the hope that Sanders' presence in the race will push her to the left on certain issues as the campaign progresses.

"He is going to have a bigger voice than he's given credit for," he said.

But the four are throwing their support to Clinton, in an effort to see a Democrat continue to occupy the White House.

Sanders is a self-described socialist, making him an easy target for conservative and tea party Republicans, they said.

Another major drawback is his inability to raise enough cash to compete with the fundraising efforts of the Clinton campaign and others.

"I mean right now, whether we like it or not, you know, we have a Citizens United America, and you need to raise a lot of money," Charlie said. "And he's just not — there is just so many characteristics where he does not stand a chance."

About the focus group

Bloomberg Politics, in conjunction with Purple Strategies, conducted two qualitative focus groups in Des Moines, one of likely Democratic caucus participants and one of likely Republican caucus participants.

Each group consisted of 10 participants, both men and women, and from a variety of ages and socio-economic and educational backgrounds.

Qualitative research results cannot be statistically analyzed or projected onto the broader population at large. As is customary, respondents were compensated for their participation.

Presidential Election Campaigning Underway in Iowa // VOA // Kane Farabaugh -May 22, 2015

CEDAR FALLS, IOWA—

Although the November 2016 presidential election is over a year and half away, campaigning to choose party nominees is already underway in Iowa - a key state because it holds a party caucus early in the election season.

Though Cedar Falls, Iowa has a population just over 40,000, right now it is the epicenter of the race for the White House. Republican party presidential hopefuls are pressing the flesh (shaking hands with people) and answering voters' questions on issues ranging from immigration reform to marriage equality.

"My biggest concern as a voter is that America has to come back to God," said Linda Morris.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republican voter Linda Morris was among a group attending a breakfast with candidate and former Arkansas Governor Mike Huckabee.

“We have gone down the wrong path for the last eight years," she said.

Conservative voter Curtis Bartlett agrees. He wants a president that can reverse escalating racial tensions in America.

“I don’t understand why whites and blacks can’t get together and sit down and talk over what one person wants, the other person wants too," said Bartlett.

Bartlett’s list of concerns also includes the debate over same-sex marriage.

It’s an issue that attracted dozens of protestors outside Cedar Falls High School. Inside, Huckabee joined fellow presidential hopeful former Senator Rick Santorum on stage to speak with conservative voters who oppose same-sex marriage.

“I don’t think it’s that big of an issue," said Lynn Brant.

As a Democrat, Lynn Brant supports same-sex marriage. In his party, the leading presidential contender is former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, who also visited Cedar Falls to interact with potential supporters.

“It looks like Hillary might be a shoo-in, but I hope not. I hope that there is a debate that she will have to defend herself and the Democrats will hav e a choice," said Brant.

Iowa matters for these candidates because it is the first state to hold an election, called a caucus. The results can either boost or sink aspirations for the White House early in an election y ear depending on who wins or loses.

For Republicans this year, Iowa is the place where they can build name recognition and momentum ahead of the caucus. But the growing field of candidates all vying for attention and campaign funding concerns Curtis Bartlett.

“Because are you going to wipe out somebody who could be a good candidate right away because they can’t get the finances?" Asked Bartlett.

More finances means more advertising, and in an election expected to break all prev ious records for money spent, ev ery dollar counts.

Prospect of Hillary Clinton-Marco Rubio Matchup Unnerves Democrats // NYT // Jeremy W. Peters - May 22, 2015

WASHINGTON — They use words like “historic” and “charismatic,” phrases like “great potential” and “million-dollar smile.” They notice audience members moved to tears by an American-dream-come-true success story. When they look at the cold, hard political math, they get uneasy .

An incipient sense of anxiety is tugging at some Democrats — a feeling tersely captured in four words from a blog post written recently by a seasoned party strategist in Florida: “Marco Rubio scares me.”

What is so unnerving to them at this early phase of the 2016 presidential campaign still seems, at worst, a distant danger:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

the prospect of a head-to-head general-election contest between Mr. Rubio, the Republican senator from Florida, and Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Yet the worriers include some on Mrs. Clinton's team. And even former President Bill Clinton is said to worry that Mr. Rubio could become the Republican nominee, whittle away at Mrs. Clinton's support from Hispanics and jeopardize her chances of carrying Florida's vital 29 electoral votes.

What Marco Rubio Would Need to Do to Win

Democrats express concerns not only about whether Mr. Rubio, 43, a son of Cuban immigrants, will win over Hispanic voters, a growing and increasingly important slice of the electorate. They also worry that he would offer a sharp generational contrast to Mrs. Clinton, a fixture in American politics for nearly a quarter-century who will turn 69 less than two weeks before the election.

As her supporters recall, Barack Obama beat Mrs. Clinton for the nomination in the 2008 elections after drawing similar contrasts himself.

Patti Solis Doyle, who ran Mrs. Clinton's presidential campaign for most of the 2008 contest, said Mr. Rubio "could have the ability to nip away at the numbers for the Democrats."

Ms. Doyle, the first Hispanic woman to manage a presidential campaign, added that Mr. Rubio could allow Republicans to regain a "reasonable percentage" of the Hispanic v ote, which hit a low of 27 percent in the 2012 presidential election.

"He is a powerful speaker," she added. "He is young. He is very motivational. He has a powerful story."

Recognizing how essential it is to win Hispanic support, Mrs. Clinton has gone further in laying out an immigration policy than she has on almost any other issue, saying that she would extend greater protections to halt deportations of people in the United States illegally. She has also hired a former undocumented immigrant to lead her Latino outreach efforts.

Her own strategists, their allies in the "super PACs" working on her behalf and the Democratic Party all say they see plenty of vulnerabilities in Mr. Rubio's record and his views. And they are trying to shape the perception people have of him while polls show that he is still relatively unknown: Yes, the Democratic National Committee said in a recent memo, Mr. Rubio was a fresh face, but one "peddling a tired playbook of policies that endanger our country, hurt the middle class, and stifle the American dream."

So far, Democrats who have combed over Mr. Rubio's voting record in the Senate have seized on his opposition to legislation raising the minimum wage and to expanding college loan refinancing, try ing to cast him as no different from other Republicans.

The subtext: He may be Hispanic, but he is not on the side of Hispanics when it comes to the issues they care about.

Democrats will try to use Mr. Rubio's youth and four-y ear career in national politics against him, depicting him as green or naïve — a liability at a time when unrest abroad is a top concern. "A Dan Quayle without the experience," suggested Christopher Lehane, a veteran strategist who has worked for the Clintons.

Bill Richardson, the former governor of New Mexico, who is of Mexican heritage, said Democrats would also make an issue of Mr. Rubio's mixed record on how to overhaul the immigration system: He initially supported a Senate bill to grant people in the United States illegally a path to citizenship, but he later backed down.

Mr. Richardson said that would poison his chances with Hispanic voters. "His own Hispanic potential would defeat him," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It is also unclear how much Mr. Rubio would appeal to Puerto Ricans, Mexicans and other voters with Latin American ancestry who may not feel much cultural affinity with a Cuban.

Still, when many Democrats assess Mr. Rubio's chances, as nearly a dozen of them did for this article, they put him in the top tier of candidates who concern them the most, along with former Gov. Jeb Bush, another Floridian who is courting Hispanics, and Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin.

Mr. Rubio's heritage and his youth could be particularly dangerous to Mrs. Clinton, they said. Each of those points could help neutralize one of her biggest strengths: the opportunity to help elect the first female president, and the experience Mrs. Clinton gained as secretary of state.

Mr. Rubio already appears to be pursuing that strategy. By calling himself a candidate of the "21st century, not the 20th," he seeks both to turn Mrs. Clinton's long career against her and to entice voters who may desire a change of direction.

In Florida, Democrats who have watched Mr. Rubio's rise warn against playing down his strengths.

Former Gov. Charlie Crist, who lost to Mr. Rubio in the Republican primary for the 2010 senatorial election but later switched parties, said he admired how Mr. Rubio told the story of his immigrant parents — his mother a maid, his father a bartender — and how they worked hard so that he could succeed. "It's hard to get more compelling than that," Mr. Crist said.

Chris Christie and Jeb Bush Cite Experience in Courting Southern G.O.P. 4:35 PM ET

Josh Duggar Receives Support From Mike Huckabee 3:22 PM ET

Hillary Clinton Takes Questions Again and Addresses Emails 2:53 PM ET

John Morgan, a major Democratic donor in Florida who will hold a fund-raiser for Mrs. Clinton next week, said he planned to raise the issue of Mr. Rubio's strengths with her.

"Jim Messina talks about how elections are about where we want to go from here," Mr. Morgan said, naming the strategist who helped President Obama win two national elections. What is problematic about Mr. Rubio, he said, is "his theme will be, 'We don't want to go back; we need to go forward.' "

Continue reading the main story

"I think they do underestimate him," Mr. Morgan added. "He's energetic, he's photogenic, and he will say whatever you want him to say."

Steve Schale, the Florida strategist who wrote the "Marco Rubio scares me" blog post, said that when he worked for the Democratic leader of the Florida House of Representatives, his boss, Dan Gelber, had a saying about Mr. Rubio's effect on crowds, and about his sincerity: "Young women swoon, old women pass out, and toilets flush themselves."

And Mr. Gelber himself recalled the day in Tallahassee, Fla., in 2008 when he and Mr. Rubio, then the speaker of the State House, gave their farewell speeches. He spoke first, followed by Mr. Rubio, as Mr. Gelber's wife looked on.

"She's sitting there weeping," Mr. Gelber recalled, still incredulous. "And I look up, and I mouth, 'Are you kidding me?' "

Mr. Gelber praised Mr. Rubio's ability to use his family's story to convey compassion for people marginalized by society, but he said he believed, as many Democrats do, that this was disingenuous.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It’s a little maddening when his policies are so inconsistent with that,” Mr. Gelber said. “My head would explode.”

A Rubio-Clinton contest could ultimately come down to Florida. Republicans can ill afford to lose the state if they hope to win the White House. And bleeding Hispanic votes could make Mrs. Clinton’s path much harder.

“Losing a point among whites means winning Hispanics by about 5 percent more just to make up that loss,” Mr. Schale wrote in his memo on Florida’s election demographics. If Democrats continue to lose white voters, he added, Mr. Rubio’s place on the ballot would only complicate matters.

“He should be the one you don’t want to face,” Mr. Schale wrote.

A Win for Progressives in Philadelphia // The Atlantic // Molly Ball - May 21, 2015

Is there a rising progressive tide in the Democratic Party? Liberals like to claim that there is. But beyond the recent elections of two vocal populists—Senator Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts and New York Mayor Bill de Blasio—there hasn't been a whole lot of evidence to point to. Indeed, in two of the most hyped challenges to centrist Democratic officeholders—the recent primaries of New York Governor Andrew Cuomo and Chicago Mayor Rahm Emanuel—the left has come up short. And things aren't looking much better for Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders in his left-wing challenge to Hillary Clinton.

On Tuesday, though, progressives scored a victory. The Democratic primary for Philadelphia mayor pitted a crusading left-winger against a charter-school advocate backed by suburban hedge-fund magnates. This time, the left-winger, a former city councilman named Jim Kenney, actually won. Given the city's overwhelmingly Democratic tilt, the primary is likely to decide the election.

Kenney ran on a de Blasio-esque platform of establishing universal pre-K, raising the minimum wage to $15 per hour, and ending stop-and-frisk police tactics. (Kenney, a 57-year-old Irish-American, also epitomizes the classiness and tact for which Philadelphia sports fans are famed: In December, he called New Jersey Governor Chris Christie "fat assed" and "a creep" for sitting in the Dallas Cowboys' box at an Eagles game.) On Monday, de Blasio endorsed Kenney, saying the two shared a "progressive vision." Kenney’s campaign was outspent many times over by supporters of his chief rival, Anthony Hardy Williams, a state senator who was backed by a $7 million super PAC. But on Tuesday night, Kenney took 56 percent of the vote.

The Kenney-Williams divide typifies the current split within the Democratic Party between those who style themselves "pro-business" and those who emphasize remedying income inequality. It's a conflict that's also currently playing out on Capitol Hill, where President Obama is in an increasingly acrimonious dispute with the majority of congressional Democrats over a Republican-backed trade-authority measure. The split has echoes of the 1990s battles between Bill Clinton's Democratic Leadership Council and the party base led by Jesse Jackson.

Education is a major fault line in the current Democratic divide—in Chicago, Emanuel's school policies were a principal driver of the dissatisfaction that forced him into a runoff last month. De Blasio has also been in high-profile fights with New York charter-school advocates, while Obama's stance in favor of education reform has dismayed the teachers’ unions that are a major Democratic Party constituency.

Williams, Kenney's rival, was the author of a state law that created a voucher-like system giving companies tax credits in exchange for student scholarships. The super PAC backing him was bankrolled by three financiers who support free-market education reform. Yet in addition to backing Kenney, Philadelphia voters on Tuesday also approved an advisory ballot question seeking to return public schools to local control. Kati Sipp, director of Pennsylvania Working Families, a union-backed liberal coalition, declared the primary "a big win for public education," adding, "Money men tried to buy this election, but they failed."

Liberal activists say Kenney's election is further proof that the center of the Democratic Party is indeed moving leftward—a trend that Clinton, even without a serious primary challenger, will have to grapple with in 2016. Also Tuesday, the city council in Los Angeles voted to raise that city's minimum wage to $15 per hour. "The energy in the Democratic Party is on the left," Anna Greenberg, Kenney's pollster, told me. "It's coming from the urban centers, and that's where Democratic votes come from."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GOP

[‘Optimistic’ Jeb Bush faces hard truths in New Hampshire swing] // MSNBC // Benjy Sarlin - May 22, 2015

PORTSMOUTH, New Hampshire – Jeb Bush has cautioned from the start of his presidential flirtation that he would only take the final plunge if he can “do it joyfully.”

“In order to win a Republican has to be joyful, has to be hopeful, has to be optimistic,” Bush told a roundtable of business leaders here on Wednesday during a 2-day campaign tour of the nation’s first primary state.

That goal has never looked more daunting than it does now, as the nominal GOP frontrunner looks to shake off a rough period of questions about his position on the Iraq War, fend off ongoing attacks from the right on his stances on immigration and education, and – perhaps most importantly – unshackle himself from his brother’s legacy.

“Joy” is one of his most frequently used words on the trail and there are laughs here and there in his speeches, but his one-liners tend toward the biting rather than the giddy. As he left a local Chamber of Commerce event at a bar in Concord on Thursday, he told reporters gathered outside his car that he had been told to smile more – then flashed a grin before driv ing off.

If Bush is having trouble smiling enough, it’s because there’s an implied underside to Bush’s talk of a “joyful” run, which is the modern political meat grinder that the campaign usually is in practice. Bush’s well-earned contempt for the show is borne out of generations of family experience and he got his first taste of its bitter reality earlier this month when he stumbled over an answer on the Iraq War, prompting a multi-day media frenzy that played out across multiple interviews with network TV and radio hosts and in scrums at high-profile GOP gatherings.

“It got a little bumpy, but all is well now,” Bush told a voter concerned about the Iraq episode in Portsmouth. “The ship is stable.”

With the worst behind him for now, Bush spent his two day s in New Hampshire getting back to basics at four small retail events with just a few dozen attendees each. Along the way , he accepted hours of impromptu questioning from locals and the press alike on any topic that crossed their minds in between shaking hands and slapping backs. These are the kinds of personal grill sessions that state Republicans argue are the key to prevailing in what is likely a must-win primary for Bush. It was also, as Bush’s aides liked to point out, a pronounced contrast to the often inaccessible Hillary Clinton.

Bush is better versed in the X’s and O’s of political strategy than probably anyone in the field with the exception of Clinton and it showed. He has a habit of narrating his political thinking in real time, a kind of meta-commentary in which he tells audiences whether something he’s about to say might cause him problems with the press, or with a key voting bloc, or with his political opponents.

After an audience member in Portsmouth asked him about what he would do about the “pathological liar on the other side” in the general election– presumably Clinton – Bush straightforwardly said he “can’t rephrase that question because I’ll get in trouble with the ‘pathological liar’ part” before answering. He quipped that he was called “a lot of things I can’t repeat here in front of the press” as governor.

Later that evening, a state radio reporter asked Bush whether he regretted raising money for Republican Rep. Frank Guinta, who is now engulfed in a career-threatening campaign finance scandal. Knowing any response he gav e would crowd out coverage of his remarks in the local press, Bush offered a bracing non-answer: “I am av oiding the question.”

Bush, who opens his speeches with earnest biographical anecdotes about his wife and family, even went into detail with one voter about the political logic to the way he discusses his personal life – it's meant to insulate him from the character attacks that plagued the previous nominee.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Mitt Romney was a successful, loving, caring, generous man and he never showed it," Bush said.

But the obv ious savv y Bush displayed on the road raised a troubling question for some attendees. How could someone with such a finely-tuned political radar get caught so flat-footed last week over an issue as predictable as the Iraq War?

"I would have thought if you were a presidential candidate or a serious politician you'd have had the answer down pat on the first try," Joan Rice, who works at a financial planning business, told msnbc at the Portsmouth event. "It's such an important question – how could not be prepared for it?"

Milling around a Bedford house party ahead of a visit from Bush, state representative David Milz said he was glad the 201 6 hopeful had eventually distanced himself from the decision to invade Iraq. Not because Milz was critical of the Iraq War – as far as he's concerned, George W. Bush has nothing to apologize for – but because it was the obvious political mov e.

"Bush gets blamed for every thing – everything," he told msnbc. "They 're still trying to hold him responsible for stuff Obama has screwed up for y ears now."

It's the topic of family that most threatens to harsh Bush's vision of a mellow campaign. The former Florida governor seems almost physically pained discussing any kind of difference with his sibling or father. During the Fox News interview with Megy n Kelly launched the Iraq odyssey, he appeared most concerned about making sure v iewers know that whatever criticisms of the war he cited were shared by his brother as well.

"I'm proud of my family, I love my mom and dad, I love my brother and people are going to hav e just get ov er that," he said in Portsmouth, prompting a round of applause. "That's the way it is."

At the house party, Bush turned to discussing the fall of the Soviet Union at one point, a development he credited to Ronald Reagan "and the guy who succeeded him who I'm supposed to somehow disown."

Bush scored a laugh at the same event by assuring the audience that he would differentiate himself from Marvin and Neil Bush, two non-politician siblings. He waxed philosophical about the issue after being asked an audience member to elaborate on his family ties, telling the crowd how reading the great historian Barbara Tuchman had reminded him of history's "confounding way of repeating itself" and that even though the world had "changed dramatically" since his father was president, he planned to apply lessons learned from previous administrations.

He got some encouragement along the way too. Bush met plenty of supporters in New Hampshire who thought the Iraq issue was overblown or said that the Bush name was a selling point, not a drawback.

"If I'm hiring a plumber and he says his dad's a plumber, I'm not going to say he can't work on the house," Lori Ashooh, who co-hosted the Bedford party with her husband, told msnbc. She's uncommitted for now in the primaries.

But the prev ious week also showed the danger for Bush of setting himself up, intentionally or not, as the Republican field's defender-in-chief of the family legacy . Many Republicans say they like the younger Bush personally, but are concerned about encouraging a "dynasty" or worry that he'll be constantly sucked into old political fights if he can't mute the issue early on.

Well aware of the problem, Bush offered the most pointed critique of his brother's presidency yet to a voter in Concord who asked where they differed on policy .

"I think in Washington during my brother's time Republicans spent too much money ," Bush said. "I think he could have used the veto power, he didn't have line item veto power, but he could have brought budget discipline to Washington, DC."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For most candidates it would be a relatively banal admission – almost nobody in the party defends Bush-era spending anymore. For the only candidate whose last name is Bush, however, it's not so easy. He quickly followed up with a set of caveats – Obama's deficits were bigger, nobody's perfect, let's not dwell on our differences, etc.

"I don't feel compelled to go out of my way to criticize Republican presidents," Bush said. "I don't know, just call me a team player here. Just so happens the last two Republican presidents happen to be my dad and my brother, but you'll never hear me complain about Ronald Reagan either. Every president makes mistakes, the question is what do you do, what do you learn from those mistakes?"

It did not look like a joyful moment. Only 536 days until the general election.

Jeb Bush's War on Gay Adoption // Daily Beast // Betsy Woodruff - May 22, 2015

Bush defended Florida's strict ban on LGBT adoption, but emails from his time as governor show he had trouble explaining why.

When Jessie Odell asked Jeb Bush to let him and his partner adopt a child 15 years ago, all he got was silence. But his pleas did no go unheard, and despite the governor's best efforts, Odell is now a father.

His story is one of many that play out in the email exchanges between Bush and his staff -- which the Florida Center for Investigative Reporting recently made searchable -- and it gives an intriguing view into how the then-Florida governor struggled to explain his opposition to adoption rights for LGBT people.

It also shows that Bush and his top advisors were acutely aware of internal inconsistencies in the state's policy on same-sex adoption and foster families.

In 1977, Florida became the only state in the country to proactively ban gays and lesbians from adopting. Thanks in part to the dogged anti-gay activism of former Miss Oklahoma Anita Bryant, the state implemented legislation saying sexual orientation alone could disqualify prospective parents from adopting.

That law faced a court challenge during Bush's time as governor. In 2004, the 11th Circuit Court of Appeals ruled against four gay men trying to overturn the law – a decision Bush applauded.

"[I]t is in the best interest of adoptive children, many of whom come from troubled and unstable backgrounds, to be placed in a home anchored both by a father and a mother," Bush said at the time, according to the St. Petersburg Times. "Our adoption policies take that important role into account."

In 2005, the Supreme Court refused to hear the men's appeal. But years later, the adoption ban was finally overturned.

Bush's email exchanges with gay constituents during the adoption fight indicate that his rhetoric on the topic was carefully crafted. And perhaps the most telling exchange is between Bush, his staffers, and Jessie Odell.

Odell, a gay man then living in Florida with his long-term partner, emailed the governor on Feb. 9 of 2000 pushing him to change his stance on adoption.

"My partner and I have been together for 11 years, our income is in the six figures, we have a very normal and stable home life," Odell wrote. "We have a lot to offer a child, love, the finest schools, and good moral standing. I also want to know, do you all feel that we would raise our children to be gay or lesbian? Do you all think that we would molest children?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He then appealed to the governor's traditional values.

"I understand that the media sometimes will show only the bad side of people, such as the drag parades on gay day, and other negative things of that nature," he continued. "Please understand that there is a whole other gay community, that the general public is unfamiliar with. My partner and I are in that community. We go to work, and pay bills just like you and your family."

I spoke with Odell about this email, and he said he never heard back from the governor or his staff about it. But emails show that Bush wanted to respond and was ultimately persuaded against it by his aides. A day after getting the email, in fact, he forwarded it to staffers and asked them to draft a reply. Two months later, Brian Yablonski, one of Bush's most senior advisors, emailed around a proposed response.

"While I respect the great diversity of our state, and have not been a vocal opponent of the gay and lesbian lifestyle, I am not in favor of lifting the ban on gay and lesbian adoptions," wrote Yablonski in his suggested response for Bush.

He continued to say that placing a child in "an alternative environment, as loving it may be [sic]," would be "an additional challenge for that child to face."

Then Yablonski suggested that the governor touch on the gay "lifestyle."

"I do not believe it is for the state to encourage or endorse this particular lifestyle," he wrote. "So long as it is within the bounds of the law, people may be free to do what they wish in their own private and personal affairs. However, when those activities require state approval and oversight, then that constitutes an explicit endorsement of the activity by the state. I am joined by the majority of policy makers and Floridians who do not believe it is appropriate for the state to sanction this particular lifestyle."

Yablonski suggested they conclude the email by saying, "I am sure this is not the response that you wanted to hear, but on this matter we have difference of opinion."

Sally Bradshaw, perhaps Bush's most trusted aide, then weighed in on Yablonski's proposed response.

"I am concerned about the obvious inconsistency in the fact that we allow gay couples to become foster parents, but not to adopt children," she wrote. "Don't we?"

Bush's reply was confused.

"I didn't think we allowed gay couples to be foster parents," he wrote. "Or may be it is adoption."

Bradshaw then emailed, "Don't you remember the info about [Kathleen Kearney, then-secretary of the Florida Department of Children and Families] presenting an award to a gay couple for being stellar foster parents? That's why this is problematic."

Yablonski then cleared up that the state had a "don't ask don't tell" policy on gay foster parenting, and that as a result children were placed with gay foster parents.

And his proposed response never went out. Yablonski told the email chain that he spoken to Kearney about the issue, and that she discouraged them from replying.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“She encouraged us not to respond because there is on going litigation against the state on this matter,” he said.

And that was that. In 2011, the now-married Odell finally adopted a son who, despite Bush’s concerns, has been on Honor Roll several times this year and is “the center of our universe.”

“God really played his hand in this, because we ended up with the most perfect, most gorgeous blond-haired, blue-eyed boy you’ve ever seen and not a problem in the world, just happy to be loved and have daddies,” he said.

Odell never heard back from Bush. When I directed his attention to the emails discussing his note, he wasn’t impressed with the inner workings of Team Bush.

“I am absolutely appalled to read those ‘possible’ responses they were considering sending,” Odell told me. “Especially the one that ended in ‘I know that's not the response you wanted to hear, But...’ That is the REAL Jeb Bush right there. Typical cowboy behavior like his brother. God Help us should he win the presidency. Go Hillary!!!”

But some gay Floridians were more forgiving of Bush’s stance on adoption.

“I am a proud republican and a gay man as well,” wrote Miik Martorell on Oct. 15, 2002. “Unlike many in my community, I support the conservative agenda because I believe that being BORN THIS WAY does not make me any less of a person or any more of a person. It makes me EQUAL, just like everyone else.”

Then he raised a concern.

“I believe that making the statement that only a man and a woman must parent a child is to say the least, ignorant,” he wrote.

“What you said about gay parenting just hurts, even more because I have supported you for so long,” he continued. “I believe I could make a good parent one day and I hope that I will be able to marry the one I love before I die. I guess my only thought for you would be to take a look at people like me that support you even though they are ridiculed by their community for doing so, yet we still fight on.”

Martorell didn’t get the response he wanted, but at least he got one. The governor wrote that he opposed anti-gay discrimination and hate, but didn’t think barring gays from adopting was a type of discrimination.

“Perhaps our disagreement is that I believe that the creation of life by a husband and wife and the creation of a family from that should be something that is protected and treated differently than other family strutures [sic],” he wrote. “I don't believe that this is a discriminatory position.”

And a few days before the 2002 re-election, another gay supporter emailed Bush to express support and call for him to change his stance on adoption.

“It seems that practically all people in the gay community think that if you are gay that you must vote for the democratic candidate,” wrote Bob Fritz. “Not so. Perhaps you should rethink your position on gay adoption and perhaps there may be another issue or two that I would like to see you take a different position on, but no candidate is perfect.”

Bush’s stance on gay adoption gets less popular by the day. Talking Points Memo reported earlier this week that, per UCLA demographer Gary Gates, gay adoption has even stronger public support than gay marriage.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's perhaps unsurprising, then, that Bush has softened his rhetoric on the issue. Earlier this week, the governor alluded to the gay adoption issue in an interview with the Christian Broadcast Network.

"If we want to create a right to rise society where people -- particularly children born in poverty -- if we want to have them have a chance, which should be a core American value, we have to restore committed loving family life with a mom and a dad loving their children with their heart and soul," he said.

Bush hasn't endorsed Sen. Ted Cruz's push for a Constitutional amendment to keep the federal government from overturning states' marriage laws, and in 2012 told Charlie Rose that loving same-sex parents can be good role models. And earlier this year, he talked about his opposition to LGBT adoption in the past tense.

"Previously, I opposed gay adoption, but it has since become the law in our state, and I respect that decision," he told Politifact in January .

For families like the Odells, that's good news. Still, as the emails from his time as governor show, Bush's messaging is certain to be handled carefully on LGBT issues as he struggles to court both social conservative die-hards, and a broader electorate that's much more pro-equality than when he last ran for office.

Christie: Patriot Act debate is 'dangerous' // MSNBC // Jane C. Timm - May 22, 2015

OKLAHOMA CITY — New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie slammed the Patriot Act's critics on Friday for engaging in a "very dangerous debate."

"This debate that we're having right now about the Patriot Act — it's is a very dangerous debate because it's done by people with no experience dealing what I've dealt with," Christie said. "I'm the only person in this national conversation who has used the Patriot Act, signed off on it, convicted terrorists because of it."

Presidential candidate and Republican Sen. Rand Paul has been the most vocal critic of the act, part of which has allowed for bulk data collection by the NSA and is set to expire on June 1. Paul spoke for ten-and-a-half hours in a "talking filibuster" to protest the Patriot Act's re-authorization, helping to delay the vote to Saturday in the Senate. His epic talk-a-thon also means that it's likely to expire temporarily since the House of Representatives is already in recess for the holiday weekend. A bipartisan group of senators assisted Paul by asking questions during the filibuster, a tactic designed to give the speaker a break.

Christie — who is expected to mount his own presidential campaign — said there's a "responsible" way to oversee the laws, and that the current critics were being irresponsible in the debate about the law.

"That's why I act the way I act, some days it may make you feel great and cheer, and other days you may wince and say I can't believe he said that!"

NEW JERSEY GOV. CHRIS CHRISTIE

"These same folks who are criticizing it now will be the same people who will stand on Capitol Hill if there's another attack on America and interrogate the CIA director and FBI director and say why they didn't connect and not see the hypocrisy in their own actions," he said to big cheers, speaking at the Southern Republican Leadership Conference, where Sens. Marco Rubio and Ted Cruz are canceling in-person appearances because of the planned Saturday votes.

Likely presidential candidate and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, who has had a difficult time appealing to hard line conservatives on social issues in particular, agreed with Christie, saying the Patriot Act should be reauthorized. The pair of governors will struggle among some of the most conservative voters, as they're seen as more moderate on a handful of issues. As such, both sought to assure the crowd they're conservative enough.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush talked up his conservative credentials and worked to convince the crowd that he is an effective leader with executive experience in a purple state.

"We took on the public unions and we won. We took on the teacher's unions and we won. We took on the broken worker's compensation system and we won," he said, continuing to enumerate his record despite applause that drowned him out. "I'm proud of that record and i believe there's a direct role for the next president of the United State to apply the kind of principles that we applied in the state of Florida to Washington, D.C."

Bush and Christie both spoke on Friday morning, where they largely impressed the audience in equal amounts; the crowd particularly approved of the conservative credentials Bush championed, like high grade ratings from the National Rifle Association.

On the other hand, Christie boasted of his work as a U.S. Attorney and worked to introduce himself to the conservative crowd — the New Jersey governor doesn't always attend these GOP cattle calls. He also portrayed himself as a more hawkish, safety-oriented potential candidate.

"I lov e this country and I want this country to be safe for my children," he said. "I will fight for it with every ounce of energy. I have to return America to the promise and prosperity at home and leadership around the world, if you giv e me a chance. That's why I came to Oklahoma."

Christie also seemed to offer a defense — and some spin — about his often blunt style, particularly highlighted in an expletive-laden speech on Thursday.

Recounting his late mother's advice, Christie said he knew she'd advise him to speak plainly in a presidential bid.

"[She'd say] you better tell them what's on y our mind and in your heart and you better not mince words because they need to trust you," he said. "That's why I act the way I act, some days it may make you feel great and cheer, and other days y ou may wince and say I can't believ e he said that! But here's what y ou'll never have to say — you'll never have to say I wonder what he thinks."

Chris Christie Says the Difference Between Coverage of Him and Hillary Reveals Biased Media // IJRreview / Chris Enloe - May 22, 2015

During an interview on CNBC Thursday, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie slammed the media for their leniency toward Hillary Clinton and her private email server scandal.

Gov. Christie said he was upset because he faced a lot more scrutiny from the media over the "Bridgegate" scandal than Clinton has over her email use scandal. Christie said:

"Has there been coverage of the email situation with the Secretary, absolutely. But the intensity of the coverage, and the relentlessness of the coverage is different. And that's where the bias is revealed."

Christie went on to hypothetically ask the show hosts how they thought the media would react if it had been him who had deleted his emails, in an attempt to show the media's bias for Hillary Clinton:

"If I had come out the day after the 'Bridgegate' thing was announced and said, 'By the way , all my emails are on a private serv er, and I deleted a whole bunch of them and destroyed the server and you have to take my word for it, the emails had nothing to do with the bridge stuff,' can you only imagine what the reaction would have been?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Can you imagine if it were me who deleted my emails?"

During the interview, Christie also reiterated the fact that he was recently exonerated of any wrongdoing in the "Bridgegate" scandal:

"Fifteen months later ... everything that I said the day after that story broke, everything I said, has proven out to be true after three different investigations."

In recent weeks, three people from Christie's office have been charged in connection with the scandal.

Gov. Christie is also considering a 2016 White House run, but hasn't made any formal announcements about if or when he will decide to enter the race.

Florida's Jewish voters a target for 2016 Republicans, but a near lock for Democrats // Tampa Bay News // Adam C. Smith and Kirby Wilson - May 22, 2015

TAMARAC — Republicans can't win the White House without winning Florida, so every presidential election cycle they look longingly at Florida's Jewish voters.

Just reason with them, the thinking goes. They are disproportionately affluent and well-educated. Surely these Floridians can be persuaded that voting Republican is more in their self-interest, through lower taxes and unwavering support for the conservative government in Israel.

The difference between three-quarters of Florida Jews voting for the Democratic nominee and two-thirds voting Democratic could be 50,000 votes — enough to decide the election.

"We're looking to do whatever we can," said Mark McNulty of the Republican Jewish Coalition, which spent $6.5 million in 2012 trying to sow doubts with Jewish voters about President Barack Obama's commitment to Israel. "In places like Florida and Ohio with substantial Jewish populations, a couple percentage points can mean the difference in an election."

But as much as political groups like the RJC like to say they are steadily gaining ground with Jewish voters, their progress is more accurately measured in inches than miles.

Even amid the falling out between Obama and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, as leading Republican presidential candidates argue Obama and Hillary Clinton made the Middle East less safe, and as Obama critics in Washington and Israel call the emerging nuclear deal with Iran a grave threat to the Jewish state, few experts see Republicans as likely to significantly improve their performance in 2016. Clinton's strong ties to the Jewish community, in fact, could make Jewish voters a harder target for the Republican nominee.

"It's a constant feature of American elections in the past decade. Every time the GOP claims to make inroads, and every time they are disappointed to find the American Jewish community has not changed its behavior," said Shmuel Rosner, a prominent columnist in Israel and political editor of the Jewish Journal.

It doesn't help that many of the Republicans most vocal about their deep love and devotion to Israeli security are Christian conservatives who turn off even staunchly Republican Jews.

"Apart from getting rid of their base — evangelicals — I don't see a way for Republicans to make really deep inroads in the Jewish vote," said Kenneth Wald, a political science professor and the Samuel R. "Bud" Shorstein professor of American Jewish Culture & Society at the University of Florida. "They've essentially got the Jewish voters who they're going to get, and it's essentially the same group they've had for a long time, probably about a fifth to a quarter of the population."

More than 40 years ago, political scientist Milton Himmelfarb noted that Jews are about the only ethnic group not to have grown more conservative as they became more prosperous, quipping that Jews "earn like Episcopalians, and vote like Puerto Ricans."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Wald credits radio host and comedian Peter Sagal with best summing up the question about Jewish voters that has consumed academics and confounded leading Republican strategists for generations:

"What is it about being rich and white that Jews do not understand?"

• • •

The tip filtered through the newsroom of the Tampa Bay Times earlier this month. Somebody's friend had an elderly mother living in a vast condo complex in Broward County, the kind of overwhelmingly Jewish retirement community as familiar to Democratic politicians in Florida as to fans of the TV showSeinfeld. Supposedly this lady's Democratic Club was loaded with people either ambivalent about Hillary Clinton running for president or downright hostile to her candidacy.

That would be a stunning development. Tepid support among elderly Jewish Democrats, expected to be among Clinton's most loyal constituencies, would signal serious trouble for the likely Democratic nominee.

Nowhere are the political stakes higher than Florida, the nation's biggest battleground state where Jewish voters represent anywhere from 3 percent to 6 percent of the electorate. A 10 percent swing in the Jewish vote would mean a net gain of 100,000 votes for the Republican. Obama won Florida by 74,000 votes in 2012 and 236,000 in 2008.

We hopped on a plane, drove to the 4,869-home Kings Point community in western Broward, and marched into the Kings Point clubhouse. Residents on this particular morning had gathered around dozens of sign-up tables for clubs ranging from Current Events to Canasta and Ceramics.

"I don't like that they 're trying to spread all this garbage about her emails, and donations to their foundation. It's not right, and it's not fair," said Shirley Rosen at the Hadassah table. "I'm all for her, and I don't think you'll find anyone around here who doesn't like Hillary, but there are v ery few Republicans. ... Honestly, when someone tells me they're Republican I think to myself, 'I really don't know who you are.' "

Paula Layne, 80, was distributing cards for her funeral serv ice business and bantering with friends, when she overheard a mention of Clinton.

"She's the smartest human being on Earth — truly. She's got good ideas and she's not afraid of anybody. She's fearless. All my friends are Hillary people and very enthusiastic" Layne declared.

"If she were a man, we'd say she has brass ones," chimed in George Jaquith, another transplant from the northeast. "And I think people are ready for a woman president ..."

"Not just a woman, but a smart woman," Layne cut in. "What she went through is an inspiration to all women. She overcame everything with such dignity and beauty and did not break up her family."

At the nearby Current Events Club table, Caroline Gore did not sound like much of a swing voter either.

"Any woman who votes for a Republican is an idiot, I'm going to tell you that right now. Look at the stricter abortion laws they're doing across the nation in a lot of places," she said. "It's not because she's a woman that I support her, but because of the issues. And I think she's the strongest candidate we hav e who can win the presidency and be a good president. I think she'd be a terrific president."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So it went throughout the Kings Point Clubhouse. Enthusiasm for Clinton was almost unanimous. Almost.

"As much as I am a Democrat all my life, I don't know how much I like Hillary Clinton," said Viola Baras, 87, sitting at the Holocaust survivors table. "These emails? If most people did that they would be in jail."

Turns out Mrs. Baras, who has two physician sons in the Tampa Bay area, was the source of the rumor of Clinton's weakness among Kings Point Democrats, though she doubted even the rare critic of Mrs. Clinton in her circle would ever vote Republican.

"The Jewish v ote will always be Democratic. As much as they may not like some of the policies with Israel, it doesn't affect their votes," said Baras, who survived the Auschwitz concentration camp.

• • •

Alan Bergstein, a Republican activist in Broward County, has spoken to countless Jewish groups in South Florida about why he thinks Republicans are better for Israel. These days he sounds about ready to throw in the towel.

Clinton will "absolutely" win a bigger share of Florida's Jewish vote than Obama did, Bergstein predicted, and almost nothing Republican political committees or billionaire conserv atives like Sheldon Adelson do will change that.

National exit polls showed Obama received 69 percent of the Jewish vote in 2012, compared to 78 percent in 2008, although another, more detailed analysis of exit polls concluded he really received 74 percent in 2008. Considering that Obama's support among white voters overall dropped 4 percentage points, some experts see the drop in Jewish support as insignificant.

"It's terribly frustrating," said Bergstein, a former school principal in New York. "When I talk to people who are Jewish, like I am, and have made literally fortunes in their businesses and are extremely bright people, for them to not understand the situation tells me they are no longer Jews, they are Democrats first. Their religion has been superseded by their politics."

Polls show Jewish voters more liberal on Middle East matters than most Americans, and Israel a lower-tier issue. Only 4 percent of Jewish voters cited Israel as the most important issue in their vote in a 2012 Public Religion Research Institute survey. More than half cited the economy, 15 percent said the growing gap between rich and poor, 10 percent said health care and 7 percent the deficit. They ov erwhelmingly supported abortion rights, same-sex marriage, environmental regulation, and more than half said they would pay more taxes to fund programs to help the poor.

"The position on Israel for most candidates is not going to be the determining factor for how Jews vote," said Ira Sheshkin, director of the Jewish Demography Project of the Sue and Leonard Miller Center for Contemporary Judaic Studies at the University of Miami. "Jews vote on social issues."

Wald, the UF professor and nationally recognized expert on Jewish voting behavior, dismisses the common supposition that Jews tend to be liberal due to Jewish values or historical experience. Only in America are Jews so concentrated on the left of the political spectrum, he noted, and Jewish support for Democrats has fluctuated at times.

"The political priority of most American Jews is making sure that the Jews continue to be full and equal participants in American life, and that is largely driven by their sense that the law should take no notice of religion," Wald said. "It's deeper than separation of church and state. It's more fundamentally that citizenship in the United States doesn't depend on your religion, your race, your ethnicity."

Jewish support for Democrats dropped in the 1960s, as the party embraced identity politics and policies such as affirmative action. President Jimmy Carter, who spoke often about being a born-again Christian, had little reservoir of goodwill with Jewish voters when he worked closely with Palestinian Liberation Organization chairman Yasser Arafat. The Jewish voted shifted back toward the Democrats in the 1980s as the Christian right gained prominence in the GOP.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A 2007 Pew survey found Jewish voters more receptive than non-Jews to supporting a presidential candidate who was Catholic, Mormon, Muslim, atheist, black, woman, or Hispanic — but not Evangelical Christian.

"Every time the surveys come out showing that 58 percent of Republicans think the U.S. should officially be a Christian country, that just reminds Jews that their success here is never entirely secure," Wald said.

TOP NEWS

DOMESTIC

Senate Vote Is a Victory for Obama on Trade, but a Tougher Test Awaits // NYT // Johnathan Weisman - May 22, 2015

President Obama moved closer to expanded trade negotiating power Friday night after the Senate passed hard-fought legislation that would help complete the most ambitious trade accord in a generation. The deal would link 12 nations on either side of the Pacific into a trading bloc that would encompass 40 percent of the global economy.

The Senate voted 62-37 to give this president and the next so-called trade promotion authority, ensuring that Congress could not amend or filibuster any trade accord negotiated over the next three-to-six years, though lawmakers could reject it.

Senator Orrin G. Hatch of Utah, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee and usually a foe of Mr. Obama's, called it "likely the most important bill we'll pass this year," adding, "it shows that when the president is right we will support him."

The legislation still faces a difficult path in the House, where almost every Democrat is dug in against Mr. Obama's top legislative priority, and where a rebellion may be brewing among the most conservative Republicans. Opponents say the measure will only hasten the exodus of manufacturing jobs to low-wage countries like Vietnam, depressing wages for the working class as it buoys the fortunes of the affluent.

"Do we want to live in an America where the middle class is wiped out?" asked Senator Jeff Merkley, Democrat of Oregon, presaging criticism to come.

But Mr. Obama's Senate victory was significant and convincing. It brought the president one step closer to securing the Trans-Pacific Partnership, a legacy-defining trade accord linking countries from Canada to Chile and Australia to Japan, cementing at least the economic part of Mr. Obama's so-called pivot to Asia. Trading partners have said they cannot complete negotiations without trade promotion authority because they cannot make their own politically difficult concessions, knowing Congress could tamper with them.

But the legislation goes still further. It extends that negotiating power for three years, with a possible extension for another three. That would mean the next president will enjoy most of the authority and it would ease passage of another major trade accord under negotiation with the European Union, expected to be finished in 2016.

Twice, Democratic opponents nearly derailed the trade promotion bill on procedural votes. On Friday night, supporters of the bill narrowly defeated a bipartisan amendment that would have demanded that future trade agreements crack down on countries that intentionally devalue their currencies, a measure that again could have derailed the bill. The amendment, by Senators Rob Portman, Republican of Ohio, and Debbie Stabenow, Democrat of Michigan, fell 48 to 51.

In the end, 13 Democrats sided with the president over Senate Democratic leadership to ensure passage.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“By passing this legislation, we can show we’re serious about advancing new opportunities for bigger American paychecks, better American jobs and a stronger American economy,” said Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the majority leader, who forged a rare alliance with the president to push the legislation.

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader and stalwart Obama ally, denounced the bill as “a handout for multinational corporations” that “does nothing for the middle class.”

Final passage came only after the bill ran a gantlet of amendments that could have derailed it — or at least made passage through the House much more difficult. The nail-biter was over the currency provision co-sponsored by Mr. Portman, a former United States trade representative in the George W. Bush White House. It would have demanded that future trade agreements include an enforceable crackdown on countries that intentionally depress their currencies to make their exports cheaper and American imports more pricey.

Jacob J. Lew, the Treasury secretary, had called on Mr. Obama to veto the trade promotion bill if the currency amendment was attached, fearing it could have backfired and empowered trading partners to challenge American fiscal and monetary policy making.

The Senate also voted down an amendment by Senator Elizabeth Warren, Democrat of Massachusetts, which tried to remove from the Pacific accord a chapter that would give corporations the power to challenge governments that take actions that affect the value of their investments. Ms. Warren maintains the so-called investor-state dispute settlement process could jeopardize American banking regulations and future environmental protections.

Also defeated was an amendment requiring congressional approval before any country not among the original 12 could join the Pacific partnership, and a Republican effort to strike assistance to workers who lose their jobs because of trade agreements.

The trade battle now shifts to the House, where passage was always expected to be more difficult. Only 17 Democrats have publicly declared their support, well short of the 30 that Republican leaders say they need. Senior House Democrats are adamant that trade deals dating to the North American Free Trade Agreement have cost hundreds of thousands of jobs and depressed wages for workers competing with low-wage countries.

More ominously for supporters of trade are the rumbles on the right that could cost the president Republican votes. The decision by Senator Ted Cruz, Republican of Texas and a Tea Party favorite, to back trade promotion has insulated the bill from Republicans inclined not to give Mr. Obama authority for anything. But that protection may be fraying.

On Friday, Rush Limbaugh became the latest conservative voice to pressure lawmakers.

“Since it’s an Obama deal, the odds are the United States is going to take it in the shorts, as we have on so much of the Obama agenda, both domestic and foreign policy,” he announced on his radio show.

Obama Set to Strengthen Federal Role in Clean Water Regulation // NYT // Coral Davenport -May 22, 2015

The Obama administration is expected in the coming days to announce a major clean water regulation that would restore the federal government’s authority to limit pollution in the nation’s rivers, lakes, streams and wetlands.

Environmentalists have praised the new rule, calling it an important step that would lead to significantly cleaner natural bodies of water and healthier drinking water.

But it has attracted fierce opposition from several business interests, including farmers, property developers, fertilizer and pesticide makers, oil and gas producers and a national association of golf course owners. Opponents contend that the rule would stifle economic growth and intrude on property owners’ rights.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republicans in Congress point to the rule as another example of what they call executiv e overreach by the Obama administration. Already, they are adv ancing legislation on Capitol Hill meant to block or delay the rule.

The announcement of the rule could come as soon as Friday. If not, it is likely to happen next week, people with knowledge of the plans said.

The water rule is part of a broader push by President Obama to use his executiv e authority to build a major environmental legacy , without requiring new legislation from the Republican-controlled Congress.

This summer, the Environmental Protection Agency is expected to release a final set of rules intended to combat climate change, by limiting greenhouse gas pollution from power plants. Mr. Obama is also expected to announce in the coming year that he will put vast swaths of public land off limits to energy exploration and other development.

“Water is the lifeblood of healthy people and healthy economies,” Gina McCarthy, the E.P.A.’s administrator, wrote in an April blog post promoting the water rule. “We have a duty to protect it. That’s why E.P.A. and the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers are finalizing a Clean Water Rule later this spring to protect critical streams and wetlands that are currently vulnerable to pollution and destruction.”

But even as E.P.A. staff worked this month to finish the rule, the House passed a bill to block it. The Senate is moving forward with a bill that would require the agency to fundamentally revamp the rule.

“Under this outrageously broad new rule, Washington bureaucrats would now have a say in how farmers, and ranchers, and families use their own property,” said Senator John Barrasso, Republican of Wyoming and the chief author of the Senate bill.

“It would allow the Environmental Protection Agency to regulate private property just based on things like whether it’s used by animals or birds, or even insects,” he said.

“This rule,” he added, “is not designed to protect the traditional waters of the United States. It is designed to expand the power of Washington bureaucrats.”

The E.P.A. proposed the rule, known as Waters of the U.S., last March. The agency has held more than 400 meetings about it with outside groups and read more than one million public comments as it wrote the final language.

The rule is being issued under the 1972 Clean Water Act, which gave the federal government broad authority to limit pollution in major water bodies, like Chesapeake Bay, the Mississippi Riv er and Puget Sound, as well as streams and wetlands that drain into larger waters.

But two Supreme Court decisions related to clean water protection, in 2001 and in 2006, created legal confusion about whether the federal government had the authority to regulate the smaller streams and headwaters, and about other water sources such as wetlands.

E.P.A. officials say the new rule will clarify that authority, allowing the government to once again limit pollution in those smaller bodies of water — although it does not restore the full scope of regulatory authority granted by the 1972 law.

The E.P.A. also contends that the new rule will not giv e it the authority to regulate additional waters that had not been covered under the 1972 law. People familiar with the rule say it will apply to about 60 percent of the nation’s waters.

“Until now, major bodies of water were protected under the law,” said Elizabeth Ouzts, a spokeswoman for Environment

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

America, an advocacy group. “But they can’t be fully protected unless the streams that flow into them are also protected.”

The rule will also limit pollution in groundwater and other sources of drinking water. Polluted groundwater is now chemically treated before being used as drinking water.

“We could spend a lot of money to massively treat the water that we drink, but it makes a lot more sense to protect the source,” Ms. Ouzts said.

A coalition of industry groups, led by the American Farm Bureau Federation, has waged an aggressive campaign calling on the E.P.A. to withdraw or revamp the rule.

Farmers fear that the rule could impose major new costs and burdens, requiring them to pay fees for environmental assessments and to obtain permits just to till the soil near gullies, ditches or dry streambeds where water flows only when it rains. A permit is required for any activity, like farming or construction, that creates a discharge into a body of water covered under the Clean Water Act or affects the health of it, like filling in a wetland or blocking a stream.

“It’s going to cause a nightmare for farmers,” said Don Parrish, the senior director of congressional relations for the American Farm Bureau Federation.

“Our members own the majority of the landscape that’s going to be impacted by this,” he said. “It’s going to make their land, the most valuable thing they possess, less valuable. It could reduce the v alue of some farmland by as much as 40 percent. If you want to build a home, if you want to grow food, if you want a job to go with that clean water, you have to ask E.P.A. for it.”

The lobbying fight over the rule has also generated a public-relations battle over social media.

In its protest of the rule, the American Farm Bureau Federation started a social media campaign, using the Twitter hashtag #DitchTheRule, to urge farmers and others to push the E.P.A. to abandon or revamp the rule. The E.P.A., in response, created a campaign with the hashtag #DitchTheMy th, urging people to speak out in favor of the rule. But some legal experts contend that campaign might have tested the limits of federal lobbying laws, which prohibit a government agency from engaging in grass-roots lobbying for proposed policies or legislation.

Wal-Mart urges m eat suppliers to curb antibiotic use // Reuters // P.J. Huffstutter and Nathan Layne - May 22, 2015

Wal-Mart Stores Inc (WMT.N) is pressing meat, seafood, dairy and egg suppliers to reduce the use of antibiotics, becoming the first large retailer to take such a public stand against the excessive use of drugs in raising farm animals.

The voluntary guidelines announced on Friday would limit suppliers to using antibiotics to treat and prevent disease, and not for promoting growth, a controversial practice by livestock producers. The move comes as concern is growing that over-use of antibiotics in animals can spawn drug-resistant superbugs, endangering human health.

Wal-Mart, the country's biggest food retailer, is also telling suppliers not to raise animals in gestation crates or in other conditions considered inhumane.

The retailer is asking suppliers to its roughly 5,200 Wal-Mart and Sam's Club stores in the United States to publicly disclose their use of antibiotics and treatment of animals on an annual basis.

In March McDonald's Corp (MCD.N) said in two years its U.S. restaurants would stop buy ing chicken raised with human antibiotics, marking the first time a major U.S. company had taken concrete action and set a timetable to it. Bulk retailer

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Costco Wholesale Corp (COST.O), a Wal-Mart riv al, has said it was working with suppliers to phase out chicken and livestock raised with antibiotics that are used to fight human infections.

But Wal-Mart's mov e is the most significant by a retailer so far, adv ocates said. Since it controls a quarter of the U.S. grocery market, the guidelines will likely ripple through the entire food supply chain and prompt rivals to follow suit.

"They're the first ones who have asked for this sort of data and to make it public. We haven't gotten that from anyone else, including the U.S. government," said Gail Hansen, senior officer for Pew Charitable Trusts' antibiotic resistance project.

"Because of its size, Wal-Mart can driv e the industry on this and they can do more," said Susan Vaughn Grooters, policy analyst with the nonprofit group Keep Antibiotics Working.

In 2013 the U.S. Food and Drug Administration released guidelines for drug makers and agricultural companies to voluntarily phase out antibiotics as a growth enhancer in livestock.

But the extent to which U.S. meat producers are using such drugs is unclear. The U.S. Agriculture Department is planning to begin collecting more detailed data on antibiotics used on farms, a potential precursor to setting targets for reducing use of the drugs in animals.

Wal-Mart said its mov e was rooted in consumer demand. It cited an internal study showing that 77 percent of its customers would increase their trust and 66 percent were more likely to shop from a retailer that ensures humane treatment of livestock.

"Our customers want to know more about how their food is grown and raised, and where it comes from. As the nation's largest grocer, Walmart is committed to using our strengths to drive transparency and improvement across the supply chain," Kathleen McLaughlin, senior vice president of Walmart sustainability, said in a statement.

Wal-Mart told suppliers it wanted them to adhere to the "five principles" of animal welfare, a set of guidelines that includes ensuring animals are not starved, hav e sufficient space to move, and do not suffer mental distress.

The advocacy group Mercy for Animals said Wal-Mart's "historic" mov e came after protests and its release of hidden-camera videos exposing animal abuse at pork suppliers of the retail chain.

Wayne Pacelle, president of the Humane Society of the United States, said the news reflected "game-changing progress" but urged Wal-Mart to set a deadline for suppliers to implement the changes.

Some meat and chicken suppliers have already begun shifting their policies after McDonald's announcement, but others have dug in their heels.

Tyson Foods Inc (TSN.N), the largest U.S. poultry producer, said in April that it planned to eliminate the use of human antibiotics in its chicken flocks by September 2017.

However, Sanderson Farms Inc (SAFM.O), the third largest U.S. poultry producer, said on Wednesday that it planned to continue using antibiotics on its birds, partly because there are no alternatives on the horizon for treating a deadly but common gut disease.

Wal-Mart's rivals may also come under pressure to alter their policies. Target Corp (TGT.N), one of the nation's top 10 grocers, said it requires that suppliers for its Simply Balanced line of healthy food products use meat from animals raised without antibiotics, hormones and steroids, and are vegetarian fed. It does not impose the same limits on other food products.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

INTERNATIONAL

Islamic State loyalists claim Saudi mosque attack // AP // Abdullah Al-Shihri and Aya Batrawy - May 22, 2015

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia (AP) — A suicide bomber killed at least 19 people Friday in a blast inside a Shiite mosque in eastern Saudi Arabia as worshippers commemorated the 7th century birth of a revered figure, residents and officials said.

Loyalists of the extremist Islamic State group claimed responsibility for the attack — the second against Shiites in the kingdom in six months. In November, the extremist Islamic State group was accused of being behind the shooting and killing of eight worshippers in the eastern Saudi Arabian village of al-Ahsa.

Despite a string of IS-related attacks over the past several months that have also targeted police, Friday's suicide bombing appears to be the deadliest in the country in nearly a decade.

Habib Mahmoud, managing editor for the state-linked Al-Sharq newspaper in Qatif, said that the local Red Crescent authorities confirmed to him that 19 people had been killed and 28 wounded.

Saudi Arabia's Interior Ministry has not released its count for the number of dead and wounded, but said that a suicide bomber who hid explosives under his clothes was behind the attack. Interior Ministry spokesman Maj. Gen. Mansour al-Turki said that the attacker struck the Imam Ali mosque in a village called al-Qudeeh.

In a statement distributed on Twitter feeds linked to IS group loyalists, a group purporting to be the IS branch in Saudi Arabia issued the claim. It could not be independently confirmed if the new group actually has operational links to the Islamic State group, which is based in Syria and Iraq.

The group's statement carried a logo in Arabic referring to itself as the "Najd Province" — a reference to the historic region that is home to the capital Riyadh and the ruling Al Saud family, as well as the ultraconservative Wahhabi branch of Islam.

Mahmoud, the editor in Qatif, said the attacker stood with the worshippers during prayer and then detonated his suicide vest as people were leaving the mosque.

A local activist, Naseema al-Sada, told The Associated Press by telephone from Qatif that the suicide bomber attacked worshippers as they were commemorating the birth of Imam Hussain, a revered figure among Shiites. She said the local hospital has called on residents to donate blood.

The Al-Manar television channel, run by the Lebanese Shiite Hezbollah group, carried blurry pictures of pools of blood inside what appeared to be the mosque where the attack took place. It also showed still photos of at least three bodies stretched out on carpets, covered with sheets. One person dressed in a white robe was being carried away on a stretcher.

The attack comes amid heightened Sunni-Shiite tensions in the region as Saudi Arabia and Iran back opposite sides in conflicts in Syria, Iraq and Yemen.

Just before Saudi Arabia launched airstrikes against Shiite rebels in Yemen in late March, a purported affiliate of the IS group claimed responsibility for suicide bombings in Yemen's capital that killed at least 137 people and wounded nearly 360.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Saudi offensive in Yemen has sharpened anti-Iranian rhetoric inside the kingdom. Saudi Arabia accuses Iran of arming the Yemeni rebels, a claim that both the militias and Tehran deny.

Some ultraconservative Sunnis in Saudi Arabia, known as Wahhabis, have used Friday sermons to rally support for the war and simultaneously criticize Shiites and their practice of praying at the tombs of religious figures, which they view as akin to polytheism.

Mahmoud said people in Qatif are shocked by the attack and "hold those who are inflaming sectarian rhetoric, from those on social media and in the mosques, responsible."

He said that too often the public does not differentiate between what is Iranian government policy and what is Shiite, and "blame Shiites for Iranian actions in the region."

The country 's top cleric, Grand Mufti Abdel-Aziz al-Sheikh, told Saudi state television that the attack in Qatif aims at "driving a wedge among the sons of the nation" and described it as "a crime, shame and great sin." The country's top council of clerics issued a statement blaming the attack on "terrorist criminals with foreign agendas."

Residents in the country 's eastern region say they are discriminated against because of their faith. They say that despite the region being home to most of the kingdom's oil reserves, their streets, buildings, hospitals, schools and infrastructure are neglected and in poor condition. They say unemployment runs high among Shiite youth in the area.

In 2011, Shiites in the east inspired by the Arab Spring uprising in neighboring Bahrain took to the streets to demand greater rights. Police arrested hundreds of people and a counterterrorism court sentenced an outspoken cleric, Nimr al-Nimr, to death.

After the bombing, a few hundred people marched in mourning through the village, Mahmoud said.

Al-Sada, the activist, said she too holds the government responsible for not doing more to criminalize sectarian rhetoric.

"The government should protect us, not encourage sermons and schoolbooks to incite against us as non-believers," al-Sada said. "We want them to prevent this from happening in the first place."

"Martyrdom does not scare us, but we want to live like other citizens and with stability ," she said.

In heavily Catholic Ireland, voters to decide on same-sex marriage // LAT // Alexandra Zavis - May 22, 2015

Joe Masterson isn’t your typical gay rights activ ist.

A 72-year-old Irish farmer, he grew up in an era when such matters were simply not discussed. But there he was, going door to door this week asking neighbors in the small village of Castlepollard to support a proposal to allow same-sex couples in Ireland to marry.

He was not alone. Opinion polls suggest that this once deeply conservative and still overwhelmingly Roman Catholic country could become the first to legalize gay marriages through a popular vote Friday.

That such a milestone could be reached in a country that did not decriminalize homosexuality until 1993, is ev idence of how quickly attitudes have changed and of the declining influence of the church after a succession of child abuse scandals.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In spite of the church's opposition, the government and all the main political parties have come out in support of the proposal to introduce a line into Ireland's Constitution that says: "Marriage may be contracted in accordance with law by two persons without distinction as to their sex."

They have been joined by major businesses, trade unions, media organizations, sports stars and other celebrities. Even some Catholic priests have said they back the amendment.

Still, analysts caution that the margin of support has narrowed in recent weeks and the vote's outcome is not certain. They suspect that some conservative voters might be shy about publicly saying they are likely to vote no.

"Everything hangs on who turns out on Friday," said David Farrell, a politics professor at University College Dublin. Support for the amendment is strongest among young, urban voters, but turnout is usually higher among their older, rural counterparts.

Masterson was taking nothing for granted as he headed out for one last night of handing out leaflets before campaigning was officially halted Thursday.

For him, the issue is personal. Masterson's son, Allan, the youngest of three children, was about 20 years old when he finally confided to his dad that he might be gay. Masterson gave his son a hug and told him it wouldn't change anything. But inside, he worried whether others in the family would respond as he did.

It wasn't until years later, when the young man married his longtime partner in the Netherlands, that his father realized how much support there was for him. Aunts, uncles, cousins traveled from near and far to celebrate the marriage. Now, Masterson would like the union to be recognized in Ireland, in case his son should want to move back with his husband one day.

"It should be the same for everybody," he said. "It shouldn't be a them-and-us issue."

To opponents, the proposal is an assault on traditional values that would encroach on religious beliefs and redefine marriage in ways they fear would harm children.

We who are parents, brothers and sisters, colleagues and friends of Ireland's gay citizens know how they have suffered because of second-class citizenship.

They have draped city lampposts with posters featuring a pair of parents kissing a rosy-cheeked infant. "Children deserve a mother and a father. Vote no," it says.

"It does seem strange to me that we have reached a point not just in Ireland, but in Western society, where we are suddenly doubting the intrinsic value of mothers and doubting the intrinsic value of fathers," said David Quinn, founder of the Iona Institute, a conservative religious advocacy group.

He argues that approving the amendment would have broad implications, making it extremely difficult, for example, for Parliament to approve an adoption or surrogacy law that says, "actually it's in the best interests of the child to have a mother and a father, all other things being equal."

The debate has played out on television screens and in homes across the island nation.

"I am told that I am not broad-minded enough and I'm old-fashioned," said Una Heaton, a 65-year-old artist and museum curator in Limerick, the country's third-largest city, who planned to vote no Friday. "But it's nothing to do with being broad-minded; it's to do with marriage and children."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I see nothing wrong with gay friends having civil relationships, but gay marriage is a step too far," she said. "And putting it in our constitution is bonkers."

Unlike in the United States, where the issue has been taken up by the Supreme Court, a simple majority of voters will decide whether to legalize same-sex marriage in Ireland. Seventeen countries have already done so, all of them through legislation or court rulings. Ireland would have to change its constitution, which requires a referendum.

For 'banished' adoptees, search for Irish family is risky

The results are expected on Saturday, which happens to be the day of the Eurovision song contest. That could make Saturday "the gayest day in Irish history," quipped Rory O'Neill, the drag queen known as Panti Bliss, in an interview with the Independent newspaper of London.

Same-sex couples have been able to enter into civil partnerships in Ireland since 2011, but activ ists argue that those don't afford the same rights and protections as being legally married.

"In symbolic terms, it is also incredibly important because it says to Irish lesbian and gay people, especially young people, that they too can grow up in a country that values them," said Brian Sheehan, codirector of Yes Equality, the umbrella group that leads the y es campaign.

Until recently, he said, many people had to emigrate if they wanted to be open about who they were. The decriminalization of homosexuality allowed thousands more to come out of the closet, a big part of the change in Ireland, Sheehan said.

One of the things he found most moving about the campaign was the number of parents who became advocates for their gay children. They include people as prominent as former President Mary McAleese, a dev out Catholic who spoke about the bully ing endured by her son, Justin.

"We who are parents, brothers and sisters, colleagues and friends of Ireland's gay citizens know how they hav e suffered because of second-class citizenship," she said at an event this week.

The debate also prompted top political figures such as Health Minister Leo Varadkar and former Equality Minister Pat Carey, who are both gay, to speak publicly about their sexuality for the first time. Both remarked on the warm response they receiv ed. The conservative-leaning prime minister, Enda Kenny , paid a visit to one of Dublin's more prominent gay bars in December.

Church leaders hav e also stepped into the fray, distributing pastoral letters to their congregations. But Farrell, of University College Dublin, said that "they're pulling their punches a lot more than they used to."

"This one referendum we're having on marriage equality personifies very well just how far the relations between church and state hav e changed," he said.

Irish political leaders have long deferred to the church, especially on matters of social policy. Contraceptives were only fully legalized in 1985. Divorce was outlawed until 1995, and abortion is still banned in most cases.

But a series of damning reports detailing decades of sexual abuse of children by clerics and efforts of church officials to protect the abusers rather than the victims was met with a public outcry and calls for a break between church and state. The scandals came at a time of spreading secularization in Ireland, which began with the economic boom of the 1990s.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Archbishop Eamon Martin took pains to emphasize in a statement posted on YouTube that gay people "ought always to be treated with respect and sensitiv ity." But he said Irish bishops can't support an amendment that "places the union of two men or two women on a par with a marriage between a man and woman, which is open to the procreation of children."

Such arguments have been hard for Louise Fitzgerald to hear. The 29-year-old radiographer is planning to marry her partner, a female police officer. She already has a wedding venue picked out in her hometown of Cork.

"All I want to do is quietly liv e my life with my partner and get on with work, and I feel like my character and her character are being laid bare and dissected in public," Fitzgerald said on Wednesday .

She was planning to do some canv assing that night, but was nervous about how she would be received. "It's a strange thing to hav e to go up to someone's door and ask them if it is OK if I get married," she said.

She was born in Wales, where same-sex marriage is now legal, and is thinking of going there to get married if the referendum doesn't go her way.

"It means the world to have that piece of paper," she said, "just to hav e a proper marriage somewhere."

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS

T he T rigger-Happy Generation // WSJ // Peggy Noonan - May 22, 2015

Readers know of the phenomenon at college campuses regarding charges of "microaggressions" and "triggers." It's been going on for a while and is part of a growing censorship movement in which professors, administrators and others are accused of racism, sexism, homophobia, classism, gender bias and ethnocentric thinking, among other things. Connected is the rejection or harassment of commencement and other campus speakers who are not politically correct. I hate that phrase, but it just won't stop being current.

Kirsten Powers goes into much of this in her book, "The Silencing." Anyway, quite a bunch of little Marats and Robespierres we're bringing up.

But I was taken aback by a piece a few weeks ago in the Spectator, the student newspaper of Columbia University . I can't shake it, though believe me I've tried. I won't name the four undergraduate authors, because 30 y ears from now their children will be on Google, and because everyone in their 20s has the right to be an idiot.

Yet theirs is a significant and growing form of idiocy that deserves greater response.

The authors describe a student in a class discussion of Ov id's epic poem "Metamorphoses." The class read the my ths of Persephone and Daphne, which, as parts of a narrative that stretches from the dawn of time to the Rome of Caesar, include depictions of violence, chaos, sexual assault and rape. The student, the authors reported, is herself "a surviv or of sexual assault" and said she was "triggered." She complained the professor focused "on the beauty of the language and the splendor of the imagery when lecturing on the text." He did not apparently notice her feelings, or their urgency. As a result, "the student completely disengaged from the class discussion as a means of self-preservation. She did not feel safe in the class."

Safe is the key word here. There's the suggestion that a work may be a masterpiece but if it makes anyone feel bad, it's out.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Later the student told the professor how she felt, and her concerns, she said, were ignored. The authors of the op-ed note that “Metamorphoses” is a fixture in the study of literature and humanities, “but like so many texts in the Western canon it contains triggering and offensive material that marginalizes student identities in the classroom.” The Western canon, they continue, is full of “histories and narratives of exclusion and oppression” that can be “difficult to read and discuss as a survivor, a person of color, or a student from a low-income background.”

That makes them feel unsafe: “Students need to feel safe in the classroom, and that requires a learning environment that recognizes the multiplicity of their identities.” The authors suggest changing the core curriculum but concede it may not be easy. Another student, they report, suggested in her class that maybe instead they could read “a Toni Morrison text.” A different student responded that “texts by authors of the African Diaspora are a staple in most high school English classes, and therefore they did not need to reread them.” That remark, the authors assert, was not only “insensitive” but “revealing of larger ideological divides.” The professor, they report, failed at this moment to “intervene.”

The op-ed authors call for “a space to hold a safe and open dialogue” about classroom experiences that “traumatize and silence students,” with the aim of creating environments that recognize “the multiplicity” of student “identities.”

Well, here are some questions and a few thoughts for all those who have been declaring at all the universities, and on social media, that their feelings have been hurt in the world and that the world had just better straighten up.

Why are you so fixated on the idea of personal safety, by which you apparently mean not having uncomfortable or unhappy thoughts and feelings? Is there any chance this preoccupation is unworthy of you? Please say yes.

There is no such thing as safety. That is asking too much of life. You can’t expect those around you to constantly accommodate your need for safety. That is asking too much of people.

Life gives you potentials for freedom, creativity, achievement, love, all sorts of beautiful things, but none of us are “safe.” And you are especially not safe in an atmosphere of true freedom. People will say and do things that are wrong, stupid, unkind, meant to injure. They’ll bring up subjects you find upsetting. It’s uncomfortable. But isn’t that the price we pay for freedom of speech?

You can ask for courtesy, sensitivity and dignity. You can show others those things, too, as a way of encouraging them. But if you constantly feel anxious and frightened by what you encounter in life, are we sure that means the world must reorder itself? Might it mean you need a lot of therapy?

Masterpieces, by their nature, pierce. They jar and unsettle. If something in a literary masterpiece upsets you, should the masterpiece really be banished? What will you be left with when all of them are gone?

What in your upbringing told you that safety is the highest of values? What told you it is a realistic expectation? Who taught you that you are entitled to it every day? Was your life full of . . . unchecked privilege? Discuss.

Do you think Shakespeare, Frieda Kahlo, Virginia Woolf, Langston Hughes and Steve Jobs woke up every morning thinking, “My focus today is on looking for slights and telling people they’re scaring me”? Or were their energies and commitments perhaps focused on other areas?

I notice lately that some members of your generation are being called, derisively, Snowflakes. Are you really a frail, special and delicate little thing that might melt when the heat is on?

Do you wish to be known as the first generation that comes with its own fainting couch? Did first- and second-wave feminists march to the barricades so their daughters and granddaughters could act like Victorians with the vapors?

Everyone in America gets triggered every day. Many of us experience the news as a daily microaggression. Who can we sue, silence or censor to feel better?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Finally, social justice warriors always portray themselves—and seem to experience themselves—as actively suffering victims who need protection. Is that perhaps an invalid self-image? Are y ou perhaps less needy than demanding? You seem to be demanding a safety no one else in the world gets. If y ou were so vulnerable, intimidated and weak, you wouldn't really be able to attack and criticize y our professors, administrators and fellow students so ably and successfully, would you?

Are you a bunch of frail and sensitiv e little bullies? Is it possible you're not intimidated but intimidators?

Again, discuss.

By the way, I went back to the op-ed and read the online comments it engendered from the Columbia community. They were quite wonderful. One called, satirically, to ban all satire because it has too many "v erbal triggers." Another: "These women are like a baby watching a movie and thinking the monster is going to come out of the screen and get them." Another: "These girls' parents need a refund."

The biggest slay er of pomposity and sanctimony in our time continues to be American wit.

T raders hoped for a more interesting Yellen, got same old // CNBC // Patti Domm - May 22, 2015

Fed Chair Janet Yellen stuck to her script Friday, even though traders had hoped a jump in consumer prices would force the central banker to give a nod to the improved inflation data. (Tweet This)

Yellen reiterated comments that the Fed is on track to raise rates this y ear and that inflation will ultimately move to 2 percent as the economy strengthens.

The consumer price index, excluding energy and food, rose 0.3 percent, compared to expectations for 0.2 percent. Headline CPI gained 0.1 percent as expected, meaning overall prices actually fell 0.2 percent year over year. Core prices, however, rose 1.8 percent, closer to the Fed's inflation target.

"It's basically the first summer Friday. It's before a long weekend. She hardly strays from her FOMC colleagues in normal times. She said we're still on track to raise rates," said John Canally, strategist and economist at LPL Financial. "She didn't say we're going to tighten soon or in June, so I think that leaves September or December."

Traders had speculated that Yellen would hav e to address the move higher in consumer prices because inflation is one of the Fed's main issues. They said if the pickup in consumer inflation continues, it would be key in determining whether the central bank will need to move sooner to raise rates.

Treasury yields mov ed higher after CPI, while the yield curve flattened—indicating the market believes a rate rise could come sooner. According to RBS, fed funds futures are now giving 45 percent odds for a Fed rate hike in September, up from a perceived 35 percent chance last week.

After Yellen's afternoon comments, yields stayed roughly in the same range they had been trading in, and stocks gained slightly but were still mostly lower on the day. The dollar index moved higher, adding 0.2 percent after her remarks.

"(CPI) was a gain, a bigger-than-expected gain, and there's been a steady gain in core for the last few months, so in the near term it certainly is influential and brings on the ever-increasing risk of a Fed move. But I don't think we need to change the odds very much," said David Ader, Treasury strategist at CRT Capital.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Yellen spoke in Rhode Island to the Greater Providence Chamber of Commerce on the economy, and she did not take questions.

Ader said he hoped to get insight into whether the Fed was concerned about the rise in core inflation or whether it was looking elsewhere. Yellen did give a nod to labor market improv ement, and said there were some encouraging improvements to wage growth this year. However, wage data in the CPI on Friday showed zero movement.

Traders had also been anxious about the timing of Yellen's comments, delivered during pre-holiday trading and on a day when some markets close early. Chicago pit trading in foreign exchange and interest rates futures closed early, at 1 p.m. ET, just as Yellen started to speak. But electronic trading remained open. The Treasury cash market was to close early at 2 p.m. ET, and stocks were to remain open until 4 p.m. ET, as usual.

"I think the market has adjusted in anticipation. Yields are higher at the front end by 4 basis points, implying that she'll be more hawkish, but the benchmark 30-year is down on the day . People are betting there's going to be a flatter curve," said Ader ahead of Yellen's speech. "The best-performing issue is the 30-year so if you think the Fed might hike, that's supportive of the back end, relative to the front end."

Tyler Tucci, RBS short-term markets and derivatives strategist, said according to his firms' calculations, fed funds futures Friday morning showed a 100 percent chance for a 25 -basis-point Fed rate hike by December. The odds had been as low as 88 percent for December recently after some traders placed bigger bets on January for the first increase.

Art Cashin, director of floor operations for UBS at the NYSE, said the bond and stock markets had different interpretations of the importance of the CPI number.

"Stock guys shrug it off, pointing to distort that is primarily health cost (government related). Bond types see it as somewhat inflationary and fed fund futures move for an earlier Fed liftoff and bond y ields rise. Gold seems to side with stock ty pes," Cashin wrote in a quick note.

Ward McCarthy , chief financial economist at Jefferies, said one factor pushing up CPI was rent, and the other inflation data have not been strong enough to change his view that the Fed will hold off on rate hikes until December.

"The bottom line is there's very little signs of inflation of any type. It's a think day. Hope springs eternal. People want to get the Fed off zero. Numbers like we saw today are not going to do that," McCarthy said, noting the decline in last week's PPI and drops in import prices.

But y et, the markets wonder how much the Fed, stating it is data-dependent, will take notice of this one CPI reading.

"All of a sudden, we have back-to-back core CPI advances of 0.23 percent and 0.26 percent in March and April. I certainly do not expect core inflation to be that firm every single month, but I have to wonder how many more of these Fed officials will need to see before they stop worrying about deflation," wrote Stephen Stanley , chief economist at Amherst Pierpont Securities.

"A 0.3 percent increase in the core CPI is such a rare event that it holds considerable shock value, even though the unrounded gain was 'only' 0.25 6 percent. In fact, there have only been four 0.3 percent rises in the core CPI since the financial crisis, and each of them was 0.25 percent or 0.26 percent unrounded. The last time we had a larger monthly increase than 0.26 percent was January 2008," he wrote.

JPMorgan economists, in a note, said they do not expect to see the CPI translate into a gain in the core PCE, the Fed's preferred inflation measure because of the influence of health-care costs.

Medical care in the PCE index is based on inputs from the producer price index, which were softer than CPI data. JPMorgan expects the core PCE to be up 1.3 percent over a year ago.

As for CPI, they noted that medical care services rose 0.9 percent, helping lift core services, up 0.3 percent, the highest since June 2008. Rent measures also gained, with owners equiv alent rent rising 0.28 percent. Airfares fell for a second month, losing 1.3 percent.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Alexandria Phillips

Press Assistant | Communications

Hillary for America | www.hillaryclinton.com

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Lee Fang" <lee@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: lsaunders@afscme.org bigcampaign@googlegroups.com erome@afscme.org
Date: 7/21/2008 6:04:28 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 07/21/08

Main Topics: al-Maliki statements, Obama visiting Iraq

Summary: As the media swooned over Senator Obama's arrival in Baghdad this morning, the McCain campaign attempted to hit back to influence the coverage. Senator McCain himself appeared on various networks giving interviews. On Good Morning America, he erroneously spoke of problems on the "Iraq-Pakistan" border. On the Today Show, Meredith Vieira pressed McCain on missing every single Afghanistan hearing his own Armed Services Committee held in the past two years, the 'learning curve' he would have on domestic issues relating to the economy, and on Phil Gramm. Senator McCain brushed aside the recent al-Maliki comment essentially endorsing Senator Obama's withdrawal plan, claiming, "I know what they [the Iraqis] want." Surrogates for the McCain campaign echoed Senator McCain's message of withdrawal being dictated by 'conditions on the ground' rather than 'an arbitrary date.' However, Governor Bobby Jindal veered slightly off-message while speaking on behalf of McCain, saying "let's listen to…Prime Minister Maliki" and also that withdrawal could take place in shorter than 16 months. Senior McCain adviser Nancy Pfotenhauer similarly conflicted with Senator McCain's dismissal of al-Maliki by saying "when [al-Maliki] comes forward and makes this statement, it's got a lot of credibility." In other news, the Batman movie performed very well in box offices, China is attempting to drastically reduce pollution before the Olympics, bin Laden's driver will be tried as a war criminal, and oil prices are down, though it is believed they will rebound shortly.
Highlights:
1. NBC: McCain Interviewed, pressed on withdrawal, Maliki's comments, hearings, economic learning curve, Gramm
2. ABC: McCain Interviewed, makes gaffe on "Pakistan-Iraq" border
3. CBS: Short clip of McCain interview, McCain stressing Obama's misjudgement of surge
4. MSNBC: Jindal highlights McCain endorsement of surge, claims withdrawal could be shorter than 16 months, says McCain listens to al-Maliki
5. CNN: Jindal downplays Maliki statement, stresses success of surge
6. FNC: Joe Lieberman Interviewed, Claims Obama seeks to lose war in Iraq
7. MSNBC: Bill Press mocks McCain's whining about Obama's overseas trip, hosts note McCain's absence from Afghanistan hearings
8. MSNBC: Pfotenhauer says Maliki has credibility, however repeats talking point about adhering to conditions on the ground
9. CNN: James Dobson "might" endorse McCain
10. CNN and FNC: Giuliani and McCain go to Yankees game

Clips:
Highlight #1
McCain Interviewed on Today Show, Pressed on Negative Ad, Withdrawal, Economic Learning Curve, Gramm (NBC 07/21/08
MEREDITH VIEIRA: Senator McCain thank you for joining us.
JOHN MCCAIN: Good morning Meredith.
VIEIRA: You have been very tough on Senator Obama, you've questioned his judgement on foreign policy, called him naïve, and his trip little more than a campaign rally overseas. So given what you've seen and heard over the past few days do you still hold to that assessment? MCCAIN: Look I'm glad Senator Obama will get a chance for the first time to sit down with General David Petraeus and understand what the surge was all about, why it succeeded, and why we are winning the war. And that is because we carried out a strategy which has succeeded. And Senator Obama rallied against, voted against, and used his opposition to the surge as a way of gaining the nomination of his party. I hope he will have a chance to admit that he badly misjudged the situation and he was wrong when he said that the surge wouldn't work.
VIEIRA: Senator you mentioned General Petraeus-
MCCAIN: It's important that the American people know that is the situation and I've mentioned General Petraeus,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

yes?
VIEIRA: I'm bringing him up because he told the AP on Saturday that al-Qaeda may be shifting its base back to Afghanistan. Then on Sunday Barack Obama reiterated his belief that Afghanistan is the central front in the war on terrorism. Do you agree with that Senator?
MCCAIN: I agree with Petraeus when he said Iraq is the central battleground in the war and the struggle against al-Qaeda. He said that. And I agree with him when he said we will be able to withdraw troops as conditions on the ground dictate. Not to do what Senator Obama wants to do, which was we'd be out by last March. Never to have the surge and the success. And you can't choose to lose a war in Iraq in my view in order to win a war in Afghanistan. Of course we have problems in Afghanistan. And as we succeed in Iraq, there will be troops available to go to Afghanistan. But it's more than just troops. Senator Obama doesn't understand that it is a strategy – the same strategy that succeeded in Iraq we will employ in Afghanistan, the one that he rejected in and still does not accept the success of.
VIEIRA: Senator Obama's table of removing troops from Iraq within that 16 month period seemed to be given a thumbs up by the Iraqi prime minister when he called it the right timeframe for withdrawal, he has backed off that somewhat but the Iraqis have not stopped using the word timetables so if the Iraqi government were to say, if you were President, we want a timetable for troops being removed, would you agree to that?
MCCAIN: I've been there too many times. I've met too many times with them and I know what they want. They want it based on conditions and of course they'd like to have us out. That's what happens when you win wars, you leave. We may have a residual presence there as even Senator Obama has admitted. But the fact is, that it should be based on the agreement between prime minister Maliki, the Iraqi government, and the United States that it will be based on conditions. This is a great success, but it's fragile. And could be reversed very easily. I think we should trust the word of General Petraeus who has orchestrated a dramatic turnaround. And by the way, we'd have been out last March if Senator Obama's wish had originally called for. Not 16 months from now, but last March. He was wrong on the surge. He was wrong today saying it wouldn't succeed. And obviously we have challenges in Afghanistan, which will require more troops, and more NATO participation, but we can win. If we had lost in Iraq, we'd have risked a much wider war that would have put enormous challenges and burdens on our military.
VIEIRA: You know in this latest TV ad sir you criticize- your ad- you critcize Obama for never holding a single Senate hearing on Afghanistan, but according to Senate records, you've missed all six hearings on Afghanistan that were held by the Senate Armed Services Committee on which you served during the last 2 years. So where is your accountability?
MCCAIN: I've visited Iraq many times. I've had briefings, constant briefings. I've visited Afghanistan. I know the issues extremely well. And, I'm not the chairman of a subcommittee that had direct responsibility, but the fact is I was right about the surge at the darkest times when many people said that would kill my ambitions for the Presidency. I did it because I believed it was best for America. Senator Obama chose a path which was very wrong and is wrong today. And if we had done what he wanted to do, we would be facing enormous challenges – probably the risk of a wider war. That's the real difference.
VIEIRA: You said in a time of war, a commander in chief's job doesn't get a learning curve. We're facing a crises here domestically that a lot of people consider more significant in their lives right now in the war and that is the economic crisis. You have admitted that your economic policy is a weakness for you. So do you deserve a learning curve to get up to speed?
MCCAIN: Actually I have far more experience on the economy than Senator Obama. I'm very strong on the economy. I was chairman of the Senator Commerce Committee, Science and Transportation which addresses all these issues. I have a concrete economic plan to fix the problems in America-
VIEIRA: But look at the man who established that plan for you-
MCCAIN: Offshore drilling, including the fact that we have nuclear power-
VIEIRA: Phil Gramm who called this a mental recession.
MCCAIN: Oxygen. Uh, Hydrogen. Hybrid fuels. All kinds of nuclear power. I have plans for all of those and I am confident we can succeed. Americans working together on a mission to fix our economy, keep them in their homes, become energy independent and I have a strong plan of action and a strong backgroud on the economy to address these issues
VIEIRA: But Senator if I can bring up Phil Gramm again, that was your key economic adviser and the framer of your policy until he called whats happening here a mental recession and that we are a nation of whiners. He has since stepped down, removed himself from your campaign. But do voters have a right to question your judgement because you said he was the strongest person you knew on economic issues. Should they be worried about your ability to lead us out of a recession?
MCCAIN: Actually, he was one out of a number of advisers that I have. I value their views and their opinions and

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I'm very strong plan of action for our economy. I think most Americans agree with it, including offshore drilling, which Senator Obama opposes, including nuclear power which Obama opposed. I strong- keep taxes low. We have a very strong economic policy. We're talking about it in town hall meetings all over America. And I've invited Senator Obama to come to these town hall meetings with me and that way people can compare us on these issues that are so important to their future and economy and the future of this nation. And I'm proud to have a broad array, including 300 economists and 5 nobel prize winners that say my economic plan is very good.

Highlight #2

McCain: Surge has worked, Afghanistan is a "serious" situation but not "precarious" or "urgent" (MSNBC 07/21/08 7:05am)

DIANE SAWYER: You have criticized Sen. Obama in the past for not going to Iraq and getting a fresh assessment. He is in Iraq as we speak this morning. Does this take care of it?

JOHN MCCAIN: Well, I believe that he'll be able to—I know that he'll be able to have the opportunity to see the success of the surge. It has succeeded. This is the same strategy that he voted against, railed against, campaigned for his nomination, to obtain his nomination in opposition. He was wrong about the surge. It is succeeding. We are winning. And I hope he will agree that he had a fundamental misjudgment in the need for this change in strategy which has succeeded, which is allowing us to win this war.

SAWYER: Quick coverage about the press coverage if I can. He's there with a lot of reporters and it's been widely reported—you're laughing. Do you think the press coverage is unfair?

MCCAIN: That's up to the American people to decide, Diane. It is what it is.

SAWYER: His camp has said that, in fact he was out ahead of you on Afghanistan, where the real problem is today. The level of violence has increased, more US and NATO troops killed in June in Afghanistan than were in Iraq. The Taliban resurging and also, Sen. Obama says he was warning of this all along. And I'm going to play a bite from yesterday.

BARACK OBAMA: I believe that US troop levels need to increase and I have, for at least a year now have called for two additional brigades, perhaps three. The situation is precarious and urgent here in Afghanistan and I believe this has to be our central focus. The central front on our battle against terrorism.

SAWYER: Does he deserve the credit for saying that there should be more troops in Afghanistan now that the chairman of the joint chiefs is saying just the same thing?

MCCAIN: Actually the chairman of the joint chiefs has said yesterday that it'd be very dangerous to do what Sen. Obama wants to do in Iraq. He said the fragile victory that we are succeeding in gaining would be all placed at risk if we did what Sen. Obama wanted. Look, you don't have to choose to lose in Iraq in order to succeed in Afghanistan. Of course I've been following closely the events in Afghanistan. I gave speeches in Germany talking about the need for more NATO troops, more US troops. But it's more complicated than that Diane. It's not just a matter of troops, it's a matter of our relations with Pakistan, it's relations with a new strategy, which will, can and will succeed. The same kind that worked in Iraq, which he has rejected, and we can succeed there and it's going to be tough.

SAWYER: But—

MCCAIN: It is very tough. If we had lost in Iraq, the complications in Afghanistan would have been enormously more difficult.

SAWYER: But the chairman of the joint chiefs says, "I need the troops, I need the additional brigades but I don't have troops I can reach for to send to Afghanistan until I have reduced requirement in Iraq." So, in a sense they are linked. The troops in Iraq and the availability of troops for Afghanistan. My question is, when will you have enough troops to send to Afghanistan?

MCCAIN: I'm sure fairly soon. But it'll be dictated by the conditions on the ground. Look, it's like any counterinsurgency or strategy that's succeeds. We will be able to free up troops to go to Afghanistan but if we abandon Iraq [laughing] and state specific dates for withdrawal, we would've been out last March. This previous March if we had done what Sen. Obama wanted to do. He was wrong then. He was wrong now. And he should admit that he was wrong. That might help us succeed in Afghanistan and we will free up additional troops as we succeed in Iraq and come home in victory and honor.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SAWYER: Do you agree the situation in Afghanistan is precarious and urgent?

MCCAIN: Well, I think it's very serious.

SAWYER: Not precarious and urgent?

MCCAIN: Oh, I don't know, uh, exactly run through the vocabulary but it's a serious situation. And but there's a lot of things we need to do. We have a lot of work to do and I'm afraid that it's a very hard struggle. Particularly given the situation on the Iraq/Pakistan border. And I would not announce that I am going to attack Pakistan as Sen. Obama did when he was doing his campaign. But most importantly, he railed against, voted against and said the surge wouldn't work. He said it wouldn't work and couldn't work. And has failed to acknowledge. It did work and we have succeeded. Thank god.

[. . .]

Highlight #3
Short Interview of McCain Stressing Obama's "Misjudgement" (CBS 07/21/08)
JOHN MCCAIN: We are winning the war and Senator Obama was wrong. He railed against it, he voted against the surge, and he said it would fail. He was wrong there. And there's very little doubt in my mind that he will see for himself that he had a gross misjudgment and that he'll correct that.

Highlight #4
Jindal Slam Obama For Late Visit, Claims Withdrawal Could Be Before 16 Months, To Listen To Maliki (MSNBC 07/21/08)
BOBBY JINDAL: One extreme says no more domestic production, the other extreme says let's only drill our way to independence. The reality is we've got to do it all. We need nuclear power, we need conservation, we need renewables as well as more domestic production. It makes no sense to say we're not going to produce more oil and gas at home while we yell at other countries that aren't always our friends. But secondly, I tell voters don't just vote on the party, vote for conservatives. And I absolutely agree the voters had cause to fire the Republican majority in Congress. The Republican majority was spending like Democrats, wasn't balancing the budget, had become addicted to earmarks, was defending corruption that we never would have tolerated in the Democratic Party, and finally we stopped being the party of new ideas. So I tell voters you know don't always vote Republican but find the real conservatives that have real great ideas. Here in Louisian we've cut six taxes, our largest income tax in our state's history, we got one of the nation's strongest ethics codes. We're actually growing jobs. We got a fortune 1000 company moving its headquarters here. Fortune 500 company contemplating a 3 billion dollar investment in Louisana. So, I tell voters find real conservates, don't worry about party labels. Find people who will do what they promise you in their campaigning.

WILLIE GEIST: Governor Jindal, it's Willie Geist here in New York. The McCain campaign has called Barack Obama's campaign overseas a photo-op, a campaign rally, a couple of the terms. I wonder what you think as you watch these pictures coming in from the weekend from today of him sitting with Karzai there, visiting Baghdad today, what are your impressions of his trip?

JINDAL: Well certainly I think its long overdue. I'm glad that he's finally going there. He didn't go during the primaries but now that he's there, I wish he'd gone and listned to the commanders instead of sticking to his policies before he announced his policies decisions before he went to listen to the commanders in the field. You know certainly when he talks about the 16 month timeline, this firm timeline, the reality is the surge is working. I hope when he goes over there he says look Senator McCain was right, Senator McCain even when the Bush administration wasn't for this, Senator Obama opposed it, said it would never work, Senator Reid said it wouldn't work, Senator McCain stood tall and said the surge can work, it will work, Senator McCain said he was willing to lose an election, rather than lose a war. So I hope Senator Obama will come back and say he's learned from his trip, he thinks the surge is working. I certainly agree we want our troops to come back as quickly and as safely as possible. But the fundamental difference between the two Senators is Senator McCain has said it has to be based on the facts on the ground. Senator Obama continues to advocate an unconditional withdrawal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MIKA BRZEZINSKI: I think there's an argument that since we're in there the job needs to be done. I think the argument has been if we should have been in there in the first place and what kind of misconceptions brought us there.

JINDAL: I disagree.

BRZEZINSKI: Senator McCain confused the issue here on exactly the differences are between the candidates.

JINDAL: Well no I disagree. I think the American voters are looking forward now and saying we want our troops to come home safely and victoriously. There is a fundamental difference between Senator Obama saying its 16 months no matter what happens on the ground and Senator McCain saying you know look it could be shorter, it could be longer, let's listen to General Petraeus, lets listen to Admiral Mullen, let's listen to Prime Minister Maliki, who have all said basically the same thing, which is yes American troops should be able to leave, they should be able to leave safely, probably more quickly that we originally anticipated, but it should be based on facts on the ground, not an artificial political timeline. I think that's the fundamental difference.

BRZEZINSKI: Well also the Prime Minister has been quoted saying the 16 month-now the questions as to exactly what that's being translated to, its pretty clear that he seems to be at least likely attracted to the 16 month withdrawal time line that Barack Obama is putting out there as suppose to a horizon.

DAVID SHUSTER: Governor Jindal it's David Shuster here I think you said something and I just want to follow up. You said John McCain said it could be less than 16 months? When has he said that? Would you agree with pulling troops out less than 16 months?

JINDAL: I think if you listen carefully to General Petraeus and the Senator and the Admiral, others who've commented on this all have said look if we want our troops to come home as quickly and safely as possible, but it needs to be driven on facts on the ground. Let me say this, and I'll put those words in my mouth, not somebody else's mouth, it could be 12 months, it could be 16 months, it could be longer, but the point is, the Senator's always consistently said it needs to be driven by the facts on the ground. And let's be clear, the reason we're able to have this conversation today is because the surge is working. The surge that Senator Obama opposed. And lets also be clear Obama's been advocating 16 months even before the facts on the ground changed. The bottom line, the most important thing is this: whether its 16 months, 12 months, 24 months, whatever the timeline, it has to be based on the facts on the ground. It cannot be simply an unconditional etched in stone withdrawal and one of the things I truly admire Senator McCain for he has said again and he said this last year: willing to lose an election but he was not willing to lose a war. I think that speaks to his character and the fact this isn't driven by politics. […]

JOE SCARBOROUGH: You talk about facts on the ground, McCain talks about facts on the ground, Obama talks about facts on the ground, but we also have facts on the ground in Washington DC, the Pentagon, the Generals saying there that we are stretched to a breaking point our army is. I know you know this even though you're working down in Louisiana now for the people of Louisiana now. Should we pay as much attention to what our generals are saying at the Pentagon about our broken US army as much as we are the generals on the ground in Iraq.

JINDAL: Absolutely. One of the things we hear our commanders both in DC as well as abroad in the field tell us is that as the surge has worked, as we are able to reduce our troop presence in Iraq- and it does look from early indications that we'll be able to be even more aggressive at reducing the number of combat troops we had originally anticipated, it absolutely looks like we'll be needing to send more troops to Afghanistan. In some sense the same kind of surge strategy that was advocated by Senator McCain in Iraq to apply that same pressure, that same tactic in Afghanistan. We absolutely need to be listening to our commanders that as we achieve success in Iraq, that may free up the resources to provide some relief in Afghanistan.

SCARBOROUGH: We just don't have the troops to send that surge to Afghanistan unless we remove them from Iraq.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Highlight #5

Jindal Downplays Maliki Comments, Pushes for Need to Pay Attention to "Facts on the Ground"
(CNN 07/20/08 7:55am)

JOHN ROBERTS: Not only does Senator Obama want to deploy troops from Iraq to Afghanistan after he is elected president . . . but he also said in Afghanistan yesterday he think there needs to be an immediate shift of troops from Iraq to Afghanistan, because Afghanistan is now the central front in the war on terror. Where does senator McCain come down on that idea of immediately moving troops?

BOBBY JINDAL: Well, two things. One, it's good to see senator Obama endorse the same kind of surge in Afghanistan he opposed in Iraq. But secondly, what Senator McCain has said, what Prime Minister Maliki has said, what Adm Mullen said yesterday, what Gen Petraeus has said, is that troop withdrawals should based on the conditions on the ground. Everyone wants to see our troops come home safely and victoriously . . . now, the surge is working. General Petraeus is beginning to say it may be possible to bring even more troops back even more quickly than originally anticipated. Now, that's great news. We need to remember, when it wasn't popular, Sen. McCain, even when the Bush administration wasn't there, Sen. Obama wasn't there, Senator McCain stood for the surge, stood for sending in more troops. One of the things I respect senator McCain for . . . he has made it clear he would rather lose an election than lose a war. He has made it very clear. Let's listen to the commanders on the ground. Yes, bring the troops out, but base ton the facts on the ground.

ROBERTS: On the point of listening to commanders on the ground, General David Petraeus said . . . at hearings that it appears that al-Qaeda is diverting fighters from Iraq to Afghanistan speaking to an urgent need for more troops on the ground there in Afghanistan.

JINDAL: Absolutely. You hear General Petraeus, Admiral Mullen and senator McCain saying give the commanders what they need . . . Sen. Obama, for months, for years now, Obama has been advocating this withdrawal without any regard to conditions—

ROBERTS: But Senator Obama also advocated, in advance of what Senator McCain said last week, sending at least two more brigades of U.S. forces to Afghanistan. Senator McCain has only recently come to that issue.

JINDAL: Again, I, this is the fundamental difference between the two is that Senator McCain said, let's listen to the commanders on the ground. General Petraeus is now saying, because of a surge senator McCain supported, it may be possible to withdraw more troops if they need more troops in Afghanistan . . . Senator McCain is right to follow the advice of the commanders on the ground but to make sure if we redeploy, we do it victoriously so that all of the sacrifice, the work on the ground is not all for naught.

ROBERTS: Gov Jindal, Sen. Obama also appeared to get support from Iraqi prime minister, Nuri al-Maliki . . . for his 16-month withdrawal timetable, a an interview he did with Der Spiegel magazine, the White House expressed concern, contacted al-Maliki, his office came out, they tried to walk it back a bit, saying it was mistranslated, misunderstood, but in a separate CNN translation of that exchange with the German reporter, al-Maliki did say, "if he is elected he would withdraw the troops within 16 months, we believe that time period give or take a little would be good to end of troop presence in Iraq." That would seem to indicate that he is coming down in favor of the Obama plan

JINDAL: Well, I think the Prime Minister came back and explicitly said, look, he wasn't trying to interfere with American elections, endorse one candidate or another. But, two things. One, the prime minister is making it clear that, thanks to the surge that Senator McCain supported, thanks to the decrease in violence and thanks to the victories against al-Qaeda it may be possible for American troops to leave more quickly than originally anticipated—

ROBERTS: Would they be able too leave in that 16-month timetable?

JINDAL: Well, but again that has be driven by facts on the ground. I think the fundamental difference is you can't go in and say 16 months no matter what happens. Let's remember, Senator Obama was advocating 16 months even before the recent drawdown in violence, the recent victories. I think that's the fundamental difference. It's an arbitrary timetable based on politics versus a plan based on the actual results on the ground. Senator

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

McCain has long believed the surge would work and result in the kinds of victories we're seeing today, and that would allow us to listen to commanders and to begin to withdraw troops. Both men want our troops to come home safely, I think the difference is Senator Obama . . . has held on to the same timeline for months despite the facts on the ground.

ROBERTS: But Governor Jindal, do you believe that given the progress in Iraq from the so-called surge, which is now coming to an end, that it might be reasonable to think you could pull combat brigades out of Iraq by June of 2010?

JINDAL: Look, it may be 12 months, may be 16 months, maybe longer. It all depends on the conditions on the ground, depends on what our commanders tell us based on what we see today. And we know the facts on the ground can change quickly. Based on what we've seen today is appears we'll be ale to withdraw more troops more quickly than originally anticipated. But let's not give the enemy an artificial deadline, let's not tell them in advance, let's not telegraph our plans so they feel like they can just outwait us or manipulate these timelines . . . the good news is that the surge is working. Senator McCain was right and, you have to remember, he advocated that long before the Bush administration, Senator Obama or anybody else. Senator Obama has yet to come out for the surge that's creating the conditions allowing our troops to come home victoriously.

Highlight #6
Lieberman Interviewed, Attacks Obama For Seeking To 'Lose' In Iraq (FNC 07/20/08)
WALLACE: Joining us now to talk about Senator Obama's trip and its effect on the presidential campaign, two key supporters who are on the vice presidential watch lists -- Senator JoeLieberman, an independent Democrat who supports McCain, and Senator Evan Bayh, who backs Obama.And, Senators, welcome back to Fox News Sunday .

LIEBERMAN: Thanks, Chris.

WALLACE: As we discussed with Admiral Mullen, Iraqi prime minister Maliki seemed over the weekend to endorse Obama's plan for pulling combat troops out of Iraq by mid 2010, within two years. Now he's apparently backed off that.

But, Senator Lieberman, the Iraqis clearly want us out sooner rather than later, and they would like on a timetable. Why is Senator McCain resisting that?

LIEBERMAN: Well, we -- Senator McCain and I and others -- want us out of Iraq sooner rather than later, but we want us out in a way that does not compromise all the gains that American and Iraqi forces have made in Iraq, which Admiral Mullen spoke to.

And frankly, we want to stay there to a victory because we don't want all those who have served in the American uniform there to have served or in some cases died in vain.

Remember this, Chris. We wouldn't be having this discussion about how to get out unless the surge, which John McCain courageously fought for, taking on the president of his own party, popular opinion, risking his campaign, and which Senator Obama opposed, worked.

So I think that's the good news. I think everybody -- that is, Prime Minister Maliki, President Bush, people like John McCain and I -- agree the sooner we're out, the better. But it has to be based on conditions on the ground.

Senator Obama doesn't seem to feel that way. It looked like he did a little bit after the primaries were over. But then he, pushed by MoveOn.org and others on the antiwar left of the Democratic Party, is back to a rigid time line. And that's not wise.

WALLACE: Let me talk to Senator Bayh about that. Admiral Mullen didn't mention Obama, but he did say this idea of a timetable for getting out in two years is dangerous. Why not agree that you're going to make any decisions based on conditions on the ground, Senator?

BAYH: Chris, I think it's important to note that Barack Obama's judgment about these issues has been excellent from the beginning, the kind of judgment you'd want in a commander in chief, and others are now beginning to adopt his positions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We wouldn't be discussing surges in Iraq or anything else if Barack had had his way. We wouldn't have started that war to begin with.

He was right about Afghanistan. That's the place from which we were attacked. He's been calling for more troops there now for over a year. And John McCain, to his credit, has now come around and adopted Barack's point of view on that.

He has been for, as you say, a phased withdrawal from Iraq. As we heard, Prime Minister Maliki has embraced a more definitive time line, whether it's the 16 months or something else. But clearly, they want a more definitive time line.

And even President Bush now is coming up with a variety of euphemisms -- aspirational goals, time horizons. I mean, it's starting to sound pretty much like a time line to me.

So it's common sense, Chris. Any important enterprise, certainly something as important as a war -- you want to have a plan. And a plan has to have some idea of what it's going to cost, what the adverse consequences are going to be and how long it's going to take.

So 16 months seems to be a reasonable goal. Let's work toward that. Let's bring this to a conclusion in a responsible way and focus on Iraq (sic) where the focus should have been all along.

WALLACE: But, Senator Bayh, even the Washington Post criticized Obama this week for -- and let's put it up on the screen -- his iron timetable, accusing him of foolish consistency and that he's ultimately indifferent to the war's outcome.

And here's an exchange between Obama and McCain this week.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: We can safely redeploy our combat brigades at a pace that would remove them in 16 months. That would be the summer of 2010.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

MCCAIN: I'm really astonished that he should give a policy speech on Iraq and Afghanistan before he goes to find out the facts.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Again, two questions, really, Senator Bayh. Why the, quote, iron timetable that the Washington Post talks about? And secondly, this issue -- why announce your policy before you go to Iraq and talk to the generals and the Iraqis?

BAYH: A couple of things, Chris. First, General Petraeus was asked recently about whether a 16-month period was a reasonable period of time, and he said it would depend on a variety of factors. He didn't say it was unreasonable.

We've been there -- will have been -- 16 months from when the next president is inaugurated, almost seven years. We've spent $700 billion. Just think of all the other things we could have done --finished Afghanistan, energy security for our country -- with those amount of resources.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What's really surprising is that John, a man I admire and respect, says that even knowing there were no weapons of mass destruct in Iraq, knowing all the consequences that have been adverse in Afghanistan because of our fixation on Iraq, he would do this all over again. That's what is really surprising.

So Barack thinks that 16 months from January is a reasonable period of time. Let's go for it. Let's see. Let's try and bring this to a conclusion on that time frame. If there are difficulties, we'll address them when they arise.

LIEBERMAN: Look, the fact is that if Barack Obama's policy on Iraq had been implemented, Barack Obama couldn't go to Iraq today. It wouldn't be safe. Barack Obama and John McCain saw the same difficulty in Iraq.

John McCain had the guts to argue against public opinion, to put his whole campaign on the line, because, as he says, he'd rather lose an election than lose in a war that he thinks is this important to the United States.

The reason I say Barack -- if Barack Obama's policy couldn't --had been implemented -- if Barack Obama's policy in Iraq had been implemented, he couldn't be in Iraq today is because he was prepared to accept retreat and defeat.

And that would mean today Al Qaida would be in charge of parts of Iraq. Iranian-backed extremists would be in charge of other parts of Iraq. There'd be civil war and maybe even genocide.

And the fact is that we are winning in Iraq today. And you know, you can't choose, as Senator Obama seems to think, to lose in Iraq so you can win in Afghanistan.

The reality is if we lost in Iraq, which Obama was prepared to do, we would go to Afghanistan as losers. Instead, Al Qaida has its tail tucked between its legs as it's exiting Iraq to go -- to try to...

WALLACE: I'm going to...

BAYH: I have to respond to that. Barack Obama was not for losing in Iraq. Barack didn't want the war to begin with.

John McCain opposed surging troops in Afghanistan until last week.

LIEBERMAN: Yeah, but what...

BAYH: Excuse me. Was John for losing in Afghanistan? I don't think so.

LIEBERMAN: Of course not.

BAYH: And now you have Maliki, even President Bush, are moving toward Barack Obama's position on this.

WALLACE: I want to...

BAYH: His judgment was right.

WALLACE: Gentlemen, I want to -- we could continue this...

LIEBERMAN: Those questions -- bottom line, no question that Barack Obama was prepared to lose in Iraq.

BAYH: That's not true.

WALLACE: All right. All right.

LIEBERMAN: Forget what's right or wrong...

WALLACE: Gentlemen, you're going to have to agree to disagree. I want to move on to the whole issue of his trip this week.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Senator Lieberman, the McCain camp seems divided about whether this is a legitimate fact-finding trip or a political stunt. After McCain and the Republican Party taunted Obama for not going to Iraq, has that, in fact, backfired on them by making this an even bigger story?

LIEBERMAN: No, I don't think so. I think John McCain's challenge to Barack Obama is very important. And frankly, it says a lot more than whether McCain was right about Iraq and Obama was wrong.

It says what kind of leaders these people will be as president. Obama reached -- John McCain reached a decision about what to do in Iraq based on what he saw there, what he heard -- what he heard from the generals and from the soldiers, and then he had the guts to fight big interests to see - - including public opinion, to see that that would happen.

Senator Obama was taking positions about Iraq to put us on a rigid time line to get all troops out by March 2008 -- all combat troops. That's what he said. That would have been accepting defeat there. And I think what it says about the two of them -- this is the kind of president John McCain will be on the economy. We're in crisis. We need a president who will listen, learn, decide what's right for the country, not what's right for their political campaign, and fight for the American people to make...

WALLACE: I want...

LIEBERMAN: ... that happen.

WALLACE: I want to ask Senator Bayh about another aspect of Obama's trip.

He plans to make a big public speech in Berlin. There was first talk it was going to be at the Brandenburg Gate. They announced today it's going to be at the Victory Column, a golden column in the heart of downtown Berlin.

Why would someone running for president of the United States hold a big rally in Germany? Wouldn't it be like a candidate for German chancellor holding a rally in front of the Statue of Liberty?

BAYH: A couple of things, Chris. First, getting back to Iraq, I just have to disagree once again. Barack Obama is for success in Iraq. His judgment about this was right from the beginning.

If you agree that knowing what we know today you would do this all over again...

WALLACE: With all due respect...

BAYH: ... then vote for John McCain.

WALLACE: Gentlemen, I think we both have been there.

BAYH: But I just couldn't let Joe get away with saying he's for defeat. That's not true. He has a better path to victory. His judgment's been right about this.

WALLACE: Now answer my question.

BAYH: Now, with regard to Germany, look. I was with Barack the last time he made one of these trips to Iraq. We met with the Iraqi president, the prime minister, our generals, our ambassadors. He was very substantive, very knowledgeable about the challenges that we face.

Now he's meeting with some of our European allies. We need to rehabilitate these relationships. They frayed over the last eight years. Our reputation in the world has been damaged because of some of the policies this president has pursued.

If we are going to be strong, if we are going to confront Iran, we need allies and friends with us. Rallying global opinion to America's side is an important responsibility for a president, and that's one of the things he is attempting to do. WALLACE: All right. Finally, I want to ask you both about your political situations.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Senator Bayh, if Obama asks you to be his running mate, what will you say?

BAYH: Well, I've said that's not the sort of thing you say no to, Chris, so...

WALLACE: Which means you'd say yes.

BAYH: Well, that's the kind of thing you do say yes to, and I've said that. But you should probably ask Joe. He has more experience with the vice presidential questions than I do.

WALLACE: Have you been asked to turn over personal information to the campaign?

BAYH: You know, that's their business, Chris, and I think you should direct those questions to them.

WALLACE: But -- oh, come on.

(LAUGHTER)

BAYH: Well, I'm trying my best not to make news on that this morning, so I hope you'll forgive me. But truly, they've established a process. It's their process. And I think it's up to them to respond to that.

WALLACE: Are you in the process?

BAYH: You know, I'd love to answer your question, but I think I really can't.

WALLACE: Senator Lieberman, some conservative leaders say -- on the Republican right say with your liberal stands -- obviously, you're not liberal or -- I don't know if those words mean anything.

But obviously, you support McCain on foreign policy, but with your -- what they call liberal stands on economic issues and social issues, for McCain to pick you as his running made would be a political, in their word, catastrophe. Do you agree?

LIEBERMAN: Well, they shouldn't worry about it too much because it's not going to happen. But I will say this. I hope that my support of John McCain, an independent Democrat supporting a Republican, is my way of saying that there's too much partisanship in Washington.

We need a leader like John McCain, a president like John McCain, who has always reached across party lines to get things done, to fight for the American people.

WALLACE: Real quickly, are you going to speak at the Republican convention? LIEBERMAN: I don't know yet.

WALLACE: If you're asked, will you?

LIEBERMAN: If John asks me and he thinks I can help him, because I believe -- this is no ordinary time, no ordinary election. John McCain is no ordinary candidate. I want to help him.

I'm not going to attack Barack Obama. I'm going to go to explain why I, as an independent Democrat, am supporting John McCain, hoping that I can convince other independents and Democrats to join me in choosing the man who is clearly more ready to be the president America needs today.

WALLACE: Even if that means Senate Democrats would kick you out of their caucus?

LIEBERMAN: Well, I'm following the model of John McCain. I'm going to do what I think is right for the country and not worry about the politics. And John McCain is definitely right for the country as our next president.

WALLACE: Senator Lieberman, Senator Bayh, we want to thank you both. We could have talked a lot more.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Safe travels on the campaign trail to both of you.

LIEBERMAN: Thank you.

BAYH: Thank you, Chris.

WALLACE: Up next, what does our Sunday panel make of the big Obama trip and all those anchors and reporters following the senator halfway around the world? Some answers when we come back.

Highlight #7
Bill Press calls McCain a whiner, hosts note McCain's absence at Afghanistan Armed Services Committee hearings (MSNBC 07/21/08)
DAVID SHUSTER: You know first of all whenever you start an ad talking about how many hearings someone has been to, that's not a very strong ad. Secondly, if you do want to talk about hearings, John McCain, ranking Republican on the Armed Services Committee, there were six hearings on Afghanistan in the last two years, how many did John McCain attend?
MIKA BRZEZINSKI: How many?
SHUSTER: Zero.
BRZEZINSKI: Ouch. Well there's the rebuttal ad. I will just say, country first, that's, I mean that's playing into those polls that already say he's more of a patriot.
BILL PRESS: I'd like to add, the country first gets to me as an American with a flag. I like John McCain and I respect his service to the country but you're right he's whining about how many hearings Obama attended, and then he's whining about this trip. You know sorta he reminds me of a kid who wasn't invited to the birthday party. So he's on the outside saying 'what a lousy party.' It's not a lousy party, it's a great party. He's just not there.

Highlight #8
Pfotenhauer Says Maliki Statement Has Credibility, Yet Repeats Talking Point About Adhering To Conditions On The Ground (MSNBC 07/21/08)
TAMRON HALL: Let me ask you do you believe the Iraqi leaders are playing politics here? Including Nouri Al-Maliki, the prime minister are playing politics here? Because their time table is essentially the same thing as what we're hearing from Senator Obama. Are they playing with the political system here?

NANCY PFOTENHAUER: I certainly couldn't question their motives. I'm just saying Maliki over time has been consistent in saying that any withdrawal needed to be based on conditions on the ground. So, when he comes forward and makes this statement, it's got a lot of credibility. But if someone was calling for withdrawal, troop withdrawal a year ago or two years ago when they were fighting the surge, withholding funds for our troops who are in combat in Iraq and in Afghanistan, those motives are questioned. I mean it's interesting that Senator Obama is able to safely visit these places in part because the strategy that he fought was put in place and has succeeded.

HALL: Some people are asking Nancy this morning where does this leave Senator McCain? You have the end of the work week, the President of course George Bush saying that there is a time horizon. That they've reached an agreement the White House and the Iraqi officials agree, reached an agreement on time horizon. Did you wake up this Monday morning with this timetable the year 2010 that Iraqi officials say they're look at yet. Where does this leave Senator McCain. Some people describe, they're saying he's kind of in a box here. He's gotta come out and he's gotta be more definitive about what he thinks is happening and what should happen next.

PFOTENHAUER: Well he made the statement a month or so ago where he said he was confident that the troop reductions would certainly be done by 2013. So he was projecting even months ago that would occur. Now we're talking about really the art if you will, not the science, of how many troops and how fast, in order to ensure the gains that were made on the ground that are significant but they're still fragile and reversible are not put into jeopardy and that requires a tremendous amount of local knowledge. It's not something that should be made based off politics. It should be made based on the very best knowledge our military commanders on the ground. And so I think what Senator McCain has done in a very principled way is that's what its gotta be based on, not any timetable that helps my election. And I think that's the opposite of what Senator Obama has done.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.

-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
To: "Milia Fisher" <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 6/29/2015 9:12:03 AM
Subject: Re: Ben Gemen policy background

Let Jen and Kristina know that I am blowing off ABC.

On Jun 29, 2015 4:08 PM, "Milia Fisher" <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com> wrote:
Also- Trevor just followed up again with the following on the SCOTUS ruling:

"One more thing to flag. John is certainly aware of today's Supreme Court decision presenting a near-term obstacle for Mercury regulations. He may be asked about it, and he could underscore his confidence that the Obama administration will take the necessary steps to comply and fully implement the regulations, but should there be a delay, HRC will do so as President.

Of note, These pollutants are dangerous primarily to women and their fetuses. They have never been regulated. It's been 25 years since the toxics provisions were adopted by Congress in 1990. The regulations are long overdue."

On Mon, Jun 29, 2015 at 4:00 PM, Milia Fisher <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com> wrote:
Yep, you're all good to call him at 5:00 or even later if it takes you longer to get here or home. His best number is his desk line: 202-266-7429

On Mon, Jun 29, 2015 at 3:56 PM, Milia Fisher <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com> wrote:
Yep I have a number and I will call him now to ask. Will circle back.

On Mon, Jun 29, 2015 at 3:54 PM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com> wrote:
Can you call Ben and see if I can cal him at 5:00
Get a number.

On Jun 29, 2015 3:19 PM, "Milia Fisher" <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com> wrote:
Trevor just followed up with the below. His cell is 917-755-5446 just in case you want to call.

_____

We've also found it successful when chatting with folks to frame energy/climate as integral to each of her four fights:

- investing in clean energy that will power the economy of the future

- protecting families from pollution

- safeguarding our country from the impacts of climate change and reducing our oil dependence

- preventing those who want to keep us trapped in the energy economy of the past from distorting our political process.

On Mon, Jun 29, 2015 at 3:14 PM, Milia Fisher <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com> wrote:
Hi John-

Here's the policy background Trevor Houser sent over for the Ben Gemen interview. Policy memo attached and at the bottom in plain text. All printed for you in the office as well in case you're able to make it in.

Thanks,
Milia

Note From Trevor Houser:

"Not sure if comms gave John background, but the reporter has been asking about HRC's process for a climate and enviro policy. Jake and the team felt now was an appropriate time to work with Ben Geman on that story in an effort to:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

1) underscore how seriously she takes these issues;
2) Climate and Environment are top priorities for the campaign; and
3) The campaign is leading a deliberate and thoughtful policy process that has sought input from a large number of experts and key stakeholders in the environment, clean energy, and conservation communities.

The one other thing I would flag for John is that if Ben asks whether we would support a permanent extension of the PTC/ITC we need to hedge given out solar/renewable targets. Those imply a $10-$15 billion per year price tag by 2020 and $25-$35 billion per year by 2027 if extended at current levels. May need to call for "extending and improving" or something like that."

Secretary of State Record

As Secretary, Hillary fought hard to mobilize a global response to climate change. She immediately created the first high-level post at the State Department dedicated exclusively to climate diplomacy (the US Special Envoy for Climate Change)

She put climate squarely on the agenda during her first trip as Secretary to Beijing

Hillary worked to feature climate change in the annual US-China Strategic and Economic Dialogue meeting

She helped to hammer out the breakthrough that led to the Copenhagen Accord, which, among other things, was the first international agreement in which all of the major economies – including China – committed to reduce their greenhouse gas pollution.

In addition, she worked hard as Secretary to build new coalitions to combat emissions from methane and other super-pollutants that damage the climate, as well as to launch a clean cookstove initiative that is bringing not only health but climate benefits.

In pursuing these international agreements, and the leadership we are showing at home and abroad, the United States now has a much stronger hand to play in the upcoming negotiations in Paris.

To: John Podesta, Jake Sullivan, Maya Harris and Dan Schwerin

From: Energy and Climate Team

Date: June 29, 2015

Re: Energy, Climate and Environment Policy Platform

This memo provides a brief overview of our proposed energy, climate and environment policy platform. We have developed six major policy initiatives that together offer a comprehensive strategy for a) protecting American families from pollution, b) powering the economy of the future, c) delivering energy and climate security that lasts, and d) responsibly stewarding our country's natural bounty and beauty. We are finalizing separate white papers with more detail on each of the six initiatives.

Our platform is designed to make the US the clean energy superpower of the 21st century and a global leader in the fight against climate change, and to do so in a way that provides economic opportunity and security for all Americans. We will have half a billion solar panels installed across the country by 2020 and generate enough renewable energy to power every home in the country within 10 years. During that time we will reduce US oil consumption by 20% and partner with other countries bring global oil demand growth to a halt [note: this is a proposed target we haven't yet discussed as a group].

The next decade is critical if we are going to successfully transition to a clean energy economy, deliver security that lasts, and prevent catastrophic climate change. The following is an ambitious and achievable plan of attack.

1. Smart Standards

We will fight efforts to roll back environmental protections in favor of polluters. We will defend and extend common-sense standards that make our air and water cleaner, safeguard the health of our families, reduce energy waste, driven clean energy deployment and fight global climate change. This includes full implementation of the Clean Power Plan, extension of efficiency standards for cars, trucks, airplanes and appliances, better building codes, mandatory disclosure of fracking chemicals and methane regulations on oil and gas production.

2. Clean Energy Challenge

Standards set the floor, not the ceiling. We can and must go further. We will form a new partnership with states, cities and rural communities that are ready to lead, providing competitive grants to those that exceed federal guidelines, remove barriers to clean energy access and entrepreneurship, and invest in innovative solutions that reduce energy costs, protect public health and cut carbon pollution.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As part of this bargain, we will guarantee that every agency within the federal government is working in concert to ensure Americans have the tools and resources they need to succeed. That includes investing in new technologies, both in our labs and through our tax code, and ensuring that we are maximizing the clean energy potential of public lands and public buildings. We will expand successful innovation initiatives, like ARPA-e, cut those that fail to deliver results, and ensure that public R&D supports private sector entrepreneurialism, small business creation and employment growth.

3. Modernizing North American Infrastructure

We must improve the safety and security of existing energy infrastructure in North America and ensure that the new infrastructure we build is consistent with the clean energy economy we are seeking to create. We will launch a major initiative to repair, replace and better regulate our existing pipeline and rail network to protect our families, communities, and outdoor economy from the risk of oil spills and explosions and protect the climate from fugitive methane emissions. And we'll negotiate a North American Climate Compact with Canada and Mexico that guides future infrastructure investment on the continent through ambitious emission reduction commitments, coordinated policy action, and strong accountability mechanisms.

Security that Lasts

The recent growth in domestic oil and gas production provides important economic and geopolitical benefits, but it doesn't solve the energy-related security issues that have plagued our country for decades. US gasoline prices will continue to be set by the global market, no matter how much oil we produce, leaving our economy vulnerable to supply disruptions elsewhere in the world. In addition, the more oil and other fossil fuels we burn, the more risk we bear – both to our economy and our national security - from higher sea levels and increasingly devastating storms, heatwaves and droughts.

The only way to truly safeguard our country is to reduce the amount of oil consumed both at home and around the world and make our investments, our communities and our infrastructure more resilient to climate-related risks. We will take actions necessary to drive down oil consumption in the US, and will partner with other countries to halt the growth in global oil consumption within the next ten years. We will lead the world in combatting climate change, build resilient infrastructure and ensure American families, businesses and investors have actionable information on the kinds of risks they face.

Collaborative Stewardship

We are still developing the public lands/conservation leg of the platform, which will include the following components:

1. Royalty reform: Raise the on-shore oil and gas royalty rate on public lands to match that charged on private lands in Texas and other states and close the loophole in coal royalty policy that costs taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars per year.

2. Leasing: Take areas too sensitive for energy production, like the Arctic, off the table.

3. LWCF: Fully fund the Land and Water Conservation Fund

4. Outdoor economy: Support the growth of the outdoor economy by protecting national parks and forests and improving access to public lands for hunters and anglers and other types of recreation.

A Just Transition

As we build the energy economy of the 21st century, we cannot turn our backs on the workers and communities in the coalfields who kept the lights on and factories running during the 20th century. We will ensure that the retirement benefits of coal miners and their families are secure, invest in carbon capture, utilization and sequestration technology, and launch a major workforce and local economic development initiative for coalfield communities from Central Appalachia to the Powder River Basin.

We will also address the legacy costs fossil fuel combustion in communities disproportionately impacted by the resulting air pollution. We will provide block grants to states, cities and rural communities that develop innovative economic development and public health solutions for vulnerable communities as part of their clean energy strategy, such as the SB 535 program in California.

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Rich Davis" <rich@dixondavismedia.com>
To: "Oren Shur" <oshur@hillaryclinton.com>
"Mandy Grunwald" <gruncom@aol.com>
Date: 1/23/2016 5:03:57 PM
Subject: RE: BREAKING: DMR: Endorsement: Hillary Clinton has needed knowledge, experience

Yep

Sent via the Samsung Galaxy S® 6 edge, an AT&T 4G LTE smartphone

-------- Original message --------
From: Oren Shur <oshur@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 1/23/2016 7:01 PM (GMT-05:00)
To: Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com>
Cc: oshur@hillaryclinton.com, john@algpolling.com, Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com, David Dixon <david@dixondavismedia.com>, Rich Davis <rich@dixondavismedia.com>, john.rimel@gmmb.com, jandrews@jacompany.com, john.podesta@gmail.com, re47@hillaryclinton.com, jbenenson@bsgco.com
Subject: Re: BREAKING: DMR: Endorsement: Hillary Clinton has needed knowledge, experience

Just so all on same page - 3 scripts being written:

1. Straight positive from DMR endorsement (DDMG)
2. Endorsement script that leans more heavily into the contrast language from the DMR (DDMG)
3. Endorsement buffet script - PP, gun groups, DMR, etc. (GMMB)

Sent from my iPhone

On Jan 23, 2016, at 6:55 PM, Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com> wrote:

> I wonder if we should try a version of the DMR spot with our endorsement groups too. Planned Parenthood, HRC, Labor, LCV, Gabby Giffords etc -- something that gives a big sense of momentum
>
> I think these groups actually have more impact on voters than the DMR (a lot of good they did us in 2008!)
>
> Mandy Grunwald
> Grunwald Communications
> 202 973-9400
>
> -----Original Message-----
> From: Oren Shur <oshur@hillaryclinton.com>
> To: John Anzalone <john@algpolling.com>
> Cc: Oren Shur <oshur@hillaryclinton.com>; Jim Margolis <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com>; Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com>; David Dixon <david@dixondavismedia.com>; rich <rich@dixondavismedia.com>; John Rimel <john.rimel@gmmb.com>; jandrews <jandrews@jacompany.com>; John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com>; Robby Mook <re47@hillaryclinton.com>; Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com>
> Sent: Sat, Jan 23, 2016 6:40 pm
> Subject: Re: BREAKING: DMR: Endorsement: Hillary Clinton has needed knowledge, experience
>
> You're such a nice guy Anzo .... But yeah probably right
>
> Sent from my iPhone
>
> On Jan 23, 2016, at 6:23 PM, John Anzalone <john@algpolling.com> wrote:
>
> > I would let that part go. I think it is more insulting than helpful for our message contrast.
> >
> > John Anzalone
> > Anzalone Liszt Grove Research
> > 334-387-3121. Office

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

@AnzaloneLiszt

On Jan 23, 2016, at 5:14 PM, Oren Shur <oshur@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

This is great, half of it reads like one of our ads.
Jim and I just discussed and we should deff cut a script from this.
Dixon Davis, are you guys available to take first crack?
My only question - whether we lean into "the presidency is not an entry level position" - and push off from it, or just let that part go.

Sent from my iPhone

Begin forwarded message:

From: Zachary Petkanas <zpetkanas@hillaryclinton.com >
Date: January 23, 2016 at 6:00:48 PM EST
To: Clips <clips@hillaryclinton.com >
Subject: BREAKING: DMR: Endorsement: Hillary Clinton has needed knowledge, experience

DMR : Endorsement: Hillary Clinton has needed knowledge, experience

If there's one thing Democrats and Republicans agree on this year, it's the fact that the next president will face enormous challenges.

Domestically, this president must work with Congress in confronting the issues of immigration, health care, increased threats to national security, the disappearing middle class, the growing deficit, Social Security solvency, gun control, renewable energy, sentencing reform and more.

On the world stage, this president will have to work with foreign leaders in dealing with ISIS and other terrorists, climate change, the containment of nuclear threats posed in North Korea and Iran, the Russian incursions in Ukraine and foreign trade.

The presidency is not an entry-level position. Whoever is sworn into office next January must demonstrate not only a deep understanding of the issues facing America, but also possess the diplomatic skills that enable presidents to forge alliances to get things done.

By that measure, Democrats have one outstanding candidate deserving of their support: Hillary Clinton. No other candidate can match the depth or breadth of her knowledge and experience.

As first lady, she worked tirelessly on health care reform and, with bipartisan support, created the Children's Health Insurance Programthat provides coverage for 8 million children.

As a senator, she reached across party lines and joined forces with conservatives, including Sen. Lindsey Graham and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, to fight for job creation and universal health care.

ENDORSEMENT: Marco Rubio can chart new direction for GOP

NASH: Register faced tough decision in endorsements

RELATED:A history of Register caucus endorsements

As secretary of state, she helped secure international sanctions against Iran and redefined her job by expanding America's diplomatic agenda to include poverty, women's rights, the environment and other issues.

She is not a perfect candidate, as evidenced the way she has handled the furor over her private email server. In our endorsement of her 2008 campaign for president, we wrote that "when she makes a mistake, she should just say so." That appears to be a lesson she has yet to fully embrace.

Her changing stance on gay marriage, immigration and other issues has invited accusations that she is guided less by personal conviction than by political calculations. She refutes that, and argues persuasively that a willingness to change one's thinking on specific issues, while remaining true to what she calls "the same values and principles," is a virtue, one lacking in most politicians.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Over the course of two meetings, Clinton spent more than three hours with the editorial board, answering questions in a direct and forthright manner. She exhibited an impressive command of the issues, though we'd have liked to hear more from her on the debt and the future of Social Security. She was somewhat prickly and defensive when discussing her emails, but overall she was gracious, engaging and personable.

Her chief opponent for the nomination, Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, has proven to be an honorable and formidable campaigner, and it's very likely that without him in the race, candidates in both parties wouldn't be discussing America's growing inequality in wealth and income.

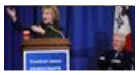
Sanders has tapped into the public's anger and frustration with Washington, without demonizing government and resorting to the cheap demagoguery favored by Donald Trump and others. He has shown himself to be a man of courage and principle who has the ability to rally others to his cause.

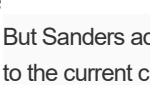
Buy Photo

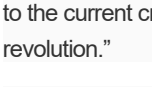
Buy Photo Fullscre

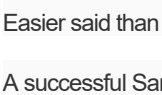
Rodney White/The Register

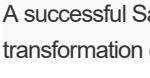
This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

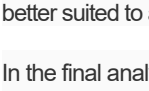












This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-

Next Slide

But Sanders admits that virtually all of his plans for reform have no chance of being approved by a Congress that bears any resemblance to the current crop of federal lawmakers. This is why, he says, voters can't simply elect him president, but must instead spark a "political revolution."

Easier said than done. Congress has the largest Republican majority since the 71st Congress of 1929-31.

A successful Sanders presidency would hinge on his ability to remake Washington in his own image. It's almost inconceivable that such a transformation could take place, even with Democrats controlling both chambers of Congress.

As for Martin O'Malley, the data-driven, wonkish former Maryland governor who has gained little traction in the campaign so far, he seems better suited to a Cabinet-level job in a Clinton White House.

In the final analysis, Iowa Democrats will have to choose between the lofty idealism of Bernie Sanders and the down-to-earth pragmatism of Hillary Clinton. For some, this will be a choice of whether to vote with their hearts or their heads.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton has demonstrated that she is a thoughtful, hardworking public servant who has earned the respect of leaders at home and abroad. She stands ready to take on the most demanding job in the world.

This endorsement is the opinion of The Des Moines Register's editorial board:

David Chivers, president and publisher

Amalie Nash*, executive editor and vice president for news and engagement*

Lynn Hicks, opinion editor

Clark Kauffman, editorial writer

Andie Dominick, editorial writer

Brian Smith, engagement editor

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Tom Matzzie" <tom@zzranch.com>
To:	"Paul Begala" <pbegala@hatcreekent.com>
	"Susan McCue" <susan@one.org>
	"Stan Greenberg" <sgreenberg@gqrr.com>
	"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date:	12/21/2007 2:40:08 AM
Subject:	Tracking Update
Attachments:	Program Update 12-20.doc
	MasterTrackerEventLog.xls

See below and attached documents

Event Details:

- Giuliani held one event in FL, one event in NH, one event in OK and three events in MO 12/113-12/19.
- Giuliani released a 'holiday' ad this week:

  MSNBC: 'Surreal' Giuliani holiday ad has to be spoof

  Rudy Giuliani's new campaign ad features the candidate attempting to soften his tough-guy image by wearing a fuzzy red sweater vest while sitting in front of a Christmas tree. Speaking in jovial tones, he confides to the viewer, "I'll be working to get everyone the same gift: a safer America, lower taxes, secure borders, job growth, fiscal discipline, strict constructionist judges -- and probably a fruitcake or something …"

  Link to story and ad: http://rawstory.com/news/2007/Scarborough_slams_Rudys_new_Xmas_political_1219.html

- At a speech in Tampa, FL on 12/15, Giuliani announced a new optimistic message for his campaign. (Quotes below)

Giuliani's new optimistic campaign message:

On Leadership:

"America needs a leader. I am running for President of the United States because I believe that I can lead America into a new era …with bold leadership, optimism, determination, and distinctly American solutions."

"If you are looking for perfection, you are not going to find it. Not in me and not in any candidate. But if you are looking for a leader who has been tested in times of crisis. … A leader who is ready to lead right now. … A leader who has achieved results – results that some people thought were impossible – a leader who believes that there is no problem too serious for American solutions and a free, American spirit … I believe I am that leader."

"We Can Do It" Attitude:

"As I travel across our country, I've begun to hear a murmur that somehow America has lost its ability to achieve great goals. - Some good people have come to believe that our country is on the wrong track.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Middle Class families feel that the American Dream may be slipping away – they're worried the future might not be as bright as the past. - It does not have to be that way. We can decide America's direction. We determine America's future. That's what an election is all about."

On the War on Terror:

"We're at war. The American people want to see victory in Iraq and Afghanistan – not humiliation and defeat. They want their children to live free from the fear of Islamic Terrorism. They're telling us: Get it done. And we will."

On Immigration:

"The American people are angry that the federal government has failed to secure our border. They want to see legal immigration reconnected with Americanization. They're telling us: Get it done. And we will."

(Major Speech; Tampa, Florida 12/15/07)

On liberal bias in the media:

"There is a media bias against, against Republicans that is very strong. There is no question that it exists. It is not the figment of anyone's imagination. It's just a reality. And the best thing for us to do as Republicans is just to, you know, those are the cards are dealt, deal with it. Don't have a chip on your shoulder about it. All it does, it means we have to communicate better. We got to do things like we're doing right now. Talk to people directly, explain to them how we deal with Islamic terrorism, how we deal with our military."

(Town Hall; Cedar Rapids, IA 12/12/07)

*Clip Available

Event Details:

- Romney held three events in CA, 11 events in IA, one event in GA, one event in MA, three events in NH and four events in SC 12/13-12/19.
- Romney appeared on NBC's Meet the Press on 12/16.

  Transcript here: http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/22273924

- Romney hosted a webcast on 12/18.
- At some events, Romney gives a powerpoint presentation with his economic plan. That plan is broken down into five main parts: fiscal discipline, lower taxes, open markets, innovation and immigration reform.
- Ann Romney took to the stump this week in NH. She appeared nervous and uncomfortable and spoke primarily about the greatness of her husband and her job as a mother.
- Our trackers' character observations on Romney are that he's elitist, stand-offish and just not comfortable with normal, everyday folk. He shakes hands because he has to – not because he's genuinely interested in the people he's meeting. He's nice, but has trouble connecting with people. This is in much contrast to Huckabee's charismatic, personable nature.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- FUN FACT: The Romney campaign plays Journey's "Don't Stop Believin'" at his Iowa campaign events.
- Romney released a new ad this week:

> New Spot: Romney "Helped Save My Daughter" (Washington Post, 12/19/07)
>
> Former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney will today begin airing a new ad in New Hampshire that will take the place of his attacks against rival Mike Huckabee as voters celebrate Christmas next week. The ad tells the story of the daughter of Romney's business partner, who disappeared for three days in New York City in 1996.
>
> http://blog.washingtonpost.com/the-trail/2007/12/19/new_spot_romney_helped_save_my_1.html
>
> Link to ad: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=MjwWVWkPr-4

Romney's storytelling side:

"…Of course I came back, I came back to Iowa a little later, after I worked in a ranch in Idaho. Joan's dad, Joan's dad owned a ranch in Idaho and I worked on that in the summer time. I will tell you, its different faming in Idaho. At least in this part of Idaho, King Hill, Idaho. The ground is sort of sandy and kinda of a gray color. It doesn't rain very much, so you have uhh, to water the corn with, with uhh irrigation ditch water. And the corn doesn't grow real tall and the ears don't get real big. After the summer there I came back on the train, and you look out the window when you get to Iowa, you see the black soil, big tall dark green corn, great big ears, the water comes from the sky like its supposed to. I said to myself, "God must love Iowa." You know that, don't you?"

(Speech; Muscatine, IA 12/13/07)

*Clip Available

On Iran:

> "Q: …You mentioned Chavez, Putin, and Ahmadijhad a few times. With regards to the Iranian issue, we're sort of at a cross-roads right now in what road may be taken in international relations with them. Where do you stand on relations with them?

A: I would be tightening down as hard as we can, diplomatic and economic sanctions on Iran, so that they know that pursuit of nuclear technology and weaponry is unacceptable in the world. And that's us, that's the Europeans, its getting the Chinese to come along with us, trying to move the Russians to do that. That takes a lot of diplomatic effort, a lot of tongue twisting. But, it is, unacceptable to the world to have Iran develop a nuclear capacity.

Now, umm I know that there are a number of reports that have come out recently that, most important is the National Intelligence Estimate. Don't, don't feel comfortable by virtue of just a quick headline reading of that. The 16 agencies I read, in that National Intelligence Estimate, say that Iran is continuing to develop nuclear technology, that they are enriching uranium. That they would be able to have a bomb as early as 2009, 2010. That means that, you know, that's not far off. You remember, this is almost 2008, in just a few days here. And that means 2009 or 2010, they could have a nuclear bomb. This is not a time for us to sit back and say ohh 'we got plenty of time.' This is a time for us dramatically tighten our economic sanctions on that nation, as well as our diplomatic sanctions.

I would indite Ahmadijhad under the Genocide Convention for incitation of genocide. Let the world know and his people know, that he is unacceptable on the world stage."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(Speech; Muscatine, IA 12/13/07)

*Clip Available

On Reagan:

"I'm convinced that if we don't take a left turn, following Hillary Clinton or Barack Obama, over the edge if you will. If we instead stay on the path that Ronald Regan built. Which is a strong economy, with strong values among our people, and a strong military to protect us, if we stay on that path our future will be bright."

(Speech; Muscatine, IA 12/13/07)

*Clip Available

"Now some folks when they look at all those challenges, they ring their hands, and say 'well government is gonna have to take over.' If you listen to Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama and John Edwards, they want to take America on a sharp leftward tack. I think they're inspired by the Europe of old, big government, big brother, big taxes. In my view that is the wrong way to go. The right way for America to proceed when we face the kinda of challenges we face is to pursue the strategy which Ronald Reagan pursued when we faced the challenges of the last century. He said the right path forward is to strengthen America. He strengthened our confidence in ourselves. He rebuilt the optimism that America had lost under Jimmy Carter. He strengthened our families and values. He also made sure that we could compete with anybody in the world. He brought our taxes down, a lot. That caused our economy to take off. And in turn allowed us to out-compete the Russians. And then of course, he strengthened our military. Facing the kind of military challenge that we faced then, he made sure that our military was second to none. And finally, the, the Soviets had to say 'enough already' and they threw in the towel."

(Speech; Carroll, IA 12/14/07)

*Clip Available

"America will follow the path Ronald Reagan chose, as he faced the great challenge of the last century. And that's a path of strength… He said I'm going to strengthen the values of country, our optimism, our sense of future… He also strengthened our economy, by holding down taxes. And he strengthened our military, and produced what was without question the strongest military in the history of the world."

(Meet and Greet; Spartanburg, SC 12/18/07)

*Clip Available

"We should take inspiration from the strategy that Ronald Reagan talked about… It was his view that the right way to approach challenges was to strengthen ourselves… He strengthened the values and the heart and the passion of the American people by calling on our optimism. He strengthened our economy by keeping our taxes down. He strengthened our military, so we could frankly out-compete the Russians on every single dimension."

(Meet and Greet; Myrtle Beach, SC 12/18/07)

*Clip Available

"Now Hillary Clinton says that, with all those challenges she's the candidate of change. And she would change America, wouldn't she. That's what we're afraid of, exactly. We don't want to follow the pathway of Europe with big government, big taxes and big brother. We instead want to pursue the pathway, frankly, that Ronald Reagan championed. When he was facing challenges in that last century, the spread of the Soviet Union and their communism, he said, 'You know, the right way to proceed is to strengthen America with a strong military and a strong economy and strong values and strong homes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(Meet and Greet; Charlotte, SC 12/18/07)

*Clip Available

On Veteran's Benefits:

"Q: What are you gonna do to improve veteran's benefits particularly what this administration has done, which really hasn't been very admirable, such as spending bills to gentlemen that had been wounded in Iraq, that they didn't fulfill their commitment. I hope this type of routine would not continue on…

A: Kinda hard to believe isn't it?

Q: Its almost sick….

A: I must admit, when I heard the story… that people who had been in Iraq, that had let's say a one-year commitment to follow through in order to get certain benefits. They got injured and were sent home because they got badly injured, and then they're told ok, because you didn't fulfill your one-year commitment, you're not gonna get benefits… That makes no sense at all… That's you're government at work…

Q: But that's done by this administration...

A: That's done by government bureaucrats...

(Office Opening; Bettendorf, IA 12/13/07)

*Clip Available

On Iraq:

Q: "What are your plans for ending the Iraq War?"

A: "What are the plans for ending the Iraq War?

Q: "Your plans?"

A: "My plans? My plans are the same as General Petraeus' plans at this point and that is to win. How do we win? The troop surge is working. A lot of people didn't think it was gonna work. Umm, but it is working. And the reason it is working is because the people in Iraq have recognized our commitment and our resolve. The Sunnis have recognized how bad their life would be if Al Qaeda took over their community. And the Sunnis are working with us to get rid of Al Qaeda. For me the key to success in Iraq is making sure we do not leave behind a safe-haven for Al Qaeda or Hezbollah, or other terror groups. And we are successful at this stage in helping move those kinds of groups out of positions of power in Iraq. And I think what you're gonna see, is as General Petraeus has laid out, we are going to start bringing down our troops support by about a brigade a month until July, when we'll take a pause. We'll have gone from about 20 to 15 brigades. We'll take a pause and see how well the Iraqis are doing, standing up their capacity to patrol the streets and secure the public safety. And then I think you're gonna see us start bringing troops down until we're down to a much more modest level.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I think you'll also see our troops playing more of a support role. Which means that we'll being being, doing aerial support, intelligence support, logistical support, and the Iraqi military will be playing a more primary front role. Ultimately, I believe our troops should all come out Iraq. I think we'll have troops in Kuwait, or Cutter, or other places where we have permanent bases in the region. But I think the Iraqis need to know that we are not planning on staying in their country forever. I believe you're going to see us successful there. And again, success for me is making sure we do not have safe-havens for Al Qaeda, from which they would launch uhh attacks, from which they would train, finance, or umm recruit people to go after us."

(Speech; Carroll, IA 12/14/07)

*Clip Available

"It's been interesting over these past several months to watch the Democrats increasingly ratchet up their rhetoric attacking the President. And uhh, of course, as I've pointed out, the war in Iraq has not been perfectly managed. We did a great job knocking down Saddam Hussein and his military. But then after that we were under-prepared and under-planned, under-staffed; The President has pointed out those weaknesses. Tony Blair has.

There is no question we were not perfectly managed. Although today we are making great progress with the surge, and its working. And we're helping the Sunnis reject Al Qaeda amongst them. And that being said, by the way, I must admit I was shocked to pick up the paper and read… One of my fellow Republicans said that this administration, he accused this administration of an 'arrogant Bunker mentality.' And I had to look again, did this come from Barack Obama? Or from Hillary Clinton? Did it come from John Edwards? No, it was one of our own, it was Governor Huckabee. He said [the]'Bush administration is guilty of an arrogant bunker mentality that's been counterproductive here and abroad. I simply can't believe that. I can't believe he'd say that. I'm afraid he's running for the wrong party.

The truth of the matter is, this president has kept us safe these last six years. And that has not been easy to do. He went to Afghanistan and knocked down the Taliban there, and took out Al Qaeda's safe haven from which they could launch attacks against us. Instead of just listening to what happened around the world, in places like Iraq and taking one shot after another. You know, we got hit at the USS Cole, Cobar Towers was hit, our embassies in Africa were hit. One time after another we were hit with no response, other than negotiating. This president finally said we are doing something about it. And responded aggressively, as he should have.

And here at home he made sure we passed the PATRIOT Act, so we could find out what the bad guys were planning on doing to us. And he also made sure that when Al Qaeda was calling, someone was listening. And we captured a terrorist, we interrogated them. And you know the story about Kahild Shiek Mohammed, he's the so-called mastermind of the 9/11 tragedy. When he was captured, he said 'I'll see you in New York with my lawyer.' Can you imagine? I'm sure he was thinking an ACLU lawyer would be provided at government expense. Instead, he saw GIs and CIA interrogators in Guantanamo, just like it ought to be.

And so, I'm, yeah go ahead, that's fine… (Romney shamelessly asks for forced applause), thank you. And so I'm of the view to say thank you to the president for keeping us safe these last six years. And I'm the last person to say that this administration is subject to an 'arrogant bunker mentality' counterproductive here and abroad.'

(Town Hall; Humboldt, IA 12/15/07)

*Clip Available

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Iraq and Oil:

"I sure was surprised that we got in there and found the infrastructure was as terrible as it was. I think the plan was that we'd use the [Iraqi] oil to offset our costs."

"And frankly, we are not getting as much oil out of that place as we expected."

"The effort we have in Iraq is not going to pay for itself in dollars and cents. But hopefully, it will pay for itself in removing the safe-haven for Al Qaeda and Hezbollah from which they can launch attacks against us."

(Meet and Greet; Early, IA 12/14/07)

*Clip Available

On Huckabee and his 'arrogant bunker mentality' comment:

"What are some differences? Well I've described for instance with regards to military policy, I do not think the President's administration is an 'arrogant bunker mentality" administration. I believe that this President has done everything he could do to keep us safe. Does a president make mistakes? Of course. Will I make mistakes? Of course. But the last thing you're gonna hear me say is that the President of the United States, George W. Bush, is a person who is arrogant with a "bunker mentality." That's simply wrong and uhhh not something I would ever do."

(Town Hall; Humboldt, IA 12/15/07)

*Clip Available

"You also heard my comments, my remarks today about uhhh Governor Huckabee's article in Foreign Affairs. To accuse the President of an 'arrogant bunker mentality' is in my view more fitting uhh from a person running for the Democratic party than from our own. It sounds like something Barack Obama or John Edwards would say. Not what you'd hear from someone running for President as a Republican. And I think it was uhh a very serious error. With that, happy to take any questions you may have."

(Town Hall; Humboldt, IA 12/15/07)

*Clip Available

"But, I'm its one thing to say that your're gonna make changes, its one thing to say that there are things have been done wrong in the past, it's a very different matter to say that the administration is arro… it's a "arrogant bunker mentality", that's uh a very different accusation. Its sounds like it came from Barack Obama and John Edwards. Its sounds like Governor Huckabee is running for the wrong party."

(Town Hall; Humboldt, IA 12/15/07)

*Clip Available

On Huckabee's FAIR Tax:

Q: "I know that Governor Huckabee has supported the FAIR Tax. I have one follow up, do you support that or not? I understand that is a national sales and use tax.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A: Yeah, it has a lot of good elements to it. It is not part of my presidential platform and I'll tell you a couple of reasons why. One, I would like to uhh, thoroughly understand what its implications would be for seniors and for middle income folks. I do not want to raise taxes on middle income Americans. So I want to understand that thoroughly. Two, I want to get immediate action to encourage economic growth. And one of the aspects of the FAIR tax is it would require a complete restructuring of our entire tax system and probably a constitutional amendment. And as you know, getting the Democratic Congress to amend our constitution and to eliminate the income tax and then to get three-quarters of the states to do the same thing, would take a long time. So I'm instead proposing immediately we take off the tax on savings.

Q: Uhh ok, that's good. I agree with you. The other thing, Huckabee talks about a 23 cent national sales tax. And everything I say, or read, says that 30 cents up to be revenue neutral. So I think you're right.

A: And, uh, you know. We ought be…Truth in, Truth in lending here, as they say, is important. Which is, which is this is how they calculate the percentage. If something costs a dollar today, and you're probably, you're pretty good at math. This takes most of us a second to think about. If something costs a dollar today, after the FAIR tax, it would, a 30 cent tax would be put on top of it, which is a dollar thirty. But 30 cents is only 23% of a dollar thirty. So they call it a 23% tax. So it is either a 30% tax or a 23% tax depending on what's in the denominator. If anybody followed that, it has not been long since you were out of school."

(Speech; Carroll, IA 12/14/07)

*Clip Available

Attacking Huckabee:

"The great majority of Americans want a person of capability with the kinds of values and vision that will lead the country forward in a very difficult time. And I think Governor Huckabee's rise in the polls justifies him getting a close look by the voters. They take a close look at his record on his immigration they'll see someone who is too liberal on immigration. When they look at the 1,033 commutations he handed out they'll see someone who is too liberal on crime. When they look also on his record of spending, from $6 billion to $16 billion as governor they'll see that's too liberal of a spending record and too liberal of a tax record. So I'm convinced that as people take a closer look the good republicans of South Carolina will support a conservative candidate like myself, and they won't be supporting Governor Huckabee."

(Meet and Greet; Columbia, SC 12/18/07)

*Clip Available

On Immigration:

"If there is a state in America that gives driver licences to illegals, I cut back on their federal highway funds. If there is a state that says were giving in state tuition credits (pause for clapping) or scholarships, I cut back on their higher education funds. And if there is a city that say its a sanctuary city and their not going to enforce the law, I am going to cut back on funds for those cities…"

(Town Hall; Storm Lake, IA 12/14/07)

*Clip Available

"We year after year after year talk about the need to enforce our immigration laws and secure the border. But we simply haven't gotten the job done… Congress is cutting back funding for the fences… For me, completing the fence is Step One. Step Two is putting in place an employment verification system… And finally, you say to the people who got her illegally that they should get in line with everybody else."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(Meet and Greet; Spartanburg, SC 12/18/07)

*Clip Available

"I like legal immigration, but I want to stop illegal immigration. And for me that means putting in place a fence and having enough border patrol agents to make sure we secure our border. It also means giving the legal immigrants a card, that shows that they're an immigrant, but they're a legal immigrant." (Note: Isn't that what a green card is?)

(Meet and Greet; Myrtle Beach, SC 12/18/07)

*Clip Available

On American being a "superpower":

"There is one superpower. I think they'd all agree, there is one superpower on the planet, that is us right now. And then there are nations which are one tier below that. And I've always said as well that they are great nations but they are not superpowers, as they once were. I don't think anyone of them would disagree with that actually. The French call us a 'hyper-power'. So, They recognize there is a difference in our military and economic capacity. And in my view, it is important for us to remain as the world's economic and military leader."

(Town Hall; Humboldt, IA 12/15/07)

*Clip Available

On Social Security:

"For our seniors today, it's not an issue, no one should frighten our seniors, we're not gonna change the deal for seniors or near-seniors. We're gonna rely on the program we have, that's, that's, and there's more money coming in to Social Security today, as you know, than money going out. So this is not matter for current seniors, but for people in their twenties, thirties, and forties, this is a matter of real concern."

(Town Hall; St. Anselm College, NH 12/17/07)

*Clip Available

On his financial investments:

"The answer is I will take a lead in our efforts to stop genocide in Darfur. I, I do not have funds these days in, uh, my investments are all managed by a blind trust. And that has been the case since I was governor, so it's been five years plus. So I don't control any of the investments that I have, but I have asked the trustee to make sure that my investments, to the extent humanly possible, can not involve things with which I disagree, and, um, and I trust that he has done just that. Or the company has done just that, that manages my investments."

(Town Hall; St. Anselm College, NH 12/17/07)

On the deficit:

"Well right now, even with the cost of the War in Iraq, the budget deficit of last year is $161 billion dollars, much smaller than it was when President Bush took office. And it's gonna continue to decline, we are gonna see a balanced budget within 4 years."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(Town Hall; Londonderry, NH 12/17/07)

On military spending:

"Our strong military is another one I should underscore… I also want to acknowledge a great need in this country. We need to add at least 100,000 active duty personnel to our military. I think as well, that we need to provide better funding so we can buy the equipment they need so they can be successful on the battlefield… So, as President of the United States, my budget will include additional funding. Will bring our funding level back up to about 4% of GDP. That's about $40 billion higher than it currently is."

(Meet and Greet; Spartanburg, SC 12/18/07)

*Clip Available

On Taxes:

"One thing you do is keep the tax burden down. You don't raise taxes if you want the economy to get stronger. I want to kill the Death tax once and for all. I also want to have a special savings tax rate… for people earning $200,000/year or less, my view is there should be a new tax rate on your savings…. At the rate of zero."

(Meet and Greet; Myrtle Beach, SC 12/18/07)

*Clip Available

Emotional Romney:

"I have five boys of my own, I imagine what it would be like to lose a son in a situation like that…

"As I looked up there, every single hand was on every heart, and I recognized this is a nation that comes together and respects and reveres those who serve this great nation, and who joins in mourning when one of them is lost."

(Town Hall; Londonderry, NH 12/17/07)

*Clip Available

Event Details:

- Huckabee held two events in IA and six events in MH 12/13-12/19.
- Huckabee appeared on CNN's Larry King Live on 12/17.

  Trancscript here: http://transcripts.cnn.com/TRANSCRIPTS/0712/17/lkl.01.html

- On 12/14 in NH, Huckabee announced that Republican strategist, Ed Rollins (http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ed_Rollins), had joined his campaign as the "National Campaign Chairman and Senior Advisor."
- The weekend of 12/15-15, Huckabee campaigned in NH with Chuck Norris.
- In general, Huckabee is very interactive with the audiences at his events. For example, he'll ask for a show of hands to make a point. During his handshaking, he'll learn details about a few folks and then use those details later in his stump speech. On one occasion, he noted a couple in the audience celebrating their 50th wedding anniversary. He's very good at making a connection with individuals in the room – asking their name, what they do, how's their job, etc – and people love it. This is in contrast to Romney – who often appears 'stand-offish' and elitist.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Huckabee released a new ad this week:

  Ad Hawk: The Greatest Story Ever Told (Newsweek, 12/17/07)

  …This might be the smartest ad of the cycle. For all the observers wondering how the candidates would manage the awkward holiday/caucus overlap, Huckabee delivers a master class.

  Link to article: http://www.blog.newsweek.com/blogs/stumper/archive/2007/ 12 /17/ad-hawk-the-greatest-story-ever-told.aspx

  Link to ad ("What really matters"): http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=8xn7uSHtkuA

Response to Romney's attacks:

"If the only platform I have is to tell you what is wrong with others, I don't have much of a platform."

(Press Conference; Concord, NH 12/14/07)

On health care:

"One of the current problems with our healthcare and health insurance issues is that we have an intervention based system that waits until we are catastrophically ill before it kicks in. The real trend has to be that we move to a prevention based system so that the dollars are spent preventing the disease rather than treating the disease after we have already gotten it…

"We started doing that in my state, ending the co-pays and deductibles on colonoscopies, mammography, prostate and cancer exam, paying 100% for the cost of smoking cessation programs, weight loss programs…

"And let me say that I think some of the approaches by the Democrats and Republicans are both wrong headed. Democrats tend to say let's turn it over to the government and the Republicans tend to say let's just turn it over to the private insurance companies. Well I don't know about you, but I don't trust private insurance companies anymore than I trust the government. I trust me.

"…even if you change jobs, you don't have to lose your insurance, it goes with you cause you own it."

(Town Hall; Boscawen, NH 12/14/07)

*Clip Available

On 'socialized medicine':

"But here's the problem, if we go immediately to coverage without a shared responsibility, without understanding, getting those issues of quality and affordability, imagine what would happen, because the logic is nobody should be without health care, everybody deserves it, it's a, it's a right, you hear those things. Sounds good. Here's the problem. You could make the same argument about eating. Everybody should eat in a very wealthy society like ours, nobody should be hungry, so to make sure that everybody has plenty, everyone is going to get a card, and that card will entitle you to get groceries. Whenever you want, any time you want, and you can have anything you want because universal groceries is now our new goal. Now imagine giving every American, all 303 million of them, a card that says any time you're hungry or want to go to the store just use the card, and you get anything you want. How long would it take for us to bankrupt America? What kind of shopping would we do? Would we compare shopping? How many of us would still coupon clip and actually say, hmm, boy, uh, this name brand is a lot more expensive, I'd better go with the generic and the store brand? None of us would do that anymore. We wouldn't be buying ground beef, we'd be buying ribeyes every time we shopped for meat. My point is that it would get completely out of control."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(Town Hall; Berlin, NH 12/15/07)

*Clip Available

On the military and how it should be like Chuck Norris:

"It is my position that we need to have the strongest possible military on the face of the earth so no one wants to engage in a battle. The best way to have peace is to have a ... military strength that is other nations who would think about touching it would take a second look and decide they don't want to do it. It's kind of like looking at Chuck Norris and saying, 'I don't think so.' And that's what we want. We want a military that is as tough as the idea of going up against Chuck Norris in a, in an alley. And, uh, quite frankly, that's what America has always been able, uh, to have that is it's greatest source of its strength and it's peace. And if we have a weak military, one that is considered vulnerable or that doesn't have the resolve, that's the military that is likely to be engaged in a battle because somebody would believe they can take it out. I hope we never have another war. But realistically we live in a very dangerous, brutal, ugly world and some people are filled with hate and a desire to kill others and to destroy …. We have an enemy now, radical Islam, that really does believe that they need to annihilate the rest of us on this planet. And just never forget somebody would take a bomb and strap it to the belly of their own child and kill their own children for their cause, they certainly wouldn't mind taking your children or mine and killing them for their cause as well…"

(Town Hall; Tilton, NH 12/14/07)

*Clip Available

On his faith:

"I've never downplayed or up-played it."

"People should vote for or against me because of my faith."

"… my faith gives you a framework for what my convictions are."

((Press Conference; Concord, NH 12/14/07)

On God's role in the rise of his candidacy:

"…I'm not trying to say that God's registered to vote in any of the early primary states that I checked. You know, I'm simply saying that there is no reasonable explanation that I can offer."

(Press Conference; Concord, NH 12/14/07)

On the economy:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I sit on a stage with a lot of the other Republican candidates for president in Dearborn, Michigan during a debate, and they ask how's the economy doing? One by one across that stage, my colleagues running for president, good men everyone of them, anyone of them, I think, probably better than all of the guys, or any of the guys, on the other side. My personal perspective of it, that would be my feeling. But the fact is, as I listened to every one of them speak and ask how's the economy doing, everyone said it's doing great. And they rattled off the Republican National Committee talking points that we all get. 22 consecutive months of unprecedented economic growth and that we were hearing all these wonderful things about how great it was, it came to me I was the only guy on the stage who said, well, for most of the guys on this stage, it's doing real well. But I said for a lot of people in this country, it's not doing that great."

(Town Hall; Berlin, NH 12/15/07)

*Clip Available

On troop withdrawal from Iraq:

"… rule of war is whoever walks away from a battle, lost."

(Radio Interview; Littleton, NH 12/15/07)

On a national service program:

"And there's just a real need for us to do two things. One, is to raise a whole generation who have some skin in the game when it comes to America. And the other is to give them an opportunity to advance their capacity to live the American dream."

(Town Hall; Littleton, NH 12/15/07)

*Clip Available

On Abortion:

"I'm a staunch believer in the sanctity of life, and I'm gonna explain why. I believe nothing gets closer to the heart of what our founding fathers understood than that every person has intrinsic value and worth that is worth protecting."

(Town Hall; Berlin, NH 12/15/07)

*Clip Available

On immigration and the 14th Amendment:

"Okay, the concept of the anchor baby, right? Right. I think there's a lot of, um, merit to saying that just physical birth if a person isn't here legally is not automatically citizenship. That's one of those things where we really need to take another look at the 14th amendment, is that what it says. Of course it's said that it does, so it would require court action to change that."

(Town Hall; Littleton, NH 12/15/07)

*Clip Available

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Event Details:

- Thompson held 10 events in IA and one event in TN 12/13-12/19.
- At the kick off event for his Iowa bus tour, Thompson spoke for approximately 10 minutes, took no questions and left in a hurry. The event boasted one of the largest crowds we've seen to this point for a Thompson event, 100, which in comparison to the other candidates, is unimpressive.
- In his Iowa bus tour this week, Thompson held three or four events where he drove his campaign bus into town, parked it and sat inside. Every now and again he would come out, shake a hand or two, but then go back in the bus. Such occurrences were billed as actual campaign events.
- A recent article in the Politico sums up Thompson's campaign best:

> "She e-mailed me back that Thompson "was so vague that I would be hard-pressed to write a story. Simply put, there is no news peg other than he came to the newsroom with his model wife and a beehive of staffers. When I asked him specifically what he would do as prez for farmers in Bremer County, he resorted to glittering generalities."
>
> So the sum total of Thompson's day in Waverly was meeting with a newspaper editor and saying nothing and then meeting about 15 people in a warm firehouse and saying nothing.
>
> When he was supposed to go out and find voters in shops and diners, talk to them and answer their questions, he decided to skip it and get back on his luxury bus instead.
>
> That's not retail politics. That's not Iowa. And that's not laconic. That's lazy."
>
> http://www.politico.com/news/stories/1207/7474.html

On the Democratic Party:

"…my friends, the main reason I'm standing here before you today is because those fundamental principles are under attack in this country. They're under assault. They're under assault from a left-wing, big government, high taxing, weak on national security, Democratic Party that's just licking its chops to take over the reins of government so they can lead us down the road to a welfare state. But there are some things standing in their ways my friends, and a lot of them are standing in this room tonight. We're not gonna turn to keys this country over to that outfit. Not as long aas we have anything to say about it. And on January the third, the people of Iowa are gonna answer an important question: Who do we want to stand for us against this assault? Who do we want to lead us in preserving our value and our principles. Now, It's a little late in the process for me to be coy. So I want to tell you, that I believe I am that man and with your help I will be that man."

(Bus Tour Kick Off; Dubuque, IA 12/17/07)

*Clip Available

On Terrorism:

"We're electing a leader. We're electing a leader for a time that is gonna need serious leadership. My friends, I've been there, I can tell you, that we are just one successful terrorist plan away from a nuclear attack in this country. All the experts know that, that's the kinda of world we live in. It's not the time for on-the-job training."

(Bus Tour Kick Off; Dubuque, IA 12/17/07)

*Clip Available

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On his record:

"When I left public service, I still continued public service in a private matter. Now although, I had a little television show called Law & Order, some of ya'll might of seen it, it got a little more publicity then some of the other stuff I've done. But the fact of the matter is while that was going on, some important things happened to me because it gave me a chance to continue my public service in a very quiet way. When Condoleeza Rice, Secretary of State, needed someone to advise her on matters of international security, she called me, its a public record. When the President of the United States wanted to help get a good solid conservative judge on the Supreme Court, now he's chief justice on the Supreme Court, he called me, he called me.

My record is clear. My experience is clear. And that's why I asked folks, the other night at the debate, after it's all said and done, think about one thing. If you're gonna think about just one thing, think about this. When the time comes where our worst enemy in the world is sitting across the table, thinking about what he can do to the United States of America, what he can get away with, who do you want sitting on the other side of the table representing us looking back across the table at him."

(Bus Tour Kick Off; Dubuque, IA 12/17/07)

*Clip Available

Event Details:

- McCain held two events in IA, two events in MA, 16 events in NH, one event in NY and five events in SC 12/13-12/19.
- A few anti-war protesters greeted McCain at events in SC.
- On 12/17 at an event in NH, Sen. Joe Lieberman publicly endorsed McCain.

Link to video of endorsement: http://youtube.com/watch?v=_nd_FczO-FM

- McCain launched a direct mail attack on Romney this week. Our trackers in NH have acquired the piece.

McCain launches direct mail attack (Nashua Telegraph, 12/18/07)

CONCORD – Republican hopeful Sen. John McCain, of Arizona, launched an attack – a direct mail campaign labeling New Hampshire primary front-runner Mitt Romney as a serial flip-flopper that "voters can't trust."

http://www.nashuatelegraph.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071218/NEWS08/78615490/-1/news08

On health care:

"My whole philosophy is that we've got to put more decisions in the hands of the user, we've got to have a whole range of actions taken in order bring inflation down and among them are to give every American family 5000 dollar refundable tax credit so they can go across state lines which they cant now, to find an insurance policy of their choice…"

(Town Hall; Davenport, IA 12/13/07)

*Clip Available

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"My friends, there's never been a system in history that when the government paid for it, it wasn't more expensive than when the private enterprise system did it. So please don't listen to this siren song of let government take it over and it'll be cheaper. My friends, the cost will be much higher, but it'll just be coming out of a different pocket."

(Town Hall; Salem, NH 12/18/07)

On SCHIP:

"First of all, SCHIP, I'm not, like I said, these things, sometimes I have to tell you things you don't want to hear as well as those that you want to hear. Um… The SCHIP program was designed to provide children with health insurance. We did that pretty well. There's still 8 million children that are not covered. 6 million of those are simply because we haven't signed them up. It's not a problem, we've simply got to find them and sign them up. We've got 2 million that we're going to have to expand the program to cover, and that would cost about 3 to 5 billion dollars. So what do they want to do in Washington? They want to expand it by 35 billion dollars. And they want it to encompass adults, and they want it to encompass the, uh, 300 people, 300 percent of the poverty line."

(Town Hall; Concord, NH 12/17/07)

*Clip Available

On 'mission accomplished':

"I understand the frustration, the anger, and the sorrow that people in this state and all over America feel because of nearly four years of 'mission accomplished,' 'last throes,' uh, 'few dead-enders,' these things that defied reality. And I was angry about it, and I remain angry about it."

(Town Hall; Concord, NH 12/17/07)

*Clip Available

FLIP FLOP

Senator McCain was asked "At what point will America be able to say the war was won?"

McCain said there were oil fields to secure and "die-hards" to take care of but "it's clear that the end is very much in sight, and today I think Americans should be very proud of their leadership, their technology. There are still some foreigners, Syrians and others hanging around. But it won't be long. It will be a fairly short period of time, but this happens in wars. I'm confident that once they are confident the area is no longer a threat to the Marines and to or army troops that they'll start imposing discipline. In the meantime, we'll have a short period of chaos." [ABC News, Good Morning America, 4/9/03]

"This is a mission accomplished. They know how much influence Saddam Hussein had on the Iraqi people, how much more difficult it made to get their cooperation." [This Week, ABC, 12/14/03]

On troop withdrawal:

"I would pull out troops as the situation warrants it on the ground … I will stay as long as necessary."

(Town Hall; James Island, SC 12/14/07)

*Clip Available

"My timetable for Iraq is not distinct. My, my, my, my view of Iraq and success in Iraq is what we are achieving now. It's not American presence in Iraq that matters. What matters in Iraq is American casualties."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(Town Hall; Salem, NH 12/18/07)

*Clip Available

On the sacrifices of our soliders:

"Lindsey and I were over in Iraq over Thanksgiving. And we had a great opportunity to spend Thanksgiving dinner with a number of the troops. And they're so good and they're so brave and they're so professional that you're very humbled to be in their company. A lot of 'em are South Carolinians and a lot of 'em come over and say, 'Hi' to their senator and tell them [sic] that they appreciate the fact that their senator is working to keep them on the path to success that they have embarked on with great sacrifice. I have no doubt, I have no doubt that when you look at the beginning of this surge the casualties went up because we had to go into places we had not been in for a number of years. And this success has been purchased with America's most precious asset, and that's American blood that's been sacrificed."

(Meet and Greet; Newberry, SC 12/15/07)

*Clip Available

On Terrorism:

"I think we are fighting an enemy called radical Islamic extremism, who are willing to cut off the head of someone and televise it and broadcast it, because they happen to be Jewish and an American."

(Town Hall; Greer, SC 12/15/07)

*Clip Available

On Iran:

"I don't know where the intelligence came from… I have detected no change in the Iranian behavior. They are still dedicated to the destruction of the state of Israel. They are still supporting terrorist organizations, Hamas and Hezbollah. They are still exporting explosive devices, the most lethal kind, into Iraq and killing young Americans… I've changed very little in my view that the Iranians still pose a threat to peace in the Middle East and in the world."

(Town Hall; James Island, SC 12/14/07)

*Clip Available

On Putin and Russia:

"We all knew it's a puppet show, we just didn't know who the puppet was... He's insuring his perpetuation in power… I looked into Mr. Putin's eyes and I saw three letters, a "K," a "G" and a "B." If I were the President of the United States, I would make sure that he wasn't invited to the next G-8 meeting. I would make it very clear that he's using all these petro-dollars to stick his thumb in America's eye."

(Town Hall; James Island, SC 12/14/07)

*Clip Available

On President Bush:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"… after 9/11, every expert in the world believed there was going to be another attack on the United States of America. There hasn't been. Don't you think that President Bush deserves some credit for that?... Let's give the president some credit."

(Town Hall; Greer, SC 12/15/07)

*Clip Available

On Pelosi and Reid:

"… it's beneath their dignity for them to call the war lost, as Harry Reid did back in April. I think it's beneath their dignity to call for the cutting of the funds for a mission that is succeeding and has (inaudible) consequences for the future of America."

(Town Hall; Greer, SC 12/15/07)

*Clip Available

On immigration:

"My, my, my, uh, plan to deal with illegal immigration is that we have to secure the border first. My friends, there's no trust or confidence in Washington, and so when we said we'd secure the border, have a temporary worker program, and address the issue of 12 million people who are in this country illegally, they didn't believe us. And there's some legitimacy to that skepticism. I'm sure you may, many remember that in 1986 we passed a law where we said we gave amnesty to a couple million people, and we'd secure the borders. We gave the amnesty, the borders aren't secure, and we now have 12 million people here, who are here illegally. We have to secure the borders first, that's the message that we got from this last debate. I will secure the borders first, I know how to do it."

(Town Hall; Hillsborough, NH 12/17/07)

*Clip Available

On earmarks and pork:

"I have never asked for, nor received an earmark or pork barrel project for the state of Arizona in the 24 years I have been there. And I guarantee ya' I never will."

(House Party; Concord, NH 12/17/07)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Gene Karpinski, LCV Action Fund" <feedback@lcv.org>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 10/29/2010 4:56:22 AM
Subject: Deadline: Midnight tonight!

LCV ACTION FUND

Dear John,

There are only four days until Election Day.

With the latest polls showing many environmental leaders facing extremely competitive races -- every phone call we make, every door we knock on, and every contribution we RUSH to candidates – will make the difference between winning and losing on Tuesday.

Click here to RUSH your last-minute contribution to LCV Action Fund's endorsed candidates via GiveGreen>>

There's Still Time to Have an Impact

Help LCV Action Fund put Senator Boxer, Senator Bennet, Rep. Sestak, Rep. Perriello, and others over the top on Election Day.

RUSH Your Donation to them via GiveGreen>>

We set a goal this year of raising $1 million for priority environmental candidates, an amount FAR more than we had ever raised before. Some folks thought that was far too ambitious, but with your help we are only $18,744 from reaching that goal. Help put us over the top and support top priority candidates in these closing days. There's still time to have a major impact on their races and your support can do it, but we need your donation BEFORE MIDNIGHT TONIGHT. Here are four of our top priorities:

Sen. Barbara Boxer: At the top of our list of environmental leaders is California Senator Barbara Boxer. As Senate Environment and Public Works Committee Chair, Barbara Boxer is a long-time environmental champion. The latest polls show her race within the margin of error and we expect it to remain close. Her opponent, failed Hewlett Packard CEO Carly Fiorina, vigorously supports California's Prop 23– the ballot initiative that threatens to repeal California's landmark clean energy and climate law. In fact, Fiorina received $285,000 in contributions from the same Big Oil companies behind Prop 23. Independent groups just dumped another $3 million into the race earlier this week and Fiorina just added a million of her own money to her campaign.

Please RUSH Your Donation to Senator Barbara Boxer via GiveGreen>>

Rep. Joe Sestak: Rep. Joe Sestak is running a neck-and-neck race for US Senate in Pennsylvania against former Club for Growth President and ex. Rep. Pat Toomey. The Reuters/Ipsos poll from October 24th shows that this race is TIED. Rep. Sestak needs our immediate help. Rep. Sestak is an environmental leader who voted for the House-passed American Clean Energy and Security Act. On the other hand, we can expect wave after wave of attacks against the EPA and sound environmental policies if Rep. Pat Toomey is elected to the Senate on Tuesday.

Please RUSH Your Donation to Rep. Joe Sestak via GiveGreen>>

Sen. Michael Bennet: Politico rates the Colorado Senate race as one of the closest Senate races in the country. Senator Michael Bennet -- an environmental champion who consistently supports measures to build a clean energy economy -- is running against Tea Party-endorsed, climate denier, Ken Buck. The CNN/Time poll from this past Tuesday showed Ken Buck up by just one point. More third party money has poured into this Senate race than any other in the country -- most of it used to attack Senator Bennet. LCV Action Fund is putting more money into this Senate race than any other, so please help put him over the top on November 2.

Please RUSH Your Donation to Senator Bennet via GiveGreen>>

Rep. Tom Perriello: One of the closest House races in the country is unfolding in central Virginia's 5th Congressional District. Rep. Tom Perriello -- who won his first race by only 727 votes -- is running an extremely competitive race against Virginia State Senator Robert Hurt. State Senator Hurt has deep ties to the uranium industry and is willing to protect the uranium industry's profits at the expense of public health. LCV Action Fund is putting more money into this House race than any other in the country, so please help put him over the top on November 2.

Please RUSH Your Donation to Rep. Tom Perriello via GiveGreen>>

During these final days of the 2010 election, your contributions to candidates through LCV Action Fund's GiveGreen program helps increase our collective environmental strength in Congress by demonstrating your support for clean energy and the environment.

Sincerely,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Gene Karpinski
President
LCV Action Fund

PS Please RUSH your donation to GiveGreen candidates right now. Help top priority candidates and LCV Action Fund meet our $1 million goal.

Paid for by the League of Conservation Voters Action Fund, www.lcv.org , and not authorized by any candidate or committee.

Privacy Policy
To review our Privacy Policy, click here .

To Unsubscribe Click Here

POWERED BY blackbaud nonprofit software

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Tony Podesta" <podesta@podesta.com>
To:	"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date:	7/28/2015 11:08:36 AM
Subject:	Fwd: News from The Hill: Dems clash with Kerry over Iran deal

See you in September

Sent from my iPhone

Begin forwarded message:

From: The Hill <news@thehill.com >
Date: July 28, 2015 at 7:55:09 PM GMT+2
To: podesta@podesta.com
Subject: News from The Hill: Dems clash with Kerry over Iran deal
Reply-To: news@thehill.com

THE HILL

News from The Hill

Dems clash with Kerry over Iran deal

By Kristina Wong

Democrats on the House Foreign Affairs Committee joined with Republicans in pushing back on the Iran nuclear deal Tuesday as Secretary of State John Kerry faced the panel.

Committee Ranking Member Eliot Engel (D-N.Y.) said he was "troubled by" and "very disappointed" with parts of the agreement, citing a litany of concerns.

"Truth is, after 15 years, Iran is a nuclear threshold state, which means they can produce weapons-grade, highly-enriched uranium without limitations," he said. "Our friends in Israel are rightfully concerned."

Read the full story here.

Not signed up to receive our newsletters? Click here to join our list and get our daily emails in your inbox, too.

For all the latest news:
Visit TheHill.com
Follow @TheHill on Twitter
Like The Hill on Facebook
Connect with The Hill on Google+

THE HILL PRESENTS... CYBER SECURITY Sign up now to receive The Hill's newest, free newsletter. SIGN UP

SafeUnsubscribe
This email was sent to podesta@podesta.com by news@thehill.com |
Update Profile/Email Address | Rapid removal with SafeUnsubscribe ™ | Privacy Policy .

The Hill | 1625 K St. NW | Washington | DC | 20006

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "The Washington Post" <email@e.washingtonpost.com>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 11/15/2015 2:53:32 AM
Subject: The Daily 202: A defensive Hillar y Clinton lost last night's debate

View The Daily 202 on the Web

PowerPost

The Daily 202

Morning intelligence for leaders

Share on Twitter Share on Facebook

A defensive Hillary Clinton lost last night's debate

Hillary Clinton on stage at Drake University Saturday night. (AFP/Mandel Ngan)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BY JAMES HOHMANN

THE BIG IDEA:

— Bernie Sanders' campaign expressed concern before Saturday night's debate about CBS' decision to put additional emphasis on foreign policy in the wake of the Paris attacks that left 129 dead.

Many expected that Hillary Rodham Clinton would show a command of global issues that the senator from Vermont lacked, further consolidating her status as the frontrunner for the Democratic nomination.

Clinton indeed highlighted her experience, but the shift wound up working to Sanders' advantage. For the first 30 minutes of the two-hour debate, the former Secretary of State was on the defensive about everything from the Obama administration being caught off guard by the rise of the Islamic State to her 13-year-old vote for the Iraq war.

"Regime changes have unintended consequences," Sanders said. "On this issue, I'm a little more conservative than the secretary."

— It was a taste of the debate as a whole, which turned to a far greater extent than the previous meeting on Clinton's record and positions. With only three candidates on stage, Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley also got more time to speak. In Las Vegas, the candidates were unprepared to attack Clinton on foreign policy. No one even challenged her when she characterized Libya as a success story. This time it was Clinton who had to explain why removing Muammar Gaddafi was justified.

— With the world on fire, and rising fears about terrorism at home, Clinton quickly distanced herself from President Obama at the top. The day before the Paris attacks, he told ABC that ISIS has not been completely decapitated but that U.S. efforts had "contained" the group. "I don't think they're gaining strength … and we have contained them," the president told George Stephanopoulos. In a not-subtle line, Hillary declared: "We have to look at ISIS as the leading threat of an international terror network. It cannot be contained; it must be defeated." She also referred to her early support for arming moderate rebels in the Syrian civil war, which the president hesitated on.

To be sure, Sanders did not look like a commander-in-chief. And his insistence that climate change is still our biggest national security threat made him look out of his depth and unserious in the face of global terrorism. But very few Democrats still believe that someone besides Clinton will actually be their nominee, so there's less concern about him actually having the nuclear launch codes. Instead, all eyes were on her.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When the debate moved to the domestic issues on which Sanders is more comfortable, the event became more spirited. The most heated fight of the night came over reforming Wall Street. Sanders said Clinton's Wall Street proposal was "not good enough," and O'Malley called it "weak tea."

Then-New York Sen. Hillary Clinton visits the site of the World Trade Center wreckage in 2001 with Rudy Giuliani. (File photo)

— The Des Moines debate will ultimately be remembered for just one moment: Clinton playing both the gender card and invoking the Sept. 11 attacks to defend her coziness with and campaign cash from Wall Street.

Here is the exchange that everyone is talking about:

- Sanders attacks: "Let's not be naive about it. Why, over her political career, has Wall Street been a major, THE major, campaign contributor to Hillary Clinton? You know,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

maybe they're dumb and they don't know what they're going to get, but I don't think so. … Why do they make millions of dollars of campaign contributions? They expect to get something! Everybody knows that!"

- Clinton pulls out a rhetorical bazooka: "Wait a minute, he has basically used his answer to impugn my integrity. Let's be frank here: … Not only do I have hundreds of thousands of donors, most of them small. And I'm very proud that for the first time a majority of my donors are women, 60 percent. So, I represented New York, and I represented New York on 9/11 when we were attacked. Where were we attacked? We were attacked in downtown Manhattan, where Wall Street is. I did spend a whole lot of time and effort helping them rebuild. That was good for New York. It was good for the economy and it was a way to rebuke the terrorists who had attacked our country."

— Many liberal thought leaders concurred that Clinton's answer was Giuliani-esque:

- Slate's headline: "Hillary Says It's OK That She Takes Wall Street Money Because Of Women and 9/11."
- Mother Jones names it "the most important exchange of the debate."
- The Nation is struck by its "breathtaking cynicism." From D.D. Guttenplan: "Though there was a breathtaking cynicism in the way Clinton took a question about Wall Street's influence on her and turned it into a trifecta of righteousness—not only claiming that her efforts on behalf of finance capital were really part of the fight back against 9/11, and suggesting that any suggestion to the contrary was anti–New York and pro-terrorist … there was also something almost beautiful about the sheer chutzpah of the move. It was one of several moments in the debate when Clinton seemed to be navigating in 3D while her opponents remained trapped in Flatland."
- The Atlantic's Conor Friedersdorf describes the exchange as "the major gaffe of the night": "The wild card in this debate was its proximity to the Paris attacks. Many believed this would play to Clinton's strengths. But in the end I think that it hurt her because the effect was to have a long discussion about her Iraq War vote … Her overall performance was fine, but what was she thinking using 9/11 to defend all the money that she's taken from Wall Street? I expect it will be used to attack her in primaries and in the general if she gets there."

— The kerfuffle is breaking through to voters: Twitter and Facebook both say that the 9/11 moment generated more conversation than any other exchange during the face-off. NPR calculates that Wall Street and the banks got more time than any other issue. By its count, the back-and-forth took up 11 minutes and 18 seconds of airtime, compared to 9 minutes and 16 seconds on foreign policy and 6 minutes on ISIS specifically.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

— The 9/11-related clips that posted overnight are brutal, and it seems certain that the mainstream media and cable news will zero in with second-day follow-ups.

- Politico's Glenn Thrush describes Clinton's answer as "really cray-cray" and believes it "will haunt" her. The longtime Clinton watcher described the 9/11 exchange as "one of the craziest things she's uttered in public during this campaign or any other." In his takeaways piece, Glenn calls the gender part of the comment "clever" but says the rest of the answer went off the rails: "Needless to say, the remark – delivered in her emphatic shout-voice — raised eyebrows 24 hours after the terror attacks in Paris killed more than 120 people. And it's not likely to go away."
- The Economist calls the tussle "the low point" of the night: "It was so odd, and so shameless…"
- One of CNN's main takeaways was that it "could really come back to bite her." David Axelrod, Obama's strategist in the 2008 primaries, said it was "her one really false note. That was an example of her being too political." He elaborated on Twitter: "[She] seems trapped between being candidate and a responsible potential president. Solid answers. Not necessarily winning ones."
- The Des Moines Register spun out a sidebar on the exchange. So did the Wall Street Journal, describing the comment as an "unusual defense."
- The Fix's Chris Cillizza said it is "hard to overstate how little sense Clinton's … argument makes."
- Washington Post fact checkers also note that just 17 percent of Clinton's donors meet the definition of small (those contributing under $200): "More than 80 percent of her donations come from big donors, compared to just 22 percent for Sanders."
- Post editorial columnist Alexandra Petri's headline: "Under attack, Hillary Clinton PLAYS EVERY POSSIBLE CARD."

— A taste of how rivals are already trying to capitalize:

- O'Malley senior adviser Lis Smith: "My dad worked in [the World Trade Center] from the day it was built to the day it went down. @HillaryClinton, never invoke 9/11 to justify your Wall St. positions."
- RNC Chairman Reince Priebus: @HillaryClinton, you reached a new low tonight by using 9/11 to defend your campaign donations."

— Clinton tried to walk it back: Later in the debate, as Twitter exploded, CBS presented her with an emblematic viewer tweet. University of Iowa law professor Andy Grewal wrote: “Have never seen a candidate invoke 9/11 to justify millions of Wall Street donations. Until now.” Clinton replied, “I’m sorry that whoever tweeted that had that impression … Yes, I did know people. I had a lot of folks give me donations from all kinds of backgrounds [and] say, ‘I don’t agree with you on everything. But I like what you do. I like how you stand up.’”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the spin room, her communications director highlighted a tough-on-Wall Street speech from before the financial meltdown. Clinton argued that her financial regulatory proposal “is tougher, more effective, and more comprehensive” than Sanders’ “because I go after all of Wall Street not just the big banks.”

Bernie Sanders (AP/Charlie Neibergall)

— Demonstrating the passion and enthusiasm of his supporters, Sanders also received more buzz and mentions than she she did. According to our analytics partners at Zignal Labs, Sanders accounted for 202,000 of the 370,000 mentions of the candidates during the debate, compared to 152,000 for Clinton. Facebook also said Sanders got more mentions than Clinton on its platform, and Vermont was the most engaged state on the social network during the debate. Here’s a chart tracking mentions over the two hours:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

— To be sure, many observers point out that very few people were watching last night and the race's underlying dynamics still remain the same. The Post's Dan Balz and Philip Rucker write on our front page that the result "appeared unlikely to change the overall shape of a nomination battle that has moved back in Clinton's direction in recent weeks."

Other themes in the post-debate coverage:

- The New York Times' Amy Chozick and Jonathan Martin argue that Clinton was looking "beyond the primary" and trying "to improve her standing among general election voters:" "In calling out Mr. Sanders for what she said are impractical proposals, Mrs. Clinton reiterated the sentiment, if not the exact phrasing, of a refrain that resonated in the first debate: 'I'm a progressive who likes to get things done.'
- The Boston Globe's Annie Linskey says "Clinton seemed to embrace her age": "I come from the sixties,' she said. Later, when talking about her approach to health care reform, she sounded a bit resigned. "I waited for revolution," she said. "Revolution never came."
- Bloomberg's Mark Halperin : "After several weeks on a roll, Clinton not so much moved backwards as she let Sanders, and even O'Malley, back in the hunt."

— Looking ahead, Clinton understands that the Democratic race has, once again, become a referendum on her. "You've heard a lot about me in this debate," she said in her closing statement. "I'm going to keep talking and thinking about all of you."

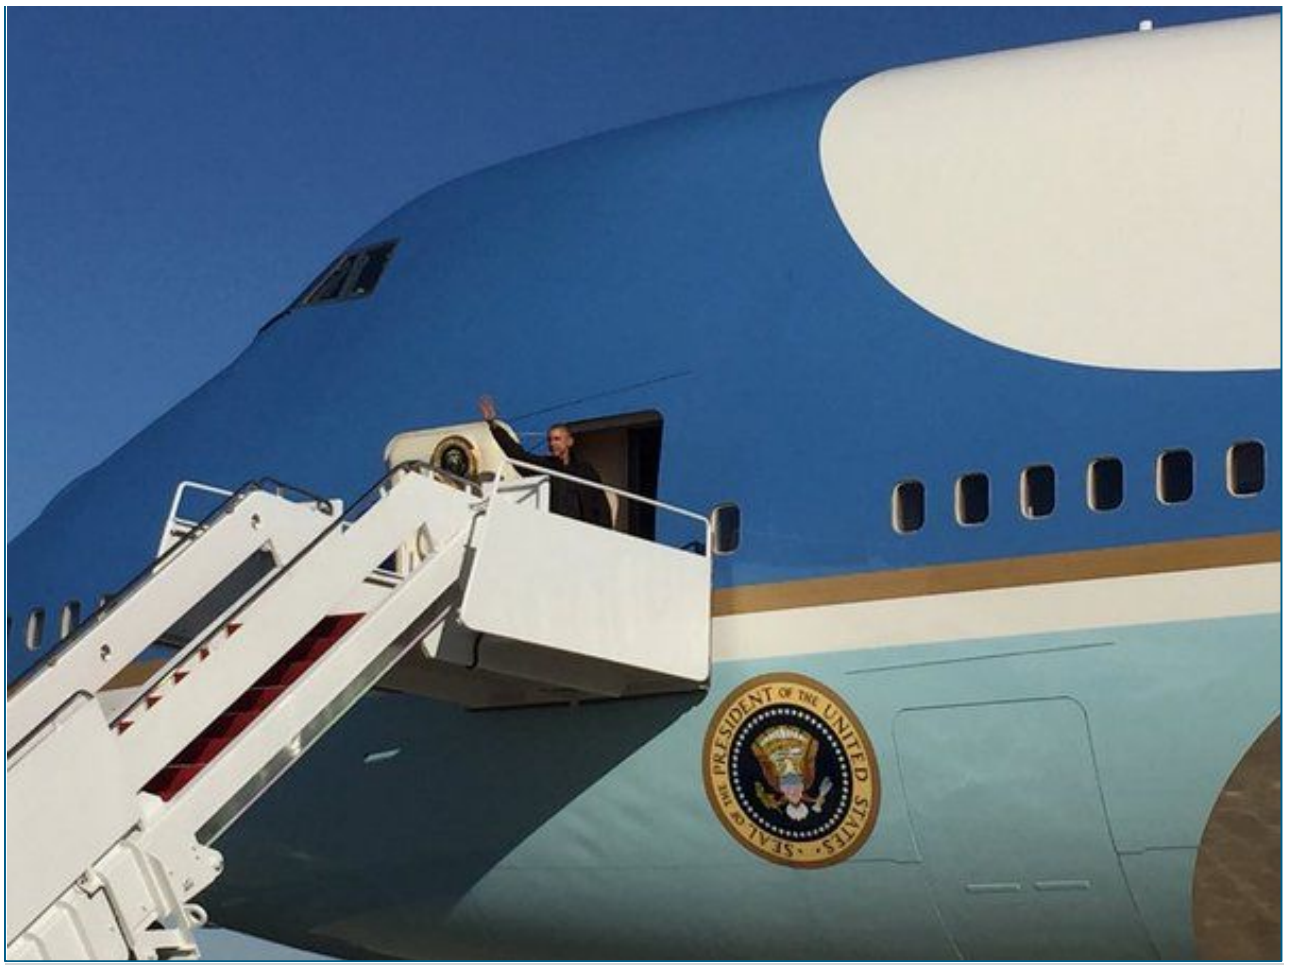
This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

— The next two Democratic debates are also scheduled for weekends when very few will watch: the Saturday before Christmas and the Sunday before MLK Day. The DNC denies it, naturally, but this was an obvious ploy to minimize viewership in order to help out the front-runner. After the first debate, suppressing viewership seemed unnecessary. After last night, it makes much more sense.

A rose placed in a bullet hole in a restaurant window the day after a series of attacks in Paris. The note reads: “In the Name of What?” (Reuters/Pascal Rossignol)

— THE LATEST FROM PARIS:

French police says the Friday evening attacks were carried out by three teams. Police have detained seven relatives of one of the assailants who was killed, Omar Ismail Mostefai, a 29-year old French national. Of Algerian descent, Mostefai was arrested between 2004 and 2010 for minor things like driving without a license. But in 2010, French police started watching him because of his ties to a mosque outside Paris. “The aim is to figure out what led this man to become a suicide bomber,” a French official told The Post’s Anthony Faiola and Souad Mekhennet.



This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A man pays his respect outside the Le Carillon restaurant the morning after it was attacked (Reuters/Christian Hartman)

— French President Francois Hollande called the attacks, for which the Islamic State claimed responsibility, an “act of war” and vowed “merciless” retribution. He also declared a state of emergency in France.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

President Obama boarded Air Force One for a nine-day trip to Turkey, the Philippines and Malaysia. (@DavidNakamura) — From the G-20 summit in Turkey , President Obama said: "The skies have been darkened by the horrific attacks that took place in Paris," and vowed that the U.S. will stand in "solidarity" with France "in hunting down the perpetrators of this crime and bringing them to justice." Interestingly , Obama has begun using the word "Daesh" to refer to ISIS, a derogatory phrase that can mean "bigot" for which the Islamic State has threatened to "cut out the tongues" of anyone using it.

What else we know:

- A manhunt is underway across Europe for a possible eighth suspect who may have fled, per Anthony Faiola .
- At least 99 of the 352 injured remained in serious condition.
- A French official confirmed one of the attackers had a Syrian passport, which he used to enter Europe in October in the refugee exodus from the Middle East.
- At least two of the seven dead attackers are thought to be Belgian, including an 18-year-old who fought in Syria.
- Three Kalashnikovs were found inside a car that was used, per the AP .
- The attackers wore suicide vests made with the "mother of Satan" explosive.
- The Eiffel Tower was shut down indefinitely: "Paris landmarks became ghost towns.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The government deployed 1,500 troops to safeguard key buildings. Schools, libraries, food markets, swimming pools and gymnasiums were closed."

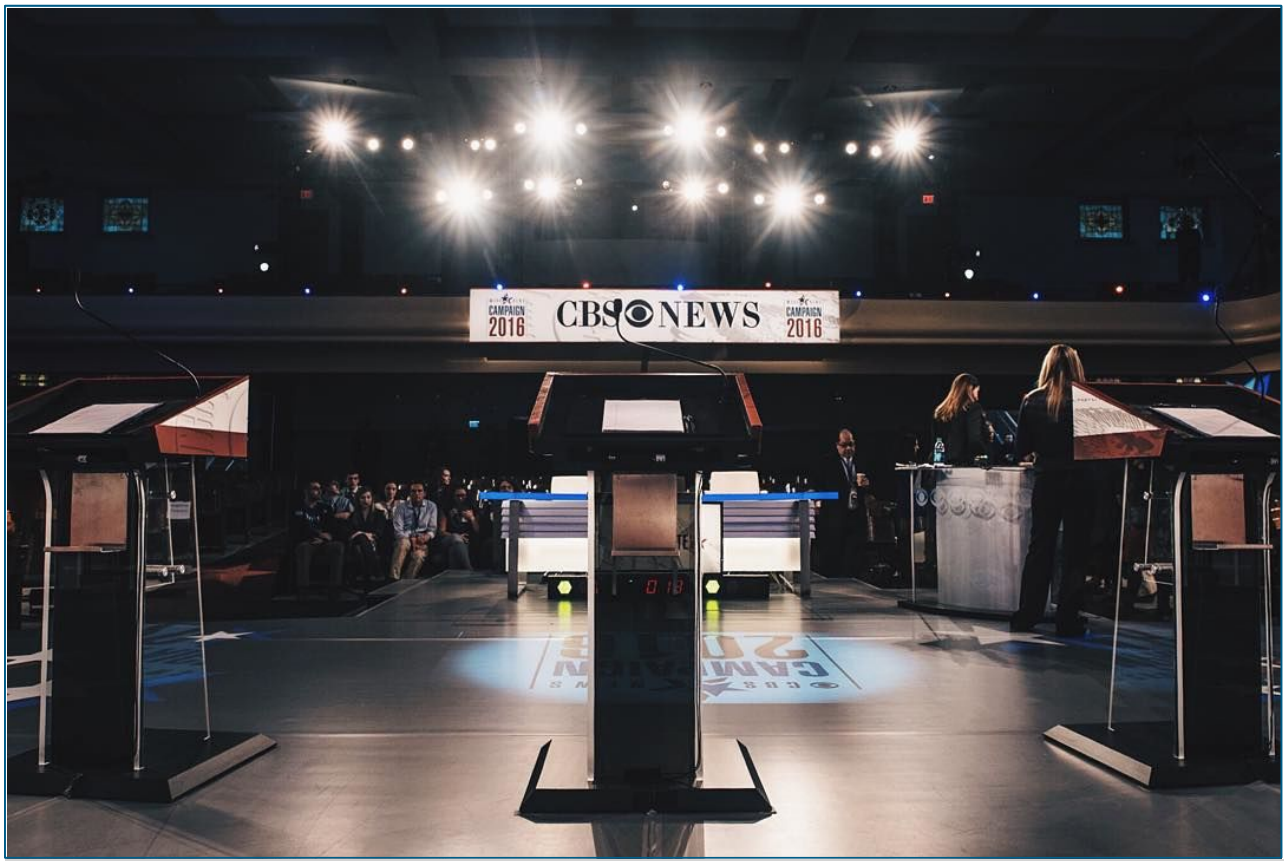
- Among the victims was 23-year-old American exchange student Nohemi Gonzalez , who was eating dinner at Le Petit Cambodge when attackers struck.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Nohemi Gonzalez, the 23-year-old Cal State University Long Beach student who died in the Paris terror attacks. (Courtesy of CSULB)

GET SMART FAST:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

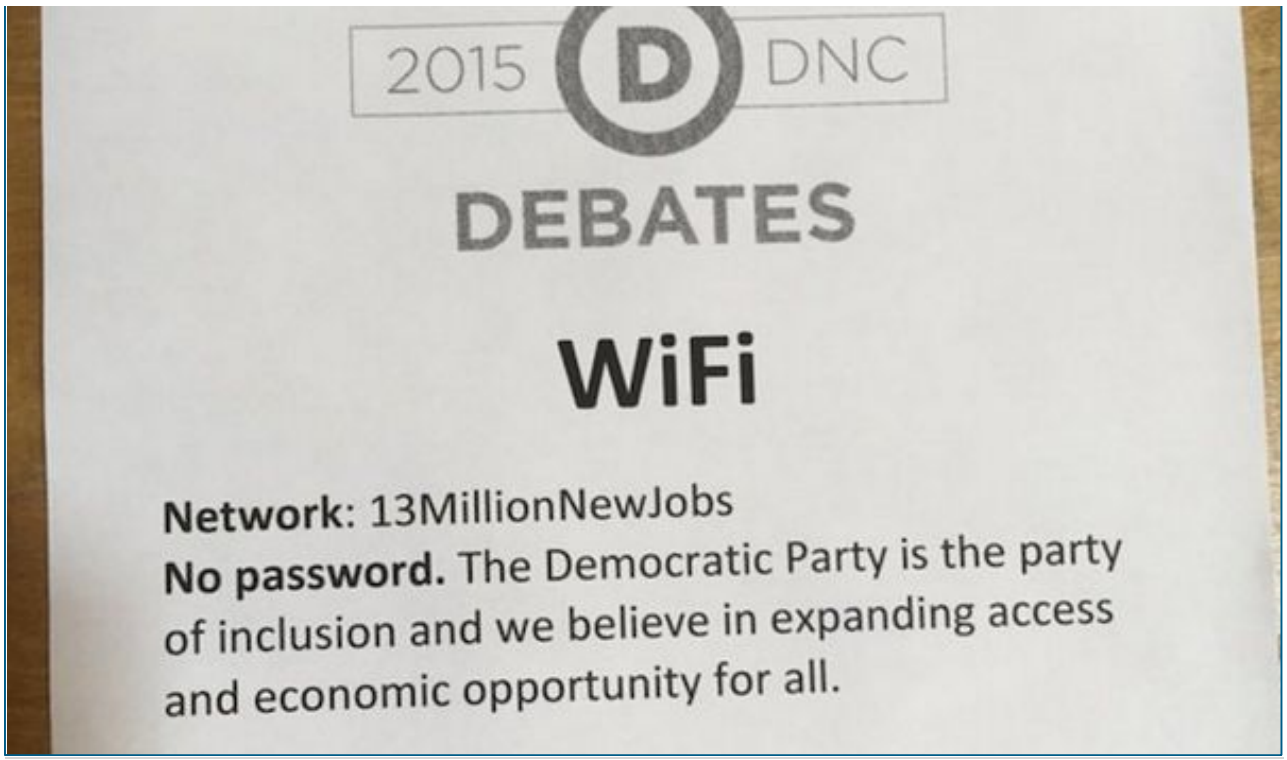


1. Baltimore had its 301st homicide last night, crossing a milestone not seen since the dark days of the crack epidemic.
2. A man who was attacking a woman with a knife was shot at Union Station last night by an off-duty cop from Maryland. “The knife-wielding man had refused to drop the weapon before being hit, along with a bystander, according to police sources,” per Clarence Williams and Martin Weil .
3. Lebanon detained seven Syrians and two Lebanese suspected of involvement in planning terrorist attacks, including a twin bombing last week, and smuggling extremists into the country, per the AP .

SOCIAL MEDIA SPEED READ

Curated by Elise Viebeck (@eliseviebeck)

From the Democratic debate:



Here’s a view from the stage at Drake University in Des Moines:

(hillaryclinton)

The Democrats trolled Republicans with the name of their Wi-Fi network:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@thehill)

Sanders and O'Malley bumped into each other earlier in the day:

(@boydenphoto)

O'Malley was trying to go for the Adlai Stevenson look in this pre-debate picture from the campaign:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

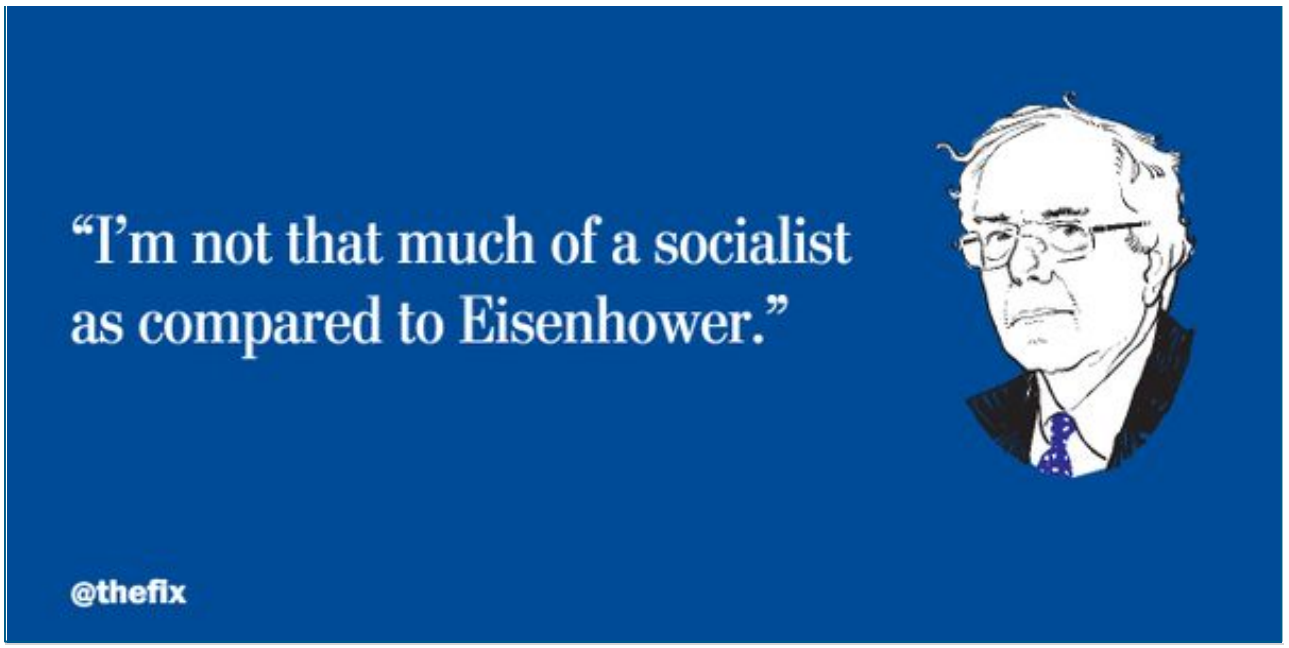
(@MartinOMalley)

DNC chair Debbie Wasserman Schultz met debate host Drake University's mascot, Griff:



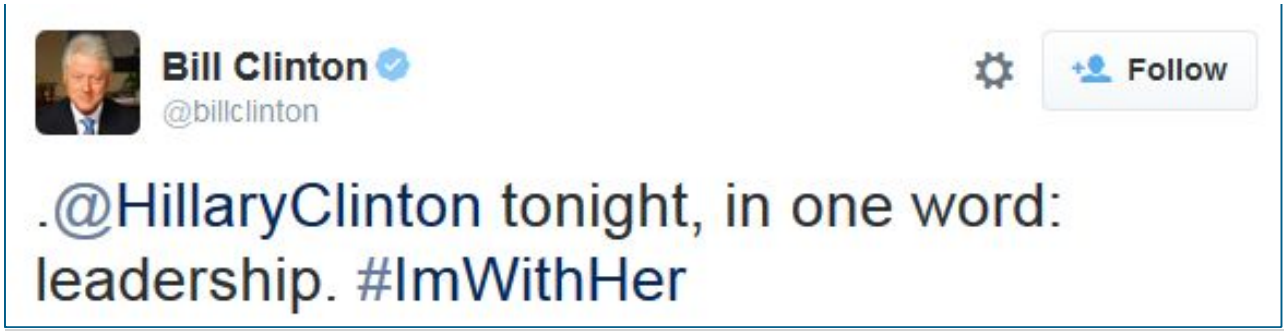
This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@DWStweets)

Sanders defended his proposal to increase taxes, noting that he'd raise the marginal tax rate to a level that's still lower than it was in the 1950's:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@TheFix)



At a Clinton debate watch party in New Hampshire, viewers were served milk and cookies:

(@McClainJulie)

Bill Clinton praised his wife’s performance:

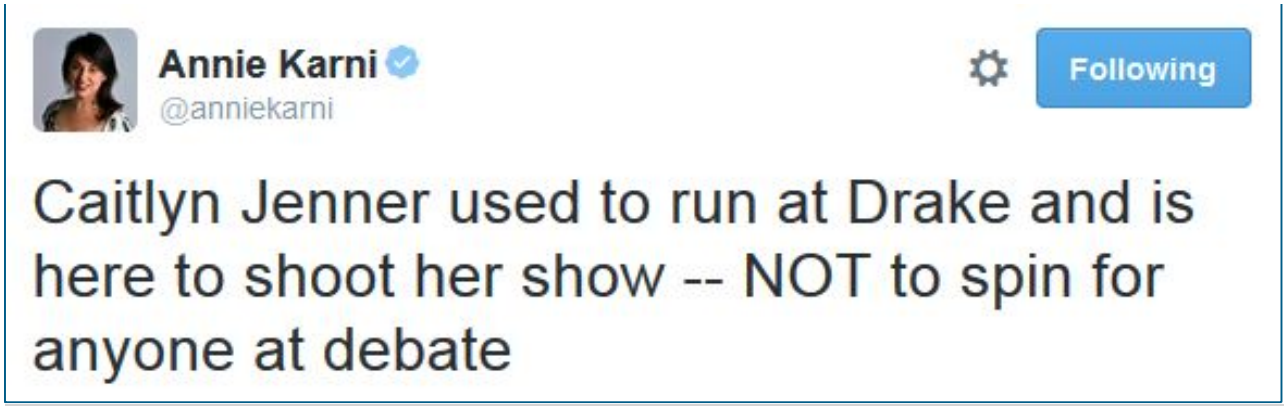
This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@billclinton)

Back at Drake, Student Body President Kevin Maisto took a photo with Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.):

(@kevinmaisto)

Reporters caught a glimpse of Caitlyn Jenner on campus:



This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@anniekarni)

But it turns out she wasn't there for the debate:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@anniekarni)

Following the Paris attacks:

Many lawmakers and staff switched their profile pictures to this image in honor of the tragic events of Friday night:

(senatorkirk)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Across the world, major monuments were lit up to honor France. Here's the Brandenburg Gate in Berlin:

(@bennyjohnson)

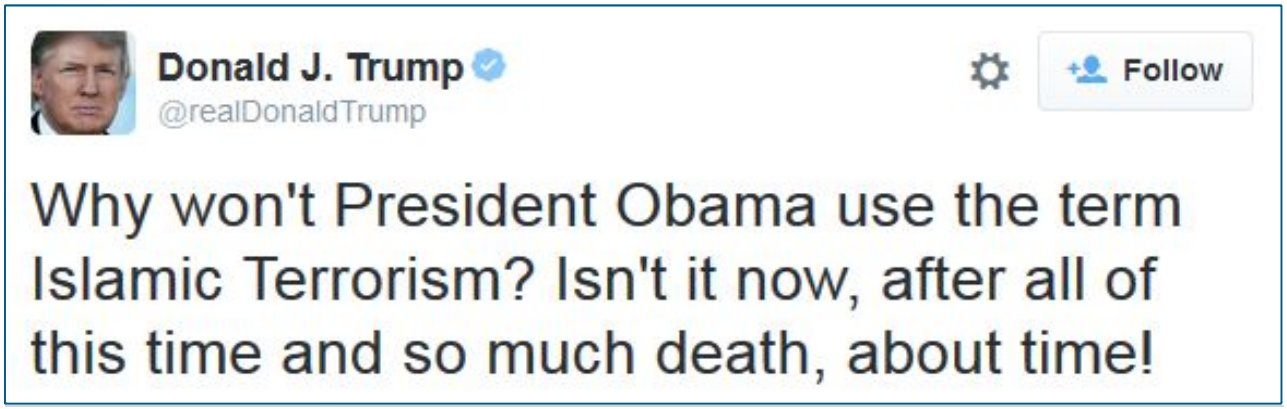
The Nationals posted this image to Instagram:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(nationals)

Republican reaction to the Paris attacks:

(@RealBenCarson)



Marco Rubio released a video saying that the U.S. is in a “clash of civilizations” with radical Islam:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(Marco Rubio)

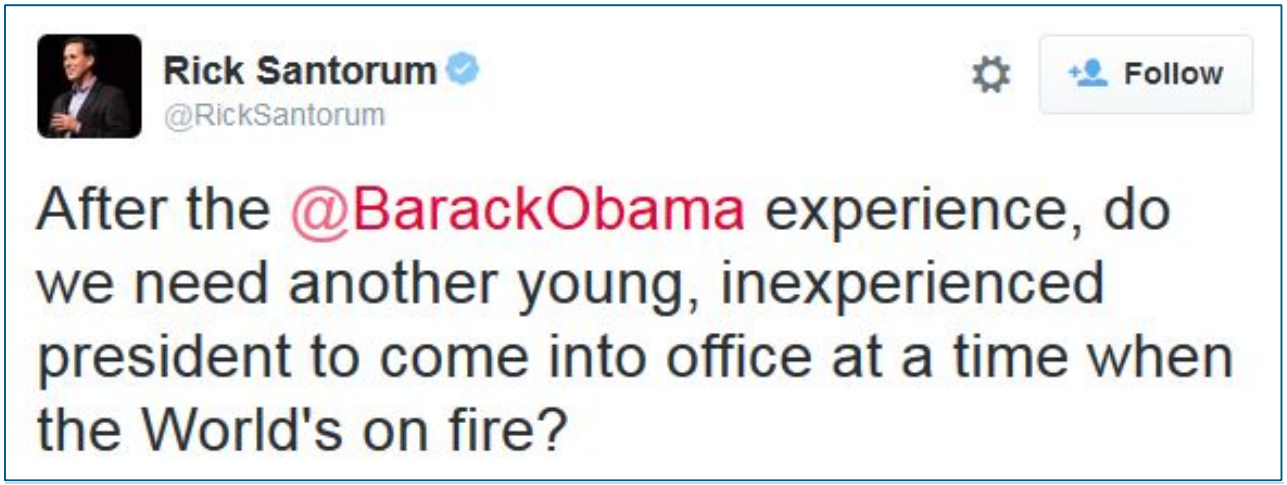
Trump, like many other Republicans, critiqued how Democrats described the perpetrators of the attacks. He also said that tough gun control laws in Paris contributed to the tragedy during a rally in Texas:

(@realDonaldTrump)

In a radio interview, Jeb Bush called the attacks an “organized effort to destroy western civilization”:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(Jeb Bush Communications)



Scott Walker lit up the Wisconsin governor's mansion in response:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@ScottWalker)

Rick Santorum made a veiled attack on younger Republican presidential candidates:

(@ricksantorum)

VIDEOS OF THE DAY:

For Saturday Night Live's cold open, Cecily Strong delivered a touching tribute to the victims in France. "Paris is the City of Light, and here in New York City, we know that light will never go out," she said, first in English and then in French. Watch here .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Here are highlights from the Democratic debate, via The Post's video team:

–Democrats react to the Paris attack

–Democrats spar on Iraq, Islamic state

–Sanders says he's "not that much of a socialist compared to Eisenhower"

–O'Malley calls for bringing immigrants out of the shadows

–Sanders, Clinton clash over minimum wage

You are receiving this e-mail because you signed up for the The Daily 202 newsletter or were registered on washingtonpost.com or were invited as a VIP. For additional free newsletters or to manage your newsletters, click here .

We respect your privacy . If you believe that this e-mail has been sent to you in error, or you no longer wish to receive e-mail from The Washington Post, click here . Contact us for help.

©2015 The Washington Post | 1150 15th St NW, Washington, DC 20071

The Washington Post

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Lauren Peterson" <lpeterson@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Jake Sullivan" <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com>
"Katie Dowd" <kdowd@hillaryclinton.com>
"Jenna Lowenstein" <jlowenstein@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 7/31/2015 6:02:26 AM
Subject: Re: TWEET | Rubio Hits HRC On Cuba, Russia

I vote for just replying directly with no period before the @ - people will see this and it will get pickup. We do need to shorten though - here's my attempt:

@ marcorubio That's backwards—engagement's a threat to the Castros, not a gift. Embargo hasn't worked for 50 yrs. Cuban ppl deserve better -H

On Fri, Jul 31, 2015 at 12:41 PM, Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

+ Nick and Lauren.

From: Brian Fallon [mailto:bfallon@hillaryclinton.com]
Sent: Friday, July 31, 2015 12:39 PM
To: Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com >
Cc: Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com >; Christina Reynolds <creynolds@hillaryclinton.com >; Laura Rosenberger <lrosenberger@hillaryclinton.com >; John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >
Subject: Re: TWEET | Rubio Hits HRC On Cuba, Russia

Like this (w the handle). Lets do it

On Fri, Jul 31, 2015 at 12:35 PM, Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

I like including his handle.

.@marcorubio you've got it backwards: Engagement isn't a gift to the Castros -- it's a threat to the Castros. Embargo hasn't worked for 50+ years. Cuban people deserve better.

On Fri, Jul 31, 2015 at 12:26 PM, Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

Dan/Brian, would love your input on this.

From: Christina Reynolds [mailto:creynolds@hillaryclinton.com]
Sent: Friday, July 31, 2015 12:18 PM
To: Laura Rosenberger <lrosenberger@hillaryclinton.com >
Cc: Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com >; John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >; Brian Fallon <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com >; Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com >
Subject: Re: TWEET | Rubio Hits HRC On Cuba, Russia

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Love hitting him back. Will defer to the policy experts on which one, but I like mixing it up when we have the high ground.

On Jul 31, 2015, at 12:16 PM, Laura Rosenberger <lrosenberger@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

I like that. Another option:

@marcorubio I'm for the Cuban people. Time to stop helping the Castros through failed policies. Going back to those would be the mistake.

From: Jake Sullivan [mailto:jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com]
Sent: Friday, July 31, 2015 12:14 PM
To: John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >; Christina Reynolds <creynolds@hillaryclinton.com >
Cc: Laura Rosenberger <lrosenberger@hillaryclinton.com >; Brian Fallon <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com >; Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com >
Subject: RE: TWEET | Rubio Hits HRC On Cuba, Russia

Adding Reynolds.

Perhaps an HRC tweet along the lines of:

Those who seek to lead our country should focus on the future, not try to pull us back to the past. Embargo hasn't worked for 50+ years. Let's try something new.

From: John Podesta [mailto:john.podesta@gmail.com]
Sent: Friday, July 31, 2015 12:05 PM
To: Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com >
Cc: Laura Rosenberger <lrosenberger@hillaryclinton.com >; Brian Fallon <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com >; Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com >
Subject: RE: TWEET | Rubio Hits HRC On Cuba, Russia

I'm good with either. Whatever is faster.

On Jul 31, 2015 8:00 AM, "Jake Sullivan" <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

> Adding Laura and Fallon. John, did you have in mind having HRC hit back, or campaign?
>
> From: Dan Schwerin [mailto:dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com]
> Sent: Friday, July 31, 2015 10:57 AM
> To: John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >; Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com >
> Subject: Fwd: TWEET | Rubio Hits HRC On Cuba, Russia

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Here we go...

---------- Forwarded message ----------
From: Jeremy Massey <jmassey@hillaryclinton.com >
Date: Fri, Jul 31, 2015 at 10:31 AM
Subject: TWEET | Rubio Hits HRC On Cuba, Russia
To: Clips <clips@hillaryclinton.com >

User Actions

Following

Marco RubioVerified account @marcorubio

After Clinton's failed 'reset' with Putin, now she wants to do a 'reset' with Castro. She is making another mistake.

https://twitter.com/marcorubio/status/627124174495055872

--

Jeremy Massey

Research Department

847 736 9211

JMassey@HillaryClinton.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Tony Podesta" <podesta@podesta.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 10/17/2015 4:31:15 AM
Subject: Re: CLIP | Yahoo: Hillary moneyman highlights new Saudi connection

Thanks
What's your plan for nights of 22 23 24 25

Sent from my iPhone

On Oct 17, 2015, at 12:19 PM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com > wrote:

---------- Forwarded message ----------
From: Sara Latham <slatham@hillaryclinton.com >
Date: Friday, October 16, 2015
Subject: Fwd: CLIP | Yahoo: Hillary moneyman highlights new Saudi connection
To: John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >

---------- Forwarded message ----------
From: Tyson Brody <tbrody@hillaryclinton.com >
Date: Fri, Oct 16, 2015 at 4:13 PM
Subject: CLIP | Yahoo: Hillary moneyman highlights new Saudi connection
To: Clips <clips@hillaryclinton.com >

Hillary moneyman highlights new Saudi connection
Michael Isikoff

Hillary Clinton and Saudi Arabian Defense Minister Prince Salman bin Abdul-Aziz Al Saud prior to a State Department meeting in 2012. (Photo: Alex Wong/Getty Images)

The Saudi government, under increasing criticism over civilian casualties from its airstrikes in Yemen and a harsh crackdown on political dissidents at home, has just hired a powerhouse Washington, D.C., lobbying firm headed by a top Hillary Clinton fundraiser — an arrangement that critics charge raises fresh questions about the influence that foreign government lobbyists could have on her campaign.

The Saudi contract with the Podesta Group, owned by veteran Washington lobbyist and Clinton campaign bundler Tony Podesta, calls for the firm to provide “public relations” and other services on behalf of the royal court of King Salman.

It included an initial “project fee” payment of $200,000 last month and unspecified further sums over the course of the next year, according to documents recently filed with the Justice Department Foreign Agents Registration Act office.

The retention comes at a time the Saudis are being condemned by United Nations officials over reports that its bombings against Houthi strongholds in Yemen’s civil war has resulted in the deaths and injuries of hundreds of innocent civilians, including children.

Adding to the international pressure, the Saudis are also facing criticism from human rights groups over its continued refusal to allow basic rights to women (e.g. the freedom to drive cars). They are also being criticized for their hardline domestic suppression of political dissidents, with draconian punishments such as the sentence — by beheading — recently given to a 20-year-old Shiite political protester.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“They are very nervous about an American policy change, and so they are betting on the horse they think will win — Hillary Clinton,” said Ali Al-Ahmad, a Saudi analyst with the Institute for Gulf Affairs, and a frequent critic of the regime, about the hiring of the Podesta Group.

The Podesta Group is now on a roster of a half-dozen D.C. lobbying firms representing the Saudis, including the giant international law firm of DLA Piper and the firm of Hogan Lovells, whose principal on the Saudi account is former Minnesota Republican Sen. Norm Coleman, who chairs the Congressional Leadership Fund, a super-Pac that is a major source of House GOP campaign funds. (Former Texas congressman Tom Loeffler, a top bundler for Jeb Bush’s presidential campaign, for years representedthe Saudis, but his current firm, Akin Gump, now lobbies for the United Arab Emirates, among other foreign clients.)

But the retention of the Podesta Group has gotten attention in Washington lobbying circles because of its unusually close ties to Hillary Clinton’s campaign: Tony Podesta is the brother and former business partner of Clinton’s campaign chairman, John Podesta. He is also a prolific Democratic Party fundraiser who is among 43 Washington lobbyists (many of whom also represent foreign governments) listed as Clinton campaign bundlers in reports filed by the campaign with the Federal Election Commission.

The reports disclose that Podesta had raised $140,175 for the Clinton campaign through Sept. 30. Two weeks ago, just days after filing its Saudi contract with the Justice Department, Podesta held a Clinton campaign fundraiser at his home that offered fine Italian food cooked by five gourmet chefs, including himself and his brother, the campaign chairman.

The Podesta Group point man on the Saudi account is David Adams, who previously served as assistant secretary of state for legislative affairs in 2011 and 2012, making him Clinton’s chief Capitol Hill lobbyist for her last two years as secretary of state, according to Justice Department filings reviewed by Yahoo News.

But Tony Podesta, while calling himself “a proud Clinton bundler,” vigorously denied that the Saudi contract had anything to do with his efforts to elect her president. “I’ve never had a conversation with Hillary Clinton or anybody in the campaign about the work of the firm,” Podesta said, when reached by Yahoo News on his cell phone while he was dining at a restaurant in Sicily. “We represent a dozen foreign governments around the world — we do good work for them. And it has nothing to do with the Hillary Clinton campaign.”

Asked for comment, Clinton campaign spokesman Josh Schwerin emailed: “Hillary Clinton has a strong record of standing up for human rights, and has spent her career fighting for women and girls around the world. She’s proven that she cannot be intimidated — let alone influenced — to sacrifice these core principles. And so as president she will continue to stand up to countries like Saudi Arabia that don’t allow women to have equality. … Make no mistake, when it comes to U.S. national security, she is guided only by the best interests of our country.“

The Saudis have longstanding ties to the Clintons: The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia is among the largest donors to the Clinton Foundation, contributing between $10 million and $25 million, according to the foundation’s website (which only discloses figures in broad categories, not precise sums.) Bill Clinton has also received hefty fees for speeches in Saudi Arabia, including $600,000 for two talks while Hillary Clinton was secretary of state. Last September 4, Bill Clinton met with King Salman for what was described by one source as a “brief courtesy visit” at the Four Seasons Hotel. Two weeks later, on Sept. 18, the Podesta Group filed papers with the Justice Department reporting that it had been retained by an entity called “the Center for Studies and Media Affairs at the Saudi Royal Court.”

Tony Podesta speaking to Associated Press reporters in Philadelphia, September 2004. (Photo: Jacqueline Larma/AP)

Podesta said he was “unaware” of the Four Seasons hotel meeting between the King and the former president and that his negotiations to represent the Saudis had been going on for several months before that. He declined, however, to talk about precisely what his firm had been retained to do for the Saudis. “We don’t speak on or off the record about what we do for our clients,” he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Podesta is far from the only Clinton campaign bundler to be lobbying for foreign governments or their interests. A review of the Clinton campaign’s bundler list by Yahoo News found lobbyists representing the United Arab Emirates, Bahrain, South Korea, Morocco, Japan, and Hong Kong. (Bush, who among GOP candidates has the most entrenched ties to K Street, received bundled contributions from lobbyists with firms that represent the People’s Republic of China, Turkey, and South Korea.)

Two of the Clinton lobbyist-bundlers, Richard Sullivan and David Jones, are principals in a firm that, until late last year, represented the Russia Direct Investment Fund, a sovereign wealth fund co-founded by Vladimir Putin when he was prime minister. Another Clinton campaign bundler, former New Jersey Sen. Robert Torricelli, is the lobbyist for the Paris-based National Council for Resistance in Iran, a controversial Iranian dissident group that for years had been on the State Department’s terrorism list, but was “de-listed” three years ago.

In her campaign, Hillary Clinton has pledged to push for sweeping campaign finance reform that will “end the stranglehold that wealthy interests have over our political system” and “curb the outsized influence of big money in American politics.” But the role of so many well-heeled foreign lobbyists in Clinton’s campaign fundraising apparatus is “very troubling” and represents a substantial retreat from eight years ago, when then candidate Barack Obama refused to take campaign money at all from any registered lobbyists, said Craig Holman of Public Citizen, a public interest group that has long pushed for wholesale changes in the campaign-finance system.

“This is classic influence-peddling,” said Holman

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "t r u t h o u t" <messenger@truthout.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 8/31/2014 7:27:33 AM
Subject: $15 and Change: How Seattle Led the Country's Wage Revolution

View Recent Newsletters

Tell a friend about Truthout!

Donate Today!

Truthout is a 501(c)3 nonprofit organization; donations are tax deductible.

Sunday, 31 August 2014

truthout

$15 and Change: How Seattle Led the Country's Wage Revolution

David "Goldy" Goldstein, YES!
Magazine: Seattle's path to a $15 minimum wage is a winding tale of effective organizing, smart messaging and luck. It is also a roadmap for bypassing partisan gridlock one city at a time.
Read the Article

Students Should Be Creative Innovators, Not Force-Fed Consumers of Status-Quo Knowledge

Mark Karlin, Truthout: Unless students are empowered to help shape their own educations, and use their skills and energy to fight for justice and make their neighborhoods better places , there will be little progress in solving the nation's most pressing problems, Mark Naison, author of Bad Ass Teachers Unite, tells Truthout.
Read the Interview

"Badhoneywell" Makes Its Nationwide Debut

Mathias Quackenbush, Truthout: The US government's complicity in the Israeli siege of Gaza is no secret, but what remains in the shadows, however, is the alarming extent to which United States corporations like Honeywell profit from the Israeli war machine.
Read the Article

The Plague

John Feffer, Foreign Police In Focus: Ebola is bad news, but it hasn't generated the same kind of fury as that other fast-spreading scourge, namely the Islamic State. The recent beheading of US journalist James Foley has ratcheted up the outrage of American observers.
Read the Article

Artesia, New Mexico: Locking up Children From Cold War to War on Immigrants

Betsy Hartmann, Truthout: It is perhaps not

BuzzFlash

The BuzzFlash commentary for Truthout will return soon.

Ferguson Isn't About Black Rage Against Cops, It's White Rage Against Progress
Read the Article at the Washington Post

Charles Koch Personally Founded a Group Protecting Oil Industry Handouts
Read the Article at The Nation

This 11-Year-Old Was Locked Up Trying to Cross the Border. Read the Heartfelt Letter She Sent Obama
Read the Article at Mother Jones

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

surprising that Homeland Security set up its immigrant detention center for children and families crossing the border in Artesia, New Mexico, where children went to school in an underground shelter in the '60s, amid the bleak nuclear landscape.

Read the Article

Truthout Interviews Featuring Adam Bessie and Dan Carino on Bill Gates, Graphic Journalism, and the Education Reform Hype Machine

Ted Asregadoo, Truthout: Ted Asregadoo speaks to English Professor Adam Bessie and Graphic Journalist Dan Carino about Bill Gates' free-market education reform movement that emphasizes a more technocratic and quantitatively rigid curriculum.

Watch the Video

Nine Extraordinary Ways to Use the Tools of Your Trade in Protest

Nadine Bloch, Waging Nonviolence: Farmers, janitors, musicians and fire fighters have found ways to wield their ordinary tools in extraordinary protests. Here are examples of some of the most iconic forms of activism.

Read the Article

Van Jones and Charles Blow Absolve White America

Margaret Kimberley, Black Agenda Report: The people of Ferguson had no power brokers dissuading protest, claiming to speak for them or cutting deals behind their backs. So they took to the streets day after day and worldwide media attention soon followed.

Read the Article

Trans Women of Color Speaking Truth to Power

Tanisha C. Ford, The Feminist Wire: Trans women of color are fighting to gain greater visibility for trans issues while also creating safe spaces for themselves. Far too often the voices of women at the vanguard of the movement who do not have a global platform are pushed to the margins of our social and political consciousness.

Read the Article

Impending Casino Closures Foreground Atlantic City's Great Divide

Read the Article on MSNBC

Six Other Excessive Force Complaints Filed Against Ferguson PD

Read the Article at Crooks and Liars

Beijing Rules Out Open Elections in Hong Kong

Read the Article at The New York Times

Colorado Town to Ask Higher Court to Uphold Its Fracking Ban

Read the Article at Inside Climate News

This week in Speakout:

Anis Shivani raises doubts about the utopian promises laid out by technology enthusiasts and scientists; Joe Uehlein draws parallels between the Great Depression and conditions in the current recession and suggests a revitalized green Labor movement; The Nuclear Age Peace Foundation says the tiny Marshall Islands nation will continue in its quest to force the US to comply with its commitments under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty; Fran Shor discusses the racism that remains embedded in American football; the Rev. Samuel Weddington notes apartheid roots of the crackdown in Ferguson; Laura Finley asks us to reconsider shelters for housing domestic violence victims; Dean Baker points out the New York Times missed the mark in its criticism of French economic policy and excoriates public funding for inflated university president pay; Ben Ptashnik and Victoria Collier report on the activism surrounding the resumption of water shut-offs in Detroit; Reprieve criticizes Secretary of Defense Chuck Hagel for refusing to release video tapes of Guantanamo detainees being force fed; Emily Homrok raises concerns over the racial composition of wrongful convictions; Gabriel San Roman interviews Tomas Moniz of Rad Dad Magazine on discussing radical politics with children; Kathy Kelly illustrates the hardship of gaining even a basic education in Afghanistan; Roger Annis points to fascist participation in fundraising by Ukrainian activists in Canada and details misconceptions about the roots of conflict in Ukraine; Guerry Hoddersen reviews Ms. Anna and the Tears from the Healing Tree, a book about racial pain and healing in the United States; and more.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Read the Articles

Support Truthout with a tax-deductible donation

Please add messenger@truthout.org to ensure you receive our messages

Truthout is a proud member of the New spaper Guild/CWA, Local 36047

Subscribe | Unsubscribe

Privacy Policy

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>
To:	"Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>
Date:	2/28/2015 9:30:12 AM
Subject:	2.28.15 HRC Clips
Attachments:	20150228 HRC Clips.docx

HRC Clips
February 28, 2015

HRC

At CPAC, Republicans attack Hillary Clinton from every angle (Politico)..... 2
The Democrats might be radio silent for the next year, thanks to Hillary Clinton (The Washington Post) 5
Hillary Clinton has a plan to fix Washington. It is not a good plan. (Vox)..... 7
Hillary Clinton Aides Are in Talks to Fill Top Campaign Roles (The New York Times)..... 10
Hillary Clinton's 'obsession' with money could be an obstacle for her 2016 campaign (Business Insider) 11
Bush, Rubio keep focus on Hillary at CPAC; Candidates avoid bashing each other to conservatives (The Post and Courier) 14
Marco Rubio: Hillary Clinton is 'yesterday' (USA Today)..... 16
Rand Paul: 'It is Time for Hillary Clinton to Permanently Retire' (Bloomberg)..... 17
Rand Paul Slams Hillary Clinton, NSA Spying At Conservative Lovefest (Huffing Post)..... 19
Hillary Clinton stacks March schedule with women's events, a paid speech (CNN)..... 20
If the struggle is for equal pay, Hillary is not the right leader (The Star Telegram)..... 22
Group Backing Netanyahu Will Air Ad Attacking Hillary Clinton (The New York Times)..... 24
Hillary Clinton takes fire from Democrats as Libya chaos creates terrorist safe haven (The Washington Times) 26

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At CPAC, Republicans attack Hillary Clinton from every angle (Politico)
By Gabriel Debenedetti
February 27, 2016
Politico

NATIONAL HARBOR, Md. — Texas Sen. Ted Cruz said Hillary Clinton couldn't make it to the Conservative Political Action Conference because "we couldn't find a foreign nation to foot the bill." Carly Fiorina, the former Hewlett-Packard CEO, insisted Clinton "likes hashtags, but she doesn't know what leadership means." And former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush knocked her on conflict of interest claims involving her family's foundation.

It was amply clear at the annual conservative confab this week that Clinton has eclipsed Barack Obama as the Republican residential hopefuls' main punching bag. But it is the sheer number of distinct anti-Clinton attack lines that is raising eyebrows.

Whether onstage or off, Republicans derided Clinton from every angle. They cast the 67-year-old as yesterday's news, brought up her husband Bill Clinton's 1990s scandals, questioned the rationale for her expected run for the White House, criticized her high-dollar speaking fees, and, of course, lashed her over the Benghazi attacks.

Republicans eager to derail a Clinton 2016 campaign, like those flooding the Gaylord National Resort and Convention Center here, see the panoply of critiques as a show of force against a candidate they insist is more vulnerable than her allies realize. Watching warily from afar, however, Democrats eager to see a Clinton presidency cast the attacks as a sign of confusion in the GOP, predicting the mish-mash of arguments will fail to jell and dent the former secretary of state's image.

Both sides could agree on one thing: that the brewing questions about the Clinton Foundation's funding — the theme gaining most attention at CPAC and among national political operatives in recent weeks — pose special danger for her. "The foundation stuff is real," said a Democrat in Clinton's orbit. "That's hurting."

Clinton has stayed relatively low-key in recent months, appearing in public within the United States for the first time just this week. She is expected to take a formal step toward a presidential run before the end of April, and her allies expect she and her campaign team will engage with such criticisms once she does. Republicans, however, cite her aides' unwillingness to take on the critics now as evidence that Clinton is "hiding" because she doesn't have a good response.

"Hillary barely comes out in public these days," Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus said on stage. "If there's not a private luxury jet and a quarter million-dollar speaking fee waiting for her, you can forget about it."

Republicans' intense and long-standing focus on Clinton suggest many of them expect her to be a formidable candidate. Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, for instance, warned a packed hotel suite of about 100 college students that Clinton has strategic advantages because she is a woman and could make history by winning the White House.

But as White House aspirants paraded through the convention center halls this week and riled up conservative activists from the stage, fellow Republicans brushed off the notion that there were too many arguments against Clinton floating around, pointing out that 2016 hopefuls aren't expected to coordinate their messages.

"Democrats have a real problem if they are complaining about Hillary Clinton having too many vulnerabilities for Republicans to exploit. This is further proof of how flawed their candidate is and why she won't come out of hiding to talk with voters," RNC spokeswoman Allison Moore said.

Democrats pointed out that Clinton, a public figure for decades, has weathered numerous controversies in the past, and that it will be hard for any one issue to change perceptions of her so far ahead of the election, especially when Republicans are hitting her with so many separate criticisms.

"It's more important to get [the campaign launch] right than to be out there to deal with all these one-offs," said former Bill Clinton White House aide Chris Lehane, a Democratic strategist.

The anti-Clinton messages were not limited to the main speakers' stage at CPAC: posters trashing the former first lady line the walls; college-age Republicans frequently refer to Clinton as the enemy as they stroll the hallways; and the official schedule included a screening of an anti-Clinton documentary.

Republican 2016 hopefuls speaking at the convention center aren't trying to sway independents; they're trying to excite the GOP base, and a stinger of a line about Clinton is worth the barrage of attention it will get.

Speaking on Friday afternoon, Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul fumed over the 2012 attacks on the U.S. mission in Benghazi, Libya, whose victims included U.S. Ambassador Christopher Stevens. He called on Clinton to "permanently retire."

"Hillary's war made us less safe," Paul said. "As Hillary was declaring victory in Libya, Ambassador Stevens was pleading for more security."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Asked by conservative media personality Sean Hannity for a one-word description of Clinton a few hours later, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush said, "foreign fundraising."

Some of the harshest attacks of the week against Clinton have come from Fiorina, the sole woman in the emerging GOP presidential field, who appears to be positioning herself as its top Clinton antagonist.

Fiorina zeroed in on the Clinton Foundation and its relationships with foreign governments: "Please explain why we should accept that the millions and millions of dollars that have flowed into the Clinton Global Initiative from foreign governments doesn't represent a conflict of interest," Fiorina implored an energized crowd on Thursday.

Speaking next that afternoon, Cruz went a similar route, saying Clinton "embodies the corruption of Washington." Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, meanwhile, continued his tactic of painting Clinton as a candidate of "yesterday."

But amid the deluge of anti-Clinton talk, one unexpected argument in particular caught CPAC's attention and set the crowd abuzz.

The notion was offered up by popular conservative radio host Laura Ingraham, who was tasked with helping rouse the sleepy activists on Friday morning.

"Why don't we just call it quits?" she asked. "Jeb and Hillary can run on the same ticket."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Democrats might be radio silent for the next year, thanks to Hillary Clinton (The Washington Post)
By Philip Bump
February 27, 2015
The Washington Post

The annual convention/pep rally that is CPAC has attracted a lot of attention over the last few years for fairly obvious reasons. It's many of the most prominent conservative members of the Republican Party, speaking publicly on current issues in an otherwise slow news period. The media loves to amplify the comments made at CPAC, in part because they generate outrage elsewhere. But for those few days, the political press is talking about one thing: conservative Republican politics.

There's no liberal equivalent. There are gatherings that get coverage, but they don't have that same sort of high-profile speaker line-ups and often lack the fire and brimstone you get at CPAC. It's easier to rant against Washington when your party doesn't control the White House, of course, but even in that short window when the Bush years overlapped with a splintered digital media, there wasn't a Democratic focal point.

The GOP will transition from CPAC to the 2016 fight with very little delay; in fact, nearly all coverage of the CPAC speeches is already using a 2016 lens. The first debates aren't for a few months -- August to be exact -- but bear in mind that it has already been two months since Jeb Bush announced his leadership PAC/presidential campaign. Time flies when you're obsessed with a presidential election. Before you know it, it will be late summer, and the Republican candidates will be fighting and clawing in preparation for Iowa. And the political press will talk about one thing: Republican politics.

On the Democratic side, well, there's Hillary Clinton. It's increasingly apparent that she won't face any real opposition in her walk to the nomination in Philadelphia. Jim Webb? Bernie Sanders? Martin O'Malley? No television network is going to preempt an evening's programming to watch Clinton swat them away. Part of the motivation for getting Elizabeth Warren into the race is that her politics are considered more liberal, particularly on economic issues. But in part, it's because there's perhaps no one else who might actually offer Clinton a real contest. Without a real contest, we'll have her announcement, a few speeches after Clinton wins a few big states, and the convention. But otherwise, what?

The theory goes that this is advantageous for Clinton. That she can sit back and raise money and, as needed, bash whoever's popping up in the GOP field. There's validity to that, to be sure. But it also means that the voices that capture the public's attention will be the Republicans criticizing each other -- and her. Especially her. Running some ads or announcing fundraising numbers won't change that. (Nor, it's safe to assume, would another book.)

There is recent evidence that this alleged disadvantage won't matter. In 2011 and early 2012, the conversation was all Republican, all the time. And Obama lackadaisically walked to victory that November. Will voters be as excited about electing Hillary Clinton as they were about reelecting Barack Obama? Perhaps. But it seems very safe to consider that they perhaps may not be. And in 2012, voters were considering someone with a known record who was sitting in the White House. Clinton needs to get people to hear her platform and to get them to believe that she is something new and fresh -- an opportunity she won't likely get until the general election.

This may not matter. Predicting politics a year from now is a fool's errand; there could be a real Democratic nomination fight or a quick Republican one. We'll see. But it's hard to see how 12 to 14 months of increasingly refined debate over which Republican solution will best address America's problems -- and how Hillary Clinton is a move in the wrong direction -- is a good thing for those hoping to elect a Democrat.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton has a plan to fix Washington. It is not a good plan. (Vox)
By Ezra Klein
February 27, 2015
Vox

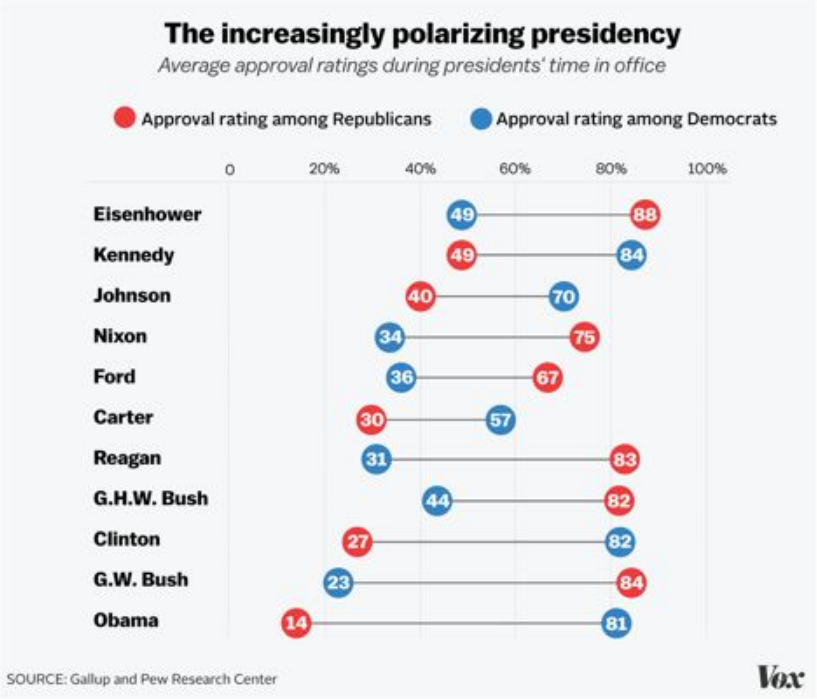
There's a lot of chatter about what Hillary Clinton's campaign will actually be about. But the truth is, coming up with a policy agenda is the easy part. The hard part is going to be persuading voters that that agenda can pass.

The Obama years have been, for liberals, a searing lesson in the limits of the presidency. Obama made huge progress on liberal goals when he had a Democratic majority from 2009-2010. Since then, his legislative agenda has been blocked. A president without a Congress can't make much change. And the next Democratic president isn't going to have a Democratic Congress. Population patterns and gerrymandering mean the House is safely under GOP control at least into the 2020s.

Now, with Republicans nearly certain to keep control of the House, the 2016 Democratic candidates are going to have to somehow convince voters that they not only have ideas, but they have a plausible plan for getting those ideas passed into law.

The New York Times reports that at the Watermark Silicon Valley Conference for Women, Clinton previewed her answer. It's not very good:

She spoke at length about bipartisanship and promoted her record of working with Republicans in Arkansas and as a senator from New York. Her objective, should she run for president, would be to end partisan gridlock, she told Ms. Swisher.



"I'd like to bring people from right, left, red, blue, get them into a nice warm purple space where everybody is talking and where we're actually trying to solve problems," Mrs. Clinton said.

And I'd like to ride a Google Bus to work in the morning. But it's not going to happen. I don't work at Google. And Hillary Clinton doesn't work in a political system where right, left, red and blue are going to meld into a warm purple.

One reason Clinton lost in 2008 was that many believed her too polarizing to elect. They were tired of the partisan wars, the bitter divisions. They wanted a president who seemed capable of bridging differences, not destined to deepen the divides. In his influential endorsement of Obama, "Goodbye to All That," Andrew Sullivan wrote:

Clinton will always be, in the minds of so many, the young woman who gave the commencement address at Wellesley, who sat in on the Nixon implosion and who once disdained baking cookies. For some, her husband will always be the draft dodger who smoked pot and wouldn't admit it. And however hard she tries, there is nothing Hillary Clinton can do about it. She and Giuliani are conscripts in their generation's war. To their respective sides, they are war heroes.

As the thinking went, Clinton was intrinsically polarizing. She couldn't end the war because she was part of the war. But Obama, as a political and generational outsider, could end the war. He clearly believed this too. But he was wrong. Obama made the war worse.

Obama has been the most polarizing president since the advent of polling. But before him, it was George W. Bush. And before Bush, it was Bill Clinton. Party polarization — and its result, partisan gridlock — is structural, not individual. Obama couldn't end it. Clinton certainly can't. The fundamental fact of American politics right now is that party polarization is natural, partisan behavior is rational and gridlock is the result.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton is promising what Obama, Bush, and, well, Clinton promised before her — to make politics work by making it less polarized. But she's not going to make it less polarized. She's somehow going to have to make it work even though it is polarized.

In 2008, Clinton made a version of this point in response to Obama's challenge:

Now I could stand up here and say 'Let's just get everybody together, Let's get unified. The sky will open. The light will come down. Celestial choirs will be singing. And everyone will know we should do the right thing and the world will be perfect.' Maybe I've just lived a little long, but I have no illusions about how hard this is going to be. You are not going to wave a magic wand and have the special interests disappear.

When Clinton talks about "special interests," she presumably doesn't include the Republicans. But they're not going to disappear either, and nor is partisan gridlock. If her plan is to pretend otherwise and to try to persuade the electorate that the gridlock of the last few years is unique to this era, well, that's not a very good plan.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton Aides Are in Talks to Fill Top Campaign Roles (The New York Times)
By Maggie Haberman
February 27, 2015
The New York Times

Hillary Rodham Clinton's advisers are in serious discussions with nearly a half-dozen operatives to fill key roles such as political director on a likely 2016 presidential campaign.

The prospects are mostly people who have worked with Mrs. Clinton before, according to a person familiar with the discussions, who asked for anonymity to speak freely about personnel discussions.

The conversations reflect a fast-moving effort by Mrs. Clinton to build a campaign as a number of Democratic Party operatives are vying for position. While the budding campaign had been criticized as too white and too male in its early stages, this group of operatives is diverse and would give Mrs. Clinton a number of women and people of color in top jobs.

They include Amanda Renteria, the first Hispanic woman to work as a chief of staff to a senator when she was on the staff of Debbie Stabenow of Michigan. Ms. Renteria, whose parents were immigrants from Mexico and worked as fruit pickers in California, is expected to be the campaign's political director. Ms. Renteria ran unsuccessfully for Congress last year.

Marlon Marshall, who worked on Mrs. Clinton's 2008 presidential campaign and later took a job with President Obama's White House, is likely to be in charge of all her state strategies in 2016. Mr. Marshall is also very close with Robby Mook, Mrs. Clinton's expected campaign manager. Mr. Marshall is often described as Mr. Mook's "right hand."

A third potential employee, Tracey Lewis, is currently working for Senator Elizabeth Warren, Democrat of Massachusetts. She worked for Mrs. Clinton's 2008 presidential campaign in New Hampshire, and before that she was the first African-American to run the Massachusetts Democratic Party's coordinated campaign efforts, when Deval Patrick was running for governor in 2006.

Brynne Craig, who's been working as a scheduler for Mrs. Clinton, is another who is close to Mr. Mook and who is also likely to be chosen for a deputy political director role, according to the person familiar with the campaign plans. She was political director on the 2013 campaign for Virginia governor by Mrs. Clinton's friend Terry McAuliffe, a race that Mr. Mook managed.

Matt Ortega, an operative who works as the digital director at the Democratic firm New Partners, has had conversations with the campaign about working on Mrs. Clinton's digital strategy. New Partners has a contract with Mrs. Clinton to conduct research into her potential vulnerabilities.

One person who has already been brought on board for Mrs. Clinton is Dennis Cheng, who led the Clinton Foundation's endowment efforts and is a trusted ally. He is having extensive conversations about filling more than a half-dozen regional jobs, according to people who've been privy to the conversations.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton's 'obsession' with money could be an obstacle for her 2016 campaign (Business Insider)
By Colin Campbell
February 27, 2015
Business Insider

For Hillary Clinton, more money means more problems.

Clinton, the Democratic presidential front-runner in 2016, is under a barrage of criticism for her finances including her six-figure speaking fees and her foundation's fundraising practices. The headlines have some experts on both sides of the aisle convinced Clinton's cash could be an issue in her prospective White House bid.

Multiple Republicans working on the 2016 race told Business Insider they thought Clinton's finances were a major weakness for her on the campaign trail.

"I think that it absolutely would be a potent attack against Hillary Clinton, if only for the fact that she's just not able to relate to the guy who's actually waiting paycheck to paycheck," one GOP operative said.

In the most explosive development, The Washington Post reported Wednesday night that the Bill, Hillary & Chelsea Clinton Foundation broke an agreement it made with the White House by taking a $500,000 contribution from the Algerian government while Clinton was secretary of state. The agreement was designed to prevent foreign governments from indirectly currying favor with the State Department through Clinton.

A Democratic operative told Business Insider the story created "a line of attack that should keep Hillaryland up at night."

"Accepting foreign donations is a huge conflict of interest, and their decision to reverse the ban is mind-boggling," the Democrat said.

Indeed, almost immediately after the story about the donations broke, the GOP pounced. In a statement, Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus ripped into Clinton's fundraising "obsession" and said it should disqualify her from the presidency.

"The latest revelations about the Clinton Foundation's shady deals are disqualifying," Priebus said. "No one in their right mind, Democrat or Republican, can think the foundation receiving foreign government donations while Hillary Clinton served as secretary of state, and in violation of its ethics agreement with the Obama administration, is acceptable. This is symptomatic of the Clintons' obsession with raising cash at all costs."

The Algerian contribution is only a small drop in the $2 billion bucket reportedly raised by Clinton's foundation over the years. A significant amount of that money is from foreign entities, including Saudi Arabia, which has widespread human-rights abuses, and Qatar, which has a history of supporting an Al Qaeda affiliate.

Clinton's foundation isn't the only aspect of her finances that has generated negative headlines. Despite widespread criticism of her paid speeches — which can command as much as $300,000 an event — Clinton has continued giving them. The organizations she speaks to have included esoteric groups like the New York regional chapter of the American Camp Association, as well as public universities like the University of Nevada at Las Vegas. UNLV students unsuccessfully petitioned Clinton to return the money to their school, which is in an important swing state.

Clinton's most recent paid appearance, at a Silicon Valley gathering of professional women, generated a damning Yahoo News headline: "Hillary Clinton paid $300,000 to explain what ails the middle class."

A representative for Clinton did not respond to a request for comment from Business Insider.

And it's not just Republicans who have been raising questions about Clinton's behavior. A Democratic strategist who spoke to Business Insider said Clinton's decision to keep taking lucrative speaking fees and foreign donations was "baffling" in light of the problems it could cause for her brand.

"You can kind of massage policy things, but these are just avoidable mistakes, and in many ways it feeds a narrative that's far more damaging than if she wasn't pure on trade, or healthcare, or some other issue — so, it's baffling," the strategist said.

Robert Gibbs, a former spokesman for President Barack Obama, also described Clinton's finances as a potential obstacle for her presidential ambitions in an appearance on NBC's "Meet the Press" on Sunday. Gibbs said the foreign donations to Clinton's foundation have an appearance that is "awkward at best" and alluded to the steady drumbeat of bad press relating to her finances.

"I think they're going to have to do something in the very short term to deal with this in a way that puts it off the table," Gibbs added. "I think there are a lot of people that have watched the sort of slow roll of the Hillary Clinton campaign, really dating back to last year with a book tour that some wondered what she was doing. ... There has been a slow roll of concerning headlines for a long time."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Indeed, Clinton's potential rivals have already started making her money an issue. Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) was one of many potential 2016 candidates who mocked the Clinton foundation's foreign contributions at the conservative confab CPAC this week.

"We could have had Hillary here, but we couldn't find a foreign nation to foot the bill," he quipped to laughter on Thursday.

The Republican operative who spoke to Business Insider said the revelation about the Algerian donation wouldn't just be a problem for Clinton in the next few days. The operative predicted the issue could be used as ammunition against her throughout the coming campaign.

"I think what you're seeing is maybe one of the first big hits on her that seems to be resonating," the Republican said. "It's certainly raising ethical questions. And you can take it to the bank that the headlines that are being produced from these stories are going to be in television ads over the next few years."

In addition to Clinton's finances providing fodder for attacks from her opponents, the Democratic strategist suggested they could also prevent Clinton from hitting her rivals on their wealth or coziness to corporate interests.

"At best, if we were running against Mitt Romney and she was the nominee, then it would be a wash. But we're not going to be that lucky this time," the Democrat said. "And from an operative's standpoint, it makes me nuts because it takes so much off the table that you might be able to use to go after [Jeb] Bush or one of the other Republicans."

Given the issues her speaking fees and the foreign donations to her foundation could pose for Clinton's presidential ambitions, nearly all the sources who spoke to Business Insider expressed shock she hasn't stopped taking the money as she prepares to launch.

"It's a form of arrogance that they think that they can continue doing it and not be held accountable for it and not get called out for it," the GOP operative said of Clinton and her family. "It's not like they didn't know that she was going to be running or that this was a possibility."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush, Rubio keep focus on Hillary at CPAC; Candidates avoid bashing each other to conservatives (The Post and Courier)

By Schuyler Kropf
February 28, 2015
The Post and Courier (South Carolina)

NA TIONAL HARBOR, Md. — The anticipated race to the right at the annual CPAC gathering of conservative activists has, instead, been largely a cathartic opportunity to bash Hillary Clinton and President Barack Obama.

Even natural rivals among the potential Republican presidential contenders who normally would be trying to outdo each other in proving they are more conservative have held their fire in talking about each other, reserving it instead for the Democrats.

"That's who's the 800-pound gorilla right now," said Charles Harvey, of Charleston, referring to Clinton during a break at the Conservative Political Action Conference. "This is a conservative rallying point."

South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham, who is considering a run for the White House, skipped CPAC, leading some political observers to say he wanted to avoid a confrontation with far-right activists who view him as a liberal when even being considered a moderate can be the kiss of death at CPAC.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush risked that in appearing Friday, as did Florida Sen. Marco Rubio. But both emerged mostly unscathed, primarily by focusing their criticism on the common enemy.

Bush, whose middle-of-the-road appeal is often touted as his strength in seeking the White House, drew the most "boos" from the audience during his 20-minute appearance. But the real vitriol was reserved for Clinton.

Some of the speakers at the convention have equated a Clinton White House to a third Obama term. The president and the former secretary of state were repeatedly vilified for the Affordable Care Act — known as Obamacare — and the perceived loss of U.S. prestige in the world.

"Our allies no longer trust us and our enemies no longer fear us," Rubio said Friday, repeating a variation of a line often used by the speakers this week about the "Obama-Clinton" foreign policy.

He equated the words "Hillary Clinton" to the one word answer: "Yesterday." Obama was called "Failed."

"Hillary's war in Libya is a perfect example," said Kentucky Republican Sen. Rand Paul, joining in the Democrat bashing. "Hillary's war made us less safe — Libya's less stable.

"It's time for Hillary Clinton to permanently retire."

Attendees said they were fine with the blistering tone, as long as it was directed at the Democrats.

"It's not all Hillary bashing, but a lot of it is Hillary bashing," said Sam Wigle, a junior at Clemson University and among a large cadre of young conservatives attending the convention.

All of the unannounced candidates avoided attacks on their potential GOP primary opponents, except one: Developer Donald Trump went after Bush.

"He's in favor of Common Core; he's weak on immigration," said Trump. "I don't see there's any way. You people are going to have to make your own choice."

Bush was the last of the potential candidates to speak at the gathering, which wraps up Saturday with a straw poll by the attendees of their presidential choices. He did face a slight rebellion when dozens of tea party-aligned Floridians walked out of his speech in quiet protest.

Wigle said the Republicans still have time to work out their divisions and settle on their candidate.

"We're so far away from the actual voting," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Marco Rubio: Hillary Clinton is 'yesterday' (USA Today)
February 27, 2015
USA Today

NATIONAL HARBOR, Md. — Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, the most focused on national security of the potential 2016 field, said Friday that the administration's "Obama-Clinton" foreign policy means "our allies no longer trust us and our enemies no longer fear us."

Rubio said it was his fifth appearance at the Conservative Political Action Conference, but his first as a potential presidential candidate.

At 43, he's the youngest of the potential presidential candidate. Asked what the words "Hillary Clinton" meant to him, he replied, "Yesterday."

Rubio advocated a ground war against the Islamic State fought by a "coalition" of nations including U.S. special operation forces and U.S. air support.

"If we wanted to defeat them militarily, we would do it," Rubio said, but President Obama "doesn't want to upset Iran."

Rubio drew criticism from his own party when he advocated immigration reform that would allow a pathway to citizenship for immigrants living in the U.S. illegally. He has since changed his position.

"It wasn't very popular, I don't know if you know that from people here," he joked before the CPAC audience. "What I've learned is that you can't even have a conversation about that until people believe" that future illegal immigration will be controlled.

"Americans know we're exceptional, and most of all, the world knows. When was the last time you heard of a boatload of American refugees arriving on the shores of another country?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rand Paul: 'It is Time for Hillary Clinton to Permanently Retire' (Bloomberg)
By David Weigel
February 27, 2015
Bloomberg

Kentucky Senator Rand Paul was supposed to speak at 10:40 a.m. Then, it was 11:40 a.m. As first Sean Hannity, then Donald Trump took the CPAC stage to free-associate about freedom, libertarian fans of Paul–many clad in STAND WITH RAND T-shirts bearing a silhouette of the senator–grew a little restless.

"I came up a half hour ago to see Rand, and it didn't work, so I thought I'd try again," joked Cato Institute vice president David Boaz. (For the record, he was not wearing one of the T-shirts.)

Paul's delay, which was delayed by 20 minutes away in the Capitol, had aftershocks. When Hannity polled the crowd for their views of the 2016 candidates, Paul got a roar of approval. The names of Jeb Bush and Chris Christie drew loud, lusty boos, duly recorded by hundreds of reporters and tweeters. Trump, never a disciplined speaker, ran into the same bear trap when he suggested "boots on the ground" could defeat ISIS and had his hair (figuratively) blown back by jeers.

Finally, closer to 12:30 p.m., Paul took the stage to some of the weekend's loudest applause and the smooth rock sounds of the Edward Winter Group's "Frankenstein." As it had been for Scott Walker's Thursday speech, the Potomac ballroom was filled to the edges.

"There comes a time in the history of nations when fear and forgetfulness cause a nation to hesitate, to waver, and perhaps even to succumb," said Paul. "When that time comes, those who love liberty must rise to the occasion. Will you lovers of liberty rise to the occasion?"

It sounded like a quote from a founding father; it was a Paul original. Paul spoke in high dudgeon about the conflicts in the Levant and the culprits in the rise of ISIS. "Hillary's war made it less safe," said Paul, leading to the growth of "a dangerous and barbaric cult" that perverted Islam.

"We need a foreign policy that encourages stability, not chaos," Paul said. "At home, conservatives understand that the government is the problem, not the solution. As conservatives, we should not succumb to the notion that a government inept at home will somehow become successful abroad." That was not just a whack at the party's hawks. "It is time for Hillary Clinton to permanently retire," said Paul, though that line did not generate as many cheers as the self-criticism of the GOP did.

Paul moved on to a recap of his trips to "Ferguson, Detroit, Chicago," and other blue cities that proved that "liberal policies had failed urban America." In the speech, and in a Q&A, he cited Martin Luther King, Jr.'s concept of two Americas, "two stark American experiences that run side by side." He "was born into the America that experiences in and believes in opportunity," but he knew what ailed the people in the other America.

"In the coming weeks," said Paul, "I will propose the biggest tax cut in American history, a tax cut on every worker in America. It will cut spending and balance the budget in just five years."

The Q&A, a feature of this CPAC that has taken wildly different forms for different candidates, made up just a few minutes at the end of Paul's time. The questions were friendly -- one asked if "curly hair" was a "gift from God," which allowed Paul to poke fun at himself. Another asked how the GOP could reach out to libertarians who were skeptical of them.

"Nominate Rand Paul!" yelled a man in the crowd.

"Good answer," said Paul.

He delivered his usual argument that true conservatism focused "on the fourth amendment, not just the second amendment," and after a few more questions he walked off the stage to "Frankenstein." Around half of the crowd left with him, as former Pennsylvania Senator Rick Santorum came onstage. The discussion among Paul fans was whether to return just in time for Jeb Bush's Q&A–and then walk out.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rand Paul Slams Hillary Clinton, NSA Spying At Conservative Lovefest (Huffing Post)
By Jennifer Bendery
February 27, 2015
Huffington Post

NATIONAL HARBOR, Md. -- Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) was the guy that everyone wanted to hear speak at the Conservative Political Action Conference, and he didn't disappoint.

In a speech Friday, Paul hit on all the issues that make a young libertarian salivate. He vowed to repeal "every last bit" of the Affordable Care Act. He wondered aloud how we can trust the government to rebuild nations abroad if it can't deliver the mail here. He criticized President Barack Obama for driving up the debt, and said Hillary Clinton was "forever" unfit to run for office because of her "dereliction of duty" as secretary of state in the wake of the 2012 attacks in Benghazi, Libya.

Don't like the National Security Agency collecting your data? Neither does Paul. "The phone records of law-abiding citizens are none of the government's damn business!" he said, drawing loud cheers.

The 2016 presidential hopeful even had a little bit of news: He announced that in the coming weeks, he plans to unveil the "largest tax cut in American history," a plan that will, somehow, simultaneously cut spending and balance the budget in five years.

"I will keep the IRS out of your life and out of the way of every job creator in America," Paul declared.

Paul's supporters came in droves to see him speak. Hundreds of people wearing "Stand with Rand" T-shirts filled the ballroom before he spoke, and cleared the room as soon he was done. In a show of loyalty, many fans were planning a mass walkout later when Jeb Bush, one of Paul's more moderate rivals for the 2016 Republican nomination, was scheduled to take the stage.

"President Paul! President Paul!" they shouted at Paul, who chuckled as he wrapped up his speech.

But for some CPAC attendees, particularly the young and fickle, a fiery speech by a GOP presidential contender may have just been something fun to check out, rather than an indication of voter support ahead of 2016. Some were just as eager to find out when the star of "Duck Dynasty" was scheduled to speak.

"Great guy," said one college-aged attendee as he walked out after Paul's speech. "He won't be president, though."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton stacks March schedule with women's events, a paid speech (CNN)
By Dan Merica
February 27, 2015
CNN

After a handful events in two months, Hillary Clinton has filled her March with a mix of women's events, nonprofit speeches and at least one paid appearance.

In January and February, Clinton headlined three events -- only one of which was in the United States. But as Clinton moves closer to her expected 2016 presidential campaign announcement, the former secretary of state has at least seven events scheduled for the month of March.

Most of Clinton's events are focused on one thing: women.

Clinton starts her month by headlining the 30th anniversary gala for Emily's List -- a pro-Clinton organization that focused on helping Democratic women win elected office. At the D.C. speech on March 3, Clinton is expected to give a nod to the group's importance to Democrats and highlight the reason more women are needed in politics.

Emily's List has been energized by Clinton's campaign and has pledged to raise and spend more money than any other election cycle because of the prospect of a Clinton White House.

The following week, Clinton will headline two New York events tied to her 1995 speech to the U.N. Fourth World Conference on Women in Beijing -- a speech Clinton regularly references in pitches to women. In that speech Clinton said, "If there is one message that echoes forth from this conference, let it be that human rights are women's rights and women's rights are human rights once and for all."

On March 9, Clinton teams up with Chelsea, her daughter, and Melinda Gates to release a report through the Clinton Foundation that looks at "the gaps that still remain" in women's participation in the economy and politics.

The following day -- on March 10 -- Clinton will headline the United Nation's Women Empowerment Principles annual gathering in New York. Clinton will use the speech to outline the findings in the Clinton Foundation report and "reflect on progress made in implementing the agenda set in Beijing two decades ago," the organizers said in a release about the event.

On March 16, Clinton will be inducted into the Irish America Hall of Fame at an event in New York. Clinton is not Irish -- her family is of English, Scottish, French, and Welsh descent -- but she is being hooded because of "her dedicated work on Irish Peace Process."

"Hillary Rodham Clinton is one of the unsung heroes of the success of the Irish peace process," said Irish America co-founder Niall O'Dowd.

In 1998, Clinton put together the Vital Voices Conference of women in Belfast, a body that pressed for a piece agreement. The former secretary of state cited her experiences in Ireland during a number of speeches in 2014.

O'Dowd is a longtime Clinton supporter, though,and was a member of her 2008 campaign finance team. Some Republicans have questioned how active Clinton was in the Northern Ireland peace process. The Washington Post Fact Checker wrote in 2008 that Clinton "seems to be overstating her significance as a catalyst in the Northern Ireland peace process, which was more symbolic than substantive," but that she did play "a helpful role at the margins."

On March 19, Clinton will headline her only confirmed paid speech of the month when she heads to Atlantic City for the American Camp Association, NY & NJ Conference.

Susie Lupert, the group's executive director, tells CNN, "Yes, just like most nonprofits and conferences, she is being paid for her appearance." But she would not confirm how much she is being paid. On average, Clinton makes between $200,000 and $300,000 per speech.

Near the end of the month, on March 23 in Washington, D.C., Clinton will be the keynote speaker at the award celebration for the Toner Prize for Excellence in Political Reporting from Syracuse University.

Robin Toner, who graduated from Syracuse, was the first woman national political correspondent for the New York Times.

Syracuse Dean Lorraine Branham said Clinton is a "vivid example — like Robin — of a pioneering woman at the top of her profession."

Clinton headlining an event honoring political journalists is somewhat unique because for decades she has held a dim view of the profession.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a 1996, according to the diary of the late Clinton confidant Diane Blair, Clinton said the media are "complete hypocrites." At an event in 2014, Clinton said "journalism has changed quite a bit in a way that is not good for the country and not good for journalism."

"A lot of serious news reporting has become more entertainment driven and more opinion-driven as opposed to factual," she said. "People book onto the shows, political figures, commentators who will be controversial who will be provocative because it's a good show. You might not learn anything but you might be entertained and I think that's just become an unfortunate pattern that I wish could be broken."

Clinton's presidential campaign has become a forgone conclusion and Democrats close to Clinton expect she will announce some official move towards the presidency in April.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If the struggle is for equal pay, Hillary is not the right leader (The Star Telegram)
By Richard Greene
February 27, 2015
The Star Telegram

Those wanting to see a political rant break out on this year's Oscars show didn't have to wait long for their wish to be fulfilled.

My wife and I are movie lovers. We watch four or five of them on our home screen just about every week.

We must be one of Redbox's best customers, and when we can't find what we want from one of their nearby dispensers, we turn to iTunes, or Netflix, or U-verse or our own library of several hundred DVDs.

Adding to our long engagement with the wonder of moving pictures is our enjoyment of following the success of family members working in the industry.

So you will find us among the legions of movie fans viewing the annual presentation of the Academy Awards.

It's always a risk that our enthusiasm for the art and magic of moviemaking will take a hit when performers seize the occasion to reveal their political agendas.

I know, they are certainly as free as the rest of us to express their views, but I would like it much better if we didn't know anything at all about the private or political lives of actors and actresses.

Sometimes such insight affects the ability to become absorbed in their films and takes the edge off the admiration of their exceptional talents.

Unsurprisingly though, some use their freedom of expression and celebrity to try to shape our society and align themselves with politicians who will pursue the results they want.

Preparations were well underway prior to this year's event to advance the narrative of equal rights for women -- a political issue that seems to loom high among the priorities in the upcoming race to elect the next president.

Helping to set the stage for what was to follow was a Hillary Clinton super PAC tweeting the hashtag #askhermore, a campaign supported by Hollywood activists to get beyond the "who are you wearing" meme that has dominated interviews with female stars on Oscar night's Red Carpet.

